

The Bookman

VOLUME XLII.

APRIL—SEPTEMBER, 1912.

London:

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,

WARWICK SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

APRIL—SEPTEMBER, 1912.

	PAGE		PAGE
Accordance with the Evidence, In. (Oliver Onions.) By A.	88	Drone, The. (Rutherford Mayne.) By A. H. J.	38
Adventures of Miss Gregory, The. (P. Gibbon.) By S. J.	176	Dunleary. (Edmund Downey.) By A. St. John Adcock	37
Afoot Round London. ("Pathfinder.") By May Byron.	80	Endless Journey, The. (N. Syrett.) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
All Manner of Folk. (H. Jackson.) By J. Clayton	263	English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy. (Prof. James Seth.) By Y. Y.	81
Also and Perhaps. (Sir F. Swettenham.) By J. Clayton	263	English Thought for English Thinkers. (St. G. Stock.) By Y. Y.	81
American Story Tellers (F. T. Cooper.) By A. St. J. Adcock	36	Esther. (Agnes E. Jacob.) By F. M. A.	83
Anglo-Indians, The. (Alice Perrin)	261	Exit Eliza. (Barry Pain.) By A. St. John Adcock	37
Anthropology. (R. R. Marett.) By T. E. Page	44	Family Living, The. (E. H. Lacon Watson)	134
Architecture (W. R. Lethaby) By T. E. Page	44	Famous Houses (A. St. J. Adcock.) By H. Baerlein	179
Aspects of the Irish Question. (Sydney Brooks)	207	Father Sergius, etc. (Leo Tolstoi.) By A. St. John Adcock	37
At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque. (A. France.) By R. Curle	259	Fines: Book I. (W. W. Gibson) By Francis Bickley	86
Bachelor's Comedy, A. (J. E. Buckrose)	135	Forest on the Hill, The. (F. Phillpotts) By K. Snowden	38
Bergson, Henri. (H. Wildon Carr.) By T. E. Page	128	Four French Adventurers. (Stoddard Dewey.)	215
Between Two Stools. (Rhoda Broughton)	134	Four Men, The. (Hilaire Belloc.) By Walter Jerrold	216
Between Two Thieves (Richard Dehan.) By W. A. F.	264	Fourth Generation. (J. Ross) By W. A. MacKenzie	250
Beyond that is Within. (E. Broutroux.) By Dr. W. Barry	201	Friar of Wittenberg, The. (William Stearns Davis.) By I.	214
Blinds Down. (H. A. Vachell)	133	From the Angle of Seventeen. (Eden Phillpotts) By Keighley Snowden.	266
BOOKMAN Gallery, The—		Garrick, David, and His French Friends. (Frank A. Hedgcock) By W. H. Helm	43
The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell. By I. N.	53	George III. and Charles Fox. (Right Hon. Sir G. O. Trevelyan) By Lewis Melville	30
E. Temple Thurston. By A. M.	103	Ghost Ship, The. (R. Middleton) By W. A. MacKenzie	172
Bookman's Table, The—		Goethe. (Joseph McCabe) By Henry Murray	171
Anglo-American Memories. George W. Smalley	223	Goethe and His Women Friends (Mary Caroline Crawford.) By Henry Murray	171
Anima Celtica. Reginald C. Hine	93	Great Russian Realist. (J. A. T. Lloyd.) By G. Sampson	85
Autobiography of a Working Woman, The. A. Popp	94	Green Overcoat, The. (Hilaire Belloc.) By Walter Jerrold	216
Behind the Nightlight. Joan Maude	183	Hadji Murad, etc. (Leo Tolstoi.) By A. St. John Adcock	37
Behind the Ranges. F. G. Aflalo	46	Halecyone. (Elnor Glyn.) By S. J.	175
By the Way. William Allingham	182	Harvey, Martin. (George Edgar)	205
Chiefs and Cities of Central Africa. Olive Macleod	140	Hearn, Lafcadio. (Nina H. Kennard) By Francis Bickley	34
Church in Pages of "Punch." Rev. D. W. Duthie	221	Heralds of the Dawn (W. Watson) By F. Bickley	170
Colour Music. A. Wallace Rimington	94	Heredity (J. A. S. Watson) By T. E. Page	128
Comedy of Catherine the Great, The. Francis Gribble	94	History of England, The. (A. F. Pollard) By T. E. Page	44
Drake in California. Hermann Scheffauer	140	History of Scotland. (T. H. Brown) By T. Seccombe	125
Early Court of Queen Victoria, The. Clare Jerrold	47	History of the Modern World. (O. Browning) By F. M. A.	207
Future of Poetry, The. E. P. B. Osmaston	141	Hodder & Stoughton's Prize Novel Competition, Result	190
Judgments in Vacation. His Honour Judge Parry	47	How 'Twas. (Stephen Reynolds.) By Richard Curle	204
Life of Emanuel Swedenborg, A. George Frobridge.	270	Hugo, Victor. (A. F. Davidson.) By F. G. Bettany	120
London Stories. John o' London	93	Idealed John Bullesses, My. (Y. Markino) By H. Baerlein	41
Lower Depths, The. Maxim Gorky	221	In Cotton Wool. (W. B. Maxwell)	133
Masque of the Elements, The. Hermann Scheffauer.	140	Indian Lily, The. (H. Sudermann.) By A. St. J. Adcock	38
Nights at the Play. H. M. Walbrook	222	Individuality and Art. (H. E. A. Furst.) By Dixon Scott	131
Norse King's Bridal, The. E. M. Smith-Dampier	272	Injured Queen, An. (Lewis Melville)	175
Oiné: A Play in Four Acts. Nean	48	Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. (Baron d'Ambes)	261
On the Backwaters of the Nile. Rev. A. L. Kitching.	140	Inviolable Sanctuary, The. (George A. Birmingham)	135
Piers Plowman. Dorothy L. Owen	183	Irish Year, My. (Padraic Colum.) By H. A. Hinkson	209
Plays and Poems. Oliver Goldsmith	184	Iscariot, The. (Eden Phillpotts.) By Francis Bickley	87
Praise of Cambridge, In. Sidney Waterlow	272	Joseph in Jeopardy. (Frank Danby) By F. M. A.	82
Praise of Edinburgh, In. Rosaline Mason	272	Julia France. (Gertrude Atherton.) By Walter Jerrold	132
Psychic Autobiography, A. Amanda T. Jones	222	King, Edward. (G. W. E. Russell) By James Moffatt	40
Real Captain Cleveland, The. Allan Ica	183	Lady Next Door, The. (Harold Begbie)	207
Royal Romances of To-day. Kellogg Durland	270	Landmarks in French Literature. (G. F. Strachey.) By T. E. Page	44
Setting Sun, The. Anon.	141	Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith. (J. S. Black and G. Chrystal.) By Rev. Prof. J. Denney	157
Short History of Music in England, A. Ernest Ford	221	Lifeboat and Its Story. (N. T. Methley.) By J. E. Patterson	214
Some Old English Worthies. Dorothy Senior	222	Life's Great Adventure (F. Stopford) By J. Clayton	263
Studies and Appreciations. William Sharp	222	Listeners, The. (W. de la Mare.) By Edward Thomas	204
Studies in Arcady. R. L. Gales	183	Little Incidents. (F. Watson) By Coulson Kernahan	76
Vagrom Men. Allied F. Story	183	London Windows. (Ethel Talbot.) By Francis Bickley	87
William James. Emile Broutroux	94	Lost Interest, A. (Mrs. George Wemyss)	134
Books, Notes on New	48, 96, 142, 184, 223, 274	Love's Pilgrimage (Upton Sinclair) By S. J.	175
Bookseller's Diary, The	6, 55, 105, 147, 191, 220	Lure of the Sea, The. (J. E. Patterson) By E. W.	178
Borrow, George, Life of. (H. Jenkins.) By T. Seccombe	27	Making of the Nations, The: Scotland. (Robert S. Rait.) By Thomas Seccombe	126
Boswell's Autobiography. (P. Fitzgerald.) By R. Straus	35	Man Who Could Not Lose. (R. H. Davis.) By A. St. J. Adcock	36
Botany. (M. C. Stopes.) By T. E. Page	128	Man Who Stroked Cats. (M. Roberts) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
Branson Heath. (C. Reginald Enock.) By S. J.	175	Margaret of France. (W. Stephens.) By Thomas Seccombe	126
Brass Faces. (Charles McEvoy.) By S. J.	175	Mary, Queen of Scots. (E. O'Neill.) By T. E. Page	128
Brothers Karamazov. (F. Dostoievski.) By G. Sampson	210	Matador of the Five Towns. (A. Bennett.) By F. G. Bettany	32
Browning, Robert, The Early Literary Career of. (T. R. Lounsbury.) By Roger Ingpen.	74	May's Constitutional History of England. (Francis Holland.) By Thomas Seccombe	127
By-ways of Belief. (Conrad Noel) By James Moffatt	78	Mazzini, Letters and Recollections of. (Mrs. H. King)	130
Cabbages and Kings. (O. Henry) By A. St. John Adcock	36	Memoir of Fleeming Jenkin. (R. I. Stevenson)	262
Canada. (A. G. Bradley.) By T. E. Page	44	Memoirs of Francesco Crispi, The. (T. Palamenghi-Crispi)	130
Captain Quadring (William Hay.) By F. M. A.	82	Modern Italian Literature. (J. C. Morley.) By H. H. Wilson	31
Century of New Zealand's Praise. (A. Wall.) By F. Bickley	87	Moods, Songs, and Doggerels. (John Galsworthy.) By A. St. John Adcock	127
Change in the Village. (George Bourne.)	87	Moon Endureth, The. (John Buchan.) By H. B.	178
Child's Visions, A. (Daphne Allen)	266	Morris, William. (John Drinkwater.) By Dixon Scott	264
China as it really is. (A Resident in Peking.) By Mrs. Archibald Little	177	My Life at Sea. (W. C. Crutchley.) By J. E. Patterson	213
Chronicle of Friendships, A. (Luther Munday)	210	Napoleon and King Murat. (Albert Espitalier.) By Thomas Seccombe	126
Climate and Weather (H. N. Dickson.) By T. E. Page	44	Newman, Cardinal, Life of. (W. Ward.) By Dr. W. Barry	22
Clouds, The. (Charles M. Doughty.) By Edward Thomas	176	News Notes	1, 49, 97, 143, 185, 225
Commentaries of Monluc, The. (A. W. Evans.) By Thomas Seccombe	126	Notes on New Books	48, 96, 142, 184, 223, 274
Common Land and Inclosure (Prof. E. C. K. Gonner.) By Thomas Seccombe	126	Novel Notes—
Competitions, THE BOOKMAN Prize	17, 71, 118, 159, 198, 254	Affairs of Men. D. C. F. Harding	218
Consider Luck, The. (H. A. Hinkson.) By S. J.	175	Beggars and Sorners. Allan McAuley	45
Dante. (A. G. Ferrers Howell.) By T. E. Page	128	Big Fish, The. H. B. Marriott Watson	270
Daughters of Louis XV., The. (Casimir Stryénski)	262
Dead Men's Bells. (Frederick Niven.) By F. M. A.	82
Dewpond, The. (Charles Marriott)	134
Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley. (R. Edgcumbe.) By R. Ingpen	179
Dostoievski. (Merikowski.) By George Sampson	210
Drama of Love and Death. (E. Carpenter.) By J. Clayton	87
Dream-Songs of the Beloved. (E. Farjeon.) By W. W. Gibson	33

Novel Notes (continued)—

	PAGE
Blue Bird's-Eye, The. George Edgar	219
Bride of Love, The. Kate Horn	90
Bright Shame. Keighley Snowden	218
Broken Ladders. Andrew Soutar	268
Candidate for Truth, A. J. D. Beresford	180
Charwoman's Daughter, The. James Stephen	45
City of Light, The. W. L. George	138
Common Touch, The. Austin Philips	138
Cost of It, The. Eleanor Mordaunt	130
Coward, The. Robert Hugh Benson	45
Damsel Dark, The. Clara Turnbull	182
Daughter of Brama, The. I. A. R. Wylie	267
Daughter of the Rich, A. Mary E. Waller	90
Denham's. Alexandra Watson	182
Department Store, The. Margaret Bohme	140
Dereht Empire, A. Mark Time	92
Dicky Diver. G. B. Bugin	93
Ebb and Flow. Miss Irwin Smart	91
Englishman, An. Mary L. Pendered	268
Eve's Second Husband. Corra Harris	130
Faery Land Forlorn, A. Mrs. H. H. Penrose	91
Felix Christie. Peggy Welbun	90
Fen Dogs, The. Stephen Foreman	138
Fire in Stubble. Baroness Orczy	46
Fly in the Ointment, The. Frances Hammond	138
For the Queen. F. Phillips Oppenheim	90
George Wenden Gave a Party. John Inghs	182
Golightly's, The. Father and Son. Laurence North	137
Good Girl, The. Vincent O'Sullivan	181
Grey Terrace, The. Mrs. Fred Reynolds	181
Healer, The. Robert Herrick	46
Hector Graeme. Evelyn Brentwood	45
Herself. Ethel Sidgwick	92
House of Roberthay, The. Emma Brooke	181
In the Vortex. Clive Holland	137
Initials Only. Anna Katharine Green	218
Innocence in the Wilderness. Theodosia Lloyd	92
Jacquine of the Hut. F. Gallienne Robin	139
Knights in Blue. Halliwell Sutcliffe	218
Knickerbocker Days. Harris Tweed	268
Lady O. Margaret Badlie Saunders	220
Little Blue Devil, The. D. Mackellar and R. Bedford	180
Long Shadow, A. Gwendolen Pryce	92
Lord of Irongray. J. B. Harris-Burland	90
Marie. H. Rider Haggard	46
Mightier than the Sword. Alphonse Coulander	217
New Humpty-Dumpty, The. Daniel Chancer	220
Night Land, The. W. Hope Hodgson	137
Oakum Pickers. L. S. Gibson	270
Oh! My Uncle. W. Teignmouth Shore	182
Pan's Garden. Algernon Blackwood	207
Penitent, The. René Bazin	218
Phrynette Married. Marthe Froly Curtin	218
Pomander Walk. Louis N. Parker	46
Pride of War. Gustaf Janson	267
Prince and Betty, The. P. G. Wodehouse	182
Prince and Priest. Beril Simons	267
Queen of the Guarded Mounts. John Oxenham	136
Revolt, The. Putnam Weale	220
Rich Man's Wife. D. Donovan and L. W. Elkington	219
Rose of the Garden. Katharine Tynan	220
Ruth of the Rowldrich. Mrs. Stanley Wrench	93
Second Woman, The. Norma Lormier	220
Semi-Detached Marriage, A. Margaret Legge	139
Sharrow. Baroness von Hutten	91
Signal, The, and other Stories. W. M. Garshun	130
Soul of the Dancer, The. Theodore Platou	270
Storm-Dog, The. Lilian Arnold	268
Sweetness of Life, The. Marcelle Tinayri	268
Tomboy and Others, The. H. B. Marriott Watson	218
Views and Vagabonds. R. Macaulay	138
War and the Woman. Max Pemberton	130
Woman Between, The. Edmund Gosse	219
Yellow Men and Gold. Gouverneur Morris	45
Yesterday. Anna Constantini	220
Old Irish Life. (J. M. Callwall.) By H. A. Hinkson	83
One of Us. (Gilbert Frankau.) By Henry Baerlein	213
Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing, The. (Harold Begbie.) By James Moffatt	173
Organic Chemistry. (Prof. J. B. Cohen.) By T. E. Page	128
Ormonde, Life of James, First Duke of. (Lady Bughclere.) By Robert Lynd	203
Out of the Wreck I Rise. (Beatrice Harraden.) By S. H. Oxford	175
In Praise of. (T. Seccombe and H. S. Scott.)	40
Pagan Trinity, The. (B. Irwin.) By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	33
Panel, The. (Ford Madox Hueffer.) By L.	214
Peoples and Problems of India. (Sir T. W. Holderness.) By T. E. Page	41
Pitt and Napoleon. (Prof. H. Rose.) By Walter Sichel	115
Plain Man's Creed, The. (E. C. Owen.) By James Moffatt	78
Play-Making. (William Archer.) By Darrell Figgis	88
Poems. (William Sharp.) By Francis Bickley	86
Poems and Songs. (R. Middleton.) By W. A. Mackenzie	172
Poems of L. Johnson. Some. (L. I. Guiney.) By D. Figgis	42
Poems of the North. (H. Brett-Smith.) By F. Bickley	86
Poet's Children, A. (E. A. Towle.) By W. E. A. Axon	75
Polish Exile with Napoleon, A. (G. L. de St. M. Watson.) By Walford D. Green	174
Pope's Green Island, The. (W. P. Ryan)	78
Posthumous Essays of John Churton Collins, The. (L. C. Collins.) By William Henry Hudson	169
Prelude to Adventure, The. (H. Walpole.) By L. Melville	80
Principles of Electricity. (N. R. Campbell.) By T. E. Page	128
Prison Without a Wall, The. (Ralph Straus.) By F. W.	34
Problems of Philosophy. (Hon. B. Russell.) By T. E. Page	44
Pure Gold. (H. C. O'Neill.) By T. E. Page	128
Queen Jeanne of Navarre. (P. Ryan.) By T. Seccombe	126
Reader, The
Balfour, Mr., as a Man of Letters. By James Moffatt, D.D., D. Litt.	193
Braddon, Miss: The Writer and Her Work. By Clive Holland	149
Browning, Robert. By Prof. George Saintsbury	57
Browning's Father, Robert. By Sir William Robertson Nicoll, LL.D.	63
Centenary of John Forster, The. By Berric Twede	123
Collins, Wilkie. By Arthur Compton-Rickett	107
Conrad. By Percival Gibbon	26
Encore Borrow. By Thomas Seccombe	27
Heroes of Armageddon. By Walter Sichel	115
Lang, Andrew. By Edmund Gosse, C.B.	256
Literature of Greater Britain, The. By A. St. John Adcock	233
New Thought in France. By Dr. William Barry	201
Newman's Life, Cardinal. By Dr. William Barry	22
Robertson Smith. By Rev. Prof. James Denney, D.D.	157
Rousseau, J. J. By Thomas Seccombe	162
Stevenson, Robert Louis. By Neil Munro	9
Recollections of a Great Lady. (Comtesse de Bognie.) By A. W. Evans	208
Reminiscences. (James Stuart)	79
Reminiscences, Some. (J. Conrad.) By P. Gibbon	26
Renascence of Truth. (R. Roberts.) By James Moffatt	78
Rickman, John, Life and Letters of. (O. Williams.) By S. J.	39
Roman Catholicism. (H. B. Coxon.) By T. E. Page	128
Rome. (W. Waide-Fowler.) By T. E. Page	44
Room of Mirrors, The. (Herbert Flowerdew.) By L.	214
Room in the Tower. (E. F. Benson.) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
Royal Miracle, The. (A. M. Broadley)	173
Rutherford and Son. (G. Sowerby.) By E. Thomas	136
Sam Bragg. (Richard Marsh.) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
School, The. (J. J. Enlay.) By T. E. Page	44
Science of the Stars. (E. W. Maunder.) By T. E. Page	128
Shakespeare. (Prof. C. H. Herford.) By T. E. Page	128
Shakespeare Memorial Souvenir of the Shakespeare Ball, The. (Mrs. George Cornwallis-West)	89
Shoe of a Horse, The. (Christopher Stone.) By F. M. A.	82
Short History of Scotland, A. (Andrew Lang.) By Thomas Seccombe	125
Short History of the Scottish People, A. (D. Macmillan.) By Thomas Seccombe	126
Sick-a-Bed Lady. (E. H. Abbott.) By A. St. J. Adcock	36
Silent Valley, The. (Harriet L. Childe-Pemberton.) By L.	214
Singing Bone, The. (A. Freeman.) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
Smith, William Robertson, Life of. (J. S. Black and George Chrystal.) By Rev. Prof. James Denney, D.D.	157
Society at Royal Tunbridge Wells in the 18th Century— and After. (Lewis Melville.) By W. E. A.	135
Songs of a Navvy. (Patrick MacGill.) By John H. Ingram	77
Songs of a Syrian Lover. (C. Scollard.) By Edward Thomas	176
Songs of Town and Country. (Herbert E. A. Furst.) By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	33
Southey, Robert, Letters of. (M. H. Fitzgerald.) By S. J.	39
Spring Supplement (64 pages). THE BOOKMAN for April, 1912
St. Clare and Her Order. (Author of "The Enclosed Nun.")	83
St. Francis of Assisi. (Johannes Jorgensen.) By J. M.	186
Stories in Grey. (Barry Pain.) By A. St. John Adcock	36
Thirteen. (E. Temple Thurston.) By A. St. John Adcock	37
Three Brontes, The. (May Sinclair.) By W. E. A. Axon	212
Tragedy in Stone. (Lord Redesdale.) By D. S. Meldrum	206
True Traveller, The. (W. H. Davies.) By Edward Thomas	84
Victories of Olivia, The. (E. Sharp.) By A. St. J. Adcock	37
Voice of Bethia, The. (Thomas Cobb.) By L.	214
Wake of the Phoenix, In the. (James A. Mackereth.) By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	33
Welsh Poetry. (A. P. Graves.) By F. Bickley	260
White Shrine, The. (G. Villiers-Stuart.) By F. M. A.	82
White Wallet, The. (Pamela Glenconner)	42
Widow in the Bye-Street. (J. Masfield.) By F. Bickley	211
Wings of Desire. (M. P. Willcocks)	134
Wintering Hav. (John Irvana.) By S. J.	175
Womenkind. (Wilfrid Wilson Gibson.) By Francis Bickley	86
Women's Suffrage. (M. G. Fawcett.) By T. E. Page	128
Works of C. and M. Lamb, The. (E. V. Lucas.) By S. J.	133
Works of R. L. Stevenson. (Swanston Edition.) By Neil Munro	168
Young Nietzsche. (Frau F. Nietzsche.) By H. Jackson	215

	PAGE		PAGE
Adams, Arthur H	240	Johnson, Pauline (Tekahionwake), 246; her birthplace	244
Allen, Daphne	226	Jose, Arthur W.	236
Balfour, Eleanor, as Mistress Jane Willoughby	89	Kidson, Ethel	146
Balfour, Rev. Lewis (Stevenson's grandfather)	10	Kipling, Rudyard	251
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J.: Plate Portrait, Aug. No.; 193, 195, 197, 200; houses connected with, 194 197, 199, 201	201	Knowles-Foster, Frances G.	187
Banerjea, S. B.	253	Lang, Andrew	256
Boldrewood, Rolf: Plate Portrait, Sept. No	233	Lethbridge, Mrs. Campbell	228
Boswell, James	35	Lipsett, E. R.	147
Braddon, M. E.: Plate Portrait, July No.; 149, 151; facsimile of MS. by, 154; houses, etc., connected with, 150-152, 154, 156; scene of "Lady Audley's Secret"	155	Lloyd, Theodosia	4
Brereton, J. Le Gay	235	Macaulay, Rose	191
Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, 59; facsimile of last poem of	60	Mackellar, Dorothea	145
Browning, Oscar	207	Maude, Joan	189
Browning, Robert: Plate Portrait, May No.; 57-59, 62, 63, 65, 67, 71; facsimile of inscription to John Forster, 124; houses, etc., connected with, 59, 60, 64, 70, 72, 73; illustrations to his works	61, 65 67	Maxwell, W. B.	2, 151, 153
Burgin, G. B.	93	Mayne, Rutherford	38
Burkholder, Mabel	244	Middleton, Richard, the late	144
Butler, Samuel, 102; illustration to "Hudibras," 102; church of baptism of	101	M'Hwarth, Jean N.	245
Campbell, Wilfred	244	Mitchell, Ex-Police Constable George R.	6
Carman, Bliss	243	Mitra, S. M.	252
Chapin, Miss	220	Mordaunt, Eleanor	3
Chesterton, G. K., original cartoon by S. Cohen	101	Munday, Luther, in 1896	211
Clayton, Rev. George	64	Murphy, Mrs. Arthur	99
Cole, E. W.	238	Nash, Richard	135
Coleridge, Hartley, aged 10	75	Newton, Mrs. Elizabeth	145
Collins, Wilkie: Plate Portrait, June No.; 97, 107, 108, 110, 111, 113, 114; facsimiles of MS. of, 109, 113, 118; houses, etc., connected with, 109, 115, 122; illustrations to his works	110, 112, 116, 119 121	Nietzsche, Friedrich	215
Colvin, Sir Sidney	114	O'Dowd, Bernard	235
Connor, Ralph (Rev. Charles W. Gordon)	241	O'Hara, John B.	235
Courlander, Alphonse	217	Osbourne, Lloyd	23, 27
Crouch, Edward Heath	250	Page, Gertrude	247
Cunningham, Alison (Stevenson's nurse)	30	Palacky, Francis	190
Dale, Mrs. Alice M.	236	Paterson, A. B.	234
Dixon, Thomas	227	Perrin, Mrs. Alice	220
Drummond, W. H.	243	Pratt, Ambrose	230
Drummond, Mrs. W. I.	243	Reeves, Amber (Mrs. Blanco White)	4
Dutt, Romesh C.	252	Rickman, John	39
Edgar, George	210	Ritchie, Lady Thackeray	51
Evans, George Essex	235	Roberts, Charles G. D.	242
"Famous Houses and Literary Shrines of London," illustration from	170	Roberts, Helen C.	188
Fitchett, W. H.	239	Ross, Janet	200
Flower, Newman	5	Ross, Sir Ronald, K.C.B., F.R.S.	100
Forster, John, 123; his library	123	Rousseau, J. J., 163, 164, 167; houses connected with	164-166
Fotheringham, Josephine	236	Russell, Right Hon. G. W. E.	51
Galsworthy, John	127	Scheffauer, Hermann	50
Garnett, Mrs. R. S.	180	Scott, Frederick George	243
Garrick as "Hamlet"	13	Service, R. W.	243
Gaunt, Mrs. Mary	237	Seton, Ernest Thompson	242
Gerard, Morice (Rev. John Jessop Teague)	188	Sheard, Mrs. Verna	245
Gill, Canon Ellis Wharton	245	Sidgwick, Ethel	99
Goethehaus, The, in Frankfurt	171	Slater, Francis Carey	249
Gordon, Adam Lindsay	234	Smith, Professor William Robertson	158
Gorky, Maxim	221	Smith-Dampier, Miss E. M.	186
Guthrie, Lord	30	Soutar, Andrew	189
Harding, Miss D. C. F.	186	St. Clare	83
Harding, Mrs. Ambrose	99	Stephens, Brunton	234
Harvey, Martin	205	Stephens, James	52
Hennessey, David	101	Stevenson, Aunt of R. L. S.	19
Hine, Muriel (Mrs. Sidney Coxon)	3	Stevenson, Robert Louis: Plate Portrait, April No.; 9, 10, 11-16, 18, 29, 169; facsimile of note by, 12; houses, etc., connected with, 11-13, 15, 17-22, 27, 28, 169; illustrations, etc., to his works	14, 16, 17
Hodgson, W. Hope	137	Stuart, James	79
Howard, Redmond	98	Symons, Beryl	228
Howes, Edith	245	Talbot, F. A.	244
Hunter, W. E.	248	Teskey, Miss A. M.	245
Hutchinson, Sir G. T.	145	Thurston, E. Temple	103
Hutton, von, The Baroness	91	Tsaritz, The	272
Irwin, Beatrice	187	Turner, Ethel, and Lilian	238
Jackson, Holbrook, at the Elizabeth Triumph	188	Victoria, Queen, in 1842	47
Janson, Gustaf	227	Walpole, Hugh	5
Jenkin, Fleeming, F.R.S., LL.D.	262	Walrond, F. E.	249
Jenkins, Herbert	146	Warens, de, Madame	165
		Watson, E. H. Lacon	98
		Watson, Frederick	77
		Watson, H. B. Marriott	270
		Watson, William	50
		Wemyss, Mrs. George	5
		Westrup, William	227
		Wilson, Rathmell	100

PRINCIPAL CONTRIBUTORS.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.	DARRELL FIGGIS.	WALTER JERROLD.	J. E. PATTERSON.
W. FRANCIS AITKEN.	W. A. FOX.	COULSON KERNAHAN.	E. PURCELL.
F. M. ATKINSON.	PERCEVAL GIBBON.	C. E. LAWRENCE.	LILIAN QUILLER COUCH.
WILLIAM E. A. AXON.	WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.	MRS. ARCHIBALD LITTLE	PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.
HENRY BAERLEIN.	EDMUND GOSSE, C.B.	ROBERT LYND.	GEORGE SAMPSON.
DR. WILLIAM BARRY.	WALFORD D. GREEN.	W. A. MACKENZIE.	DIXON SCOTT.
F. G. BITTANY.	W. H. HELM.	D. S. MELDRUM.	THOMAS SECCOMBE.
FRANCIS BUCKLEY.	H. A. HINKSON.	LEWIS MELVILLE.	WALTER SICHEL.
MAY BYRON.	CLIVE HOLLAND.	JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., D.LITT.	L. TILDEN SMITH.
JOSEPH CLAYTON.	TIGHE HOPKINS.	NEIL MUNRO.	KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN.
ARTHUR COMPTON RICKLE.	WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.	HENRY MURRAY.	RALPH STRAUS.
RICHARD CURLE.	ROGER INGPEN.	SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON	EDWARD THOMAS.
REV. PROF. JAMES DENNIV, D.D.	JOHN H. INGRAM.	NICOLL, LL.D.	H. HAY WILSON.
A. W. EVANS.	HOLBROOK JACKSON.	T. E. PAGE.	EDWARD WRIGHT.

New Volumes of the St. Martin's Library

In pocket size, small 6vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each

ORIGINAL PLAYS.

By W. S. GILBERT. A FOURTH SERIES, uniform with the first Three Series With a Portrait of the Author

GEORGE MACDONALD'S POETICAL WORKS. In two volumes.

BRET HARTE'S POETICAL WORKS.

WALT WHITMAN'S POEMS.

Edited by W. M. ROSSETTI. With a Portrait.

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES.

Vol. IV, from 1897 to 1901

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. Uniform with the first three Volumes

BALLADS AND LYRICS OF LOVE.

Selected by FRANK SIDGWICK With 10 Illustrations in Colour by BYAM SHAW

LEGENDARY BALLADS.

Selected by FRANK SIDGWICK With 10 Illustrations in Colour by BYAM SHAW

PIPPA PASSES; and MEN AND WOMEN.

By ROBERT BROWNING With 10 Illustrations in Colour by J. FORTISCUER BRICKDALE

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ; and DRAMATIC ROMANCES AND LYRICS.

By ROBERT BROWNING With 10 Illustrations in Colour by J. FORTISCUER BRICKDALE

Full List of the ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY free of application

LONDON

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

The SCOTTISH BOOK of the YEAR

MEMORIES OF

Two Cities

EDINBURGH

AND ABERDEEN

IN THE TALE

DAVID MASSON

LL.D., Litt.D.

11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11

With Photogravure frontispiece from hitherto unpublished Photograph.

PRICE 7/6 NET, POSTAGE 5d

Sir WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL says:

They are in fact perhaps the very best things he ever wrote. His and his great father shines through all his pages.

Mr. JAMES MILNE, in the DAILY CHRONICLE, writes:

On what is an illustrious Edinburgh vision in this book and its author's great power. Mr. Masson's little book will be a welcome addition to the bookshelves of all who are interested in the history of the city of Edinburgh, and the history of the city of Aberdeen.

The MORNING POST says:

They will be read as often as the light of the sun and the light of the moon.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIE

100, PRINCES STREET, EDINBURGH.

21, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, LONDON.

EXPOSITIONS OF DANTE. Dr. J. S. CARROLL'S books must prove invaluable to all who would understand Dante's life work

IN PATRIA: An Exposition of Dante's "Paradiso." By JOHN S. CARROLL, M.A., D.D. 10/6 net.

Dr. Carroll with this volume brings to a close his great study of Dante's famous poem, a labour which has taken many years to complete. The earlier volumes, Exiles of Eternity and Prisoners of Hope with the Inferno and the Purgatorio respectively for their subjects have already brought their author universal recognition as one of the most scholarly students of Dante. The theology of the Paradiso being in many ways the most difficult of any of the books of the trilogy Dr. Carroll's expositions will be studied and read with peculiar interest.

This volume furnishes the reader with just the sort and measure of exposition, appreciation, and other aid that he requires. Scotsman Dr. Carroll may be congratulated on the successful accomplishment of his great trilogy. Yorkshire Observer.

Uniform with "In Patria"

EXILES OF ETERNITY: An Exposition of Dante's "Inferno" 10/6 net.

We feel that Dr. Carroll really understands Dante. We are not irritated by novel theories, or by ignorant criticism, but we are reading Dante in company with a true disciple who has assimilated all that the best workers in the almost boundless fields of Dante literature have given to us, and, above all, a disciple who knows his Dante and not merely what others have said about Dante. The symbolism is explained with great thoroughness, and not a detail is allowed to escape. We strongly recommend this delightful book to Dante student. Guardian.

PRISONERS OF HOPE: An Exposition of Dante's "Purgatorio" 10/6 net.

The volume is to be warmly commended. It will go far to render more fascinating than ever to many minds the most intelligible and ethically useful portion of the wonderful poem in which a great spiritual genius, working under the restraints of the mediaeval economy and discipline, seeks in his own words, "to remove those living in this life from a state of misery, and to guide them to a state of happiness"—an aim which, as his latest expounder truly says, is to be accomplished only by moral and spiritual means"— Scotsman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

A literary event. "New light on George Borrow's fascinating personality. The letters so ably edited by Mr. Darlow will appeal to the man in the street no less than to the scholar."

THE LETTERS OF GEORGE BORROW TO THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Edited by T. H. DARLOW, M.A.

7/6 net

"These letters of Borrow are published without omission or alteration; the aim has been to let Borrow speak for himself. What notes I have added have only been to explain references. The most interesting fact about the whole publication is that it refutes the charges of invention that have been made against Borrow. When he went to Spain it appears that he had some idea of writing a book about it, and after his return he applied to the society for the loan of his letters. These were lent to him, and many of the most vivid scenes he has described are taken from them. The letters also throw new light on his character. They show conclusively that his religion was not assumed, it was a deep, absolutely sincere belief in the Bible. In one place he describes himself as a 'zealous though most unworthy member of the Church of England.' Perhaps he was, above all, a Bible believer with a rather Old Testament type of character. He showed himself, too, a remarkable man of affairs, and tactfully won his way among extraordinary groups of people."—From the Preface.

"The volume is in every way a delightful one, for Borrow had that art by which, if he was merely sending a statement of accounts, or stating the reasons for selecting a printer, the record becomes as enchanting as the most romantic record of his adventures."—Daily News. "We have here the raw stuff not only of 'The Bible in Spain,' but of an unwritten 'Bible in Russia.' While this volume is an indispensable supplement to 'The Bible in Spain,' it stands upon its own feet, and ought to have a place upon any shelf of Borrow."—Daily Chronicle.

This beautiful edition of Emily Brontë's works is limited to 1,000 copies for sale in Great Britain and the United States of America.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF EMILY BRONTË.

2 Volumes. Vol. 1.—THE COMPLETE POEMS OF EMILY BRONTË. Edited by CLEMENT SHORTER, with an Introductory Essay by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. Vol. 2—WUTHERING HEIGHTS. With an Introduction by CLEMENT SHORTER, and many Facsimiles of Emily Brontë's Handwriting. 6s. net each.

"Until our own day Emily's work seemed to live by the reflected glory of the sister who survived her and had presented some kind of a portrait of her in the popular story 'Shirley.' All this is now changed. Both Charlotte and Emily have their separate bands of admirers. There is a countless host that appreciate both writers equally, but a considerable number glory in their preference for one or the other. . . . It is well that Emily Brontë should have her partisans, and it is time also that she should have a separate presentation of her published work. It has long been my ambition to offer this to that select public which to-day constitutes itself a Brontë cult."—CLEMENT SHORTER.

"Welcome alike to students of literature and of Irish affairs. . . . Mr. Justin McCarthy's book abounds in personal anecdote, and it is a fund of entertainment in its choice portrayal of Irish conventions."

IRISH RECOLLECTIONS.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

Illustrated, 10/6 net

"I have long felt prompted by a desire to give shape and coherence to my early recollections of Ireland. I have already written a novel which has its scene laid in my native country, and have published a volume which describes, I hope at not too great length, the course of my life, under the name of 'The Story of an Irishman'; but my principal object in the present work is to retrace my recollections of Ireland in my early youth and my progress towards manhood, because I am convinced that a very great change has taken place in the ways, the habits, and the whole condition of my native country which makes the Ireland of the present very different from the Ireland of that not yet very far-off period."—From the Preface.

"A charming picture of a golden time when all the world was young."—Times. "The Ireland he recalls here is a land devoted to literature, music, art; a land whose young intellectuals stood amazed that the country to whose literary giants they were devoted should govern Ireland so badly."—Daily Graphic.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

12/6

net.

Dr. FREDERICK
A. COOK'S

12/6

net.

My Attainment of the Pole

Dr. Cook now, FOR THE FIRST TIME, makes public the scientific data upon which he bases his Polar claim and the reasons for his own actions, answers in detail all the charges made against him and explains his long silence.

The list of best books is not very elastic. A publication must be more than interesting or noteworthy to gain a place therein. A book may be most instructive and thrillingly interesting and yet not be worthy of a place in the list of best books.

Dr. Frederick A. Cook's book not only merits both the above adjectives but in addition it is a human document. It tells the story of a successful attempt to do something that men had tried and failed to do for over three hundred years. Dr. Cook not only deserves the support of everyone for his marvellous work in Polar exploration but in addition he must be hailed as THE DISCOVERER OF THE NORTH POLE.

"IN MY OPINION DR. COOK REACHED THE POLE," said Professor Georges Le Cointe, Director of the Royal Observatory, Belgium, and Secretary of the International Bureau of Polar Research, Brussels, after reading the book.

This book contains over 600 large octavo pages, printed on high-grade paper and lavishly illustrated with over 50 splendid half-tone reproductions. Price 12/6 Net.

ARLEN & CO.,

Chichester House, Chancery Lane, London.

THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY is a High-class Literary Agency, conducted by a Practical Author, for the criticism, revision, and placing of high-class work. The Prospectus is free, and the terms are moderate. Address "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

MYSTICAL ART and POETRY

POEMS, DRAMATIC AND LYRICAL
By CLIFFORD BAX

With cover design in white and gold, title page and tail-pieces by DIANA READ. 4s. 8d. net, post free.

The author expresses again and again the view of the universe which sees in human life a hint, a mirrored picture, a fragment of a much vaster life pulsing and glowing behind it.

DREAM SONGS FOR THE BELOVED
By ELEANOR FARJEON.

In crash and pale blue boards, 2s. 8d. net, post free.

These reveal a wide range of subject, an accomplished craft, and a subtle perception of beauty. The book is clear and radiant like a glass of water held up to the morning sun.

THE HERO IN MAN By A. E. Ward

Grey paper covers, 2nd edition, 7d. net, post free.

There is no wider living who is of such close kinship to the great mystics and seers of the past.

In "The Hero in Man" A. E. puts forward a plea for the apparently down ward soul. He sees in the man who spiritually fails the figure of Prometheus.

ORPHEUS

A QUARTERLY MAGAZINE OF MYSTICAL ART

4s. 8d. post free, per annum

Seeks to form a strong imaginative movement in the world of art, uniting what is noblest in Western and in Eastern Art.

Published by C. W. Daniel, for the Orpheus Press, 3, Amen Corner, London, E.C. List of Orpheus Books post free.

LYNWOOD & Co., Ltd.,

PUBLISHERS,

12 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Telephone

8331 Central.

AUTHORS are invited to send their Manuscripts for consideration, and where possible an offer will be made. Catalogue of publications forwarded post free on application.

WANTED TO PURCHASE, a copy of "BLAZED TRAIL STORIES," by Stewart Edward White. Full particulars, price, etc., Box 699, "BOOK-MAN" Office.

"I'm glad of Mr. Barrie."—Punch.

"Hundreds of thousands will be grateful to Mr. Barrie for this book."—Punch.

PETER AND WENDY BY J. M. BARRIE.

Illustrated by F. D. BEDFORD. Sixth Edition. 6/-

"Mothers and fathers and uncles and aunts, will bless Mr. Barrie's name."—Daily Mail.

"A little piece of immortality."—Bookman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Macmillan's List.

TENNYSON AND HIS FRIENDS.

Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON.

With Portraits. 8vo. 10s. net.

Floreat Etona. Anecdotes and Memories of Eton College. By RALPH NEVILL. With many Coloured and other Illustrations. 8vo. 15s. net.

Daily Mail.—"There is plenty of fun as well as solid information in Mr. Nevill's volume, which will be welcomed not only by Etonians but by all who care to study the institutions which have combined to place England where she stands to-day."

The Future of England. By the Hon. GEORGE PEEL. 8vo. 6s. net.

Spectator.—"A fine achievement . . . We have come across nothing more stimulating in political argument for a long time, and we trust his book will have readers by the ten thousand."

Seems So! A Working-Class View of Politics By STEPHEN REYNOLDS and BOB and TOM WOOLLEY. With Frontispiece. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.

The Nation.—"A really remarkable book of revelation and interpretation."

Professor BERGSON.

Laughter. An Essay on the Meaning of the Comic. By HENRI BERGSON. Authorized Translation by CLOUDESLEY BRERETON, L. es L. (Paris), M.A. (Cantab.), and FRED ROTHWELL, B.A. Extra crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Creative Evolution. Authorized Translation by ARTHUR MITCHELL, Ph.D. 2nd Impression. 8vo. 10s. net.

A Critical Exposition of Bergson's Philosophy. By J. McKELLAR STEWART, B.A., D.Ph. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Centaur. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. 6s.

Westminster Gazette.—"We own to having taken as many days to read this book as it takes hours to read the ordinary novel, but not because the book is heavy or dull, but because it is too good, too impressive, to be read at anything like a single sitting."

John Temple: Merchant Adventurer, Convict and Conquistador. By RALPH DURAND. Illustrated by WILLIAM SEWELL. 6s.

The Globe.—"One of the best novels of the season."

The Healer. By ROBERT HERRICK, Author of "Together," &c. 6s.

The Daily Mail.—"A great novel. There is a fineness about Mr. Herrick's work that lifts it above the ordinary level. . . . Its passion often rises to lyric pitch, its characterization is shrewd, its humour of the quietly sufficient kind that lasts."

The Love that Lives. By MABEL OSGOOD WRIGHT, Author of "The Garden of a Commuter's Wife," &c. 6s.

The Times.—"A simple and engaging domestic tale about the family of a New England minister."

Mother to Men. By ZONA GALE, Author of "Friendship Village," &c. 6s. net.

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

New Poems. Globe 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Complete Poetical Works. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Selected Poems. Pott 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. Also in cloth elegant, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net, and in limp leather, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. net. Golden Treasury Series.

Sing-Song. A Nursery Rhyme Book. Illustrated by Arthur Hughes. Pocket Classics. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth. 2s. net. Limp Leather. 3s. net.

The Rossetti Birthday Book. Edited by Olivia Rossetti. 16mo. 2s. 6d.

Speaking Likenesses. Illustrated by A. Hughes. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Goblin Market. Illustrated. Fcap. 16mo. 1s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE GREAT DICKENS YEAR.

All eyes at this moment are being directed to one of the greatest names in the annals of Literature.

Charles Dickens was born 100 years ago, and in February next all nations and classes will unite in doing honour to his memory.

Every reader, every lover of his country's literature, every one who has regard to the great cause of humanity, must make himself acquainted with the life and work of Dickens if he would not be shamed in his ignorance.

The life of Charles Dickens is as romantic a story as any which he himself conceived, and it is a story that has been well told.

A Great Work.

John Forster's "Life of Dickens" is a great story, and one of the finest of biographies. Carlyle even compared it with Boswell; and critics generally have placed its author in the front rank of biographers. No man ever had a more genial personality to discuss, for of Dickens it could truly be said that:

His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

And now, to complete this great work—to give it an even closer personal touch—there has been added to it a wonderful selection of pictures and photographs illustrating every phase in the life of the master.

A Noble Edition.

The Waverley Edition of Forster's "Dickens," which is issued by arrangement with the original publishers, stands out as one of the most attractive books ever offered.

Prepared under the personal direction of Mr. B. W. Matz, Chairman of the Council of the Dickens Fellowship, it is a monument of careful research and indefatigable labour, and a noble tribute to the memory of the great author.

Its leading features embrace:

Over 500 Illustrations

INCLUDING

33 Portraits of Dickens himself,

Many Facsimiles of Letters and Manuscripts

AND

Reproductions of the Coloured Wrapper Designs for the first issues of the Novels.

A beautiful and handsome binding in $\frac{3}{4}$ Morocco.

Notwithstanding the exceptional character of this new edition, we are offering it on special terms which will bring it within everyone's reach.

Details of these and a full description of the work are given in the Free Booklet which will be sent at once on application.

Send for the Free Booklet to-day, and for particulars of Our Special Offer.

FREE COUPON.

The Waverley Book Co., Ltd., 7 & 8, Old Bailey, E.C.

Please send me free of all charge or obligation your Illustrated Booklet on Forster's "Life of Dickens," with full details of your Special Offer.

Name

Occupation

Address

B.E. 1911.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 244. VOL. XLI.
Subscription rate 8s. per annum post free.

JANUARY, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES	177
PRIZE COMPETITIONS ..	181
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY	183
THE READER—
Santa Christina. By KATH- ARINE TYNAN	185
The Papacy and Modern Times. By R. H. BENSON	190
Edmund Gosse's Poems. By AUSTIN DOBSON	192
The Four Winds of the Spirit. By DR. WILLIAM BARRY ..	196
The Mother of the Author of " Cranford " By Mrs. ELLIS H. CHADWICK	197
NEW BOOKS—
Hannah More. By THOMAS SECCOMBE	200
" Yorick's " Head and Heart. By W. P. RYAN	200

Bergson and About Bergson. By STEPHEN REYNOLDS ..	201
A Nanny's Scrapbook. By JOHN H. INGRAM	202
Dean Swift's Correspondence. By Y. Y.	203
" Other Sheep "	204
Shakespeare Again. By W. H. HUDSON	205
The Dutch in the East. By D. S. MELDRUM	206
Rival Sisters. By DIXON SCOTT	207
A Batch of Novels. By F. M. ATKINSON	208
" Seems So " By J. E. PATTERSON	209
The Free Marriage	210
The Brownings Once More. By H. C. MINCHIN	211
The Yellow Peril in Art. By G. S. LAYARD	212

Mr. George Moore's Caricature By ROBERT LYND	214
Some of our Singers. By HENRY BAERLEIN	214

NOVEL NOTES

The Belle of Santiago—The Money Moon—Saints, Sin- ners, and the Usual People ..
Ethan Frome—Mademoiselle Celeste No Surrender—A Society Mother	216 217

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

Prince Talleyrand and His Times—Some Aspects of Thackeray My Attainment of the Pole—The Critical Attitude—The English Court in Exile—With Napoleon at Waterloo—Irish Recollec- tions	217-220
---	---------

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS ..	220
-----------------------	-----

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

For much help with the Christina Rossetti illustrations in this Number we are indebted to the kindness and courtesy of Mr. W. M. Rossetti, Messrs. G. Bell & Sons, Messrs. Macmillan, and Messrs. Blackie.

The portrait of Christina Rossetti, reproduced on our cover and given as a presentation plate with this Number, is after a drawing by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, from a photograph by Messrs. W. A. Mansell & Co., supplied by the Art Illustration and Reproduction Co.

In reply to many correspondents who have written to say they were unable to secure a copy of the Christmas BOOKMAN, we express our regret that, owing to mechanical difficulties in connection with the colour plates, we were unable to reprint the Number or we would gladly have published a second edition, in order to comply with their wishes. We have been greatly gratified by the more numerous letters from our subscribers, congratulating us on the literary and artistic excellence of what was, we believe, the largest Christmas Number of any magazine published last year. Many of these correspondents give enthusiastic praise to the presentation plates it contained, in particular to those by Willy Pogany, Hugh Thomson, Charles Robinson, Edmund Dulac, Claude Shepperson and Arthur Rackham. We should like to print a selection of such letters but have space for only one that is a fair average example of all the rest :

" I have just received my Christmas number of THE BOOKMAN from my local bookseller," (writes Mr. Ernest M. Hall, of Saltburn-by-the-Sea, Yorkshire), " and hasten to offer my congratulations to you on such a superb production and to express the gratitude which I, together with surely all your many readers, must feel for this literary treat. I am fully conscious of the fact that among the many appreciations which you are sure to receive from learned men and women throughout the country, this small tribute of mine will be but as a grain of sand on the sea-shore, but none the less, I feel sure that it will be somewhat of a pleasure to you to know of the great boon which THE BOOKMAN has become to even so humble a reader as myself. I have now received THE BOOKMAN regularly for exactly three years, and I can safely say that far from being in any way tired of it, it becomes more necessary to me every month and the latest magnificent number surely signals the high water mark of success. The unique portfolio of colour plates by Mr. Thompson, the artistic plates by well-known artists which are found throughout the book ; the unrivalled review of the season's huge output of literature ; and the excellent literary articles by writers whose names are household words wherever English literature is appreciated ; all these and probably many more features which will appear on closer acquaintance with the work, go to form surely a record-number, even among past BOOKMAN's, many of which will remain for ever among my most treasured literary possessions. Much more might I say, Sir, and still fail to do justice, but enough for my purpose. I felt, however, that I should be ingratitude itself if I allowed myself to enjoy all the treasures of this latest number without expressing a word of thanks."

Messrs. Sampson, Low & Co. are publishing a fine art edition of Mr. Jeffery Farnol's charming novel, "The Money Moon." The illustrations are by Mr. Arthur J. Keller and number sixty, thirty-six being full-page plates in colour, sepia and half-tone mono-tint.

Mr. Richard Pryce is not one of those busy novelists who turn out at least one novel a year. On his latest and perhaps finest work in fiction, "Christopher" (which was recently published by Messrs. Hutchinson) he spent five years of careful work. He writes slowly, but in the course of the last twenty years has produced some thirteen books. In the intervals of novel writing he has frequently turned to the stage. He collaborated with Mr. Frederick Fenn on a play of London life called "'Op o' My Thumb," which was first produced by the Stage Society, then at the St. James's Theatre, where Miss Hilda Trevelyan played the leading part, and at the Antoine in Paris, and in America, under Mr. Frohman's management. Another play of his, "Saturday to Monday," ran for a hundred nights at the St. James's; he collaborated with Mr. Arthur Morrison in "The Dumb-Cake," with Major W. P. Drury in "A Privy Council" (which reached its hundred and fiftieth performance at the Haymarket), and adapted "Little Miss Cummins" and "The Visit," for presentation at the Playhouse, from stories by Mrs. Mary E. Mann.

The English Review, beginning with the January Number, is now published at the reduced price of one shilling monthly, but no alteration is made either in its size or the high literary standard of its contents. The new Number includes, among other notable contributions, the second of Mr. Frederic Harrison's personal articles, "Among My Books."

Lady Bancroft has written a novel called "The Shadow of Neeme," which Mr. John Murray is publishing shortly. It is a love story, with what is described as a spiritual interest, and is said to prove, among other things, that Lady Bancroft can write excellent comedy as well as play it.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have published a new and revised edition of "The People's Insurance," explained by the Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George. It contains the amended Bill, with notes elucidating a number of the more difficult points in it.

Mr. John Lane is publishing this month a story by Mr. Louis N. Parker entitled "Pomander's Walk." It is founded on Mr. Parker's play of the same name that was produced by Mr. Cyril Maude at the Haymarket and has had a very long run in America.

Photo by Elliott & Fry

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

Whose collected Poems are reviewed on page 192, by Mr. Austin Dobson.

Mr. Tom Gallon is to be congratulated on the favourable reception accorded to his play "The Great Gay Road" on its production the other day at the Court Theatre. Reversing Mr. Parker's way, he made his play out of his novel, and a new edition of the novel has now been included in Messrs. John Long's Shilling Net series.

Mr. Martin Secker is publishing a new book by Mr. Compton Mackenzie, whose first novel, "A Passionate Elopement," issued last January, has already gone through some five editions and is still in constant demand. In his new story, "Carnival,"

Mr. Mackenzie quits the romantic atmosphere of the eighteenth century and adventures into the life of modern London and the West Country.

Mr. Frowde has published a "Book-Lover's Anthology" at two shillings under the editorship of Mr. R. M. Leonard. It is a good sized volume, artistically bound, and contains a very large and well-arranged collection in prose and poetry of "detached thoughts on books and reading."

Mr. John Freeman, whose new volume of "Fifty Poems" (Herbert & Daniel) we review in this Number, is a Londoner born and bred. He is a young man, still in the earliest thirties, and this is his second book; his first, "Twenty Poems," made its appearance two years ago, and was hailed at once as the work of a true poet. Mr. Freeman has contributed a good many reviews and signed articles to the Academy, and elsewhere, and is at present engaged on a volume of essays which form a close and sympathetic criticism of the modern spirit in letters. "Fifty Poems" is dedicated, by the way, to that fine poet and critic and friend of many poets, Mrs. Alice Meynell.

Mr. John Freeman.

Mr. Douglas Sladen is collaborating with Miss Humphris in a work on Adam Lindsay Gordon, the Australian poet, and asks us to say that he would be grateful if all those who have letters or reminiscences of Gordon and his friends which they would like to appear in the volume would kindly communicate with him at the Avenue House, Richmond, Surrey.

The admirable address delivered by Mr. Augustine Birrell, at Rochdale, on the occasion of the John Bright Centenary Celebration has been issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin as a sixpenny pamphlet.

"Down the Corridors of Time," a new novel by "Nomad," whose last book was published twenty years ago, is to be issued shortly by Mr. John Ouseley.

The prize in Mr. Andrew Melrose's two hundred and fifty guinea Novel Competition has been awarded to Miss Miriam Alexander for a story entitled "The House of Lisronan." Miss Alexander is an Irish-woman, living in County Dublin, and this is her first novel.

Photo by J. Moffat, Edinburgh.

Mrs. C. C. Cairns.

Whose "Noble Women" (published by Messrs. Jack) has been one of the most popular gift-books of the season.

Miss Ellen Kay.

The well known Swedish author whose "Love and Marriage" (Putnam's) is meeting with considerable success.

The February BOOKMAN will be a Charles Dickens' Centenary Number, and will contain a special article on "Dickens's Life and Work," by B. W. Matz; an article on the topography of Dickens's Novels, etc. The Number will be fully illustrated with portraits, facsimilies, and sketches and photographs of places associated with Dickens. We have already made reference to the new edition of Forster's "Life of Dickens," that contains over five hundred illustrations, selected, arranged and annotated by Mr. Matz. It is published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, and the Waverley Book Company has now made arrangements to supply the book on the popular instalment system. No living writer is a more expert authority on Dickens lore than Mr. B. W. Matz, and under his supervision this new issue of Forster's great biography has been made, as one eminent critic has said, "by far the most fully and intelligently illustrated edition of any English classic that we ever remember to have encountered."

Miss Beatrice Harraden has completed a new novel which will probably be published this spring.

A new addition to Mr. John Murray's useful "Questions of the Day" series is to be "The Case Against Tariff Reform" by Mr. E. Enever Todd, of the Free Trade Union. This is a reply to Archdeacon

"Windfrint," a new novel on which Mr. Wilkinson Sherren is engaged, is a story of present day life in London and Wessex, and touches incidentally on certain aspects of the feminist movement. He expects to have it completed for publication, by Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co., this spring.

Cunningham's volume in the same series on the other side of the same question.

Those who do not yet know how to be happy though married may get practical help towards that knowledge by reading Mr. J. W. C. Haldane's little shilling book on "Married Life Various Considered" (Simpkin, Marshall). Mr. Haldane is a practical man, a consulting engineer of thirty years' standing and author of several successful books on steamships, railway engineering, and so forth. Here, however, he turns from railway lines to marriage lines and shows himself as good a guide to the unwritten poetry of life as to the severely business parts of it.

For much assistance with the general illustrations in this Number our thanks are due to the kindness of Messrs. Kegan, Paul & Co., Messrs. Mills & Boon, Mr. John Long, Messrs. Stanley, Paul & Co., Messrs. Putnam's, Messrs. Jack, The Waverley Book Co., and Messrs. Macmillan.

Charles Dickens Reading to his Daughters (Mamie and Katey) on the Lawn at Gad's Hill Place.

From "Life of Charles Dickens," by John Forster (Chapman & Hall and Waverley Book Co.).

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JANUARY, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- II.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best new nursery rhyme, in not more than eight lines of verse.
- III.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- IV.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR DECEMBER.

- I.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Mr. CHARLES POWELL, of Dovedale, Victoria Park, Manchester, for the following:

SOME NEIGHBOURS. BY C. GRANVILLE (Swift.)
"You can't get away from the tune that they play."
KIPLING, Screw Guns.

We also select for printing:

THE FRENCH IDEAL. BY MADAME DUCLAUX.
(Chapman & Hall.)

"The French have taste in all they do
Which we are quite without,
For Nature, that to them gave gout
To us gave only gout."

LORD ERSKINE.

(Ernest F. Seymour, 28, Kingsgate Road, Kilburn, N.W.)

HISTORY OF PAINTING. BY HALDANE MACFALL.
(Jack.)

"Where's the cheek that doth not fade?"
KEATS, Fancy.

(M. Cornish, 5, Essenden Road, Belvedere, S.E.)

THE TROUBLED POOL. BY J. GRIFFITH FAIRFAX.
(Smith, Elder.)

"Far they leaved their nasty sins i' my pond,
An' it poisoned the cow."

TENNYSON, The Churkwarden and the Curate.

(Miss M. C. Hildick, 27, Melrose Road, Sheffield.)

THE COMPLEAT ANGLER. BY IZAAK WALTON.
(Hodder & Stoughton)

"His immeasurable falsehoods!"
LONGFELLOW, The Song of Hiawatha.

WILLIAM THE SILENT. BY RUTH PUTNAM.
(G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

"Each time as I start I means to speak,
But the moment I tries,
I catches her eyes,
And the elegant speech goes bust."

F. LANGBRIDGE, Amos Dunn's Wooing.

(Rev. E. C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road, South Woodford, N.E.)

AS HE WAS BORN. BY TOM GALLON.
(Eveleigh Nash)

"It wasn't round nor was it square—
Nor three-cornered as some noses be!
But upon my conscience I do declare 'Twas a mixture of all the three!"

HELEN, LADY DUFFRIN, The Mother's Lament.

(Miss A. M. S. Richey, 13, Cromwell Road, Belfast.)

- II.—There were a fair number of entries for this competition, but the standard attained was not particularly high, and most of the competitors confined their attentions either to Mr. Chesterton's bulk or Mr. Shaw's supposed opinion of himself. We award the Prize of THREE BOOKS to Mr. BERNARD POULINEY, of Ulverston, for the best imaginary NEW YEAR RESOLUTION, by a well-known author:

"Not a false moustache, not a fur-lined coat,
Not a prince stabbed to death in a hovel;
No Embassy Ball and no scented note Shall appear in my this year's novel."

WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

Good work was done by the following: Albert E. Halliday (Leeds), Evelyn Perres (Ramsgate), Tom Sefton (Bolton), Fred Batty (Leeds), Rev. E. C. Lawson (South Woodford), R. G. Lovatt (Victoria Park), William Morris (Sheffield), S. Poultny (Ulverston), Rev. T. A. Lindsay (Inverness), Miss E. A. Abbott (Old Malton), Mrs. C. Cochrane (Solihull), F. Rhodes (Scarborough), Frances W. Casson (Putney), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), John Murdoch (Edinburgh), Emily Kingston (Blairgowrie), Ellen L. Clutterbuck (Bromley), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), and A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield).

- III.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. K. S. VENKATARAMANI, of 78, Victoria Hotel, Chepauk Gardens, Madras, for the following:

THE IDEALS OF INDIAN ART. BY E. B. HAVELL.
(John Murray.)

Mr. Havell is truly the knight-errant of Hindu art. He is an Occidental only by an accident. With a deep sympathy for, and a sound knowledge of, the spiritual bent of the Hindu mind he discovers in our art, not a barbaric symbolism bereft of meaning, beauty, taste, grace or elegance; but an eloquent and highly-imaginative picture of the mental postures of a race gifted with spiritual vision. Hindu art is born of Hindu thought; the devotional feeling has a persistent expression. To perceive this needs a catholic taste. Surely, this book will be an eye-opener to many Englishmen.

Other good reviews received are :

THE EVERLASTING MERCY. BY JOHN MASEFIELD.
(Sidgwick & Jackson)

The common man comes apace to his kingdom. In this piece of masterly workmanship, Mr. Masefield lifts his imagination fearlessly to the task of revealing the village drunkard in conflict with his "Everlasting No"; a struggle with Darkness, now sickening and foul, now mounting to a wild frenzy, now full of pity and stifled tears. Always it is clanging with life, crisp and deadly accurate. We begin to thirst for goodness and beauty, and at last, over the tempest of this soul too, light breaks. The whole earth leaps to singing. Man goes to his task—Christ is in the field. Mr. Masefield's work is vital with poetry.

(Raymond Taunton, "Ingleside," Albany Road, Coventry.)

THE COUNTRY OF THE BLIND BY H. G. WELLS.
(Nelson)

These stories contrast utterly with the later novels, so utterly that one marvels. They are written with absolute clarity effective unaffectedness. Wells has nearly all the attributes: sensationalism, psychology, humour, and poetry; and all are foils for one another. Only a very spacious mind could contain so many qualities, such radically conflicting moods. Logic is the vital principle of his work, and it is the logic of a scientist shorn of sentiment, but imagination, flamboyant and mercurial, is almost equally developed; and the fusion of the two produces a quite individual brand—one impossible of imitation by any living writer.

(Beatrix Terry, 374, Brixton Road, London, S.W.)

THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK: A CRITICAL STUDY.
BY A. MARTIN FREEMAN (Secker)

This book is critical rather than biographical, throwing little fresh light on Peacock's personality or uneventful life, here compared to the course of a lonely stream. Mr. Freeman is a Peacockian enthusiast. He does full justice to Peacock's wit and scholarship, considerable space being devoted to the early poems, and to identifying characters in the novels, so called—with their prototypes, particularly the "studies" of Shelley. The chapters concerning the latter's friendship with Peacock are not the least interesting in this admirable study of a satirist and poet whose delightful writings are unique in literature.

(Evelyn M. Abbott, The Croft, Old Malton, Yorks.)

THE FRUITFUL VINE BY ROBERT HICHENS
(Fisher Unwin)

The story of Dolores Cannynge's tragic love for her husband, and the complete sacrifice of herself upon the altar of that love, is told with delicacy and restraint. In spite of Mr. Hichens' amazing insight into the soul of a despairing woman, it remains difficult to realise that one so good and pure as Dolores could act as she did. Her death, which, so far as she is concerned, brings the book to the only possible conclusion, rather leaves room for speculation regarding the ultimate fate of her child, and of those who knew and understood its real history.

(Margery Wilkins, Utttoxeter.)

LAURA BY CAROLINE GROSVENOR (Heinemann)

It is not fair to upbraid the girl who concludes that, in marriage, a rational combination of money and love is preferable to a sentimental basis of love and little else. Almost as well find fault with the man who finds it impossible to enjoy his dinner without condiments. For we live in a material world and, if love is the meat of life, money is certainly the appetising condiment. In Laura we are shown a girl who has to decide in this matter, and the result is exhibited with naturalness and sympathy, with a refreshing absence of special pleading.

(James Brenton, 27, Chestnut Road, Tottenham.)

We specially commend also the reviews sent by Rose B. Froud (Southsea), Miss A. G. M. Sopwith (Handsworth), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton at Hone), W. H. Gillman (Devizes), Louise A. Beveridge (Belfast), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson, M.A. (Scarborough), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), A. Walton (Gainsborough), Miss M. V. Woodgate (London, S.W.), K. Fisher (Warwick), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), George Brown

(Hartill), I. Harrison (Bristol), L. R. Lodge (Norwood), Lilian M. Wagstaff (Leighton Buzzard), I. Swinscon (Tunbridge Wells), Leith Gordon (Birmingham), F. W. Lawfield (Galveston), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Lilian G. Ping (Leytonstone), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), Mrs. S. Stirling (Glenfarg), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Margery Wilkins (Utttoxeter), Fred E. Bolt (Anerley), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield), Sybil Waller (Boscombe), Beryl M. May (Farnham), Cecily M. Rutley (Catford), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), William Morriss (Sheffield), L. H. Cooke (Stockport), R. G. Lovatt (Victoria Park, S.E.), Miss E. Ellis (Leicester), Miss V. D. Goodwin (Gillingham), Fred Batty (Leeds), Mrs. F. L. Payne (St. Austell), H. M. Creswell Payne (St. Austell), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Tom Sefton (Bolton), George Stanton (Leicester), Miss Richey (Belfast), and Andrew H. Brown (Barnsbury, N.)

IV. THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to EMILY KINGTON, Ardblair Castle, Blairgowrie, Perthshire, N.B.

V. This Competition has proved very popular and an unusually large number of entries have been received. Dr. John Brown, the author of "Rab and his Friends," has been represented with unfailing regularity among the entries of almost every competitor, while other much quoted writers comprise Byron, Wordsworth, Homer, Rudyard Kipling, and Jack London. We have awarded the THREE PRIZES to Mr. CHARLES POWELL, of Dovedale, Victoria Park, Manchester; Mr. LAURENCE TARR, of 17, Central Park Road, East Ham, E.; and Miss G. N. NORTHCOTE, Alderley, Church Road, West Kirby, near Birkenhead, for the following:

(1) THE COMPANIONSHIP OF DOGS.

"And it was thus that, the other day, before his illness, I saw my little Pelléas sitting on his tail at the foot of my writing-table, his head a little on one side the better to question me, at once attentive and tranquil, as a saint should be in the presence of God. He was happy with a happiness which we, perhaps, shall never know, since it sprang from the smile and the approval of a life incomparably higher than his own. He was there, studying, drinking in all my looks, and he replied to them gravely, as from equal to equal, to inform me, no doubt, that at least through the eyes, the almost immaterial organ that transformed into affectionate intelligence the light which we enjoyed, he well knew that he was saying to me all that love should say."

MAURICE MAETERLINCK, My Dog.

(Charles Powell.)

(2) THE LOSS OF A DOG.

"Nobody knows, except you and me, and those who have experienced the like affections, what it is to love a dog and lose it. Grant the love and the loss is imaginable, but I complain of the fact that people who will not or cannot grant the love set about wondering how one is not ashamed to make a fuss for a dog. . . . For my part, my eyelids have swelled and reddened, both for the sake of lost dogs and birds, and I do not feel particularly ashamed of it."

MRS. BROWNING to MR. WESTWOOD.

(Laurence Tarr.)

(3) THE INTELLIGENCE OF DOGS.

"And all through that night of age-long agony the grey figure stood, still as a statue at the foot of the stairs. Only when with the first chill breath of the morning a dry quick-quenched sob of a strong man sorrowing for the helpmeet of a score of years, and a tiny cry of a new-born child wailing because its mother was not, came into his ears, the Grey Watchman drooped his head upon his bosom, and with a little whimpering note crept back to his blanket. A little later, the door above opened and James Moore tramped down the stairs."

"At the foot of the stairs Owd Bob stole out to meet him. He came crouching up as though guilty of the deadly sin, head and tail down, in a manner no man ever saw before or since."

"At his master's feet he stopped and whined pitifully."

"Then for one short moment James Moore's whole face quivered."

"Weel, lad," he said, quite low, and his voice broke, "she's awa'."

"That was all—for they were an undemonstrative couple."

ALFRED OLLIVANT, Owd Bob.

(Miss G. N. Northcott.)

We also specially commend the good work of the following: Miss V. D. Goodwin (Gillingham), Len Harling (Skipton-in-Craven), K. Fisher (Warwick), Miss Stewart-Cockerton (Southampton), Miss C. Johnson (Malton), Rosie Speight (Leeds), E. Briggs (Old Charlton), J. N. Adamson (Liverpool), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield), Miss M. G. Morton (Walmer), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Ethel M. Odell (Forest Gate), Miss Hext (St. Austell), Miss Mason (Ashford), Miss Bella Mackenzie (Edinburgh), Miss Watson (Newcastle on Tyne), Dorothy K. Hines (Ipswich), Norah E. Goodbody (Clara), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), John Gower (Haverhill), Fred E. Holt (Anerley), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough), F. Rhodes (Scarborough), M. Capper (Saffron Walden), Thomas Lantear (London, S.E.), Alice M. Morgan (Sheffield), Miss E. I. Conyers (Ben Rhydding), E. J. Notcutt (Leamington), Miss Mackenzie (St. Andrew's), Mrs. A. E. Sell (Wanstead), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), John Butell (Belfast), Edward J. Hales (Wolverhampton), Miss Paterson (Fleet), A. R. Williams (Worcester), John Murdoch (Edinburgh), J. U. Adamson (Liverpool), Mrs. R. K. Polkinghorne (West Kensington), and S. A. Doody (Boscombe).

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

January 1st to February 1st, 1912.

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

BRIGGS, R. A. I.R.I.B.A. Pompeian Decorations. Illustrated in a series of "Coloured Drawings reproduced by three colour process, and by many pencil drawings reproduced in half-tone. Accompanied by Descriptive Text. 25s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

William Robertson Smith. His Life and Letters. Edited by John Sutherland Black and George Chrystal.

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

BASTIN, S. LEONARD.—Wonders of Plant Life. 7s. 6d. net.
HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—Ghost Kings. 6d.
HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—Mime. 6s.
HUTCHINSON, DR. WOODS.—Consider the Children. 6s. net.
KEARTON, RICHARD, I.Z.S., F.R.P.S.—British Bird's Nest. Serial. 17 Parts. Part 1, January 1st. 7d. net per part.
WARD, MRS. HUMPHRY.—Daphne. 1s. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

ANONYMOUS.—For the Defence. A Brief for Lady Carol. 6s.
CHADWICK, ADMIRAL.—The Relations of Spain and the United States of America. In 3 Vols. 31s. 6d. net.
CHANCELLOR, E. BIERESFORD.—Annals of the Strand. 7s. 6d. net.
COKE, DESMOND.—The Cure. 6s.
CULLUM, RIDGWELL.—The Hound from the North. 2s. net.
HUNSEKER, JAMES.—Franz Liszt. 6s. net.
LE BRAZ, ANATOLE.—The Night of Furies. 4s. net.
LEIGH, GERTRUDE.—Tasso and Flemonia. 4s. net.
O'KANE, W. M.—The King's Luck. 6s.
ROGERS, SIR JOHN.—Sport in Vancouver and Newfoundland. 7s. 6d. net.
SCHUSTER, ROSE.—The Triple Crown. 6s.
STRIGIENSKI, C.—Meadows of France. 10s. 6d. net.
YOUNG, E.—Finland, the Land of a Thousand Lakes. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Hugo. Cheap edition, in Coloured Cover. 6d.
LITTLE, MAUDE.—The Children's Bread. A Novel. 6s.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

CHAYTON, H. J., M.A.—Direct French Course.
CLAY, H. B.A., and WYATT, A. J., M.A.—English Literature of the Nineteenth Century. 2s.
COLLINS, A. J. F., M.A., and ROBINSON, A., B.A.—Senior Latin Course (for Cambridge Senior Local). 3s. 6d.
EDMUNDS, E. W., M.A.—Senior Course of English Composition (for Cambridge Senior Local). 2s. 6d.
FLECHER, REV. W. H., M.A., D.C.L., and SHUKER, J. W., M.A.—Acts of the Apostles, Part II. (for Cambridge Senior Local). 1s. 6d.
JACKSON, T. C., B.A., LL.B.—Practical Lessons in Book-keeping. (Fourth Edition, Revised and Re-written). 1s. 6d., or in Two Parts, each 2s.
JAMES, R. F., B.A.—Senior French Reader for Cambridge Senior Local. 2s. 6d.
MOFFATT, PAGET, M.A., M.B., B.C.—Science. (French Course). 3s. 6d.
STEWART, R. W., D.Sc., and SATTERLY, JOHN, D.Sc., M.A.—Senior Sound and Light (for Cambridge Senior Local). 4s.
WALKER, REV. T. A., M.A., and SHUKER, J. W., M.A.—St. Matthew's Gospel (for Cambridge Senior Local). 1s. 6d.
WEEKLY, PROF. E., and GILLI, C., B.A.—Senior French Course (for Cambridge Senior Local). 3s. 6d.

Mr. Henry Frowde.

ARNOLD, M. L.—The Soliloquies of Shakespeare. Columbia University Press Books.
CLAPP, E. J.—The Port of Hamburg. Yale University Press Books.
GRIERSON, DR. G. A.—Manual of the Kashmiri Language.
HOBHOUSE, L. T.—Social Evolution and Political Theory. Columbia University Press Books.

JOHNSON, W. C.—Thomas Carlyle. A Study of His Literary Apprenticeship. Yale University Press Books.

LEE, E. S.—Scientific Features of Modern Medicine. Columbia University Press Books.

MORGAN, CHARLOTTE J.—The Rec. of the Novel of Manners. Columbia University Press Books.

PORTER, A. K.—Construction of Gothic and Lombard Vaults. Yale University Press Books.

REED, E. B.—English Lyric Poetry. Yale University Press Books.

Vulgate New Testament. Prepared by Prof. H. J. White from the large edition by the late Bishop of Salisbury and Professor White.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

BURLAND, I. B. HARRIS.—Lord of Hongroy. 6s.
FITZGERALD, LINA.—And the Stars Fought. 6s.
FRANCO, ANATOLE.—Thais. 10s. net.
GAUTOT, PAUL.—The Red Shirt. (Doris Library). Cloth, 1s. 6d. net. Leather, 2s. net.
RAY, MICHAEL, and EADE, MONTEFIORE.—The Mousme. 1s.
OPCZY, BARONESS.—Imperial Camellies. New 6d. Edition.
HORN, GUY.—The Drunkard. 6s.
WILSON, RATHMILL.—Cannon Wing. 6s.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

KNIGHT, FRANK (Editor).—Annual Monitor, 1912. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net.
SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Official).—Book of Discipline. Part I. Christian Practice. Cloth, 1s. net.
SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Official).—Friends' Year Book. Cloth, 1s. net.
SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Official).—Book of Meetings. Cloth, 6d. net.
WOOD, ELIZABETH.—The Story of the Prophet. Cloth limp, 1s. net, paper, 7d. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

ANON.—He Who Passed. 6s.
FENOLLOSA, L. L.—Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. 30s. net.
MERCIER, DR. C. A.—New Logic. 10s. net.
SHARP, WILLIAM.—Poem and Dramatic Interludes. 4s. net.
SINCLAIR, LUTON.—Love's Pilgrimage. 6s.
TALBOT, P. A.—Moving Pictures, and How They are Made and Worked. 6s. net.
UZANNE, OCTAVE.—The Modern Pansienne. 6s. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BENSON, R. H.—The Coward. 6s.
COLE, L. W., Edited by.—Cole's Treasury of Song. 2s. 6d.
CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—The Arrival of Anthony. 6s.
CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—Two Impostors and a Tanker. 7d.
DICKENS, M. ANGELA.—The Debtor. 6s.
FRASER, MRS. HUGH, and F. I. STATHMAN.—Satan's. 6s.
GREEN, EVELYN EVERETT.—Silver Axe. 7d.
McCABE, JOSEPH.—The Story of Evolution. 12s. 6d. net.
MELVILLE, LEWIS.—Caroline of Brunswick. 1s.
PHILIPPOUS, EDWIN.—The Thief of Virtue. 7d.
RIMINGTON, A. WALLACE, A.R.P., R.B.A.—Cuban Music. 6s. net.
SERGEANT, PHILIP W.—My Lady Castlemaine. 1s. 6d. net.
STACPOLE, H. DE VRE.—The Order of Release. 6s.
WHITE, PHILIP Y.—Park Lane. 7d.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

DYKES, W. RICKATSON.—Irisles. ("Present Day Gardening.") 1s. 6d. net.
KIRKMAN, J. B.—British Bird Book. Section 7. 10s. 6d. net. Edition de Luxe, 71s.
PEAKE, PROFESSOR A. S.—Jeremiah 11 and Lamentations. (Century Bible) 2s. 6d. net, leather, 3s. 6d. net.
SPOONER, PROFESSOR.—Motors and Motoring. Revised Edition. 2s. net.
WARWICK, COUNTESS OF.—William Morris. (The Pilgrim Books) 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- COBB, THOMAS.—A Giver in Secret.—2s. net.
 FORD, SEWELL.—Torchy. Illustrated. 6s.
 GAUNT, MARY.—Alone in West Africa. 96 full-page illustrations and photographic frontispiece. 15s. net.
 HOWARD, G. BRONSON.—An Enemy to Society. Illustrated. 6s.
 PAIN, BARRY.—Stories in Grey. 6s.
 ROTHERY, GUY CADOGAN.—Chimneyplaces and Ingle Nooks. Fully illustrated. 6s. net.
 SMITH, F. HOPKINSON.—Kennedy Square. Illustrated. 6s.
 TRELAWNEY, GEORGE.—In a Cottage Hospital. 2s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green, & Co.

- BOUTROUX, EMILE.—William James: Authorised Translation by Archibald Henderson.
 DUCHENE, CAPTAIN.—The Mechanics of the Aeroplane. Translated from the French by John H. Ledebor and T. O'B. Hubbard. With 98 illustrations and diagrams. 7s. 6d. net.
 FERGUSSON, JOHN C.—Fergusson's Percentage Unit of Angular Measurement with Logarithms.
 JOHNSTONE, HILDA, M.A.—A Hundred Years of History from Record and Chronicle, 1216-1327.
 KEATINGE, G.—Rural Economy in the Bombay Deccan.
 MAY, RIGHT HON. SIR THOMAS FRANKLIN, K.C.B., D.C.L. (LORD FARNBOROUGH).—The Constitutional History of England since the Accession of George III., 1760-1860. New Edition. Vols I and II., 1760-1860, 15s. net; Vol. III., 1860-1911, by Francis Holland, 12s. 6d. net.
 OPPENHEIM, L.—International Law. 2 Vols. Vol. I. Peace. New and Thoroughly Revised Edition, 18s.
 PEACOCK, MAJOR F. M.—When the War is Over: A Novel.
 PULLER, REV. F. W.—Marriage: With a Deceased Wife's Sister.
 RHODES, J. E. WYNFIELD. Microtopology for Beginners. With a Preface by C. Howard Sidelbotham, A.R.S.M. With numerous original illustrations by the Author.
 ROBINSON, REV. CHARLES H., D.D. Our Bounden Duty: Sermons and Addresses. 2s. 6d. net.
 STONE, REV. JAMES S., D.D.—The Passion of Christ.
 THORPE, SIR EDWARD, C.B., LL.D., F.R.S. Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. Revised and Enlarged Edition. 5 Vols. Vol. I., 2s. 5s. net.

Messrs. Maclehoose & Sons.

- ELDER, JOHN R., M.A.—The Royal Fishery Companies of the Seventeenth Century. 5s. net.
 MACFARLANE, WILLIAM, F.R.S. The Growth of Bone. Observations on Osteogenesis. An Experimental Inquiry into the Development and Reproduction of Diaphyseal Bone. 8s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- BARNETT, JOHN.—A Queen of Castaways. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—A Man from the North. New Edition. 6s.
 CLARKE, ISABEL.—Prisoners' Years. 6s.
 HERBERTSON, AGNES GROZIER.—The Ship that came Home in the Dark. 6s.
 HICHENS, ROBERT.—The Woman with the Fan. New Edition. 1s. net.
 HOLDSWORTH, ANNIE E.—Dame Verona of the Angels. 6s.
 HOPE, MARGARET.—Christina Holbrook. 6s.
 IRONSIDE, JOHN.—Forged in Strong Fires. 6s.
 RITCHIE, MRS. DAVID G.—The Human Cry. 6s.
 SHIPLEY, MARY.—English Church History for Children. Vol. III. 2s. 6d. net.
 TOLSTOY, LEO.—Sevastopol and other Stories. New Edition. 1s. net.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. & A. M.—My Friend the Chauffeur. New Edition. 2s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- ARMSTRONG, CECIL.—The Actor's Companion. 2s. 6d. net.
 CARNEGY, MILDRED.—A Queen's Knight. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 CLOUSTON, J. STORER.—The Peer's Progress. 1s. net.
 COBB, THOMAS.—Enter Bridget. 6s.
 CRESPIGNY, MRS. P. CHAMPION DE.—The Mark. 6s.
 FARRER, C., from the French of. Translated by E. DE CLERMONT TONNERRE.—The Battle. Illustrated. 6s.
 LEBLANC, MAURICE.—The Frontier. 6s.
 MANN, MARY E.—Men and Dreams. 6s.
 NEWTE, HORACE W. C.—The Sins of the Children. 1s. net.
 STEVENS, F. S.—The Lure. 6s.
 WRENCH, MRS. STANLEY.—Ruth of the Rowdrieh. 6s.
 WYLIE, I. A. R.—The Rajah's People. 1s. net.

John Murray, Esq.

- ARMITAGE, MRS.—Early Norman Castles. Illustrated with Drawings by D. H. Montgomerie.
 BROWN, W. JETHRO, LL.D., Litt.D.—The Underlying Principles of Modern Legislation.
 CUMMING, GORDON.—Lion Hunter of South Africa. (Murray's Shilling Library.)
 DUNRAVEN, EARL OF.—The Legacy of Past Years. (Cheap Edition), 6d.
 GRANT DUFF, THE LATE SIR M. F.—Notes from a Diary. First Series. (Murray's Shilling Library.)
 HARKER, MRS. L. ALLEN.—Mr. Wycherly's Wards. Novel. 6s. net.
 LIVINGSTONE, THE LATE DAVID.—First Expedition to Africa. (Murray's Shilling Library.)
 NEUMAN, B. PAUL.—Roddies. 6s. net.
 PHILLOPS, EDEN.—The Forest on the Hill. 6s. net.
 POCKOCK, ROGER.—Jesse of Cariboo. 6s. net.
 ROSS, H. C.—Continuation of Further Researches into Induced Cell-Reproduction and Cancer.
 TEMPLE, SIR RICHARD, Edited by.—The Diaries of Streynsham Master, 1675-1680. Indian Records Series.
 TURNER, H. H., D.Sc., F.R.S.—The Great Star Map.
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN.—Part XVII.: The Genus Rosa. 21s. net.

Mr. J. Evelyn Nash.

- ASKEW, ALICE & CLAUDE.—The Woman Deborah. 2s. net.
 CONRAD, JOSEPH.—Some Reminiscences. 5s. net.
 FLETCHER, J. S.—The Town of Crooked Ways. 6s.
 GILLPATRICK, WALLACE.—Wanderings in Mexico: Being an Account of Travel and Adventure in Mexican Highways and Byways. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 HENRY, C.—Cabbages and Kings.—6s.
 HODGSON, WILLIAM HOPE.—The Night Land.—6s.
 JERROLD, MRS. CLARE.—The Early Court of Queen Victoria. Illustrated. 15s. net.
 KENNARD, NINA H.—Lafcadio Hearn: His Life and Work. Illustrated, and containing hitherto unpublished letters. 12s. 6d. net.
 KING, LOUIS.—China as it Really is. 2s. net.
 PRAGUE, JOSEPH.—A Woman of Impulse. 6s.
 WRIGHT, OLIVER.—The Riverport Mall. 2s. net.

Messrs. Sampson, Low, Marston & Co.

- ADMIRAL MAHAN.—Naval Strategy. 16s. net.
 JANE.—All the World's Aircraft. 21s. net.
 MEIKLE.—West Indies, etc. 5s. net.
 STOWE, H. B.—Old Town Folk. 3s. 6d.
 MORAN.—Miss Washington. 5s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

- ARCHER, FRANK.—An Actor's Note Books. 7s. 6d. net.
 BAKER, CAPTAIN GRANVILLE.—A Winter Holiday in Portugal. 12s. 6d. net.
 BARCLAY, ARMIGER.—The Activities of Lavie Juit. 6s.
 BAZIN, RENE.—The Children of Alsace. 6s.
 BETT, REV. H.—The Watch Night. 6s.
 HAGGARD, LT.-COL. ANDREW C. P.—Two Worlds. 6s.
 HEDGCOCK, DR. F. A.—David Garrick and His French Friends. 7s. 6d. net.
 MARSHALL, ARCHIBALD H.—The Mystery of Red Marsh Farm. 6s.
 RAPPOPORT, DR. ANGELO S.—The Love Affairs of the Vatican. 16s. net.
 "RITA."—Only an Actress. 6d.
 SABATINI, RAFAEL.—The Life of Cesare Borgia. 16s. net.
 VAHEY, HERBERT L.—Camilla Forgetting Herself. 6s.
 WYNNE, MAY.—The Red Fleur de Lys. 6s.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

- ADDISON, A. C.—The Romantic Story of the "Mayflower" Pilgrims and its Place in the Life of To-day. With 50 illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 ASPINALL, A. G.—The British West Indies: Their History, Resources, and Progress. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 HAYLEY, J. E.—Drapery Business Organisation, Management and Accounts. 5s. net.
 HAYLEY, J. E.—Business Terms, Phrases, and Abbreviations. With Foreign Equivalents. Fourth Edition, revised and enlarged. 2s. 6d. net.
 BERRY, A. J.—Europa's Childhood and Growth: An Historical Geography of Europe. 2s.
 CHADWICK, MRS. F. H.—Mothercraft and Infant Management. 9d. net.
 INGPEN, ROGER.—The Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley. 2 Vols. New and cheaper Edition, with Additional Matter. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net; half leather, 27s. net.
 JONES, DAVID.—Dramatised History Reader: Junior Book. 7d. net.
 LEULIETTE, VICTOR.—French Prose Writers of the Nineteenth Century and after: An Advanced French Reader. 3s. net.
 LONGFORD, PROFESSOR J. H.—Japan of the Japanese. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 MASKELL, H. P. and GREGORY, E. W.—Old Country Inns. Cheaper Edition. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.
 PARKER, JOHN.—Who's Who in the Theatre. Cloth, 6s. net; leather, 8s. 6d. net.
 SHELLEY, H. C.—The British Museum: Its History and Treasures. Profusely illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
 SPENCER, F. H.—The Student's Guide to Political Economy. 2s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, C. E.—Athletic Training for Girls. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.
 TOMLINSON, J. B.—Children of Other Countries. 1s. 3d.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

- ANDERSON, ROBERT.—An Artillery Officer in the Mexican War. 7s. 6d. net.
 COLLINS, JOSEPH.—The Way with the Nerves. 6s. net.
 CORNELISEN, REV. ISAAC A., D.D.—The Natural History of Religious Feeling. 6s. net.
 OLCOTT, WILLIAM TYLER.—Star Lore of All Ages. 12s. 6d. net.
 ST. LEGER, EVELYN.—The Shape of the World. 6s.
 TENNYSON, ALFRED, LORD.—In Memoriam. 6s. net.
 TENNYSON, ALFRED, LORD.—The Princess. 6s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

- MOORE, LESLIE.—The Cloak of Convention. 6s.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co.

- BITHELL, JETHRO, M.A.—Contemporary French Poetry. 1s.
 COHEN, CHAPMAN.—Determinism or Free-Will? 1s. net.
 DUNCAN, EDMONSTOUN.—101 Carols, 200 pages. Both Notations, with Vocal and Organ Parts. 1s. net, 3s. 6d. and 5s.
 DUNCAN, TAYLOR.—The Composition of Matter and the Evolution of Mind. 3s. 6d.

Mr. Martin Secker.

- DOUGLAS, THEO.—White Webs. 6s.
 FEA, ALLAN.—The Real Captain Cleveland. 8s. 6d. net.
 MACHEN, ARTHUR.—Hieroglyphics. 2s. 6d. net.
 MACKENZIE, COMPTON.—Carnival. 6s.
 MAKOWER, STANLEY V.—The Outward Appearance. 6s.
 NIVEN, FREDERICK.—Dead Men's Bells. 6s.
 NORTH, LAWRENCE.—The Goghtlys: Father and Son. 6s.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

- GARNETT, EDWARD.—The Trial of Jeanne d'Arc: A Play. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
 MONKHOUSE, A. N.—Mary Broome: A Play. Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sheffington & Son.

- CRAIGIE, REV. J. A., M.A.—The Parable of the Prodigal. 2s. net.
 CRAWFORD, REV. LIONEL P., M.A.—The Transfiguration. 2s. 6d. net.
 F. V. H.—The Six Maries. 1s. 6d. net.
 GIBBERNE, AGNES.—Glimpses of Christ. 2s. net.
 GRESSWELL, REV. H. W.—Religion in Many Aspects. 2s. 6d. net.
 HILL, REV. HENRY ERSKINE.—The Seven Parables of the Kingdom. 1s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, REV. G. A. C.—In the Way with the Master. 1s. 6d. net.
 SWINBURNE, REV. JAS. K.—Beneath the Cloak of England's Respectability. 2s. net.
 WESTALL, REV. L. S., B.D.—Aids to Catholic Worship. 1s.
 WOOD, REV. THEODORE.—The Second Adam.—3s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- BODKIN, M. McDONNELL.—Young Beck. 6s.
 CRANFORD, REV. A. H.—The Religion and Ethics of Tolstoy. 3s. 6d. net.
 DELL, E. M.—The Way of an Eagle. 6s.
 FABRE, J. H.—Social Life in the Insect World. 10s. 6d. net.
 FOX, S. M.—The Wakes of Bitterness (a Play in Three Acts); and The Clodhopper (an Incredible Comedy). 2s. 6d.
 GILMAN, CHARLOTTE PERKINS.—What Diantha Did.—4s. 6d. net.
 GLENCONNER, LADY.—The White Wallet. 5s. net.
 HAY, WILLIAM.—Captain Quadding. 6s.
 HERZEL, MARCEL.—Six Faberies: Their Treasures and Tollers. 10s. 6d. net.
 HODSON, ARNOLD H.—Tracking the Great Thirst; Sport and Travel in the Kalahari Desert. 10s. 6d. net.
 MERR, REV. CHARLES.—The Normandy Coast. 6s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

- MOBERLY, L. G.—Christina. 6s.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE A.—In Love's Land. 6s.
 TYNAN, KATHERINE.—Princess Katherine. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—The Mystery of the Ravenshoe. 6s.

THE READER.

SANTA CHRISTINA.

BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

MY first acquaintance with Christina Rossetti came about in 1885, after I had published my first volume of poems, "Louise de la Vallière." I did not send it to the great, indiscriminatingly, as the young poets of those days were wont to do; but because I was Rossetti-mad at the time, because the little book was very Rossettian - a good deal of it had been written, nevertheless, before I had read Dante Gabriel—I sent it to William Michael Rossetti. I may recall that the first Rossetti book I ever owned—number one of the two famous volumes published by Ellis and Elvey, with the Rossetti design on the cover—was purchased with the 10s. 6d. which the Graphic had paid me for a poem: and well I remember buying it in the Dublin book-shop and carrying it home hugged against my heart, the colour and glory of it irradiating my day. Rossetti had succeeded Mrs. Browning with me. There was a time when I used to repeat "The Brown Rosary" as I raced along the country roads, running from exhilaration in the poetry and my youth, till the sight of a gaping urchin shocked me into decorum. But "The Brown Rosary" and "The Sonnets from the Portuguese" had been replaced by "The Blessed Damsel" and "The Staff and Scrip," before ever "Louise de la Vallière" saw the light! Those were days when I had a great deal of Dante Gabriel by heart and used to say him over to myself by day and by night. The little book was an arrow shot in the dark. • Picture then the incredulous delight of the rustic maiden when an early post brought a long letter from Mr. William Rossetti, full of praise of the book, and inviting her to select from a list of the Hollier photographs of Rossetti's pictures any half-dozen! I thought, and still think it, royal kindness—gold for bronze indeed. The letter came on a summer Sunday morning, and I can yet recall the joy of my heart as I read it aloud to the father who shared all my joys.

The letter contained a suggestion that I should send the book to Christina, who had read my letter to her brother and had been greatly interested. I suppose they were amused and pleased at my frank Rossetti adoration. It was indeed a name of enchantment to me in those days. I sent the book with a heart and a half, and a few days later brought me a most kind and warm letter from Christina, with the photographs of the pictures I had chosen which still are among my cherished possessions.

The remainder of that summer and the autumn were marked by white-stone days on which I received letters from either William or Christina Rossetti. I used to send them all I wrote, and they never failed in kindest acknowledgment. I realize now that my youthful enthusiasm might well have been a bore; but if these kind people, who to me were up in the skies above me—as indeed Christina was—touched with even more than the enchantment which hung for me then over all people of literary achievement, felt it so at any time, they never betrayed it by a sign. I used to wait for their letters, turning cold with apprehension if they were delayed—having a correspondingly warm rush of joy when the envelopes with William Michael's beautiful little caligraphy or Christina's large clear hand, were in my post-bag some happy morning. I have a good many letters of Christina's of that date, but they are not at this moment accessible, and I think they were chiefly concerned with the poems I sent her. "More than gifts I value graces," she wrote to me once, in praise of a poem of mine: and I think she liked me because of my religious poems.

Sometime in that winter I was in London, and was bidden to William Rossetti's house in Euston Square—Endsleigh Gardens, rather—and to 30, Torrington Square, Christina's unlikely home for so many years.

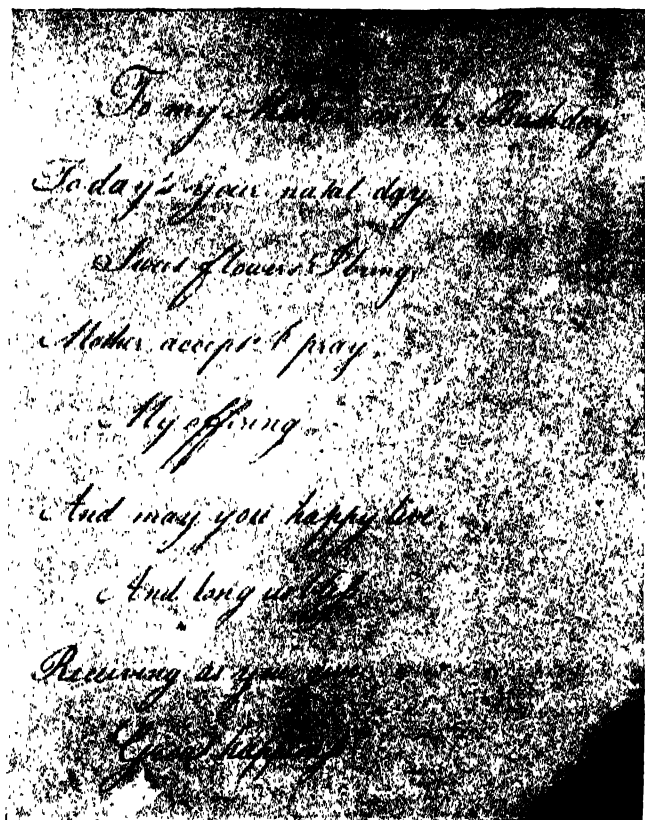

I paid Christina several visits that winter, and I daresay they may have been visitations, but I'm sure if they were so that I must have been pressed to remain. The Rossettis were always true Bloomsbury people. Torrington Square was near William Rossetti; and the

Photo by W. A. Mansell & Co.

Christina Rossetti.

From a drawing by D. G. Rossetti.

Christina Rossetti's earliest recorded verses.

Written on 27th April, 1842, when she was aged 12. They are addressed to her mother on her birthday.

family ties with Christina were close and dear. It was near her favourite church. It was convenient for the many people who came to see her. She told me that she had crowds of American visitors, and she did not deny herself to them. I must, I think, have visited Christina in summer later on: but I have no memory of it. My memory is always of dark and wet winter evenings: of the little oblong London square, the lamp-light shining on its dripping evergreens; of the darkness of the little house to which I was admitted where Santa Christina shone like a light. The last time I saw her, within the weeks immediately preceding her death, she lay on a sofa, the light burning brighter and brighter as the frail vessel that held it grew more and more transparent.

That first afternoon we sat in the dusk, I, at one side of the fireplace, facing the great old mother of the Rossettis, who was then in her eighties. There was still living in the house an old Miss Polidori, or perhaps two. I seem to remember Christina taking one, or perhaps two, to Torquay, where she always made her infrequent holidays. The room was very dim. I do not think there was bright firelight. But as time went Christina lit a couple of candles. I remember the grave, noble face watching me with great interest and kindness. My adoration for Dante Rossetti had pleased and touched them. I exuded it. In those days my grief was that I could not have won one word of his approval. Sometimes Mrs. Rossetti bent to ask Christina what I had said; and when it was conveyed to her, the steadfast, fine old face turned on me its look of pleased approval. Once Christina said something about her mother, who leant forward and patted her knee, murmuring, "My affectionate Christina."

I remember that it was something of a shock to me to receive at my first sight of Christina an impression of short-petticoated sturdiness. She was not in the least bit sturdy. Probably she would have loved the trailing Pre-Raphaelite garments which just then were all the vogue; the beautiful colours to which Liberty's were just introducing us. Doubtless it was a mortification of the flesh or the spirit to wear, as she did, thick boots and short rough grey skirts. As far as they could they made her almost ugly, for the spiritual face, with the heavily-lidded eyes, had nothing to do with those garments fit for a ten-mile walk over ploughed fields. She had scruples about the sadness of her poetry. "I was a melancholy girl," she said, "so I am a very cheerful old lady." She was not an old lady, but she had chosen, so far as she could, to be Victorian middle-aged. Something of a death-in-life it seemed to the girl coming in from outside, to be shut up in an ill-lit house in Torrington Square, with two or three old ladies getting up to their centuries. One wondered that she did not make it more tolerable by living in the country. But she chose Torrington Square. I wonder if she hated it as much as she ought to have hated it.

I had come fresh from William Rossetti's house where I had handled—as though it were the Grail—the Germ, and had inspected all manner of relics of Dante Gabriel. I had been given a short note of his, asking if Mrs. Stillman had come to town, an immemorable thing, but memorable to the disciple; also a characteristic note of Christina's: "My dear William, I will come on Thursday, so far as human prevision can ensure it," an escape from the hackneyed "D.V." Christina too took down from walls and out of desks all sorts of pictures and sketches of "Dear Gabriel," and "Poor little Lizzie." We talked about Christina's poetry. I wish I remembered more clearly what was said. One poem we discussed was "Milly, a Lady." Is that the title I wonder? My books are out of reach and I cannot be sure. But I

30, Torrington Square.

Christina Rossetti's residence for 19 years, and where she died.

National Portrait Gall.

Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Drawn by himself in 1846.

what was probably a first edition, with a Polidori name written in it. She laughed a great deal over "Cranford," turning the pages and recalling this or that. I think I went away uneasy because of her pretence of robustness, of brusquerie, almost.

Then on some other wet winter evening I carried off her umbrella. I had some considerable difficulty in restoring it, for though I set out several times with that object I did not succeed in achieving it till the eve of my leaving London, and then, I think, I took three hansoms, before I finally reached Torrington Square. I forget what my adventures were, but I know she was greatly diverted by my recital of them. "That sad tale of an umbrella!" she wrote afterwards: "and all the time I had another, not elegant, I admit, but quite serviceable." The one I had taken was, by the way, quite gampish. It belonged to that period when she was determined to be Victorian middle-aged, she the "undaunted daughter of desires!"

"I am not sure that I have one drop of Irish blood in me," she wrote once, "but if there is a drop, it is a very warm one."

Once— it was in the day of the interview— I sought to interview her. She would not be interviewed, or rather she put it in this way: "Would I come to see her and ask what I liked, only remembering that she had a dislike to being interviewed for the Press." This naturally had a very deterrent effect. I went and saw her; but no interview was written.

remember the verse I quoted. And now I think that must have been why Mrs. Rossetti, the other side of the fire murmured, "My affectionate Christina"

"Milly has no mother, and sad beyond another Is she whose blessed mother is vanished out of call.
Surely sweetness beyond sweetness is wrapped up in a mother
Who bears with all, and trusts through all, and • loves us all."

"Ah," said Christina, "I remember how Gabriel said when I read it to him: 'You've been reading 'Lady Geraldine's Courtship.' And I had," she added.

I don't know if it was then or at some other time that she told me she never stepped on a scrap of torn paper, but lifted it out of the mud lest perhaps it should have the Holy Name written or printed upon it.

I went away that evening loaded with books, her own— she gave me at one time or another all she had written— other books as well. It was she who introduced me to "Cranford." I carried off

Christina Rossetti and her Mother.

Drawn by D. G. Rossetti.
From "Dante Gabriel Rossetti," by H. C. Marillier. (G. Bell & Sons)
By permission of Mr. W. M. Rossetti.

I certainly saw her on her sofa in her last illness. My impression is that I called to inquire, not intending nor hoping to see her, but that my name being taken up to her she wished to see me. Anyhow I was with her for a few moments, a farewell visit it proved. I think as she lay there, so gentle and patient, holding my hand, that she was really panting for Heaven. No one could grudge her her happy release; her happy ending that was only the prelude to the happiest beginning, although London, which must have many saints behind its dark house-fronts, had a saint the less.

South Kensington Museum.

Miss Siddal,

who was married to D. G. Rossetti in 1860, and died in 1862.

From a chalk drawing by Rossetti made about 1854.

'Tis O, in Paradise I fain would be!

All her poetry rings with the cry. Her vision of Paradise was very clear:

Multitudes, multitudes stood up in bliss

Made equal to the angels, glorious, fair:

With palms, harps, wedding-garments, kiss of peace,
And crowned and haloed hair.

Photo by W. A. Mansel & Co.

Lucy Rossetti.

(Mrs. W. M. Rossetti.)

They sang a song, a new song in the height,
Harping with harps to Him who is Strong and True:
They drank new wine: their eyes saw with new light.
Lo, all things were made new!

Tier beyond tier they rose and rose and rose,
So high that it was dreadful: flames with flames.
No man could number them, no tongue disclose
Their secret sacred names.

Photo by W. A. Mansel & Co.

Mrs. William Morris.

From a painting by Rossetti.

As though one pulse stirred all, one rush of blood
 Fed all, one breath swept through them myriad-voiced—
 They struck their harps, cast down their crowns, they stood
 And worshipped and rejoiced.

Each face looked one way like a moon new-lit :
 Each face looked one way towards the Sun of Love ;
 Drank love and bathed in love and mirrored it
 And knew no end thereof.

could not accept what to her was life and breath, was afforded her by the love of the Cayley who translated Petrarch. She was very hard on her lover and herself, but she never repented the hardness I think, in her later judgment, though a less greatly-loving woman might have found justification for being happy in certain texts of St. Paul. It is this latest of her lovers whom she bade to many a passionate tryst when her heart spoke in the abandonment of her poetry :

Shall I forget on this side of the grave ?

I promise nothing : you must wait and see—

Patient and brave.

(Oh my soul, watch with him and he with me.)

Shall I forget in peace of Paradise ?

I promise nothing : follow, friend, and see—

Faithful and wise.

(Oh, my soul, keep the way he walks with me.)

I think in spite of the human passion which beats through much of her poetry she was of the women who are called to be Brides of Christ, own sister to St. Teresa and St. Catharine of Siena. Perhaps it was part of her greatness, of the whole woman she was, that she laid such passionate hold on the human love and relinquished it with such pangs and tears.

Oh dream, how sweet, too sweet,
 too bitter-sweet :

Whose wakening should have been in Paradise,

Where souls brimful of love abide and meet ;

Where thirsting, longing eyes

Watch the slow door
 That opening in, letting in, lets out no more.

Yet come to me in dreams that
 I may live

My very life again, though cold in death.

Come back to me in dreams, that I may give

Pulse for pulse, breath for breath :

Speak low, lean low
 As long ago, my love, how long ago.

"My heart is like a singing bird,"

Illustrating "A Birthday" in "Poems by Christina Rossetti." (Blackie & Son.)
 From a colour plate by Florence Harrison.

The intensity of this realization of the Beatific Vision must have irradiated her life, wherever it was spent, with a glory beyond telling. Perhaps that was why Torrington Square held her as contentedly as the lovely country where she might have dwelt if she had chosen.

All the world that cares to know knows that Christina might have married two or three times. Her last vision of earthly happiness, foregone by her because her lover

this flame-hearted saint, with the grey streets of London, above all with Bloomsbury, more than all with the Mid-Victorian and Early-Victorian woman she tried to look like? There was nothing at all of England in her way of loving, the mortal love or the Divine love. She might have been one of those Italian nuns of whom Mrs. Humphry Ward says that, deprived of their daily Communion, they faint and wither. She was a born mystic. England had no part in her ; but England is immeasurably the gainer for that revolutionary bee in the bonnet which drove Gabriele Rossetti out of Italy and into England. Christina belonged to the Church of England by a strange accident. I am far from saying that her poetry did not gain much from her being brought up on the English Bible.

Perhaps if it had not been for the accident her poetry would have gained in another respect. She might have been free of that love of dwelling on the material aspect of death, which gives a certain sickly hue to this radiant creature's else rapturous poetry. Someone said of Christina's early poems that she could never keep the worms out of them. Well, perhaps that was partly the English Bible. But I imagine it may also have been—Torrington Square. Be that as it may, the fact remains that Christina Rossetti stands head and shoulders above all other women who have written English poetry. Where she stands in the line of poets, men as well as women, time will prove, and the judgment that sits in judgment, sifting, apportioning for immortality, beyond the futilities of contemporary judgment, blown about by many winds. If one may venture an opinion, among the Victorian poets, she and Browning will take the first place. Mystic and vestal virgin as she was, she was so much woman that the love she had refused and set on one side, preferring a heavenly love to an earthly, was her inspiration scarcely less than the heavenly. It

*Sleeping at last, the trouble & tumult over,
Sleeking at last, the struggle & passion past,
Red white out of sight of friend & of lover
Sleeping at last—
No more a tired heart downcast or overcast,
No more fears that rising or shifting fears that prove,
Sleeping at last in a dreamless sleep locked fast.
Fast, asleep. Singing birds in their leafy cover,
Cannot wake her, nor shake her the gusty blast.
Under the purple thyme & the purple clover
Sleeping at last.*

I make these (now in the English Museum) written by Christina Rossetti. In a note accompanying the verses Mr. W. M. Rossetti writes: "The verses I think must be the last Christina ever wrote—perhaps late in her life." (Early in 1894.)

inspired the "Monna Innominata," the noblest series of sonnets given to the world by a woman.

Another reminiscence and I am done. Some time in the early 'nineties my assistance was asked in collecting autographed books by famous English writers for the book-stall at an American bazaar. I was more adventurous then than I am now, and my cheerful confidence was well repaid. The great were all or nearly all propitious. Christina, with characteristic generosity, sent me all her own books, and—two or three volumes by Mr. Cayley. So that she had not lost spiritual touch with him even then. Some of the books were late for the bazaar and came back, among them these volumes by Christina's life-long lover, which are still in my possession.

Some time in the 'eighties I made the acquaintance of a little lady of very tender age, who was Christina's god-child and the happy possessor of Christina's coral and Christina's baby string of beads. I envied that little lady. I envy her now. Christina's necklace, well, who knows what ills Christina's necklace might charm away, how potent her coral might be against evil enchantments? She would perhaps have been shocked at the suggestion. Her poetry tells us that she regarded herself as a sinner. Yet surely no one in our time was more of the stuff of saints, fitter for the Kingdom, than crowned and haloed and palm-branched Santa Christina.

THE PAPACY AND MODERN TIMES.*

BY R. H. BENSON.

DR. BARRY is too great a writer to preach loudly in any written work, above all, in a work which has as its object the statement of historical facts; for, in such an enterprise, unless the facts themselves preach a moral, no imported lesson can be anything except one-sided and untrue. The facts with which he has to deal are innumerable and enormous, since they are illustrative of nothing less than the two great principles of Sacred and Secular, as these have manifested themselves in the Western history of the last two thousand years. On the one side stand the civil governments of the world, from Cæsar to the President of the United States; on the other stands Rome, exhaustively logical, as Catholics think her; over-developed and partial, as Protestants think her, yet, in any case, a commanding type of the claim to represent God. For, whatever may be the theological views of a man, he cannot deny that, as a matter of historical fact, she has stood for Christianity on the stage of the world's history as no other denomination has yet been able to stand; she numbers half the Christian world at the present day; she has moved among kings as well as among their subjects; she has made terms with this, has defied a second, and has been defied by a third.

The facts then are innumerable. In his prologue Dr. Barry sketches the formation of Christendom, and the gradual emergence of the Vatican to that position which Catholics believe to have been designed by the Divine Founder of Christianity, which Protestants believe was brought about by the stress and movement of history. "The Vatican," says the author, "is a name more august than the Parthenon, . . . full of millennial hopes and the pathos of man's history, nor yet illuminated by any visible and reconciling last scene. To the Catholic who reads, I would commend the exercise of his faith, having trust in the event. . . . To the general student let me say: 'These, too, had their sorrows, their heavy task, ere they passed into the unknown. Remember that they were like unto thee, as thou art like unto them. We will look over these chronicles together, and learn from them how divine, how helpless, how much to be pitied and wondered at a thing is human nature.'" This is beautifully said, and Dr. Barry acts up to it loyally. There is no covert proselytism, no suppression of truth, no over-emphasis of detail. Here are the facts, he seems to say: from these facts various men have drawn various conclusions: very well; then let us study them again together.

* "The Papacy and Modern Times." By William Barry, D.D. 1s. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

The book proper begins with a significant event, just touched upon, as a type—the conflict of Henry II. of England and St. Thomas of Canterbury. And then—"The royal supremacy was adjourned for three hundred and sixty years." Thence the author ranges out from England at its acute stage, to Europe generally, where, in this country the encounter had already taken place, in that country 'was yet to come', and, in the "Great Captivity" of Avignon finds the seeds sown for the great schism of the West. Thence the movement proceeds: there is confusion, not as to the fact of the Spiritual Twelve-piece illustration from "Sing-song: A Nursery Rhyme Book," by Christina Rossetti (Macmillan).

Drawn by Arthur Hughes.

"Buy from us with @ golden curl"

From "Goblin Market," by Christina Rossetti. (Macmillan.)

Power, but as to which arm holds it—whether Urban VI. or Clement VII. be the Vicar of Christ; and it is exceedingly significant of the position which the Spiritual Power had already established for itself, that the suggestion that there was no Vicar of Christ at all was never even breathed. But the stage of history to which most modern readers will turn with particular interest is that known as the Reformation; and here Dr. Barry is found almost at his best: he is splendidly frank. "Under what scandalous conditions," he writes, "Leo X. revived the Petrine indulgence, despite his oath to the contrary, and shared its profits with Albert, Archbishop of Mayence, we may learn from historians. In 1517 the German Church was a confederacy of high-born prince prelates, enormously rich, too often dissolute, and at best men of the world who left their spiritual charge to others." But he is fair, too, to the other side. "There was evidence of much piety," he adds, "in the middle and lower classes. . . . There is abundant proof that Scripture was well-known, preached and commented on, long before Wittenberg saw the friar among its professors." And so the battle is set and waged: shrewd blows are exchanged on either side; and when the dust has cleared away, part of Germany and Switzerland, Scandinavia and all England has been lost to Catholic unity. Henceforward the centre of gravity on the spiritual side will swing down once for all into the south, strengthened and reinforced as that was by the "Catholic Revival," under such men as St. Ignatius and his Society of Jesus.

These are, however, but specimens of the sections of history which Dr. Barry sketches so broadly and usefully. He carries the process down to our own days, and leaves us confronted with democracy—such democracy at least as has taken permanent shape in the Constitution of the United States of America. And it is an exceedingly fascinating view which he opens before us—a view on which he makes no partisan comments at all. He is obliged, of course, to cover an enormous tract of ground; and the result is that his style is even more compressed than usual. He writes, as a monastic chronicler illustrates, who has to combine in one picture of an inch square the Passion of Christ, the Eternal Father, the fabric of a soldier's tunic, the Magdalene's sorrow, and an Italian landscape. He writes in an unending succession of short sentences, each containing some pointed and vivid word, yet blending the whole into a real and considered design. It is a little difficult to read; it is even more difficult to remember; yet it is worth reading and re-reading. For it is not often that we meet with an historian who has, besides a real and minute knowledge of facts and a power of generalization and compression, a perfectly definite standpoint of his own from which to view them. There is, at any rate, something to be said for Mr. Belloc's assertion that none but a Catholic can adequately deal with the history of a Continent which, whether for good or evil, has been moulded wholly by Catholic influence and by reactions from it.

EDMUND GOSSE'S POEMS.

By AUSTIN DOBSON.

WRITING some seventy years ago in the Revue des Deux Mondes, Sainte-Beuve expressed his opinion that "il existe, en un mot, chez les trois quarts des hommes Un poète mort jeune à qui l'homme survit"—a piece of pessimism for which he was promptly and properly rebuked by Alfred de Musset, who pointed out that his friend's aphorism belied him, since it was almost a verse as it stood; and, surrendering him to his "offended Muse," contended that:

"en nous il existe souvent
Un poète endormi toujours jeune et vivant."

We are reminded of this episode by Mr. Gosse's well-planned and well-printed volume of "Collected Poems" (Heinemann, 5s. net). Those who are familiar with his fluent and pellucid prose—who, perhaps, know him chiefly as a sympathetic critic and an accomplished

Dante Gabriel, Christina, W. M. Rossetti, and their Mother in the garden of Rossetti's house, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea.

From a photograph by "Lewis Carroll" (Rev. C. L. Dodgson) in 1863. (Lent by Mr. W. M. Rossetti.)

essayist, have sometimes allowed themselves to forget—"so vast is art, so narrow human wit"—that he is also a poet of the most rare and delicate sensibility, a born metrist, and a keen lover of nature. And this poet is certainly not endormi, still less dead. But, regarding his art as a gift, not lightly to be abused, he has versified only à ses heures; and waited until his mind was duly attuned to the notes of that Phrygian flute whose music—as Lucian tells us—is audible only to the adept. His Euterpe is no Muse-of-all-work. He has never condescended to the temptations of the "topical," or set his words to the jingle of the cross-ways. On the contrary, he has always kept his song at a certain elevation, remembering, with the fine pensée of Joubert, that "the lyre is a winged instrument."

In a Preface of singular modesty, and touched a little sadly by the retrospect which must inevitably accompany an ingathering extending over a lengthy period, Mr. Gosse defines his position. His view, he says, is of 1872, when his technique was determined. "If I am a poet at all, I belong to the age of the Franco-German War, of the introduction of Japanese art into Europe, of the discoveries of Huxley and Hæckel, and of the Oxford lectures of Matthew Arnold." One may smile a little—as, indeed, he himself does at this "intellectual topography." But what we are here more concerned with is the fact that there was no initial fumbling in the technique he mentions. What is most notable about it is that what it was, it remains. Take, for instance, the final stanza of "The Return of the Swallows," which is one of the earliest pieces:

"And something awoke in the slumbering heart
Of the alien birds in their African air,
And they paused, and alighted,
and twittered apart,
And met in the broad white, dreamy square;
And the sad slave-woman, who lifted up
From the fountain her broad-lipped, earthen cup,
Said to herself, with a weary sigh,
'To-morrow the swallows will northward fly.'"

Compare with this the last verses of "The Land of France," which belongs to 1909:

"Sands of Dunkirk are not too cold for me;
Nor dales of Rousillon too full of fire;
Down Tarn and Lot my memory leaps in glee;
Long miles of poplar'd Anjou cannot tire
Feet that to frost-capp'd Dauphiné aspire;
Shouting of waves that on black Penmarch fall—
Slow stream 'ot Aigues-Mortes—I love them all.

"France, take my hands in those kind hands of thine;
Like a chill swallow to thy fields I fly!
Warmth, beauty, calm and happiness are mine
When o'er me bends that soft and radiant sky,
When in that vivid atmosphere I sigh—
Sigh, for pure gladness, while my pulses dance
A joyful measure to the praise of France."

But while one remarks that, in metrical skill, there are scant signs of alteration, this is no more than to say that no alteration was required, save the increased facility that comes of practice. In respect of form, Mr. Gosse entered the arena fully-armed, and had consequently to add nothing to his panoply. On the other hand, the matter of his work, as the very titles of his books imply ("In Russet and Silver," "An Autumn Garden") has changed with the passing of the years; and as his friend, Robert Louis Stevenson, says—in the letter written from Vailima only two days before his death which acknowledges "Tusitala" takes on an autumnal sobriety as it goes, growing, not indeed less "rich in adornment," but more "natural, personal,

Illustrating "The Lowest Room" in "Poems by Christina Rossetti." (Blackie & Son.)
From a drawing by Florence Harrison.

Caricatures of W. M. and D. G. Rossetti.

Drawn by D. G. R. in 1853.
From "Dante Gabriel Rossetti," by H. C. Marlhier. (G. Bell & Sons.
By permission of Mr. W. M. Rossetti.

sincere and articulate in substance." This is partly expressed in the poet's own epigraph :

"Life, that, when youth was hot and bold,
Leaped up in scarlet and in gold,
Now walks, by graver hopes possessed,
In russet and in silver dressed ;"

and finds larger utterance in the impressive verses that close the opening poem :

"Thank God, that, while the nerves decay
And muscles dessicate away,
The brain's the hardest part of men,
And thrives till three-score years and ten ;

"That, tho' the crescent flesh be wound
In soft, unseemly folds around,
The heart may, all the days we live,
Grow more alert and sensitive.

"Then, thews and prickly nerves, adieu !
Thanks for the years I spent with you ;
Gently and cheerfully we part :
Now I must live for brain and heart "

Fourteen years later, in "The Autumn Garden," the same thought dominates "A Song for the New Year" :

"Why, then, my New Year's wish shall
be
For love and love alone ;
More hands to hold out joy to me,
More hearts for me to own ;
And if the gain
In part be pain,—
Since time but gives to take again,—
Yet more than gold a thousandfold Is love that's neither bought nor sold."

How should one speak of a volume such as this, the hiving of well-nigh forty years ! To Mr. Gosse's contemporaries to those who have walked with him through good and evil hap the way is strewn with memories, thick-coming memories of the Past. Criticism may set aside her considering cap. It is no time for the weighing of values, where all has been valued already. One listens to the hygone voices, renews the old sensations. One reads again the old favourites, "The White-throat,"

"Wind of Provence," "The Mænad's Grave,"
"The Charcoal-burner." Here is "Firdausi in Exile," which one recalls as an introduction to "The Epic of Kings" ; here is the spirited
"Cruise of the Rover," which belongs to the "Magazine of Art" in Henley's reign, when it was illustrated by Seymour Lucas ; here are the clever Popesque couplets addressed to Oliver Wendell Holmes on his seventy-fifth birthday ; here are a score more which bring back a vanished time. The beautiful early sonnet "On a Lute found in a Sarco-phagus," and the dexterous "Alcyone," serve to show how skilful is this craftsman in an exacting form ; the "Memorial Verses," with how light a hand, and yet how sure a touch, he can paint the people he has known and loved. The "R.B." of this will be easily recognised :

"His soul went singing like a mountaineer
Who climbs the hills, and carols as he climbs ;
Above the snow he heard the fairy chimes !
Of God's faint bells, and felt no shade of fear.

"He leaped in faith from year to glimmering year ;
Nothing to him seemed poor or vile or vain,
Since all the fibres of his heart and brain
Were braced by hope's high Alpine atmosphere.

D. G. Rossetti.

From the medallion by John Hancock (engraved by Jonnard).

"I have known no goodlier spirit! Where he walked,
Love masqueraded in rough skins and claws,
Feigning to be some monster of the woods;

"Loud was the voice wherewith he rhymed and talked,
But warmer heart, or moved in kindlier cause,
Was never stirred by man's vicissitudes."

One of the most interesting of these "Memorial Verses" is a ballado on the death of that "Prince-jeweller" of rhyme, Théodore de Banville, which serves further to bring to mind Mr. Gosse's connection with the revival, circa 1875-85, of the old French forms of Villon and Clement Marot and Charles of Orleans. We say "revival," to be accurate, because some of them had been written by Chaucer; and they had also been essayed fitfully and timidly by Surrey and Patrick Carey, and even by writers of the eighteenth century. And when, at last, they were marshalled in force, they had long been, so to speak, in the air. Swinburne was thinking of them in the "Ballad of Burdens"; and the stanza of his admirable "Match" is a modification of the Dante triolet. Rossetti paraphrased Villon's "Ballad of Dead Ladies" in a way that, had he played the game as he did in Villon's "Rondel to Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

From a French Etching.

Death," would have made all later versions needless. Mr. Gosse himself, in his "On Viol and Flute," of 1873, wrote early rondels, which, he would admit, were rondels only in name. But not until later do people seem to have become aware, through Banville's "Odes Funambulesques" and his "Petit Traité de Poésie Française," that there were fixed rules for all these forms—rules as definite and inexorable as those for the Petrarchan sonnet. An article by Mr. Gosse in the Cornhill Magazine for July, 1877, first called attention to what was then being done; and he was fortunate enough to illustrate his "Plea for certain Exotic Forms of Verse" by an excellent and unexcelled "Chant Royal," one of the most intricate of the exercises which "the bigots of that iron time" regarded as a futile dancing in fetters. As though there are no fetters in the sonnet of Milton and Wordsworth! There are examples of most of the French forms in the "Collected Poems" (especially a "Ballade of Dead Cities"), which may serve as models to the student. It is a far cry to 1877, but the imported measures are still being written as assiduously as ever, both in England and America; and it is encouraging to those who, like Mr. Gosse, first attempted them seriously in English, to note, that, in most cases, they are being written by versifiers who, still blissfully ignorant of Banville and the "Petit Traité"—to say nothing of Marot and François Villon—follow sedulously in the footsteps of the makers of the 'Seventies.

The Rossetti Family Tomb
at Highgate Cemetery.

THE FOUR WINDS OF THE SPIRIT.*

BY DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

I BORROW from Victor Hugo the title by which he renders into French that which we call "the breath of poetry." To make us feel that breath, blowing from known and unknown heights upon our dusty world, is the amiable yet not easy task set himself by the author of these contributions to The Times' Literary Supplement. The Times! How solidly British, with all the appurtenances of the breakfast table, does not the word sound! It is matter-of-fact, hard, and workaday, severely dogmatic and established; or, as they say in French, tout le pontif—the average man's average balance at the banker's. Can we imagine poetry in The Times? I believe Mr. Rudyard Kipling has uttered in its columns now and again his lyrical cry; but even so the question is not quite answered. Prose, weighty, Gibbonian, touched with academic self-control, that is what we look for when the great journal speaks; but poetry—alas! poor stranger, what welcome shall it find on the Stock Exchange, or in those illustrated advertisements of patent foods to which, at its critical age, The Times has yielded hospitable room? Do the Nine Muses subscribe on cheapened terms for a daily copy posted to Parnassus? The Muse of History, perhaps? Or of Comedy? I must leave these curious problems.

All the more am I delighted when a bunch of spring flowers wet with dew is brought me from Printing House Square—English blooms not wholly innocent of a subtle French perfume, or even like French roses marked by their decisive yet graceful contours. Such, I would say, is the quality (a rare one) that gives to Mr. Bailey's volume of essays point and distinction. Let us do French critics the justice they deserve. Always they write of poets and poetry with respectful enthusiasm. They hold that education should soar up as on wings to the templa serena of the mighty singers. They believe that poetry is more than politics; and when a young Frenchman wanders round Oxford he feels astonished that undergraduates discuss football and cricket scores instead of doing what Parisian sophomores do, and building cénacles to their favourite authors. You would never, in Paris, hear a brilliant woman of the world exclaim, "I hate poetry"—a sentence which I have heard even from an actress's lips. Victor Hugo during his last years was king, not only of French literature, but of society, looked upon as a sovereign by Divine right, before whom the mere politician, though he were named Gambetta, bent his knee. When did London, when did England, acclaim a poet on these terms? Dead, he may lie in Westminster Abbey; but living, if he wins the Laureate's wreath or a peerage he has done supremely well. The English gospel is neither Wordsworth nor Shakespeare, but The Times.

Honour, then, to a bold, sincerely reverent spirit whom this atmosphere cannot overcome, a lover of the poets, open to their charm, persuaded in a day like ours "of thunder and eclipse" that poetry is the breath of life—something transcendent and magical, which we must on no account forgo. Here is one who will study and make his own the whole compass of the lyre, willing to range from Æschylus to Swinburne, Fitzgerald, Meredith; and, as another fine volume proves, victorious over the purblind English superstition that roundly tells the ignorant there is no poetry in French. If a reader can take these broad views, full of admiration for the wild unearthly music of "Prometheus Unbound," yet appraising Dryden's "All for Love" as a thing of "immortal passion," he has (who can doubt it?) learned from the schools of Paris what criticism should be, adding their sober judgment to the deep sense of mystery and ecstasy that the bards of England have somehow caught from its silence and its speaking action. But another conclusion begins to show from this tempered mood, at once large and impartial, which it is worth while to indicate.

New beginnings are commonly reactions, for they do not spring out of "chaos and old night." In the long series—let us frame our meaning thus—of Professor Saintsbury's travels through literature, we find him always coming up to "the triumph of Romanticism." On the last field of battle the classical squadron dies or surrenders. But when we turn to Professor Raleigh or to these pages of Mr. Bailey, there is a change. It might seem as if the dead were to live again. Of that resurrection the token, highly characteristic, in England is a return to Johnson "without Boswell," to Johnson the writer as distinct from Johnson the speaker. What is the sign in France? Looking broadly at the hundred years just over, we may call them the years of Rousseau. From Chateaubriand to Flaubert, from George Sand to Paul Bourget, one spirit moves in them all. It is the passion of Jean Jacques, accepted or resisted, but ever triumphant. How shall the new age revolt from the revolution? By going back beyond it. And who stands beyond it, sardonically smiling, crystal-clear in his speech, the absolute man of the world, most French of Frenchmen, as Johnson is most English of Englishmen? You have already named him Voltaire. To Voltaire, then, the true Parisian is retracing his steps, after exotic adventures into which he was betrayed by the Swiss philosopher, by Chateaubriand the Breton, George Sand the half-German, Hugo the Spanish hidalgo, none of them pure Gauls of the centre. On this side, where the Romantic movement is at home, we shall never exchange our Elizabethans for Pope and Dryden; but the eighteenth century is no longer flouted, and the Augustan Age has recovered something of the admiration it once too confidently claimed. Professor Raleigh compels his readers to own the greatness of Johnson. Mr. Bailey has edited Cowper's Poems, in which the air of the century blows, however soothingly, against us. The Germanism of Carlyle, his affinities with Jean Paul Richter, his violence and his fantastic imagery, led the late Bishop Creighton to ask whether he would share Richter's fate and sink below the horizon. These are "signs of the times," not to be overlooked by the discerning.

Must we now fix on a volume, so pleasantly written, so thoughtful, earnest, and stimulating, the fatal French

* "Poets and Poetry." By John Bailey. 5s. net. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

The Memorial to Christina Rossetti in Christ Church, Woburn Square.

The last work of Burne-Jones.

epithet, juste milieu? I would not say so. One could wish, indeed, that writers who are evidently Christians had a little less reserve in expressing the principles which their best judgments imply. It is really the fact that a man's opinions about literature cannot remain apart, as if his religious beliefs did in no degree colour them. The creed in its heights and depths is far from being a centre of indifference, a compromise, or a dilettantism. And of all human utterances, poetry, since it is the most profoundly alive, is also the most sincere. Even sincere scepticism, as in that Omar Khayyam of which our book has excellent things to say, is by its melancholy, its defiance of a Power denied yet haunting the soul, poetical in its negations. I think the day is coming when this frank admission of our attitude towards the first and last questions will throw a flood of light on the art of criticism, lifting it from a mere matter of your taste and mine to the neighbourhood of science, and thereby proving that, however poets may seem to write for pleasure, they sing in unison with divine harmonies.

THE MOTHER OF THE AUTHOR OF "CRANFORD."

BY MRS. ELLIS H. CHADWICK.

THE mothers of the great writers are always interesting. It has often been deplored that we do not know more of the mother of Charlotte Brontë, but scant as our knowledge of her is, still less is known of the mother of her biographer, Mrs. Gaskell, and that little as recorded is not correct. It has always been affirmed by members of her family that Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson, to give Mrs. Gaskell her full maiden name, lost her mother in 1810 when she was a baby of a few weeks old and when her parents were living at No. 1, Belle Vue, which was part of old Lindsey Row, Chelsea; but this is not so. Mrs. Stevenson died in October, 1811, at 3, Beaufort Row, which is now known as Beaufort Street, in one of the houses which has since been demolished.

Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson was a little more than a year old when her mother died, and by the time the father could make arrangements for his little daughter to be taken to Mrs. Lumb, his wife's sister, who lived in a tall red brick house on the heath-side at Knutsford, the baby was about thirteen months old. This is confirmed by a letter to Mary Howitt written by Mrs. Gaskell herself in May, 1838, where she says: "I was early motherless and taken when only a year old to my dear adopted native town Knutsford."

Photo by Warwick Brooks.

Mrs. Lumb, of Knutsford, the Aunt with whom Mrs. Gaskell lived until her marriage.

(From an oil painting.)

It is strange that Mrs. Gaskell's own relatives should have thought that Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson was only a few weeks old when taken to Knutsford, for there is not the slightest doubt about the letter to Mary Howitt being in Mrs. Gaskell's own handwriting. Mrs. Gaskell was certainly born on September 29th, 1810, at a house in old Lindsey Row, which from the Chelsea rate books and the title-deeds of the house I proved in September, 1909, to be the present 93, Cheyne Walk, for I have handled the actual faded bit of paper on which the birth certificate was written in 1810, which was deposited in Dr. William's Library, to be afterwards transferred to Somerset House.

According to the Chelsea rate book for the June quarter of 1811, William Stevenson removed with his family to 3, Beaufort Row, and there his wife died in the October of that year. Eighteen years afterwards, Mr. Stevenson was buried from that same house. The reason why forty-six years have been allowed to elapse before this information could be absolutely verified—Mrs. Gaskell having died in 1865—must be attributed to the statement of the family on the subject as recorded in the "Dictionary of National Biography" as well as in Dr. Ward's biographical introduction to the Knutsford Edition of Mrs. Gaskell's works, and to the incorrect spelling of the name Stevenson in the Chelsea Church Register.

The parish clerks of bygone days have much to answer for, and they have often sorely tried the patience of those who have had to follow them in the research which is necessary for gaining authentic information concerning those who can claim a place in that great Valhalla the "Dictionary of National Biography."

We are now quite familiar with O'Prunty becoming Branty, Bronte and finally Brontë, though the parish clerk cannot take all the blame or credit of this interesting alteration; but in the case of William Stevenson, it was certainly the fault of the clerk, for when residing in Chelsea Mrs. Gaskell's father always spelt his name Stevenson, though it is said that his ancestors spelt it Stevensen, which Mrs. Gaskell said betrayed her Scandinavian origin. In the old Chelsea rate books the name appears in 1810 as Stephens, and later as Stephenson, and finally Stevenson, and in the Chelsea directory for 1812 it is written Stephenson, though Mr. Stevenson is correctly described as the Keeper of the Records at the Treasury Office.

In the Burial Register of the old parish church of Chelsea is an entry which evidently refers to the interment of Mrs. Stevenson, dated October 30th, 1811, though the name appears as "Elizabeth Stevens age 40." Mrs. Stevenson was buried in the King's Road Burial Ground, Chelsea, which was used as an extension of the Old Chelsea Parish graveyard, until December, 1812.

The celebration of the centenaries of distinguished people has its uses, if only to set in motion careful research connected with the person to be honoured. Recently, in looking through some correspondence which belonged to her mother, one of Mrs. Gaskell's daughters has found a contemporary letter which suggests that her maternal grandmother died about November, 1811, but having searched every register of burials in and around Chelsea, I have not been able to find any record except the entry for October 30th, 1811. As a further proof that this refers to the novelist's mother, it may be mentioned that Mr. Stevenson was buried in the King's Road Burial Ground on March 27th, 1829, therefore he must have owned a grave there previous to 1812, after which no new graves were sold in that burial place. This would point to the fact that he bought a grave there when his wife died in 1811. This old graveyard is now used as a recreation ground by the inmates of the Chelsea workhouse.

Copyright.

Corner of Old Lindsey Row, Chelsea.

Showing house on the left in which Mrs. Gaskell was born, and on the right where she lived when her mother died in 1811, and her father in 1829.

In order to verify the age of Mrs. Stevenson, I have searched the registers of baptisms from the old Unitarian Chapel at Knutsford, but this does not give any assistance, for a footnote in one of the registers states: "The register of Knutsford Chapel previous to 1791 is lost; it is supposed to have been taken away among the books of Mr. Lord, a former minister, and has never been found."

I have, however, been able to consult a book entitled "The History of the Family of Holland of Mobberley and Knutsford," privately printed in 1902, which refers to "Elizabeth Holland who married the Rev. William Stevenson" as the fourth daughter of Samuel Holland of Sandle Bridge, Cheshire.

Copying the dates of birth of Samuel Holland's daughters from the grave-stones in the Knutsford Unitarian burial ground Anne, the eldest, was born in 1766; Hannah (Mrs. Lumb) in 1768; Mary, mentioned as the third daughter, in 1770; Catherine, 1772; and the youngest, Abigail, 1773. There is no mention of Elizabeth, as she was buried in Chelsea, and as the fourth daughter, she must have been born in 1771, which would prove that she was forty in 1811.

Now that we know that Mrs. Gaskell was a baby a year old when her mother died, and not a month old, as every previous writer has felt compelled to believe, it is easier to grasp the fact, so often stated, that the stage coach journey of little Elizabeth Stevenson with Mrs. Whittington, a friend of the Hollands, from Chelsea to Knutsford, suggested the account in "Mary Barton" of "babby's journey" from London to Manchester with the two grandfathers, for certainly the treatment of the "babby" is much more suited to a child of a year than to one a few weeks old as the story represents, for so young a baby could not have needed "pobbies," nor would a crust of bread have been of any use. It is just possible, in the absence of confirmation of the actual age, that the story is responsible for the statement that the baby Stevenson was only a few weeks old when her mother died, and that in weaving the account of her own early travels into the story, Mrs. Gaskell altered the age of the child.

Photo by Ernest Chadwick.

Mrs. Lumb's House in Knutsford, to which Mrs. Gaskell was taken when a year old.

All other writers have given the wrong date of Mr. Stevenson's death, March 22nd, 1829, as recorded in the Chelsea Parish Church Register, so that the celebration of Mrs. Gaskell's centenary has led to research in many directions, and has produced authentic information which otherwise might never have been brought to light.

If Elizabeth Stevenson's mother had not died when her famous daughter was a baby, it is questionable if we ever should have had "Cranford," for it was the early years of Mrs. Gaskell's residence in Knutsford that impressed her with scenes which she depicted with such charm and pathos in that prose idyll and also in all her stories of Knutsford life.

Some of the chats with "Miss Matty" are founded on fact, and it is interesting to know that the beautiful Aunt Hannah—Mrs. Lumb—who became a second mother to Elizabeth Stevenson, was noted for her "elegant economy" and, like Miss Matty Jenkyns, was chary of candles. When alone on winter evenings she would sit knitting by the firelight, but immediately she heard her niece's footsteps coming along the path, she would take up her paper spill and light a candle "to make it more cheerful like." If, however, company arrived, a second candle was lighted, for by carefully relighting each candle in turn she had been able to keep both about the same height, as the author of "Cranford" relates in her chapter on "old letters." "Cranford" is with the immortals, and as long as the book lives Mrs. Gaskell's name will be held in grateful remembrance, for the story of the society in that little country town is redolent of the humorous as well as the pathetic side of the old-world village life of the early Victorian period, when Sedan chairs, pattens, and gigot sleeves were de rigueur, things which the present generation needs a footnote to explain the meaning of.

New Books.

HANNAH MORE.*

There has been such an ebb-tide flowing away from the eighteenth century writers, especially since 1900, that it is agreeable to encounter a new biographical study: Nothing in the shape of the Higher Criticism of Hannah More, but a frank acceptance of her as one of the Sibyls! Miss Meakin enjoys thoroughly the discussion and defence of Hannah and ends by communicating to the reader a certain amount of her own enjoyment. It matters a good deal, it seems, that such a heroine was born, not at Stapleton, as the books say, but at Fishponds which is a hamlet of Stapleton. Again, as Miss Meakin recounts with glee, Hannah's cottage of Cowslip Green was not in the parish of Blagdon, but in the adjoining parish of Wrington. She was not indifferent to natural scenery. She did not cultivate the friendship of a slave owner. Her strict observance of Sunday was a Puritan, and not a Calvinistic trait. We cannot afford to ignore Hannah More. So Miss Meakin says, and she knows so much about the subject that it would be presumptuous indeed for us to contradict her.

One cannot help being astonished at the number of ladies who enjoyed a reputation for learning and literary distinction during the seventies of that century. Besides Hannah who represented the "Nine" (Garriek's nickname for his young favourite) and the "Queen of the Blues" (Mrs. Montagu), we hear much of Miss Carter who knew Greek better than Johnson, Mrs. Macaulay, the historian, Mrs. Barbauld, Miss Reynolds, Mrs. Boscawen, Mrs. Chapone, Mrs. Vesey, Mrs. Delany, Mrs. Thrale, and Dr. Johnson's favourite "little toad," Fanny Burney. With the exception of the last, they can hardly be said to have left "a wrack behind." Miss Meakin takes them very seriously. Mrs. Montagu, she tells, got her knife into Voltaire more than once, and the detractor of our immortal bard writhed in anguish under her witty retorts. The author says complacently: "One cannot but be struck in studying the lives of our eighteenth century writers, with the fact that they all emerged more or less from one and the same little group of intellectually disposed families, or if they did not emerge from them, they were drawn into their circle. London, so much smaller then than now, had its literary centre, its intellectual soil, and its intellectual atmosphere, just as some continental cities have to-day a musical soil, and a musical atmosphere. No wonder that some good plants were produced."

Miss Meakin seems at times to take a rather optimistic view of this blue stocking reserve. Most of the great century figures were passing, and the mutual admiration society who had met under Mrs. Montagu's umbrella can hardly be said to have fitted the vacant places. One imagines them platitudinising in the Miss Seward vein upon the value of correct views until one would be fain to shriek aloud "Allons jaisons des soldatismes!" The lively Hannah got more didactic and more square-toed in this censorious atmosphere. Where are the productions of this society to-day? Who now reads "Percy," which in its day earned as much for Hannah as did "She Stoops" for Goldsmith? Who has heard of "Sir Eldred of the Bower," a poem for which the writer, as Cadell expressly stipulated, was to get the same amount as Goldsmith obtained for "The Deserted Village?" Hannah pleased the great ones of her time by her liveliness, sincerity and buoyancy. She pleased Johnson, Garrick, Reynolds, and Burke by her quick schoolgirl memory and ready sensibility. Rather a pretty "methodee" she was, too, and one who impressed the old with a sense of appreciation combined with sufficient wit and purpose to make a good transmitter from one generation to another. This, the good Hannah, who lived to be one of the few subjects of George IV., to retain a lively recollection of the glories of the reign of George II., was to be in a most complete and emphatic manner.

* "Hannah More: A Biographical Study." By Annette M. B. Meakin. With portraits. 14s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

But we certainly do not read the excellent Hannah now—even those of us who still cherish a fondness for Maria Edgeworth and Harriet Martineau. Her books are with difficulty accessible. Enormous as the sale must have once been, it is now perfectly quiescent. One seldom sees her books on the stalls—or even in the barrows. We read about her now, as the subject of biographies, such as those of Roberts, Miss Yonge, or now Miss Meakin, which afford us a succession of pictures of the London and the Bath of other days—when Wimbledon Park was seven miles from town, and as "un-Londonish as if it were a hundred"; when gentlemen of the Museum came to fetch away Garrick's legacy of old plays, which Charles Lamb was subsequently to explore; when Hannah disputed with Lord Monboddo as to the rights and wrongs of slavery; when Johnson praised her "Bas Bleu" as a great performance, took her hand at dinner, called her his child, and said that it was as dangerous to talk poetry before her, as to discuss the art of war before Hannibal. "He continued his jokes and lamented that I had not married Chatterton, so that posterity might have seen a propagation of poets." It is amusing still to read of Hannah's disillusionment with her dairywoman poet, of her correspondence with Horace Walpole, and her guarded criticisms of Gibbon. As she grew older she grew more didactic. The approbation of bishops became as food and drink to her. She communicated to rich and poor alike, the way in which well-to-do middle class evangelicals would have them behave. In this frame she wrote on "Manners of the Great," "The Religion of the Fashionable," "Female Education," and "Village Politics"—common sense tracts for the times. In the main they were, it would seem, a kind of mixture of Benjamin Franklin and John Bull, Lady Grove and Father Bernard Vaughan. Sunday observance appears to have been the keystone of her extremely drab, disagreeable and utilitarian gospel. That she meant well to all alike is illustrated by the fact that this reporter of village conversation took the responsibility of addressing a book of advice to the greatest lady in the land, the Princess Charlotte. This indomitable spinster ends up by advising every man how to select a wife. Sydney Smith incurs the severe reprobation of the authoress for having ventured to laugh at the excellent Hannah's pretensions. Personally, I think the young Cælebs would be better advised in asking the well-nourished Sydney, than in accepting the edifying but dogmatic proposals of such an incorrigible old maid as Hannah, at the age of sixty-four. "Cælebs" is undoubtedly a successor of Grandison, that Prince of Prigs.

The good Hannah was evidently a sound philanthropist in the field of action, so far as her extremely limited vision permitted; but as to whether she was an exponent of the highest Christian philosophy in inculcating upon the poor the virtues of contentment, frugality, total abstinence, humility, reverence for clergy and constitution, hatred of the French, and trust in God and the Gentry, we must leave it to our individual readers to determine.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

"YORICK'S" HEAD AND HEART.*

"Laugh I will, my lord, and as loud as I can," said Sterne to Bishop Warburton. He laughs in his letters on the slightest provocation. The laughter is sometimes healthy and natural, it is sometimes strained and insincere, sometimes rather crude and empty, but seldom ill-natured. The laughing Sterne, when he is not coarse, is, on the whole, a likeable personality; but all except shallow or easily satisfied or exceptionally patient natures would grow tired of a long course of him. He is well as an acquaintance; he would become rather intolerable

* "The Life and Letters of Laurence Sterne." By Lewis Melville. In 2 vols., with 26 illustrations. 28s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

Laurence Sterne.

From a painting by Ramsay, at Jesus College, Cambridge.

From "Life and Letters of Sterne," by Lewis Melville. (Stanley Paul)

as a companion. The laughing Sterne is often a mere actor, and frequently, in really humorous moments, he cannot quite forget the actor's tricks. He was called "Cervantic" by himself and others, he deserved it less often than he or they imagined. At his best, a humorist, at his worst, an indecent "entertainer," the comic spirit in the great sense was not his; he had not sufficient insight and imagination. His soul, so to say, too often put on evening dress and remained as local as a dinner-table.

In his letters he also weeps, and weeps copiously. The tears are for the most part the tears of a ready and experienced performer. The performance conduces to tedium on occasion. It is not life, or the semblance of life, so much as a bit of sentimental eighteenth century drama. Yet it does not seem altogether artificial, as the performer for the time had got into the habit of believing in it. Sometimes when it appears to be human and unrestrained it is only the outer and casual man that laments and weeps; the deeper Laurence Sterne is not affected, and does not manifest himself. Indeed, for various reasons, very seldom in his correspondence, and not often in his books, did he sound his deepest, his whole, self. He realised a varied, in its way arresting and often piquant, personality for literary and epistolary use; in the way of sentiment and humour he often cultivated it sedulously enough, though at times he was content to be plodding or superficial; but the deep soil and strata of Individuality, in the true sense, he did not till or even consider.

In his assumption that "Yorick" was never really in love, despite his numerous "love-affairs," Mr. Melville is on fairly safe ground. It is another way of suggesting that he never really sounded the depths of his nature. His letters and confidences do not show at any stage an individual lover for whom the world has been re-created, or whose own nature has been in any wise sanctified; they are rather those of an amatory animal with an eager desire for companionship, spiced with a certain psychic intoxication. At times both the letters and the journal to "Eliza" (Mrs. Draper) betray a fair approach to conviction and sincerity; they even rise to a colourable imitation of intensity, with a curious dash of mild, unconscious blasphemy. But even here "Yorick" protests too much and too theatrically, and the affected naïveté with which he opens his heart to all and sundry, servant, peer, bishop, and so on, is too utterly utter. And, during a break in the composition of the tear-besprinkled "Journal," we find him writing to another lady, "racking my memory to inform me where it was that you and I had that affair together . . . it could not be the lady in Bond Street, or Grosvenor Street, or — Square, or Pall Mall — we shall make it out, H, when we meet. I impatiently long for it." Temperament, not soul, made him a lover, as accident or necessity rather than a "call" made him a clergyman.

Mr. Melville is elaborate and apologetic in his work. He tells his story in a leisurely and straightforward way, clearing up sundry misconceptions, but giving us rather too generously of the casual detail which so many modern biographers imagine to be conducive to reality and comprehensiveness. Not only family troubles but domestic expenses and travelling arrangements, and other things still more incidental, are paraded with affectionate liberality. The work has been dutifully, but too industriously, done. The volumes are of the useful kind which after the first perusal will be kept for reference, and apart from their elaborate information they have enough of the moods, confessions and capers of "Yorick" to keep them distinctive and alive.

W. P. RYAN.

BERGSON AND ABOUT BERGSON.* ✓

In lucidity and in the wealth and brilliance of the everyday examples with which his thought is illustrated, Professor Bergson stands almost alone among philosophers. He is difficult to read in the sense that he requires a very close attention, easy to read in the sense that nearly always his meaning is quite clear. In order to understand him, a knowledge of philosophical terms is less essential than a working acquaintance with scientific nomenclature; for he includes science within the scope of his philosophy, and although metaphysics can be expressed in comparatively non-technical language by a philosopher of Bergson's literary genius, it is impossible to deal with science except in its own technical language—at all events, without appalling loans from the circumlocution office. Bergson cuts the ground from under the feet of those who would try to explain him. It is hardly possible to write so plainly as he does himself.

It is no blame to Mr. Lindsay that he has had to labour under that disadvantage. Those who take up "The Philosophy of Bergson" in the hope of finding, in one volume, a short cut to Bergson's philosophy, will be disappointed. There is no such short cut in Bergson's own writings, systematic and summarized though they are, it is almost useless, for instance, to read "Creative Evolution," his most celebrated work, unless one has first studied his theory of pure duration in "Time and Free Will," and his theory of perception in "Matter and Memory." To the question, so often heard of late: "What can I read of Bergson's, just to get the hang of him?" there can be only one answer: "Read him all." Mr. Lindsay will not do as a substitute. He is more difficult than Bergson himself.

What he has tried to do is to indicate the place of Bergson's philosophy in the main stream of philosophic thought, to reduce it to more technical terms, and to show its bearing on the problems with which modern philosophers are more immediately occupied. In other words, he has attempted to range Bergson. Also, he says, "I have ventured to criticize the details of Monsieur Bergson's arguments when they seemed to me to obscure what I take to be the main results of his thinking." In those respects he has done a very careful and a useful piece of work—spade-work none the less. Precisely because Bergson's writings are "so fresh and original," they cannot be ranged, cannot be reduced to current technical terms, without the best of their freshness, their suggestiveness and their imaginative flight proving too elusive for the process. Mr. Lindsay has swallowed the camel right enough, but the gnat has flown away. Though there are, of course, plenty of debatable passages in his interpretation, I have only come across one statement which one actually falls foul of:—

* "The Philosophy of Bergson." By A. D. Lindsay. 5s. net. (Dent.)

"Laughter: an Essay on the Meaning of the Comic." By Henri Bergson. Authorised translation by Clouesley Brereton and Fred Rothwell. 3s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

"In all intelligent thinking, the past is continually used in guiding our selection among present movements, and present perception in its turn is used but as a symbol of the past. All our memories are 'there' to be used, but not jumbled together in a kind of lucky-bag, in which we plunge at random, but connected together by laws."

Surely it is time for philosophers to give up speaking of laws as if they were directing intelligences or a kind of universal policemen. Scientists, even, invoke their so-called laws with less assurance. "Connected together by laws" sounds, no doubt, very explanatory, but it can only mean, "Connected together because somehow or other they appear to be connected together."

One fault, however, does not spoil a book. Mr. Lindsay's volume is, as I have hinted, not introductory to Bergson's philosophy, but supplementary to it, and as such it should prove a help not only to the amateur, desirous of studying Bergson from another vantage point, but also to those more academic students of philosophy who find themselves somewhat outraged by Bergson's unconventionality and his popularity.

"Laughter: an Essay on the Meaning of the Comic" was first published in a series of three articles in the Revue de Paris. For that reason, no doubt, it is written with an even greater simplicity and avoidance of technical terms than Bergson's other works. And for the same reason, no doubt, it does not strike one as so thorough or exhaustive. It furnishes an explanation, and a good one, of the comic, but not of laughter as a whole.

Life, in Bergson's view, is a continual flux, a continual becoming. It is plastic, adaptive, self-conscious, and continually creating itself without repetition—to such an extent, indeed, that psychologically speaking the law of cause and effect no longer represents facts, inasmuch as where the same combination of causes is never repeated, it cannot be said that certain effects follow certain causes. The comic, on the other hand, has its origin in a lack of plasticity, in a lapse from full consciousness and complete adaptation to environment; in repetition, in habit, in automatism, in rigidity. It is "something mechanical encrusted upon the living." It is "some rigidity or other applied to the mobility of life, in an awkward attempt to follow its lines and counter-~~feit~~ its suppleness." When, to take a crude example, a man walks into a lamp-post, he is comic because, instead of seeing the post and adapting himself to its presence, he walks mechanically into it. He is laughed at, and that laughter, according to Bergson's view, is the human or social gesture which reproves him for his lapse by humiliating him. Comedy is concerned with subtler lapses, transferred to the region of character. Society demands a plasticity and an adaptation of the individual to the whole which the comic personage lacks or refuses to give; and society reproves him with ridicule and laughter. The more developed the society, the greater the plasticity demanded from each member of it; hence the observable fact that comedy, as opposed to horse-play, requires a considerable degree of civilization.

That, needless to say, is an exceedingly bald summary of a theory which Bergson works out in a manner which is fascinating, if not invariably convincing, anyhow at first sight:

"Laughter is, above all, a corrective. Being intended to humiliate, it must make a painful impression on the person against whom it is directed. By laughter, society avenges itself for the liberties taken with it. It would fail in its object if it bore the stamp of sympathy or kindness."

But although Bergson's explanation of the comic, and of the particular laughter which greets it, may be sufficient, it does not seem so certain that he has explained all the sorts of laughter. Is it always a corrective gesture? Is it not frequently a gesture of exuberance, a sign not of reproof, but of abundance of life? What of the laughter which greets a well-timed obscenity? (Whether it ought to, or not, is a question for moralists. Sufficient for the philosopher that it does.) Is it not rather an encouragement? Has it not something to do with the fact that obscenity reminds us of existent and necessary life-forces which society tries to keep decently covered up? What of merriment, when one laughs not at somebody, but out of sympathy and satisfaction?

Those are questions which may find their answer in Bergson's theory, or may not, and there are many more one would like to ask. In any case, the book is full of good sayings well translated (Bergson has had uniform good fortune in his English translations.) Sentence after sentence possesses an epigrammatic neatness and force. Hereunder are a few, taking at random, beginning with a definition of art from the splendid passage on it:

"So art, whether it be painting or sculpture, poetry or music, has no other object than to brush aside the utilitarian symbols, the conventional and socially accepted generalities, in short, everything that veils reality from us, in order to bring us face to face with reality itself."

"Laughter appears to stand in need of an echo."

"However spontaneous it seems, laughter always implies a kind of secret freemasonry, or even complicity, with other laughers, real or imaginary."

"In every wit there is something of a poet—just as in every good reader there is the making of an actor."

"For it is a remarkable fact that the more questionable an art, science or occupation is, the more those who practise it are inclined to regard themselves as invested with a kind of priesthood, and to claim that all should bow before its mysteries. Useful professions are clearly meant for the public, but those whose utility is more dubious can only justify their existence by assuming that the public is meant for them: now this is just the illusion that lies at the root of solemnity."

Wherefore, I think, without undue solemnity, I had better shut up, and cease for the moment to exercise the very dubious profession of critic.

STEPHEN REYNOLDS.

A NAVVY'S SCRAPBOOK.*

The author's position and the conditions under which this book has been produced are almost unique. "Gleanings" was first issued in December, 1910; it has already gone through various editions, and five thousand copies of it have been printed. It is the work of a daily labourer only just out of his teens. Mr. Patrick MacGill, the eldest of ten children, is the son of a Donegal crofter, and when only twelve years old had to turn out into the world and work for his living. The worst of his cruel experiences was, probably, the occasional impossibility of getting employment, and in "Have You?" he furnishes glimpses of its consequent troubles:

"Have you tramped about in winter when your boots were minus soles?

Have you wandered deuced unhappy with your pockets full of holes?

Have you wondered which was better when your capital was light,

A plate of fish and taters, or a hammock for the night?

Have you ever smelt the odour of some swell refreshment shop,

And would exchange your very soul for just one single chop?

When every one was happy as the week drew near an end,

Have you wandered through the city without a cent to spend?

Through some wealthy person's window have you seen the fire glow,

While shiv'ring 'neath a ragged hedge you sheltered from the snow?"

What induced this youth to forego the ordinary amusements of the working man during his hours of relaxation, and seek his pleasure in literature, may only be guessed at;

* "Gleanings from a Navvy's Scrapbook." By P. MacGill, 6d. (P. MacGill, 8, Jamaica Street, Greenock.)

but, as with Chatterton, pride was probably the motive power. At any rate he has contrived to educate himself up to a high mental standard, and make a fair bid for fame. He tells that some of these "Gleanings" were written in a dark corner of a navvies' hut full of "men shaggy as bears, dressed in moleskin and leather, reeking of beer and tobacco," the while he was scribbling down his fleeting fancies in a grimy notebook, hearing "on one side a trio of experts discuss the Johnson-Jeffries match, and on the other side a dozen gamblers argue and curse over a game of banker." Notwithstanding such surroundings, this young Irishman has overcome the defects of his irregular education and, if his lines "My Bookcase," are to be accepted literally, he has become familiar with the works of a large number of the world's mastermen.

As poetry and politics cannot abide together, it is gratifying to find Mr. MacGill asserting he has "left politics severely alone," although it is seen that he cannot refrain from trenching upon topics of the day. In his "Introduction," he says: "I spoke to a man once, asking him what he thought of going back to the land and having small holdings. 'Very good,' he said, 'in fact, the solution of all ills.' Afterwards I learned he was a gravedigger!" It will be surmised from this and from similar "asides," that Mr. MacGill possesses humour of a sarcastic tendency. He indulges this feeling in his revised versions of La Fontaine's fables, but their modernised morals are scarcely worthy of his powers. He should not waste his time in translations; he should forsake his ideal loves—his Irenes and his Isas—put his "Locks of Hair" in the fire, and fling his invocations "To B—" to the winds. He can do better things. Such pieces as "He rose a Man," "No More," "Was it all in vain?" and "To Erin," in their various ways are far more valuable. They deal with real humanity; they strike a higher note, and display more maturity of taste. Some poems in this collection, whilst quite different from what their author's antecedents would have led us to expect, although good in their way are too strongly infused with the spirit of other men's writings: they are not sufficiently original in tone to proclaim the advent of a new poet. "The Dream," is an example. An extract will show that it has plenty of vigour

"I've sat at their tables, and drank their wine and played with skill my part,
My tastes and my ways and my loves seemed theirs, but they never guessed my heart,
For often at night when the feast was done, and the flickering fire grew low,
Would memory muster the years away and the joys of the long ago,
And bring them into my aching mind, as sleep with its wand of power
Changed in a flash the feast-hall dim, to scenes of a fairer hour,
When far from the gloss of the tissue art, and pleasure upreared on pain,
My soul on dreams was borne away to live in the past again."

The most imaginative poem in the book is "The Isle in the Mystic Sea." It is replete with Celtic suggestiveness, but would be better without the final stanza: a poem needs no explanatory moral tagged on to it. If the author of these "Gleanings" is to make any permanent impression on the age, he must shake off the influence of his favourite poets and sing as his feelings, and not his readings, prompt him. He must seek his themes not in the pages of books, but in the infinite originality of nature, and he may then produce something worthy of his high ideals, for his writings are full of promise: they display pathos, a strong sense of humour, sympathy with the lowly, a love of nature, and above all, a healthy ambition. He is understood to be preparing for publication another book, dealing mainly with navvy life, which he believes will be a better work than his first, so it is to be hoped that the promise of "Gleanings," will be fulfilled.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

Photo by Thos. Rennie, Greenock.

Mr. Patrick MacGill.

DEAN SWIFT'S CORRESPONDENCE.*

From 1741 to 1900 Swift's correspondence has been more or less fully published in no less than twelve editions. In a most concise and convenient Table (p. vi.) these are arranged and analysed by Mr. F. Elrington Ball, showing how Time and literary treasure seekers gradually increased the store. One is appalled at the sum of human toil expended for a century and a half on these not invaluable relics, and after studying them—this instalment, at least—many will ask whether the game was worth so many candles. Not of course the Swift enthusiasts, the specialists in his literary period, nor that stout band of lazy leisured readers who eat what is set before them asking no questions, and having once begun, feed on till the last course, though conscience is all the time warning them that time and digestion might be better spent. Anyway the admirable edition now before us has a triumphant defence against every cavil. It is final, definitive, the very best that ever will or can be. Sisyphus has at last got the ever-growing snowball to stand firm for ever. A few precious discoveries will no doubt be made as the years go on. Grave scandals in the family of the Dean's wig maker may come to light, the date of some joke may be corrected by days or weeks; we may yet recover the recipe for lemon pudding invented by one Queen Esther, or find out where the other bought her stay laces. But diligent search for autograph letters to or from Swift is no longer likely to be rewarded by more than enough to make up a meagre appendix, though no doubt many obscurities in the published letters may yet be cleared up. So, if all goes well the labours of six generations of editors will soon come to maturity. And Mr. Ball's edition is definitive, not only because it is the last, but because it is the best; not quite perfect perhaps, yet so excellent that no sensible scholar will ever waste time in trying to improve upon it.

* "The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift, 1670-1717." Edited by F. E. Ball. 2 vols. 10/6 net each. (G. Bell & Sons.)

In his really useful Preface, the editor pays a graceful and feeling tribute to his predecessor, the late Caesar L. Falkiner, who after a year's labour bequeathed his task and materials to his friend. The confidence of so exact and exacting a scholar has not been misplaced. Mr. Ball excels in method; his insight is clear, his judgment sound, his tone modest and sober, his industry indefatigable. Much of it passes perforce unnoticed. For instance, the enormous labour involved in arranging (for the first time), in correct chronological order this mass of letters, so many of them with dubious or obviously wrong dates or none at all. We may safely trust his judgment in printing nothing which is not demonstrably genuine. Thus his argument (endorsed by Dean Barnard, Vol. I., p. xxii.) against the attribution of the three famous Montagu letters is conclusive, and his explanation doubtless correct. I cannot understand how the Hist. MSS. Com. could be deceived by the signature. They are just familiar business letters to the Duke evidently from his favourite, Mr. Lamotte, Rector on his Northants estate, who seems to have acted as his honorary steward and agent. He addresses his Grace as Rev. Doctor, and signs himself "Jonathan Swift"—clearly some little standing joke between themselves. Again, though he does not commit himself, Mr. Ball evidently agrees with Forster and Craik that Swift's remark to Hunter about getting "my Virginian bishopric" was only a jest; both Scott and Sheridan took it quite seriously. Indeed I have met with a good many more grave statements in the Dean's letters which I suspect to be due to his love of "bites," now called "sells" or "scores"—a stupid form of jest then in fashion.

But the Editor's admirable method and care are best seen in his Notes. Before beginning each letter we can gather almost at a glance all that should be known of its source—does the original autograph exist? and where? has he himself copied or collated it? how far, and when, and how correctly has it been already printed? And so forth. Too much care cannot be spent on such points. Curiously enough the most interesting letter in the Chetwode series—it showed the Dean's humanity in the case of a cat—was somehow lost, but its contents were "declared" to Forster by the owner. Again in the footnotes much help is given and much space economised by constant cross references. Great—sometimes perhaps too great—pain has been taken to elucidate obscure allusions. A good many, however, mostly in Swift's earlier letters are discreetly ignored; these I take to be either deliberate mystifications (to outwit the letter-openers), or standing jokes to us unknown between the correspondents, or clumsy pleasantries, for it must be owned that Swift's playfulness was sometimes elephantine. But the longer notes are biographical of the good old Croker type. These require judgment and restraint. They may be overdone, and I think Mr. Ball now and then overdoes them. Such notes when confined, as for instance in the Suffolk Papers, to important personages and relevant anecdote, are as delightful as the text; they instruct the many and refresh the memory of the few. But jealous editors pounce down on some obscure person, incidentally mentioned, as in a mere list of diners, and ferret out more or less rubbish about him—if a clergyman, his parentage, connexion, school, college, his various preferments, the poems he could never publish and the two sermons which he did—all with carefully revised dates. Now obviously the strict rule should be, in annotating letters such as these, to deal only with persons and incidents that affected, influenced, or illustrated the life and work of Swift, and that only so far as they did so. Further details, and the careers of the irrelevant obscurities, may be sought by the curious in the D.N.B. Where that is silent, know that curiosity is idle. On the other hand to many these irrelevancies have a fatal fascination. I myself can barely skip a line, and then I forget it all. What waste of time when one might have been going over the "Journal to Stella" once again! And to think there are six great volumes in all—and so many great books yet unread! Still Mr. Ball's notes are interesting, often curious, and, so far as I can judge, very accurate. Sometimes there seems a little want of proportion. Thus in his long notice of Lady E. Germain (I. 110), he never mentions that as a rich and active widow she became perhaps the best known woman in society. Further he observes that Germain's vast wealth "passed ultimately to a son of the first Duke of Dorset." A son! Why not mention that this son was Lord George Sackville (afterwards Germain) of Minden notoriety? And further he says that the only connection of Germain with the Sackvilles was that the Duchess was daughter of Germain's Dutch comrade, Marshal Colyear. My impression is that it was Lady Betty who left the property to Lord George, and that she was his aunt—at least, somebody, I think Granby, says so. It is possible that the libertine Germain may have been suspected to be the real father of the Duchess. But no doubt it is all down in the D.N.B.

As to the Correspondence itself, I wish the Editor had prefixed to each volume a list of the letters which now appear for the first time, or in complete and correct version. Many are highly important, especially those to and from Archbishop King. Yet I do not gather a clear impression of Irish affairs from Swift and his friends, and recall—it may be bad taste—the extreme interest excited by the almost forgotten Letters of that most prosaic and business-like of prelates, Primate Boulter. However, he will come on for comparison in the later volumes. Candidly, I am rather disappointed with the Correspondence so far, especially with the first volume. Of course nothing could be omitted, but some letters seem as a whole or in part hardly worth printing. But the interest grows as Swift becomes a personage, as men of genius and action gather round him, as his aim and outlook become wider and his experience ripens. The best volumes are yet in store. One desideratum I miss sorely. It is hopeless for any one to understand and enjoy these early volumes unless he has at his elbow Sir Henry Craik's admirable "Life of Swift," and even Mr. Temple Scott's edition of the "Prose Works." But if Mr. Ball had prefixed a concise two-page biography mainly composed of dates, those two pages would have been well thumbed. The most gracious feature of the work is that it contains nothing fresh about the Dean's relations to the two Esthers. After all what business is it of ours? Long ago I took my line, rightly or wrongly, and chose to think that the whole affair was only friendship seasoned by flirtation; that it suited Swift to pun and banter and flirt, and, in short, unbend in converse with what he considered the inferior female mind. And further, that with all his faults he was loyal to a severe if unconventional conscience. So I left, and still leave it at that. The party spirit and greedy place hunting of the period is repellant, but one gets used to it. We cease to blame Swift—it was a popular game, like golf, and less contemptible. When we come to Queen Anne's last days, we cannot help enjoying the scramble. On the whole is there much to blame in Swift's political career? Was he not inwardly consistent?

His successor in the Deanery contributes an interesting and judicious Introduction. Few will gainsay his praise or censure of Swift. He says all that can fairly be said against his character and conduct, nearly all that can be urged—and it is much—in his vindication. That Swift's conscious religious opinions went beyond Deism I cannot admit, but curiously enough there seems to have lain deep down in him the stern, grave ecclesiastic. Many other points in Doctor Barnard's Introduction invite comment, but we must await the completion of Mr. Ball's great work before attempting to revise our estimates of Swift by its light. And so with hearty commendations and hopes for a happy consummation of his labours we take leave.

Y. Y.

"OTHER SHEEP."*

A study? No, Mr. Begbie, an impressionist sketch, full of colour and life. A study means quiet processes of reflection upon masses of relevant material gathered by patient research. Dr. Hume's recent book is a study; Professor Hogg's small tract on Karma is a study of one element in the collision to which Mr. Begbie refers. But "Other Sheep" is an appreciative, one-sided eulogium of the Salvation Army's methods in India, and particularly of Mr. Tucker, who is the Fakir Singh of the stories. Readers of Mr. Begbie's previous volumes upon home missions will know what to expect in this sequel—vivid descriptions, earnest conviction, and a passionate emphasis upon the saving truths of evangelical Christianity. The field covered by the sequel is so vast and intricate and remote, however, that the impression produced sometimes fails to be clearly cut. There is a tendency to abstract argument, instead of concrete illustrations. Even when the descriptions are full of detail, as in the case of Benares, they present less individual human interest than the earlier volumes on London. In one of the early chapters the author notes how "there is a handsome tree-shaded road in Bombay, running between gardens and sea, where the rich and fashionable take the air from five to eight o'clock of an evening, and where you may see more splendour in five minutes than any capital of Europe could show you in a week; here you may behold in the midst of motor cars and lordly chariots a fine brougham drawn by a pair of tall horses, with two flunkeys on the box and two flunkeys at the back, carrying in its drab-lined interior a Parsee lady dressed in the most delicate pale silks imaginable, who, leaning back on her cushions, rests a naked biscuit-coloured foot on the ledge of the door, every toe twinkling in the sun." Mr. Begbie is best when he reveals this human touch in the Indian natives whom he met. He is less convincing in his vehement thesis that there is no use taking Christianity to oppose Brahminism until we first purge our own religion from clericalism, ceremonialism, and all magic rites, from the superstitions which have suffused Latin Christianity. There is truth enough in this contention to make it timely. But it is going too far on this line to say that "England's greatest obstacle to an understanding with Mohammedan people throughout the entire East is the ceremonialism of Christianity, regarded by all Mussulmans as blasphemous idolatry." And Mr. Begbie's appeal for a firm belief in the Bible, and at the same time for a gospel based on the majestic simplicity of Jesus Christ, opens up a series of problems which cannot be solved so easily as he seems to imagine.

* "Other Sheep. A study of the people of India, with particular reference to the collision between Christianity and Hinduism." By Harold Begbie. 6s. (London: Hodder and Stoughton.)

However, the book has its own striking qualities. Mr. Begbie has the journalist's eye for telling episodes and vivid contrasts. He also is sympathetic towards the British government. Perhaps the most effective pages are those which describe some Ceylonese experiences. If the reader will begin by taking "De Profundis," "Buddha-land," and "Restoration," he will get into touch with Mr. Begbie at his best.

SHAKESPEARE AGAIN.*

The two latest books to hand about Shakespeare may fittingly be considered together, if only because they form an interesting contrast in matter and treatment. Mr. Saint-George's "The Young Man from Stratford" is a lively contribution to that interminable absurdity, the Baconian controversy. Mr. Figgis's "Shakespeare" is a sound and serious study of the dramatist and his art.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Saint-George arouses prejudice to start with. His book is badly got up; its very title breeds suspicion; the prefixed sonnet is worse than poor; the opening chapter, with its would-be humorous pose of a jurymen addressing his fellow-jurymen, is a melancholy example of failure in an effort to be funny. Such initial obstacles are nearly enough to turn even the most heroic explorer aside. But on reading further we find that the volume is much better than we had been led to expect. Mr. Saint-George knows his ground; he makes his points neatly;

* "The Young Man from Stratford: A Jurymen's View of the Bacon-Shakespeare Controversy." By Henry Saint-George. 2s. net. (William Reeves.)

"Shakespeare: A Study." By Darrell Figgis 5s net. (Dent.)

Photo by Claude Harris, Regent Street, W.

Mr. Darrell Figgis.

he carries the war with much vivacity into the Baconian camp. He is particularly successful in showing the self-contradictory character of the so-called evidence upon which the Baconians rely, and the way in which any one part of their case, carried well home, will be found to cancel some other part of it. Those who can still take interest in a dreary and profitless discussion will doubtless be amused to see the Baconian men of straw bowled over again for the one-hundred-and-first time. But I am myself more concerned with the author's attitude towards the fanatical Shakespeareans. I have long been convinced and have often said that, as Mr. Saint-George suggests by the way, the wild extravagances still current about Shakespeare's "universality," his encyclopaedic learning, his legal attainments, and so forth, have been at least a part cause of the persistency of the anti-Shakespearean heresy, and that the bogey who figures as Shakespeare in the pages of Baconian writers is a not unnatural pendent to the superhuman monster of orthodox romantic criticism. Mr. Saint-George's little book falls into line with the healthy movement which is now gaining strength away from romantic superstition towards commonsense and historical reality. He is courageous enough too, to touch frankly on matters which are, as a rule, either avoided altogether or handled with a finicking respect for modern susceptibilities. Thus he speaks roundly of the "morbidly erotic" element in many of the plays, and of "the ever present dainty indelecacy" which he regards as one of Shakespeare's "distinguishing characteristics." My only quarrel with this remark is, that Shakespeare's "indelecacy" is by no means always "dainty," but is often, rather, of the full blooded and robustious kind.

It is more difficult to speak of Mr. Figgis's book, both because it is so massive and thorough, and because it bristles with points for discussion. That so thoughtful and independent a writer should still be so much under the influence of the romantic tradition in criticism, seems to me to be a matter for deep regret. He says that Shakespeare's biographers have too often been lacking in a "sense of divination." My own complaint would rather be that, in biographers and critics alike, we have had altogether too much "divination," we have not yet emancipated ourselves from the amazing vagaries of Coleridge's "divination," for example. Mr. Figgis does a little "divination" occasionally on his own account, and is therefore enabled to tell us a number of things about Shakespeare which are not revealed to the ordinary intelligence, as for instance, how Shakespeare comported himself in discussion: "In arguments at the 'Mermaid' he would probably either be silent, because he saw the wider issues of the debate, or, if good sack were in him, engaged in the lighter word-play that Fuller credited him with, because over-earnestness in discussion could but inevitably narrow the issue, and so destroy the truth of it." This bit of pure fancy, for of course it is absolutely nothing more, is only one instance of the author's tendency—the tendency of the old school—to eke out fact with "divination": reminding us somewhat of Southey's learned friend who wrote whole volumes of hypothetical history in the subjunctive mood. Not infrequently, too, Mr. Figgis drops into the romantic critic's familiar habit of working out a priori theories about Shakespeare's method and art without the slightest reference to such facts as either contradict outright or at least suggest qualifications. He praises Shakespeare as "supreme" among dramatists "in the subtle faculty of conveying requisite information in apt and natural dialogue." Well, Shakespeare at his best was undoubtedly a master of good business-like openings; but what about such glaring examples of how not to do it as we find, for instance, in "Richard III.," "Cymbeline," "The Winter's Tale"? Even the exposition of "Hamlet," which is the special topic of Mr. Figgis's remark, is sadly clogged by lumps of undigested narrative. Again, emphasising, and rightly, Shakespeare's pre-occupation with character even at the expense of plot, Mr. Figgis goes so far as to assert that "it was never he himself that wrought the construction wherein to place his characters; he created the characters that should themselves achieve their destiny, weaving it in a certain fashion according to the impulsion of life that drove them forward." But how can he say this in view of the fact that Shakespeare habitually took over his plots ready-made? It is indeed true that he often adapted his stories to meet the characters; but on the other hand, as I have myself pointed out elsewhere, the exigencies of the machinery of the action upon which he had to work often interfered with, and sometimes ruined entirely, the psychology of his characters. It is a pity that a writer who has thought so steadily about his subject should be beguiled into such transcendental utterances, to say nothing of such excursions into abstract æsthetics as: "We do not demand Illusion in a Novel, for in a Novel we seek Relation; but we demand Illusion in Drama, for in Drama we seek Contention and a Reaching-after." For otherwise, he has much to give us of real value, and no serious student of Shakespeare can afford to pass by his book. Especially noteworthy are his long and elaborate chapters on Shakespeare's stage and craft, and everything he says about the influence of contemporary stage conditions upon the form and spirit of the dramatist's work. Even on the very page which contains the dark saying just quoted, we come upon the illuminating sentence: "Antony did not go from Athens to Alexandria in five minutes; he merely went out from the stage by one door and entered by another. Athens and Alexandria were never in the matter. The whole concern was with the stage of the Globe." This is enough to show the clearness with which Mr. Figgis has perceived the long neglected truth that technical conditions were fundamental elements in the structural principles of the Shakespearean drama. The knowledge and insight which he brings to bear upon this part of his subject deserve the highest praise.

WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

THE DUTCH IN THE EAST.*

Mrs. Clifton has, as she confesses, given a popular rather than a strictly accurate title to the volume in which she describes an expedition made by her husband and herself into the East in search of orchids. The route taken by the "pilgrims" ran from Calcutta to Rangoon, from where visits were made to Mandalay and to the Andaman and Nicobar Islands; and then from Rangoon to Singapore, and so home by Batavia and Penang. Of their journey Mrs. Clifton has written a bright but not always, as we shall have occasion to show immediately, a very well informed account. The lure of the exotic flowers runs through it for such as these attract, and there is much to entertain any general reader, particularly in the pages upon the Andamans, the isles of convicts, which give the book its fanciful name. Here the impressions are fresh and direct, and they are helped out by some excellent photographs.

* "Java, Sumatra, and the other Islands of the Dutch East Indies." By A. Cabaton. Translated and with a Preface by Bernard Miall. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.) "Pilgrims to the Isle of Penance." By Mrs. Talbot Clifton. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (John Long.)

Mrs. Clifton's book, like her route, skirts the Dutch East Indies, and at one point touches on them, but it is for a more particular reason that we associate it now with M. Cabaton's. The orchid-seekers, having landed at Batavia, were naturally anxious to push on to Buitenzorg with its unmatched botanical gardens, and beyond that their acquaintance with Java was apparently brief and not extensive. About that island Mrs. Clifton's volume says little, as we might thus expect, but the little is curiously erroneous. The distinction drawn between British and Dutch systems of administration in the East points to a belief on the part of the author that in Java Holland still maintains forced cultures; whereas, of course, she condemned them half a century ago—since when, nevertheless, they have received a benediction from many English travellers—and such as remain to-day are quite peculiar exceptions. The same lack of knowledge of changed conditions is evident in the remark that "to demonstrate how enormously the Dutch make their colonies pay, I must mention that they send back to Holland annually two hundred thousand pounds sterling out of the profits of Java, and in addition have paid for the Achinese War". The Dutch, indeed, have done much more than that out of the profits of Java, but the statement quoted above, standing unqualified and alone, can only have been set down in ignorance of the ultra-paternal government of the Javanese, which it now pleases Holland to promote. Again, we read that the Chinamen in Java are not allowed to work in the country districts, and in the towns may only do manual labour for one another; if one of them goes into the country, even for a day's work, he has to pay a fine. That, needless to say, is a comically inadequate recital of the problem of the all-pervasive Chinaman which faces Holland to-day in Java. And when, perceiving the wise adaptability of the Dutch there, on the manifestations of which, however, in food, dress, and social habits, her comments are somewhat sarcastic, Mrs. Clifton explains that "they settle down and look upon the East as their home and their abiding city, and seldom or never go back on leave," she is really missing the most obvious element in Dutch colonial life, its social impermanence.

Outside Buitenzorg, these are the only impressions of Java Mrs. Clifton records, and in them we have such justification as is required for a translation of M. Cabaton's comprehensive and informing work. If an observant and travelled visitor from among us can enter the Dutch East Indies and leave them, entertaining so inadequate and erroneous notions about their life and administration, there must be a considerable popular darkness to dispel. The whole subject, as Mr. Bernard Miall remarks, has been unaccountably neglected by the English author, and the English reader, shut off from the enormous body of Dutch literature upon it which has accumulated in the last fifty years, has had only a few, but excellent, French works to guide him. Now, however, he possesses a volume in his own tongue to enlighten him about the development of Java since Sir Stamford Raffles left it, and particularly about the political and economic importance of the Dutch colonies in the East at this interesting moment.

They stand, like Brazil, on the edge of a new era, Mr. Miall says in the historical sketch with which he prefaces his translation. As to their fate, M. Cabaton remarks that the past will answer for the future. This new and, in some respects, critical situation, logically developed from the error and wisdom of earlier administrations, gives brightness in retrospect to a drab page of colonial history. For that reason we wish that Mr. Miall had amplified his account of Raffles' government so as to include the complexities of land tenure in Java, the only important subject on which we feel M. Cabaton rather fails us. That would have explained the difficulties and failures of administrators, both English and Dutch, in the past, and thrown light on many of the problems of the present, amongst them the position of the Chinaman, the friction between colonist and official, and the freeing of such forced labour as remains. The other main factors in the experiment Holland is now making—her new policy of education of the natives, and fresh developments in her old one of native aristocratic rule—could not be better elucidated in the space than they are here by the author and his translator.

D. S. MEJDRUM.

RIVAL SISTERS*

And rival brothers too, it will be seen, for whilst it is Mr. James Bone who plays the part of Court Painter to the high-nebbit old beauty in the East, it is the famous Murhead of that ilk who has celebrated the soiled young Cinderella who sits stirring the strong Clyde soup and polishing up the ship-ware in the West. Gude forgie's, though, did we attempt to judge between them here: if we weigh them simultaneously, it is in the self-same pan of the scales, with strictly non-invidious epithets—"unrivalled," "unique," "unsurpassed"—heaped up in the other. And indeed, though it will sound exorbitant to claim so much, these would in any case be the real right words, the proper adjectives due not only to Mr. Murhead Bone's drawings (whose right to them is, after all, pretty well official by now) but also to his brother's book, the work of a writer known hitherto—at all events by name—to none but a lucky few. Nor does one forget the "Picturesque Notes" in order to make such assertions. "Edinburgh Revisited" is a most radiant and distinguished piece of writing—brilliant yet rounded—beautiful without prettiness—outlined as keenly as the Castle when it cuts against the sunset, yet as countrified and heartsome in its detail as the little glowing taverns that still snuggle about the West Bow. And it is just this emotional "reach" of the book that wins it a right to that strong word unique. Edinburgh's own range, to be sure, is of the richest, her fingers press a wonderful octave, it would be a very wizened mind that failed to find itself quickening in new directions at their touch, mixing notes together with a sudden daring—striking out audacious contrasts of expression. With her frock-coats and rapiers, her dour lawyers and dark legends, her countless kirks and her queer old crimes, this "east-windy westendy" Græco-gothic town fairly out-Brodies the Deacon, in a dozen directions at once, in the vein of a splendid duplicity, and all these surface contrasts of crescents and crags, of the old Adam and the eighteenth century one, are but minor variations and enrichments of the best paradox of all: the fact that she is a city set on a hill. She will bury you deep in a black wynd, fathoms below the free sunlight, and then, in a twinkling, by simply flinging back a door, proclaim you lord of a glittering landscape spreading beneath you to the hills;—and the very wind that gives the top-hats in Princes Street their inimitably resolute rake was filling sails on the firth a second before and will be shadowing cornfields the next. Young Louis Stevenson reviled those winds—and, indeed, they nipped his body sorely, but we cannot doubt that they fed and nursed his prose. Ranging the hills and the sea for elemental images, and then fitting them together with a crafty urbane click, that prose is supremely the product of a town where you may stroll, at your ease, on an eighteenth century terrace and watch ships beating out for the Baltic, or sit softly among your books, and see the mists melting above moorland farms. A City that fairly FORCES rich prose!

True enough; but just as true that the moment you take such a source of inspirations for your sitter you tax far more than the special strength which she provides. Few writers, certainly, have been strong enough to stand such a siege; their work either splinters and jars, like so-and-so's, or else they pick and choose eclectically among the aspects—this one sticking to the Old Town and its tales—another taking up with Architecture—the most famous of them using just enough of it to make a kind of cameo profile. But Mr. Bone's book accepts and embodies them all. "Edinburgh goes to one's head," he does once admit, with a kind of happy desperation, "so crowded, vivid and sounding are the impressions she breaks about her," but even as he gasps it he dashes the spray from his eyes and leaps level with his subject:

"Edinburgh goes to one's head, so crowded, vivid and sounding are the impressions she breaks about her. A flag is your only simile. Like a flag the city cuts clean and brave against the clouds, fluttering over often in the shake of the east wind. She is a thing of history, torn and stained with old deeds and great days, and starred with burning names. Take a flag the sight of her makes the blood move at a quick step."

And his prose can keep pace with all her moods. It is dandiical in Princes Street, pawky down at Leith, grim enough in Greyfriars, and on the page which tells of the Deacon it screws the pitch up by a device so novel yet so sound that even that old drama clutches the reader by the throat afresh. The chapter on the New Town is as spacious and secure as the masonry of which it speaks; and bedded in the midst of it are fluted passages of a lingering beauty, carved with an exquisite skill:

"Then there comes a moment when the delicate little trees quietly assert themselves as potent factors in the spell of Edinburgh. In a winter afternoon at dusk, when the sun has left a tinge of red in the west, and the waters of the Forth are blue as a dead man's eye, while night steals in from the east, and the sea mists and the town smoke conspire to help her—then, citizens on their steep way down from the Old Town to their homes in Stockbridge do well to stop at the corner of Queen Street and look west. From the hanging gardens the empty little trees with their deep-blue limbs rise and unite the grey astringent pink of the sky with the wan green grass and black earth, while the lemon-grey stone of the Heriot Row houses appears at the bottom, with perhaps a lit window or two, their glow still paled by the twilight, to give a hint of home and fire-sides. At such a time I have felt there a sense of fugitive beauty that was almost intolerable, something in the blend of intimacy and mystery in the scene that seemed to say that the key to the secret behind the material face of things lay there—there all about one—but that the night was coming on, and in a moment more the spell would be gone, the faculties would re-assert themselves, and the soul return to its silence. That spirit of strange wounded beauty of which Watteau among painters had the surest vision, lingers somewhere in Edinburgh, and these delicate, starved little trees among the masonry are the magic wands to summon it."

To set that delicate scroll-work beside one of the ripe genre studies in the lilting chapter which deals with the "lands" is to get some idea of the grasp of this new, strong and subtle artist. And the proof of the rightness of his vision is the way all these various aspects swim together to form a common picture. As he writes, Edinburgh ceases to figure in the mind as a piece of brittle fantasy. It warms from within, deepens and mellows. It loses its air of being a piece of stage-scenery. It becomes human and habitable, a jolly home for living men.

And meanwhile, over in the west, it is a precisely complementary service that Mr. Murhead Bone has been rendering Glasgow. "Edinburgh Revisited" betrays the housewifely heart behind the famous beauty; "Glasgow" is a mirror convicting utility of loveliness, a loveliness of which she never dreamed and which has crept upon her unawares, the unsought seal of her labours. We have no etcher like Mr. Bone, none so vital or adventurous; but he is de race for all that—it is no anxious originality that takes him to our cities for his subjects—it is just because he is the due child of the traditions that he turns so frankly and simply to these strange contemporary flowers, with their petals of fenestrated stone and their stems of twisted streets and the quivering, black pollen of their traffic. The mark of his work is an absolute honesty—a craftsmanship so uncannily perfect that it could easily conquer us by sheer virtuosity, but that is always controlled by an intellect of beautiful serenity and candour. A man need not be a native of Glasgow, need not even know the place, in order to recognise these drawings and rejoice in them all. For there is no typical expression of a modern city which has not its choice ambassador here; and townfolk all over the country—in Birmingham, in Liverpool, in Edinburgh herself, will perceive with a thrill that they have been walking among pictures all their lives. In "Buchanan Street, looking South" it is that familiar effect of a tall, rapid vista, all vertical lines and concentrated detail dwindling sharply, along which the eye runs like a hand rippling across harp-strings, striking off rich arpeggios of pleasure. "St. Vincent Street, looking West" is a record of the hour that comes when evening tip-toes up some blank suburban street, making the hushed houses seem momentous, and drawing in its wake a range of far spires and roof-tops rising to assume their one hour of solemnity. "Gordon Street" exalts one with the sight of quivering clots and strings of clustered traffic, very tiny and tense, as one sees them from a high building, working and breaking down below. The "Demolition of the Barony Poor House" has the haggard and penetrating beauty that breaks from such themes, coming to us in forms as strange as stalagmites or gourds.

* "Edinburgh Revisited." By James Bone. With Etched Frontispiece, 16 mounted Collotype and 50 line drawings by Hanslip Fletcher. 21s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

"Glasgow: Fifty Drawings." By Murhead Bone. With Notes on Glasgow by A. H. Charteris. (James Maclehose & Sons.)

But in most the drama is wholly impersonal and intrinsic. There are no pathetic fallacies in Mr. Bone's work. He is a master of mists, as his "Tracehorses on a Foggy Day" proves, but he has no need to wait, with Whistler, for evening to turn chimney-stacks into campanili. And whilst he can track and repeat the least wrinkle on a wrung face of buildings as relentlessly as Meryon, he never thrusts the rendering askew, or tugs it into melodrama, as the Frenchman too often did. The result is that the emotions roused by these pictures of street-scenes are as primitive and enduring as those which come from the sight of far hills or woods or at the touch of rain. Could they only be distributed as easily as printed books they might stir men as the early Kipling did. They certainly take us closer to the realisation of actuality than any literature we have: save for a page or two of Mr. Wells, modern writing has never faced its surroundings so frankly. Town Planners and Municipal Reformers are a fine sight, of course, and they have their due place in the scheme of things. But this portfolio might do more than them all to make a man aware of the wonder of urbanity and proud of his part in it and zestful to serve his city.

DIXON SCOTT.

A BATCH OF NOVELS.*

Mrs. Penny's Rajah was brought up at Eton and Oxford, but after his pleasant English years he must return to his own kingdom to take up his duties as ruler. He had made friends, chief among them Ted Dersingham and his sister Delphine, and took Ted out as his secretary, Delphine following to keep house for Ted. Of course the Rajah missed England, and Ted and Delphine were priceless helps to remembering the old days, through the squabbles and intrigues of the Zenana where his father's four widows lived and plotted. But gradually his obligations towards his people prevailed on him to lean to Indian ways, he went through religious ceremonies and joined in strange rites to please them, and though Delphine nearly loved him and he her, and almost they joined forces in marriage, matters stopped short, the Rajah married the daughter of one of his nobles, who had been Delphine's friend in England, and Delphine went home, though it is hinted that she would probably end by marrying the Political Resident. It is all a straightforward story, never sensational nor profound in any way, the characters are distinctly differentiated rather than delineated, and the incidents are interesting without being highly coloured. Even the kidnapping of Delphine by the hostile Zenana rouses very little emotion in the reader's mind. You know it is going to end all right and without much trouble. A very cheerful readable tale, with just a suggestion of the problem of educating Indian princes that Mr. A. E. W. Mason set before us so startlingly in "The Broken Road."

Taking together the four books that follow—"Earth" by Muriel Hine, "Moonseed" by Rosalind Murray, "The Taming of John Blunt" by Alfred Ollivant, and "A Sheltered Woman" by Mrs. H. H. Penrose—one might find a common measure for the four in their principal women. They display indeed contrasted points of view, two of them—"A Sheltered Woman" and "Moonseed"—presenting women of the reticent, fine hearted, sensitive type, to a certain degree unequal to grappling with life, unable to master their fate; the other two have for heroine the more modern, free-thoughted, active, fine-hearted, dauntless woman, facing life steadily and bravely. Miss Hine's Diana is a live, lively person, "half a boy" as the rough old painter tells her, noble and sane, though it is not quite clear how the ripe major, the old philanderer, falls in love with her or she with him; it would seem that a lawless kiss snatched in an Italian moonlight made all the difference to her between careless friendship and love. The book has no little verve, and introduces several other people who play their parts with spirit, though we are rather tired of the Jack of the modern novel, the "good-looking young Englishman with his trim white yacht and respectful crew, his whole air of good breeding and British prosperity." He appears in so many books nowadays, and is so much made to stock pattern. We should have liked more of Ericson, the big, tumultuous, red bearded, buoyant, outspoken Royal Academician, with his genius and his big heart. The active part of the story is hardly so good as the beginning, where there are some excellent portraits, none in the book being better than that of Diana's mother, sourish, selfish, hypocochondriacal, yet in the end by a beautiful surprise almost winning our regard.

Another portrait of a self-reliant, brave souled girl is to be found in "The Taming of John Blunt." The story cannot be better epitomized than in the little note on the cover of the book:

"The protagonist is a Socialist publicist known as the Un-speakable Blunt. Rough yet heroic, a savage fighter with the heart of a child and the manners of a barbarian, he goes up to Cumberland to investigate an old-time aristocrat's management of her estates. There he charms, and is charmed by, the niece of his aristocratic antagonist. The latter brings an officer of the Guards on to the scene. The two men battle over the girl. John conquers the man and is conquered by the woman."

There you have the story in a nutshell. But with every deference to Mr. Ollivant his people are not real. This grievous result he attains by his way of presenting them. His ideas of the noble woman, spinster, heroic, rigidly conforming to her ideal of life; of the fine free girl, pure and courageous, gay, mischievous, understanding; of the big-hearted big-bodied man, unconventional, full of burning thoughts; of the rugged woman of the cottage; of the dear delightful mother of John Blunt (the friendliest of all the people in the book, for she dies in the first chapter and remains an idea, unspoilt by emphasis or crude phrasing), all this is arresting and interesting to the last degree. But in the working out it becomes conventionally unconventional, theatrical, jarring. Blunt never does anything in an ordinary way: he "chuckles" all the time, everything is violent and unreal. Mr. Ollivant has something of the epic manner, grandiose, spacious, great doing: we saw it in "The Gentleman," but in "John Blunt" the manner becomes mock heroic, almost burlesque. Blunt is simply, as Lady Florence says, "The most really impossible person

* "The Rajah." By F. E. Penny. 6s. (Chatto & Windus).—"Earth." By Muriel Hine. 6s. (John Lane).—"A Sheltered Woman." Mrs. H. H. Penrose. 6s. (Alston Rivers).—"Moonseed." Rosalind Murray. 3s. 6d. (Sidgwick & Jackson).—"The Taming of John Blunt." Alfred Ollivant. 6s. (Methuen).—"A Circuit Rider's Wife." Corra Harris. 6s. (Constable.)

I ever met. No manners, no breedin', no nothin'." It is most unkind to marry Rachel to such a bear. Moreover it is hard to imagine that if fifty odd years of such a delicious little old mother could not lick him into shape, Rachel could do it in a few weeks, or ever at all at his time of life. The strength and vividness of Mr. Ollivant's robust and virile style, though it is strained and misapplied grievously on many occasions, gives this book an undoubted advantage in holding the reader's attention. But Ericson, in Miss Hine's book, little as we see of him, is more suggestive of reality than John Blunt with all this emphasis and underlining.

In "Moonseed" and in "A Sheltered Woman" we have very quiet, very restrained stories, yet in their restraint showing no little art. Miss Murray tells of a strange suppressed girl, Chloe, eager for beauty in all things, with deep sensitive feelings, who falls in love with a bright, artistic young man who unfortunately engages himself most unsuitably to her cousin Augusta, an out-of-doors, sport-loving girl, proud, unsentimental, unswerving from a rigid code. Claude proves unworthy and the engagement is broken off, but Chloe forgives his weaknesses and still loves him.

In time she too comes to find him impossible, and ceases to love, but the passing of this love takes something from her life, and though she finds sober content in a sober marriage with a good, middle-aged man, nothing can ever restore the freshness of life before her romance was killed. The characterization is very subtly and clearly wrought, and the frame of the story well shaped and carefully proportioned. "Moonseed" assures an attentive reader that Miss Murray is capable of very good work indeed.

In "A Sheltered Woman" Mrs. Penrose has given us a novel that should find a wide public and help to establish her reputation firmly. The story of Cecily Chalmers is a pathetic one. Left after three months of marriage by the husband she adored, who went off to his regiment in West Africa; living in a bungalow near three of his aunts, she was betrayed through her innocence and goodness by Violet Chalmers, her sister-in-law, who one night brought her lover into the bungalow, and by a fatal chance he was seen, and this story, carried to those grim aunts and transferred to Major Chalmers, brought him home to accuse Cecily of infidelity. Indignation and a soft-hearted promise of secrecy wheedled out of her by Violet (who swore her innocence and gave plausible explanations) kept Cecily from telling the whole thing to her husband. And the estrangement when he left her almost killed her. Violet was divorcing her husband, and had got her decree nisi, when Major Chalmers was persuaded by the strange boy Lawrence Colburn that he was in the wrong. He went down to Cecily, but hearing the truth about that suspicious night he declared he would stop Violet's divorce. This agony of having endured so much in vain, of betraying her friend when she had kept her secret till all was safe, and when she had told only her husband whom she would have trusted, was too much for Cecily, and the shock killed her. The portrait of Cecily is masterly, and the other people—Fred her husband, self-righteous, making a fetish of "duty" and his own opinion; the three aunts, two of them narrow-minded, carping, scandal-hunting, tale-bearing, the third more human and understanding; Lawrence Colburn the schoolboy, poet, painter, perhaps a little too much endowed with intuition and knowledge to be quite convincing in one or two instances, but charming and a true friend; Captain Bosworth; old Susan the maid—everybody is given a distinct individuality and a definite place in the story. In short, for its art and its story, the balance and feeling of which are alike admirable, this is certainly the best of all the books already mentioned.

As for "A Circuit Rider's Wife," by Corra Harris, it is impossible to praise it too highly. It describes the life of the Methodist parson in the heart of the country districts of America, with its uncouthness, its poverty, its privations, its austere spirituality, its homely nobility, its triviality, its upliftings, its desolations, its triumphs. Told in the first person by the parson's wife, who as a girl was part of the gay Episcopalian society of a little white-and-blue town in Middle Georgia, it recounts how they met and singled out each other from the first moment, and how in less than a week they were engaged, and married in less than a month, and drove off to the parsonage on the Redwine Circuit, "a little wren of a house, hidden between two green shoulders of the world." Soon the Episcopalian girl had to learn new ways and new people, and these are described with a vividness, a pungency, a precision that cannot easily be surpassed. The circuit and its ways, the open-air meetings with their picnicking flavour, the revivals, the backsliders, the working of the Spirit in her husband, her own part in sustaining and mothering him, his faith, his singleness of mind, the women who pestered him, the trials that followed on their poverty, such as the difficulty of finding clothes, all the thousand and one varieties of a monotonous long life spent in going from circuit to circuit, finding "the same kind of sinners everywhere and the same defects in all the saints," till "at last I came to understand that there is just one kind of sin in the world—the sin against love—and no saints at all," all this is to be found told in the most delightful way, with an exquisite sense of humour playing over all like sunlight, a tenderness and comprehension that is never sentimental, and in a supple, subtle style that arrives at distinction. That is the quality of the book, distinction. It says what you do not quite expect in a way you do not quite expect, but just a little better than you had ventured to hope. The wit of the thought and expression never jars with the complete reverence of the whole. Read the sixth chapter on William and his Worldly Mind, and his love of horse-dealing, or the eleventh on Finances and Fashions, and then the deep sweetness of chapter four, which describes William at a deathbed, or five, which shows him in the shadow of despair, and you cannot find anything incongruous. The beauty and dignity of spiritual Methodism find in this book a wise and true expression. The charm of the manner is only equalled by the penetration displayed in interpreting. Even in the humorous pages there is something tender and sympathetic, something that shows the heart of the people as it is, as in the account of the revival where the saintliest soul in the village testified as follows:

"Brother Thompson, you know, all of you know, I try to be a good man. But the flesh is weak. I git tempted and fall into sin before I know it. I'm suffering remorse now bec'ase I set my old Dominique hen twice and cheated her into hatchin' two broods of chickens without giving her a day's rest between settin's! My remorse is worse bec'ase a man can't apologize to a hen or make restitution!"

Here is an excellent paragraph in summing up:

"These faded daguerreotypes of memory suggest but faintly any idea of the people with whom I began my life as a minister's wife. I can only show their narrowness. I am not able to give the shrill high notes of faith in their lives. They made an awful business of being good. And the contrast between them and the witty, mind-bred, spirit-lost people of the world was startling indeed, but more to their credit than some are accustomed to think."

F. M. ATKINSON.

"SEEMS SO!"*

It is quite easy to find fault with this book. Whether you are a Liberal, a Conservative, or merely a critic, doesn't matter, you can't prevent yourself from being struck by certain blemishes. Politically, the authors have no good word for any party; brickbats of destructive criticism are hurled at all alike, and no allowance is made anywhere. Critically and politically Mr. Reynolds and his two collaborators bring us, in effect, a bucket without a bottom and say: Put us some water in this for our needs. In other words, they state their case bluntly and leave it there, with no hint whatever of how the case is to be met. It is as if a physician diagnosed a malady, then stopped short of a prescription—parallels could be multiplied. They may answer that they are not doctors; and we can reply with the fact that in this particular trouble all the world is an anatomist, and can put its finger on the seat and cause of the disorder. Briefly, who is there in these islands who doesn't know of the discontent of the so-called working classes? Surely no one who deserves to be counted as a citizen. And this is what Mr. Reynolds offers us—a needle-eye view of this discontent as it moves and has its being in a small, south coast fishing port.

* "Seems So! A Working-class View of Politics." By Stephen Reynolds and Bob and Tom Woolley. With a Frontispiece from a photograph by Melville Mackay. 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

Arguing the Point.

From "Scenes So" by Stephen Reynolds. (Macmillan.)

Yet taking the book as a whole it is one that must make certain persons—we hope certain classes—think afresh—not, as we have said, because they didn't know of these matters, but because the points are here driven home in a quiet, first-hand manner; are put before them in grey home-spun, the very strength of which is enough to arouse some needful attention. Not, again, that these ailments of the body politic are receiving no attention; there never was a time when they received so much, and the more they get the more they ask. It was a case of Oliver Twist; soon it will be the Fat Boy. And the evil is that he does not know which is the best food for him, nor how much to take of any portion; while his very humanity and the whole conditions of the situation have made him, and always will make him, discontented with what is given. Still, in the general interests of humanity and the particular betterment of the race, it has to be given; and it were wiser to have a rather slow and bloodless revolution, no matter what heart-aching it costs, than one of fire and sword. The working man—that is the industrialist, and even the workers on the soil in the north, not your out-of-date agricultural labourers in the south—is out to wrest certain rights from the capitalist, for whom he has been too long a tool, and in that wrestling Mr. Reynolds's long-shoremen, and all the laggards of the south and east and west, will benefit. The trouble is: Will that wrestling stop short when justice is satisfied? Or will the pendulum swing too far the other way? And all true citizens must be concerned at this uncertainty.

If the book has any outstanding value it is in the fact that it comes not merely from a part of the country where stagnation has long been the order, but also that it emanates from a class that has claimed no attention in politics and is generally, the whole coasts around, of a phlegmatic, "follow-me-father" order. In addition it stirs up many points of contention, and lets light into many little corners which must, from the common nature of things, be dark to the mass of persons who have not lived amongst hand-workers; such as: "The cheap political Press is becoming an object of stronger and resentful suspicion. . . Its irresponsibility for anything except vote-catching is defeating itself. The semi-educated clerks of the suburban railway train, the tradesman hurrying down-street to see if the papers are in, place more reliance on its statements than do workmen; for working people, who live much in the past and let the future take care of itself, have longish memories. In the end, it does not do to tell them one thing one day and the reverse next week. Among some of the younger men here it was one of the jokes at recent elections to get hold of rival half-penny journals and to compare their headlines; and the verdict usually was: 'They're all of 'em liars together. They only does it to deceive the likes of us. They ought to be muzzled, or put a stop to, I reckon.'"

This, at least, is a straw, and a pretty correct one, showing how the wind blows. As to the divisions of this discontent i.e. the subjects discussed in the book they are many; and we could easily have fastened on any one of them and filled our space with comments for and against the authors' point of view. But instead of doing so, we have striven to give some hint of the whole; and to show that while the book is one of some real value, it is not outstandingly so, for the simple reason that it neither goes into the under-currents of this great obvious stream, nor does it either show us in any way how to dam the stream or to turn it aside to some better end. Mr. Reynolds is, apparently, not an idealist at all, not a builder up, or both here and in that far better book of his, "The Poor Man's House," he would have had some constructive theory to offer. His mission seems to be to show up certain evils and leave them there, yet to show them up in a way that will at least arrest attention and compel the more penetrative, resourceful and formative thought of others to take up the matter where he leaves it and pursue it to some more definite and cogent end.

J. E. PATTERSON.

THE FREE MARRIAGE.*

With the suffragette agitation reaching its acutest stage, amid the breaking of windows in the West End and the incomprehensible hostility of the leaders of the cause towards public men who are brave enough to sympathise with and support them, Mr. Keighley Snowden's new novel comes wearing a certain air of timeliness, for it offers a shrewd and sympathetic study of those insistent problems of sex equality, the right of a woman to go her own way and retain her individual freedom after marriage, and of the baffling and uncertain elements of feminine psychology in general.

So far as I remember, no novelist who has handled the question of free marriage has boldly chosen as his protagonists a man and wife with a few children. It is a simple matter for a childless man and wife, when they tire of each other or feel the bond of wedlock unduly irksome, to arrange quite amicably to dwell apart. She can proceed to earn her own living; he his; it is only the personal happiness and well being of each that is involved in this separation, and so long as they obtain these all is for the best. But when there are children to consider, the whole aspect of the situation is changed, unless both husband and wife are without scruple and can lightly throw over the responsibilities they voluntarily took upon themselves. Mr. Snowden's man and wife are childless; to that extent he simplifies the problem; otherwise, he deals with it very frankly and with marked ability. His Dick and Margery Jerrold had agreed, on marrying, that neither should be bond-slave to the other; that each should be still at liberty to pursue a separate aim and course in life without consulting the other. They are both journalists; Dick a sensitive, over-conscientious one; Margery of more robust fibre, and with a knack of writing exactly the cheap and catchy stuff that suits the readers of the lady's journal to which she is attached. On a point of conscience and personal dignity Dick quarrels with his editor and losing his engagement cannot find another. Margery earns enough for the two but it humiliates him to be dependent on her, so he gets together a trifle of money and goes away to rent a small cottage in the country whilst he lives there alone and writes a second novel that shall bring him money and fame and lift him for ever out of the journalistic rut.

* "The Free Marriage." By Keighley Snowden. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

Meanwhile, living without him and pursuing her own work in London, Margery attracts the attention of the proprietor of her paper. This man, Hurst, a great newspaper owner of the coldly calculating, imperious, ultra-modern type, is one of the subtlest and most masterly-drawn characters in the book. He is taken with Margery's brightness and vivacity, and from placing increasing confidence in her, appoints her his private secretary. She is so far from suspecting anything more than an honest friendliness in these favours that she even ventures to ask him to use his authority and have her husband restored to his post on the paper that had dispensed with his services, and Hurst not only consents to do so but obligingly adopts methods of doing it that shall open the door so wide that Dick may easily return without pinching his vanity in the entry.

This arranged, Hurst at once begins to move quickly in his private designs. He dispatches Dick, on a moment's notice, to report the wine riots in France—sends him off on an evening when Margery is coming to dine with her employer, and before she has met Dick since their estrangement. He had come to town to interview Hurst, not knowing that her influence had been at work to secure his recall, and had not yet been home to see her. When she arrives at Hurst's flat and learns that her husband had been there, and is already on his way to France without even a good-bye to her, she is hurt and angry, and Hurst accentuates her resentment by withholding explanations and suppressing the message Dick had left for her with him. For the time, her deep love of her husband is obscured, and Hurst subtly, calculatingly proceeds to take advantage of this. That he failed was due to no relenting on his part. Nothing but an accident saves Margery from his callous snare, but though the accident brings Margery and Dick together she does not find it easy to win back his love and his faith in her. She has to travel a dark, sad road before she can find admittance again to his heart, and once there is glad to confess that the free marriage was a mistake and that "I think, Dick, we haven't been living enough for one another."

The sketches of journalistic life are vivid and true, and full of interest. They make an excellent setting for a strong and poignant story that has been well thought out and is written with ripe knowledge of humanity and with imagination. In characterisation, as well as in dramatic and emotional forcefulness "The Free Marriage" reaches a higher level than Mr. Snowden has ever touched before. He has done other good books but, so far, this is his best.

S. J.

THE BROWNING'S ONCE MORE.*

A warmth of expression and a liberal display of sentiment, vivid colour and ecstatic asides, such were presumably among the qualities looked for by his hearers in the narrative of an Improvvisatore; to have demanded an exactitude

* "The Brownings; their Life and Art." By Lilian Whiting. 12s. 6d. net. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

and carefulness inconsistent with impromptu utterances would have been unreasonable; and so long as he added the piquancy of some high-flown compliments to the more prominent persons among his audience, he might think his task creditably achieved. Biography is not improvisation, but both the merits and defects of the Improvvisatore's method are apparent in Miss Whiting's work. She is an emotional rather than a critical biographer; but that is not to say that her book is not both interesting and acceptable. Robert Browning himself loved to look at men and things from different points of view. We have had serious English records of his life and work, too serious and too cold, it may be, in Miss Whiting's opinion, which may be called "Half-Rome"; Mr. Chesterton's monograph may stand for "Tertium Quid", and now here, suffused with feeling, comes the American presentment, "The other Half-Rome." It is true that Miss Whiting, as her title shews, sets out to include more than her predecessors did; but of Mrs. Browning she tells us little more than we have already learnt in the biographies of Robert Browning, less, indeed, in one respect, for she ignores the medium question, which was practically the only one on which the poetess differed seriously from her husband. Perhaps Miss Whiting thinks we have already had enough of that episode, and many people will agree with her. The book, as a whole, may be read with enjoyment by those not previously familiar with its story; but its real value lies in the handful of letters, hitherto unpublished, written by Browning in his later years to some of his American friends. Before, however, these are considered, Miss Whiting will, it is hoped, pardon a writer who ventures to touch lightly upon some of the defects incidental to her method, with a view to their correction where possible. The Improvvisatore was not deliberate, and there are evident traces of haste in Miss Whiting's pages. Positive repetitions are found on pp. 194 and 206, and on pp. 267 and 268. On p. 14 she speaks of the first eight parts of "Bells and Pomegranates," as if there were more, whereas they are eight in all; Eastnor Castle (p. 22) is not a "seat of the Somersets"; not Macready's departure for America (p. 35), but that of the actor who played

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. Keighley Snowden.

Pym checked the run of Strafford; Browning's early friendship with the Flower sisters is pointedly ignored (p. 40); the "Pension Rue Ville l'Evêque," p. 93, is an odd contraction of the Hotel de la Ville in the Rue d'Evêque; the statement, on p. 28, that "at Como they abandoned the diligence for the boat, sailing through the lovely chain of lakes to Fluelen" is to attribute to the poets a faith which could remove mountains; Devonshire Street (p. 129) becomes Grosvenor Street on p. 130; Lady Marian Alford's father was not the Duke of Northampton (p. 153); the editorship of Cornhill was not offered to Browning on Thackeray's death (p. 203), but on his retirement; and selections from the Brownings' poetry were not demanded (p. 210) for "The Golden Treasury." Miss Browning, we are told on p. 244, "was able to ride a mule or a donkey as one to the manor born"; the Lady of the Manor, in fact! On a certain occasion (p. 294) "The entire Venetian Syndic" (how could it be otherwise?) was present; and the last sentence in the book, a really eloquent one, is marred by the substitution of a "was" for a "were." These, as well as some obvious printers' errors, are matters readily susceptible of alteration; but whether adulation of the living, which in a book concerned with the great dead jars painfully upon an English reader, will permanently satisfy Miss Whiting's taste, who but herself can say?

To come to the new letters. Browning's indebtedness to Mrs. Arthur Bronson, which has always been recognised, can now be still more amply realised. Her judicious Venetian hospitality protected the poet from himself. Why he needed such protection is rather mysterious, but that he did this correspondence proves. "I have been nearly eleven weeks in town," he writes (August, 1888), "and hard social work all the time up to the latest, when, three weeks ago, I found it impossible to keep going . . . Poor battered me, tugged at and torn to pieces, metaphorically, by so many sympathisers, real or pretended." The picture of a poet, well on in the seventies, who allowed his energies to become exhausted by the acceptance of perpetual hospitalities, some of which at any rate he might have had the firmness to decline, troubles the imagination. It is clear, too, that he valued "peace and quietude." Those, at any rate, he found under the roof of his Venetian hostess, who knew how to keep bores and crowds at a respectful distance. He was duly grateful. "He never regarded gratitude as a burden," Mrs. Bronson has recorded, "as less generous minds are apt to do." These letters, illustrative in the main of Browning's heart rather than of his intellect, shew him gifted with a depth of affection, too, which ordinary men, particularly in old age, do not possess. They emphasise, also, his perennial youthfulness. We see him furnishing the "bare framework" of a comedietta, which Mrs. Bronson filled up—does this survive, one wonders?—mending her verses and begging her to take his alterations "for what they are not worth"; and correcting in the high Alps the proofs of a poem of which he had been "too negligent in London; many distractions stood in the way of that." In the most interesting passage of all he describes his first visit to Asolo, "delicious Asolo" as he then called it. His last stay in that city of enchantment has rightly been fixed upon by all his biographers as one of the most beautiful episodes in his career, illumined as it is with the light of an approaching sunset. Let us hear his own account of his earliest acquaintance with it fifty-one years before.

"When I first found out Asolo," he writes, "I lodged at the main hotel in the Square—an old, large inn of the most primitive kind. The ceiling of my bedroom was traversed by a huge crack, or rather cleft, caused by the earthquake last year; the sky was as blue as blue could be, and we were all praying in the fields, expecting the town to tumble in. On the morning after my arrival, I walked up to the Rocca; and on returning to breakfast I mentioned it to the landlady, whereon a respectable middle-aged man, sitting by, said: 'You have done what I, born here, never thought of doing.' I took long walks every day, and carried away a lively recollection of the general beauty, but I did not write a word of 'Pippa Passes"—that idea struck me when walking in an English wood, and I made use of Italian memories."

Here we may fitly leave him, amid the happy reminiscences of youth and poetry.

H. C. MINCHIN.

THE YELLOW PERIL IN ART.*

There are alarmists who foresee in the near future an invasion of Europe from the Far East. They call it "The Yellow Peril" and, concerned only with material conquest, are unaware that they have been cleverly prophesying after the event and that the Western world has already bowed its head to the Yellow Conqueror. And the victory has been the greater because no diplomatic or commercial bargains have had to be struck, imposed by the brutal logic of guns and bayonets. The pen, they admit, is mightier than the sword, where treaties have had to be signed, but they have not dreamed that the brush may be mightier than the pen. They have not realised that, in things of vital importance, Europe, that is the Europe which really matters, has gladly recognised its master. In a word they are ignorant of the fact that Europe has, in artistic affairs, gone to school to Japan, just as, in material affairs, Japan has gone to school to Europe. And who, realising that man is composed of matter and spirit, can doubt which has learned the most valuable lesson?

For two hundred years it had been an accepted axiom in the Western world of Art that the last word in Painting had been said by Raphael, Correggio and Titian. As in our "schools of sound learning" all teaching had to be founded upon the study of Greek and Latin, so, in our schools of Art, it was axiomatic that everything had to be founded upon the classicism of Greece or the Renaissance. There were, of course, a few audacious persons who dared from time to time to be indifferent to precedent, but they were howled down, and Art was on the verge of being choked in an atmosphere of brown sauce and red shadows, when suddenly through our stuffy studios swept a draught of sweet, clean east wind. The old teachers wrapped up to the ears in conventions shivered a bit and ordered the windows to be closed, but the young men had savoured the freedom which lay outside and were not to be denied. It was true, they admitted, that the last word had been said in the grand style by Greece and Italy. All glory to the past for that. But was that any reason why they should sit in unventilated studios for ever making poor travesties of Greek and Latin masterpieces, any more than that their fellows in the schoolroom should sit for ever spoiling good paper with halting Greek and Latin iambs? They had no thought of belittling the achievements of classicism, but they wanted to express themselves, and there were teachers from the East standing about outside in the unfettered air ready to teach them the way to do it. So certain naughty boys, whose ring-leaders were Alfred Stevens, Narcisse Diaz, James Whistler, Edouard Manet and Alphonse Legros, kicked over Dame Europa's forms (or formulæ), at which they had sat too long, and played truant to the school of Nippon. Thus was inaugurated a revolution in the art of Painting in Europe of which the end is not yet. Fortunately, the boys who thus took French leave of their Dame's School had minds of their own, minds very alien to those of their new masters. Otherwise we should have had a repetition of the old trouble, poor mockeries of bygone masterpieces. But they took care to absorb the spirit, and ignore the letter. They grasped the Japanese essentials and appropriated them to Western requirements. That was in the third quarter of the nineteenth century and most of the pioneers are now dead. But the revolution goes on, and the rising generations demand Histories and text books. And they are getting them.

Fortunately for us in England, we have ~~one~~ ^{now} a man who is recognised, both in Asia and in Europe, as a supreme authority on the Art of China and Japan, and it is to Mr. Arthur Morrison that we are indebted for the latest, though by no means the final utterance on a matter of outstanding importance. We may not agree with all he has to say, but we shall be wise, before expressing anything adverse to his opinions, to start with the presumption that he is right and we are wrong. Not that, even in the generous space of these two splendid volumes which he before us, even he can say a tithe of what is to be said, or give examples of more than a little that is to be seen, of the vast material that has been accumulating during a thousand years. For it must be remembered that Eastern Art and Art, be it said, in a very lofty, some would say the loftiest, meaning of the word, was being practised when our Allied the Great, surrounded by ferocity, barbarism and ignorance, was laying the foundations of Britain's primitive civilization, and that this Art, through developments as various and as clearly marked as those of European Art, held an unbroken record until it culminated in the outstanding genius of Hokusai who lived into the days of Queen Victoria. Think, then, of this vast period, during which at least a thousand painters lived whose names are still well remembered in their own country, think of the tens of thousands of paintings which they produced, and then gauge if you can the enormous difficulty of Mr. Morrison's task, appreciate the remarkable ability with which it has been accomplished.

* "The Painters of Japan." By Arthur Morrison. 2 vols. Illustrated. 4s 5s. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

Photo by F. W. Clark.

Mr. Arthur Morrison.

We must, of course, be careful, in the enthusiasm engendered by any new discovery, whether material or spiritual, not to allow ourselves to be blinded to the merit of achievement to which we have grown accustomed. We must not ignore the splendour of Western Art, because, for the moment, we are overwhelmed by the revelation that has come to us from the East. What we have to do is to recognise St. Paul's eclecticism, that there are diversities of gifts but the same spirit. And, it must be remembered at the same time, as Mr. Morrison justly points out, that the innate character of Japanese Painting was limited and determined by its conditions. "Process and material," he writes, "made the convention one of restraint, simplicity, directness and sincerity. A wet brush was used on a sheet of paper or silk on which the design must be placed boldly, rapidly, without hesitation, and once for all—for there was no recalling the touch once hazarded." There we get the limitations and the virtues which arose from the necessities. Just so it was with the fresco painter, though he could cut away a mistake and lay in fresh plaster. "But the Japanese painter had no such resource. Any interference with the surface of fine grained silk once painted meant ruin on the instant, and the fibrous paper, drinking the colour or ink as deeply as the silk itself, was equally obdurate." That is well said. It indicates where the possibilities of Eastern water-colour painting fall short of the possibilities of Western painting in oils. And it indicates further that painting by first intention, decision of touch, must be mastered in a way that has only been revealed to a few of the painters in oils. The necessities of their material demanded from the Eastern painter unity of design, simplicity and disregard of unimportant detail. Chiaroscuro, the staple of oil painting, was ruled out. The painter must suggest to the imagination what was not there. He must call upon the beholder of the picture for his collaboration, and he was fortunate in that alongside him was growing up a nation of Connoisseurs on whom no suggestion, even of the subtlest, would fail of its effect. "For Art in any form" as Mr. Morrison, most justly says "is nothing but a language—the vehicle of a transcendent message from mind to mind." And here I would pause for a moment to preach my own sermon, not for the first time in the pages of THE BOOKMAN, that Art must be democratic, must inform our national life, must not be the luxury of the few, a closed book to the many, not a mere Sunday-go-to-meeting-in-a-top-hat affair, but something permeating, sweetening our existence morning, noon and night. That is what it has done for the Japanese and that is what it may come to one day in Europe when we realise that the spiritual essence of things is something better than the material cloak.

But why, it will be asked, did it come to Japan in its infancy and must it come to us, if ever it does come, in old age? The answer is easy. It is because Japanese Art was in its origin essentially childish. It is because Japanese Art is the direct outcome of its calligraphy. From earliest childhood in Japan the brush is in everyone's hand. It, instead of the pen, is the instrument of education. Their writing is done with it, and the picture is only a further development of the hieroglyphics in which they write. As Lafcadio Hearn has said, "It is not surprising, considering the strangely personal, animate, esoteric aspect of Japanese lettering, that there should be wonderful legends of calligraphy, relating how words written by holy experts, became incarnate, and descended from their tablets to hold converse with mankind!" And if this could be said of mere handwriting, what could not be said of the pictures painted by master hands which were but the transcendent developments of these same hieroglyphics? What wonder that Japanese critics should have said, as they have said, of the living lines of certain masters "that, had it chanced in the midst of a stroke that a swift sword-cut had severed the brush, it would have bled." And it was this intimate relationship between handwriting and painting that gave the Japanese painter an audience at once stimulating and appreciative.

But I have only touched the root of Mr. Morrison's great subject when I see the limits imposed upon me by a relentless editor. I should have liked to enlarge on the fact that landscape painting, with us the invention of yesterday, has afforded to the Eastern painter his chief means of expression for a thousand years; that in treating other subjects it has been his primary aim not so much to paint them with consummate skill as to suggest the part they play in the visible universe. I should have liked to do more than merely pray the student not to turn away from Eastern Art because to his conventional eyes it may at first sight appear in many cases grotesque and childish, but to persevere until he comprehends something of the Eastern view, assuring him that once started on an adventure full of delight, he will go on until perhaps even the school of Nan-jui, may yield up its secret to him. And, talking of Nan-jui, I should have liked to enlarge upon the fact that the revolt against professionalism in the middle of the eighteenth century resulted in a movement advocating principles almost identical with those of the post-impressionist of to-day. But these and a hundred other things of compelling interest are dealt with by Mr. Morrison better than I could deal with them and I cannot do better than send the student to the fountain source. There he will find the master-key with which to unlock one of the most fascinating and fantastic caskets in the world, filled to the brim with treasures of boundless delight.

GEORGE SOMES LAYARD.

MR. GEORGE MOORE'S CARICATURE.*

When Synge wrote "The Playboy of the Western World" and many people protested that it was an excessive caricature of Irish peasant life, Mr. Yeats retorted that Synge had paid the Irish peasantry the profoundest compliment in his power by making them the subjects of his art. Now that Mr. George Moore has paid Mr. Yeats himself a similar profound compliment by making him the cockshy of his caricaturing genius in "Hail and Farewell!" one hopes that Mr. Yeats will be equally philosophic. Superficially, there seems to be little in common between "Hail and Farewell!" and "The Playboy." Mr. Moore is a dealer in prosaic acids: Synge was an adventurer into the grotesque infernal regions of poetry. They are alike, however, in having written of Irish life with what Mr. Masfield has called "brilliant malice." Synge's malice was pessimistic and, if it is not straining a word too hard, almost affectionate; Mr. Moore's is gay and has claws. Synge's laughter had something horrible in it: his exuberant phrases expressed, not exuberance of spirit, but a wild pursuit of vitality. Mr. Moore's jests, on the other hand, are never anything approaching horrible, though they are often cattish. He has reassuring self-command, and, even when he is saying the worst he can remember about his old friends, he does so with the imperturbable cheerfulness of the smoke-room. Still the descent from "Esther Waters" and "The Untilled Field" to "Hail and Farewell" is as precipitous as, in Synge's case, was the fall from the universal beauty and symbolism of "Riders to the Sea" and "The Well of the Saints" to the rococo parody of "The Playboy."

There are, of course, a multitude of readers who urge that we should judge literature quite apart from its reference to reality. But both Mr. Moore and Synge challenge us as realists. Mr. Moore, as he himself knows, is one of the greatest realistic novelists living: "Esther Waters" gives him a position as the greatest realistic novelist who has yet written in English. Synge, too, claimed that he had brought reality upon the stage. He insisted on the realism even of his separate phrases. And both "Hail and Farewell!" and "The Playboy" are masterpieces of realism for a considerable part of the way. Mr. Moore gives us in "Hail and Farewell!" a ruthlessly true account of his return to Ireland during the Boer War in order to assist in the literary and dramatic revival. But his ruthlessness is the ruthlessness of the mocker, the observer of surfaces, not the ruthlessness of the imaginative man, the observer of souls. He can show us Mr. W. B. Yeats hurrying in and out of a bun-shop or helplessly in need of rest and refreshment after a brief spell of work. But he reveals to us nothing of the Mr. Yeats who wrote "The Wind among the Reeds" or who kept alive the Abbey Theatre.

Only once does his portrait of Mr. Yeats rise far above the level of caricature, and that is when he describes him as a Grand Inquisitor of Art, a priest of literature who could burn you at the stake for writing badly. Mr. Moore may praise you for a moment, but the next moment he will say in the hearing of all that you have no back to your head or describe your nose or your figure in a way that will make you look mighty ludicrous. The truth is he has neither respect nor affection for Ireland—a land of ruin and weed, he calls it—and amid the artistic and national enthusiasms of Dublin, he was as uncomfortable as a fish out of water. Of Mr. George Russell ("A.E.") alone he speaks in unconditional praise. The measured uncomplimentariness of his descriptions of Irish movements and the leading personages in them is seen at its most innocent in his account of a speech in Irish by Dr. Douglas Hyde, the President of the Gaelic League.

* "Hail and Farewell! I. Ave." By George Moore. 6s. (Heinemann.)

"A torrent of dark, muddled stuff flowed from him, much like the porter which used to come up from Carnecum to be drunk by the peasants 'on midsummer nights, when a bonfire was lighted. It seemed to me a language suitable for the celebration of an antique Celtic rite, but too remote for modern use. It had never been spoken by ladies in silken gowns with fans in their hands, or by gentlemen going out to kill each other with engraved rapiers or pistols. Men had merely cudgelled each other, yelling strange oaths the while in Irish, and I remembered it in the mouths of the old fellows dressed in breeches and worsted stockings, swallow-tail coats and tall hats full of dirty banknotes, which they used to give to my father. Since those days I had not heard Irish, and when Hyde began to speak it, an instinctive repulsion rose up in me, quelled with difficulty, for I was already a Gaelic Leaguer. Hyde, too, perhaps on account of the language, perhaps it was his appearance, inspired a certain repulsion in me, which, however, I did not attempt to quell."

Unfortunately, repulsion is not the stuff of which literature is made, and one wearies of Mr. Moore's repulsions in this book as in "Memoirs of My Dead Life" one wearies of his loves. Moreover, one suspects his genuineness. He makes even truth look quite unlike herself by compelling her to attitudinise in fancy dress. In the result, his book must be judged as a jeu d'esprit—a jeu d'esprit in the politest of bad taste—at the expense of the Irish literary revival. This, and something more. Waste and pettiness though much of the book is, there is enough wit and observation in it to last any ordinary novelist a lifetime. And there is the exquisitely-phrased overture in which Mr. Moore gives us a study of Irish gentry in decay which has no equal in literature. It is his humour to boast that he would have saved the Irish language and given it a masterpiece which would have been hailed throughout Europe, had he only in his boyhood in the West of Ireland used his chances to learn it, and written the story of the passionate people who lived about him. There is more in this than jesting. Mr. Moore is the only great novelist that Ireland has produced. He is one of the novelists of Europe. His genius, even in "Hail and Farewell!" is a constant amazement and delight. His waste of genius in the same book—his niggling nastinesses and unimaginative disparagements—make one wish that some faith or affection had saved him from giving to the cat's so much that was meant for mankind.

ROBERT LYND.

SOME OF OUR SINGERS.*

When England was a nest of singing birds she did not listen to the song of other than domestic creatures, whereas I have been distracted all this morning by the most exotic importations. One of them is no more foreign than was the writer of "Hajji Baba"; we may quote these verses of Mr. Ben Kendim on Woman Suffrage:

"When seaweed binds a storm at sea, when spiders break the oak,
When architects can make a mosque of rainbow, night and smoke,
In those dear distant days a man will rule his women-folk."

* "Eastern Songs." By Ben Kendim. 5s. net. (Blackwood.)—"Sword and Blossom Poem," (Vol. III.). Done into English verse by Shotaro Kimura and Charlotte M. A. Peake. 3s. 6d. net. (Hasegawa, Tokyo; and Simpkin, Marshall).—"Under the Swedish Colours." Done into English verse by Francis Arthur Judd, arranged by H. M., with a Preface by Edmund Gosse. 1s. net. (Mathews.)—"Verses." By Dolf Wyllarde. 1s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul).—"The Epic of God and the Devil." By John Frederick Rowbotham. 10s. 6d. net. (Baylis).—"The Cup of Quietness." By Alfred Hayes. 3s. 6d. net. (Methuen).—"Fifty Poems." By John Freeman. 1s. net. (Herbert and Daniel.)

And often certain methods have been brought to bear :
 "There's sunset on the Bosphorus, the Conqueror's golden stream,
 And all the peace of Paradise in gardens where I dream,
 And peace as deep as the deep sea inside my cool Harim."

But it is rather disconcerting to find Mr. Kendim, from out his oriental robes, singing of Galahad, and still more disconcerting to read him on Bismarck, with no reference to anything eastern :

"Pray that you be utterly forgot,
 You and your triumphs, mean bargains of your trade,
 Friendship a feint, your sacrament a plot,
 Your lies the twins of oaths, your kiss before you shot,
 Creator of the people you betrayed."

In "Sword and Blossom Poems" (Vol. III) we welcome an old friend, Mrs. Peake, whose versions from the Japanese are perfectly delightful. This book, printed in Japan and beautifully illustrated by native artists, has seduced me utterly ; but no alien arts are needed by this verse :

"'Tis Autumn, and the early morning air
 Here in Arashiyama strikes so cold,
 The kindly Maple trees have bade us wear
 Brocaded garments of their red and gold"

And this is the first time that Mrs. Peake has included love songs. Here is one, translated from an anonymous writer :

"Scatter your blossoms, Cherry trees, I pray,
 To keep my friend still longer at my side,
 Quick ! with your drifting snow of petals hide
 The Road by which he thinks to go away"

Mrs. Peake is to Japanese poetry what Mr. Cranmer-Byng, author of "The Lute of Jade," is to the Chinese. What can be more beautiful than this :

"As on the mountains, when the Clouds above
 Fall to the earth in Mist a man may see
 The dim, white blossom of some Cherry tree,
 So only have I seen the One I love"

The Swedish poems are not so well translated, and it seems as if Mr. Judd had attempted to be quite faithful, to be quite literal, omitting no word, whereas he should rather have striven to omit, if possible, no spirit and none of the perfume of poetry. As the adventurous Queen Christina lies upon her death-bed :

"Nay, this is more than dreaming who should dare
 To sing without in teeth of order stern ?
 From heavy slumbers suddenly aware,
 What sounds are these ? the dying Queen would learn"

And yet it is interesting to walk awhile in such untrodden meadows, even if we cannot say that from this little book we have derived those exquisite sensations of the Swedish philosopher, Strindberg (an "austere writer," says Mr. Gosse, in his introduction to this volume), when he took a celebrated forest walk, and as his feet trod now on moss and now on earth, experienced a universe of thrills. The sonnet by Count Snodsky (1841-1903) on Cellin is good, so far as the idea goes, and this brief song, "The Goth's Song," of Viktor Rydberg, is well rendered :

"In northern woodlands
 The pine-trees nod,
 O race of Woden,
 War-rousing God !
 Go down where cypress
 And cedar sigh,
 'Mid slaves unmanly
 Content to die
 Lull them to slumber
 With song of the sword ;
 To hergs auroral
 Bear golden hoard.
 To the warrior's cairn,
 To the hero's mound,
 Where fir-trees shadow
 The darkling ground."

Before I allude to "The Cup of Quietness," and to Mr. Rowbotham's work, a book by the well-known novelist, Dolf Wyllarde, attracts attention. She is more modest than Mr. Rowbotham, who, I believe, calls himself (or permits his publishers, though not of this book, to call him) "The English Homer." Miss Wyllarde's prose, of which I do not profess myself more than a moderate lover, had not prepared me for "The Flower-Seller." Here is the last verse :

"'Violets, sir ?'
 Her basket shows a scented heap,
 One splendid colour, soft and deep,
 And such a contrast matched with her,
 This mud-stained wreck, who plies her trade
 On perfect things that God has made !
 'Violets, sir !'"

This is a very varied and a fascinating book. On the other hand Mr. Rowbotham is not to be merely laughed at, he is a facile rhymist, he is moved by the horrors of life into such a passion that we are ashamed at his unfortunate effect on our sophisticated eyes. But what will you, when in a most righteous ode, "The Devil at Prostitution," he gives us :

"Each unsuspecting girl
 With many a sunny curl,
 Converting her into a hag diseased and dirty,
 Before she's anything like thirty" and thus about the Devil, who

"Out of the joy to be her lord and owner, Often comes to visit her in propria persona"

With the name of Mr. Alfred Hayes I own that I have hitherto been unfamiliar. I must ascertain if in the four books which he has already published there is anything as fine as the poem "To my Little Daughter," with these stanzas :

"Thou still hast taught me, since the dawn
 Of that May morning, when I stood
 Joy-stricken on the dew-drenched lawn,
 While all around
 The great bird-chorus gathered to a flood
 Of rapturous sound ;
 "And mingled my full heart with theirs,
 And, as the sun rose, sought again
 The cradled answer to my prayers,
 And met those eyes
 Untroubled yet by joy, undimmed by pain,
 So calm, so wise"

Now and then, in Mr. Freeman's "Fifty Poems," you will run across a line which trips you up. "Was it Love's Ghost's last call ?" And one resents it thoroughly, because in this delightful little book one is led on so trippingly, and if one halts at all it is to meditate the startling beauty of a line or passage or a poem. The exquisite No. 20 I have seen quoted elsewhere, and Mercutio would have treasured it. No. 32 is another gem which, after celebrating Love most worthily, concludes :

"Love, Love, what shall be said of thee, Blind Pilot singing over the sea ?"

These fifty poems it is to be hoped that his next collection will embrace a hundred, and so on, and so on—show a great variety of metre, and if here and there it is a trifle academic it is never otherwise than interesting, while on some occasions the success is brilliant. Here is the last verse of No. 3 ("Evening Beauty : Blackfriars") :

"So in her darkening loveliness is she seen
 Like an autumnal passion-haunted queen,
 Who hears, 'A captain-king is nigh the gate'—
 'Tis Antony, Antony !' Then hastens she,
 Beauty to beauty adding yet, till see,
 A queen within the queen perilous with love and fate !"

By calling his book "Fifty Poems" Mr. Freeman has inclined me to a calculation. It appears that he sells beauty at an average price of 3006 of a penny a line. There are in these days few investments that can be so safely recommended.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

Novel Notes.

THE BELLE OF SANTIAGO. By G. B. Burgin. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Burgin is perfectly at home in romantic melodrama; he catches the appropriate atmosphere of mystery; he knows how to manage a strong scene; his characters glow with the fire of their passions; he has no place for business or anything that savours of the workaday money-making life; sentiment holds undisputed sway. The reader of "The Belle of Santiago" is not long left in doubt as to the depth and nature of the sentiment which draws young Anthony Heron into a midnight meeting with the beautiful Señorita Mercedes under the walls of her father's castle; nor does the outraged parent, alighting upon the rash couple, conceal his feelings on this preposterous violation of Spanish etiquette. "Get a mattock and dig a grave big enough for two," he commands his men forthwith. The lovers, however, are spared this untimely end by the intervention of Anthony's friend, Don Lopez, the soul of honour, who placates the father by marrying the discredited Mercedes, well knowing her love can never be his. Broken-hearted, Anthony returns to England, where in due course he receives a message from Mercedes: "I have borne a child that she may wed with your son. Antonio mio, you will do this for my sake . . ." This is the central point of the plot. At long last we see Anthony's son retracing his father's footsteps and, after many adventures, finding with Mercedes' daughter the happiness that was denied to their parents. Mr. Burgin provides an entertaining character in Pedro, the optimistic little waiter, and an unusually powerful one in Cuchillo, the faithful dwarf with the great dog-like eyes. "The Belle of Santiago," is a capital story—it has an ingenious plot, and is narrated with a deft and skilful lightness of touch.

THE MONEY MOON. By Jeffery Farnol. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

If the charm of "The Broad Highway" was its picturesque realism, the charm of Mr. Jeffery Farnol's second novel, "The Money Moon," is its dainty and delightful unreality. It is almost as fantastically improbable as a dream, but it is one of the happiest and most winsome dreams that ever a man remembered after he woke. Jilted by a pretty American girl, who is fascinated by the title of an English aristocrat, George Bellew leaves his valet behind in London and sets out to tramp the road into the country hoping to find forgetfulness and balm for his wounded vanity. He walks straightway into some amusing rough-and-tumble adventures and thence onwards into the golden meshes of a new and exquisite love affair that develops in an atmosphere of quaint humour and gracious sentiment and is shaped to an idyllic end by a series of cunningly devised disasters, misunderstandings, and a final daring and desperate abduction. The characters are wonderfully human and real; Bellew himself, the blundering, good-hearted, romantic-minded American millionaire; his quaintly philosophical valet; the witching Miss Anthea, working her farm and taking in lodgers; Anthea's man, Adam, and her fanciful little nephew, George, otherwise Small Porges; the wistful Miss Priscilla and her soldier lover—they are all sketched with sympathy and humour and in the very colours of life. They are actual persons playing their various parts in one of the blithest, tenderest, freshest, and most delightfully Arcadian dream-stories that was ever written.

SAINTS, SINNERS, AND THE USUAL PEOPLE. By St. John Lucas. 6s. (Blackwood.)

Mr. St. John Lucas is no provider of mental pabulum for subscribers to the circulating libraries. He writes because he has got something to say, a way to say it in, and a select but appreciative public. He is a writer indeed worth following up, and those who love wit, humour, and irony, and are not repelled by a style which is at once mobile, well-bred and restrained, may be recommended to make acquaintance with his second book "Saints, Sinners, and the Usual People," a book which we have no hesitation in describing as the best volume of short stories that has come our way for quite a long time. The promise in these stories—and a great promise they make—is made by their variety. There are three stories poking excellent fun at the Saints—tales which in treatment and intention show a sort of hesitation between the kindly Catholic attitude towards the hagiology adopted by Baron Corvo in those delightfully funny "Stories Toto told me," and the frankly and derisively anti-clerical spirit in which Anatole France approaches the legends. There are three ironical studies in the unexpected, which are as good as anything Mr. G. S. Street gave us years ago in "Episodes." There is a screaming piece of farce ("The Statute of the Commander"), an excellent, because non-anthropomorphic, story of a cat ("The Pale Cat"), an attempt, but not quite a successful attempt, at a grisly shudder ("The Gorgon's Head"), and three studies full of mordant humour which the author calls "Grotesques."

ETHAN FROME. By Edith Wharton. 3s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

Mrs. Wharton has more than satisfied one's expectation, and her art has never been shown to greater advantage than in this story of Ethan Frome, the young Massachusetts' farmer. It is a tragedy, almost unendurably poignant, but justified by its inevitableness. From his youth Fate dealt hardly with Ethan. His father died, leaving him a bleak unproductive farm, and a failing saw-mill. After a lingering illness, his mother also died. That was in the Fall; had it been in the Spring his future might have been different, but Ethan dared not face the winter alone in this "New England farmhouse that made the landscape lonelier." Then he took his first step toward the abyss: he asked Zeena, the tall, uncomely, raw-boned woman who had nursed his mother, to be his wife. From that time his life was a martyrdom, for Zeena soon showed her real character as a sickly, querulous neurotic. Then came the next stroke of Destiny. To save expense, for the poverty at the farm was grinding, Mattie Silver, the penniless young cousin of Zeena, was invited to live with them. As the girl served without pay her cousin suggested that on the rare occasions, when there was an entertainment in the village, Mattie should go to it, so that she should not feel too sharp a contrast between the life she had left and the isolation of the farm. On these occasions, Ethan, although at first he had inwardly demurred at the extra toil imposed on him, was accustomed to fetch home his wife's cousin. Soon he found himself wishing that the village might give all its nights to revelry. Gradually the wife's suspicions are aroused; a hired girl is employed, and Mattie must go. Poverty makes Ethan helpless; money might have saved two lives, if not three, but there is none. So the blow falls in the last act that is to consign the three to a living death. It is a beautiful, sad, but intensely human story, working out to its final conclusion with all the inevitability of a great Greek tragedy.

MADEMOISELLE CELESTE. By Adele Ferguson Knight. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

The French Revolution seems still to be an inexhaustible theme for romance. Just as our sixteenth-century poets would win their spurs by writing a sonnet-sequence, so our modern historical novelist enters the field with a romance beginning at the time when the tumbrils were hurrying to the guillotine. The book before us opens with a scene showing Celeste arriving at the actual place of execution, when her escape is cleverly effected by a diversion created by her lover and his accomplice. To the accomplice falls the task of escorting the heroine to England and to safety. The adventures of the pair supply an enthralling story, the love of Celeste turning from her renegade Royalist lover to her resourceful champion. Ingeniously avoiding the commonplace, the author keeps the heroine in France, as she elects to forego the certain safety of flight, by returning with her husband to share the fortunes of his tenantry. It is a well-written, interesting novel, and possesses not a little of the atmosphere of gallantry and romance that seem to belong by right to this period. The author's name is new to us, but it is a pleasure to welcome as a first attempt, a book so creditable and workmanlike. If the beginning of the story almost inevitably recalls a familiar chapter in Dickens, it is due to the author to say that the rest of the story is worked out with undoubted freshness and originality. In fact, the plot contains quite a number of clever and ingenious surprises.

NO SURRENDER. By Constance Elizabeth Maud. 6s. (Duckworth.)

Art is a jealous mistress, and when a brilliant writer endeavours to advance a cause through the medium of fiction the artistic quality is bound to suffer. That is not to say that "No Surrender" is not an interesting, witty and brightly-written book. Indeed, given the conditions, it is about as good as it could be. Those familiar with rural life in England will recognise the truth of, and will be delighted with, the incisive pen pictures of Sir Godfrey Walker, M.P., and his wife, Sir George Crompton and his sister. These are types which are to be met with in every English county, and they serve to illustrate in secular life, what the phrase "invincible ignorance" implies in ecclesiastical parlance. The life amongst the mill hands would seem to be equally true to life, and some of the characters—notably Jenny, who is a fine creature—are apparently transcripts from life. On the whole the book is written with restraint, but one hopes and believes that the incidents described in the chapter headed "In the Punishment Cell" are exceptional. But pray, Miss Maud, now that you have done your duty by your sex, give us some more of the stories we love so much better.

A SOCIETY MOTHER. By Edmund Bosanquet. 6s. (Long.)

If, as we believe, "A Society Mother" is the first work of its author, we shall in future watch the publishers' announcements pretty closely for the name of Mr Edmund Bosanquet. There are many excellent qualities in his work. He can tell a story very well, and his chief fault of occasional over-elaboration is one of which he will soon be able to cure himself. And besides, he certainly possesses gifts of lifelike characterisation. But perhaps the best point about "A Society Mother" is that the author is clearly well acquainted with the life he describes. It really would seem that he knows the life and manners of the "Smart Set." The plot of the book is comparatively simple. Howard Leonardson, a Jewish financier of unimaginable wealth, has fallen in love with Mrs. D'Enville, who is unhappily married to a spendthrift and unfaithful husband. Having got D'Enville into his power, he proposes that that gentleman shall consent to be divorced from his wife, when Leonardson believes that she will marry the man who is able to offer her love and luxury. His scheme succeeds to a certain point, but it breaks down altogether when Mrs. D'Enville's son puts his veto upon his mother's marriage. Very clever is Mr. Bosanquet's study of the love existing between his mother and her son, and very pleasant too are the sketches of the boy's school life at Eton; but though it is on the side of the angels, it cannot be said that "A Society Mother" will prove acceptable reading for everybody. But the sophisticated novel-reader will doubtless—and quite justifiably—admire the book.

The Bookman's Table.

PRINCE TALLEYRAND AND HIS TIMES. By Frédéric Lohée. Adapted by Bryan O'Donnell, M.A. With 16 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Long.)

Monsieur Frédéric Lohée is, as all the world knows, one of the leading authorities upon the period of the Second Empire, and probably no living writer is better equipped to undertake the duty which Monsieur Lohée has set himself in the present work. The author tells us that his design is to write a complete biography of Talleyrand—after Napoleon, with whose character his is contrasted to excellent effect in these pages, one of the most remarkable geniuses France has ever known. This task the author has found it impossible to compress within the covers of a single volume, and he accordingly projects a second volume dealing with the latter portion of Talleyrand's life, and opening with the proceedings of the Congress of Vienna. Thanks to a large amount of new material which has recently been discovered, Monsieur Lohée is enabled to throw a novel light upon the character and aims of his hero. He by no means neglects the lighter side of Talleyrand's character, and much space is set aside to a consideration of the society of the day. Mr. Bryan O'Donnell's English rendering of this most interesting book is worthy of the highest praise.

SOME ASPECTS OF THACKERAY. By Lewis Melville. 12s. 6d. net. (Stephen Swift)

Everybody who is interested in Thackeray—and who is not, nowadays?—will find something to interest him in this book of Mr. Melville's. It is a collection of miscellaneous papers that have, for the most part, already appeared in the English and American magazines, but three good chapters are here published for the first time. You have chapters on "Thackeray and the Dignity of Literature"; Thackeray

Madame Grand, Princesse de Talleyrand.
From "Prince Talleyrand and his Times" (John Long.)

as a reader and critic of books, as an artist, as a writer of ballads; on Thackeray and his illustrators; on the London of "Esmond"; on Thackeray and Dickens—fourteen chapters in all on various aspects of Thackeray's life and work. He was not a great critic, preferring second-rate books of the first class, as Mr. Melville says, to the greatest. "While as a matter of course he admitted that Milton was a great poet, he added that 'he was such a bore that no one could read him.'" Perhaps you may think this slightly discounts what Mr. Melville has said elsewhere of Thackeray's culture and Dickens's lack of it; it is an interesting point, anyhow. When he began as a critic, "like most young writers," observes Mr. Melville (and he might have added like a good many older ones) "he sought for the blemishes rather than the virtues of books sent to him for review"; but growing mature he saw that "love is a higher intellectual exercise than hatred," and that it was better and even cleverer to be kind than cruel. In discussing the merits of Thackeray and Dickens, Mr. Melville sometimes betrays a little natural bias; he declares that "if jealousy existed between the two men, it was not on Thackeray's side"; yet elsewhere he tells how anxiously Thackeray inquired about Dickens's sales and his own, and in yet another place confesses that "for many years Thackeray envied Dickens his popularity and financial success." The book affords further evidence, if any were needed, of Mr. Melville's intimacy with all that concerns Thackeray; it is full of various information that will be helpful to the student, and its light and gossip style makes it attractive reading for the general reader. The illustrations are numerous and really illustrative.

MY ATTAINMENT OF THE POLE. By Dr. Frederick A. Cook. With 50 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Arlan & Co., Chichester House, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.)

It is hardly our purpose to go into the details of the controversy as to whether Dr. Cook ever reached the spot on the earth's surface which he likes to speak of as the "boreal center." He may have done so, or—which is probably the more generally accepted opinion in this country—he may not. For ourselves, we are neutral, but the reader will notice that we have not included our notice in the "Novel Notes" section of THE BOOKMAN. The reason for this is that we are uncertain whether the book really is fiction or fact, and we must therefore take it at its own valuation. But we will say that if it is fiction, it is very good of its kind. Almost would Dr. Cook persuade us. . . . He writes well, certainly, though we cannot but think that nearly a third of this book—in which the most astounding charges are made against Admiral Peary—is very ill-advised indeed. The whole of Dr. Cook's story is here given in much detail, from the start of his expedition down to the present day, and it is only right for us to say that if it is true, the bitterness with which certain portions of it are treated is at any rate partially justified. The mere onlooker will find the book to be one of great interest, and for that at least Dr. Cook may be thanked.

THE CRITICAL ATTITUDE. By Ford Madox Hueffer. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

It is a very astonishing thing that this book, which is a sign of the times, should contain so little that is absolutely original; and that, in spite of its lack of originality, it should be almost startling. Mr. Hueffer writes, casually and dogmatically, what many of the most expert minds of the day have thought and are thinking. He is careless in definition, he repeats himself, he says everything with a sort of large, imperious nonchalance. He cries out upon modernity, and upon Victorianism, in quite the usual manner of the conversational critic. Yet there is health and vitality in all he says—enough to make this book shine like a good deed in a naughty world, and enough to set a-thinking all the people who do not possess, and who will not understand, what he calls "The Critical Attitude." In fact, Mr. Hueffer writes as one of that small body of men, of whom Mr. Arnold Bennett is the most notable—the craftsmen-critics. He brings to his criticism the sure, trained sense of the writer who cares most for art and its expression, without emotional credulity, and without the amateurishness of the average educated unprofessional critic. But his valuation of such writers as George Eliot and Mr. Galsworthy, his characterisation of the Great Figure of the Victorian era, his studies of modern dramatists, are all familiar to those who move in literary circles; and may, to some, appear as purely temperamental as the quite different opinions of so temperamental a critic as, say, Mr. Chesterton. Outside these circles, Mr. Hueffer may earn a legitimate triumph; his opinions may be listened to with what he describes as "dislike and dread"; they may provoke a startled indignation; but only if his book can be put into the hands of those who blindly accept tradition in literary opinions. Thus, on the subject of Shakespeare, Mr. Hueffer may arouse disquiet by his assumption that the greatest English writer is probably inferior to Turgenev; when he says "to the great bulk of educated criticism of to-day, George Eliot has become a writer unreadable in herself and negligible as a critical illustration," he may shake the reader who has always been a little uncomfortably loyal to the tradition of George Eliot's supremacy; he may terribly distress many people by his elaborate explanation that "money spent upon the Arts is not only money invested in sound securities, but that it adds distinctly to the good-will of the nation as a going concern." If he can convince those who are not already convinced, Mr. Hueffer will have triumphed indeed; but his book is largely addressed to the converted. The fact that he has himself assisted earlier in that conversion will no doubt be a satisfaction to him; and "The Critical Attitude" should be read by all who truly care about just estimates, yet, in its very nature, the book must appeal most strongly to those who have acquired or are acquiring the Critical Attitude for themselves. It is, in fact, written in a professional key—of Art as it appears, from the inside, to the artist. It is deliberately unheroic, free from illusion, and suggestive rather than final. Where it becomes important is in its definitely anti-Philistine and anti-sentimental character. Mr. Hueffer, with his fellow-craftsmen, looks upon Art without pretence of even the most accidental kind. He demands the "vision of things as they are." It is that which makes him a realist in criticism, far from the elaborate thesis-monger, or the poet who picked a handful of gems from Shakespeare's plays and exclaimed at them. Such a book may be casual, the proofs may have been passed unread, some of the individual opinions may seem debatable: What remains is the extraordinary sanity of the artist who is familiar with the work of his contemporaries, and who does not hesitate to appraise it.

THE ENGLISH COURT IN EXILE. By E. & M. S. Grew. 15s. (Mills & Boon.)

It would be ungenerous not to pay a special tribute to the patience, ingenuity, and research that have gone to the compilation of this new and imposing-looking record of the life of James II. and his Queen at Saint-Germain. If zeal, experience, a consistent determination to be thorough, and a literary appetite that can assimilate and emphasise trifles with an almost prodigious readiness, would make a work of fair historical proportions, this story of the life of James II. and his family at the Chateau of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, and their relations with the French court after their precipitate flight from London in 1688, would be one of the season's literary triumphs. Unfortunately, a mere taking of pains does not reconstitute history on a large scale. That work demands a certain breadth of vision, and a certain sense of aloofness that these authors do not exercise and, as a consequence, their history-making, though based upon a first hand study of contemporary diaries, memoirs, histories, pamphlets, and manuscripts, sinks occasionally to the level of the every-day manufacturers of books. Students keenly interested in this vague and troublous period, will be grateful of course to Mr. and Mrs. Grew for the scholarship and the trouble that they have expended; the authors give a very carefully balanced and stirring account of the incidents that led up to the flight of James II. to France, but from a reader's standpoint, the work appears

An Apartment of the English Royal Family at St. Germain.

Reproduced by permission of Mr. Solomon Renuch.
From "The English Court in Exile" by F. and M. S. Grew. (Mills & Boon.)

to suffer afterwards from the fact that a distinct portion is then allotted to James's expedition to Ireland. This section is really rather clumsily contrived. At the same time, the authors give a clear and succinct story of the efforts made by the unhappy monarch to recover his throne, and have made a careful and able study of the character of Louis XIV. showing his treatment of the exiles to have been always "that of a great king and a great gentleman." His relation to the fugitive and ruined guests was without reproach. It was dictated by the most delicate courtesy, by the most boundless generosity. All that he had was placed at their disposal."

WITH NAPOLEON AT WATERLOO. By Edward Bruce Low. 15s. net. (Francis Griffiths.)

This volume embodies the work of the late Edward Bruce Low among documents and diaries dealing with the Waterloo and Peninsular campaigns. It is now produced under the editorship of Mr. Mackenzie MacBride who furnishes a most interesting introduction in which he comments on the habit of weaving the story of history round its few great leaders in warfare. The British citizen, he says, has little idea of the extraordinary exertions, privations, discomforts, which are suffered chiefly by the common soldier in the ranks. "Of the real warfare no accounts with which we are acquainted give a picture anything like so graphic as the words of the actual soldiers themselves." Perhaps the most important chapters of the book are those dealing with Napoleon at Waterloo, though they occupy less than a third of the space. The vital strategic importance of Hougomont is interestingly elaborated by the late Edward Bruce Low in a chapter on "The Guards at Waterloo," in which he quotes Victor Hugo's remark: "This corner of the earth, could Napoleon have held it, would have given him the sovereignty of the world." The closing of the gates of Hougomont was due to the magnificent bravery displayed by two rugged Highlanders of immense stature, Colonel Macdonnell and Serjeant John Graham. The diary of Napoleon's equerry, Jardin aîné, and the journal of one of his Aides-de-Camp give rather pathetic glimpses of the great Emperor on the field of Waterloo. Both of these documents, printed for the first time in this volume, are interesting and have some real historical value. The diaries of "the actual soldiers themselves" are very plentifully used. Serjeant Nicol describes his experiences with Abercrombie and Moore in Egypt; Serjeant Robertson's diary is quoted for the ghastly story of the retreat from Corunna. The late E. B. Low points out that if the British Government, instead of splitting up their magnificent army of 90,000 men at this time of European crisis, had sent an adequate force to assist the Spanish and Portuguese allies, five years fighting in the Peninsular would have been saved. Wellesley, it will be remembered, had only 20,000 men with which to oppose the combined armies of France (at that time ten times more numerous than his own), owing to the decision of Canning and Castlereagh to aid Austria in the war they were waging with France, and their determination to equip the ill-fated Walcheren expedition. Ruskin, in "Praeterita," tells us that he traversed the field of Waterloo without the slightest inclination to be a soldier. After reading this fascinating record and the diaries of the brave and simple warriors who have painted so vividly the horrors of war when robbed of the romance of the battle field, we must confess that we, too, have very little inclination for the soldier's life. We should add that the book is provided with a serviceable index and many excellent illustrations, but why not have placed them opposite their context? For instance there is on page 60 a portrait of Sir James Macdonnell, to whom we have already referred in the defence of Hougomont, but the reader must turn sixty-three pages before he will find any reference to him. This carelessness diminishes the value of the illustrations.

IRISH RECOLLECTIONS. By Justin McCarthy. 10s 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Readers who have reached middle age will be delighted to find Mr. Justin McCarthy still alive, and—well, not kicking—kicking never was the forte of Mr. McCarthy, otherwise he would have made a bigger figure in Parliamentary life but talking, and talking in these early "Irish Recollections" of his, with a charm and vivacity rather rarely to be found, we fancy, in the work of a veteran, eighty-two years old. The novelist to whom we owe "Dear Lady Disdain," the historical student who described the "History of Our Own Times," the politician whom Charles Stewart Parnell dismissed with bantering acerbity as "a nice old gentleman for a lady's tea-party," is our creditor for so many hours of easy instruction and innocent amusement that we trust many a New Year will come round before so genial and popular a personality undergoes the inevitable eclipse. The present generation, accustomed to what is grandiloquently called the sociological romance—the kind of fiction we mean that Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. Arnold Bennett and Mr. Oliver Onions write—can have little notion of those leisurely days of the 'eighties and early 'nineties, when Mr. James Payn, Messrs. Besant and Rice, and Mr. McCarthy introduced us to charming girls and pleasant men, and never troubled us with anything even dimly approaching to problems and social tendencies. How immeasurably distant from the present year of grace those days seem! Mr. Payn is dead, Sir Walter Besant is no longer with us; but happily Mr. McCarthy can cry "So am not I." And those of us who still have pleasant memories of his "Donna Quixote" and his "Maid of Athens" must join with that younger generation which has enjoyed the life of Gladstone, and derived instruction from his history of "The Reign of Queen Anne" in hoping that for many a long day the author of so many delightful books may be spared to make the boast. Certainly these latest reminiscences of Mr. McCarthy's show no signs of failing force or impaired vitality. Written with an urbanity, a kindliness, a tolerance, and a mellow wisdom that are the note of their author's style they deserve, and, indeed, cannot fail, to be widely read. No one who wants to know the average life led by a cultured and gently-born Irish family in the first three decades of Queen Victoria's reign can afford to overlook Mr. McCarthy's latest chapters. If we had to single out for praise any particular pages in these "Recollections," they would be those in which the author pays a fraternal tribute and raises a charming memorial to his sister Ely, and those which are devoted to an account of that extinct master, the Irish absentee landlord.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. CASSELL & CO.

The drift of the title is not the only elusive feature of Miss Elisabeth Cosby's romance, A Servant of the State (6s.), for the plot also is unnecessarily teasing. The title does not mean that the story is one of high diplomacy, but merely indicates the profession of the successful lover. Veronica's happiness seemed likely to be frustrated by the re-appearance of the mother she had been brought up to believe was dead; but de la Cherois showed in his private affairs the resourcefulness of his profession, although the author leaves us a little in the dark as to the value of his services to the State.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

We give a very warm welcome to the handy volume just presented to us by Elizabeth E. Goldsmith, Sacred Symbols in Art. There has long been need for such a book, and its help to those who find pleasure in the picture galleries of the world will be incalculable. It enables us to recognise the saints by their symbols, it explains the meanings of colours, the habits of monastic orders, and it helps us also to the inner and beautiful meanings of the symbolism, by giving us the legends and the attributes of the best known saints. The book is well and carefully carried out, and is enhanced by nearly sixty illustrations.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

A book of many allurements is A Tour through Old Provence (6s. net) by A. S. Forrest. The author possesses a very readable style, and by his gossip of places, people, legends, anecdotes, history, and even personal experience and advice, leaves us all deciding that Provence shall be our next holiday goal, without doubt. By word and by numerous excellent illustrations he gives an admirable impression of the Provence of history and of to-day.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.

Mr. C. Hefman Senn, G.C.A., has edited a new edition of the monumental work of that "good culinary architect," Charles Elmé Francatelli, which should prove very welcome to those in search of a cookery book of what may be styled the "advanced" kind. The Modern Cook (7s. 6d. net) was not designed on lines suitable for small households, though the student will find means to gratify almost every taste among the innumerable recipes which it contains. The value of the book is enhanced by a most exhaustive index and a useful glossary.

MESSRS. KEGAN, PAUL & CO.

"Italy is the ideal place for a summer holiday," says Mr. Douglas Sladen, in How to See Italy (7s. 6d. net), and one is tempted after reading this full and lavishly illustrated volume to say that Mr. Sladen has written an ideal guide-book for those who wish to go and see it. In particular he tells you how to see Italy by rail, furnishing the traveller with all needful information for his journeyings, whether he is seeking only a genial climate or beautiful scenery, or whether he goes as a student of sculpture, painting or architecture. Everything is most carefully and lucidly arranged in chapters that discourse on the charm of Italy; on the differing scenery of different parts of the country; on its architecture; where to see its famous paintings and sculpture; on its churches and chapels and noble monuments and public buildings. Each state, with its places of interest, is dealt with separately and exhaustively, and there are special chapters on what to see in Rome and in Sicily. Mr. Sladen is the most informing and pleasantly gossiping of guides, and his book runs to nearly six hundred pages, but is convenient in size, strongly and compactly bound, and light in the hand. Its hundred and sixty illustrations include a number of excellent photographs by Miss Dorothy Ridley, and a very useful map.

The Castle of Sirmione.

From "How to See Italy," by Douglas Sladen (Kegan, Paul & Co.)

MESSRS. JOHN LONG, LTD.

In Under Eastern Skies (6s.), Miss Olive Tompest tells a sad little story, the motif of which is "the unwritten law in the Indian Army—which is occasionally responsible for terrible tragedies—to the effect that nobody must marry until he has attained the rank of captain." The author seems to us somewhat to weaken her case by portraying two of her principal male characters as atrocious bouncers, but she has unquestionably a thorough knowledge of India and the Anglo-Indian military life. The book is well managed, and there are several passages of considerable dramatic power.

MESSRS. GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO.

In A Thackeray Year Book (2s. 6d. net), Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Melville have compiled a very charming volume of selections of the wit, humour, satire, opinions and philosophy of the great Victorian novelist. The book is arranged in order of months, and there is an extract for every day of the year. The compilers have drawn on the poems and miscellaneous articles, as well as on the novels of Thackeray, and their pages are rich with his shrewd criticisms of life and character, and his wisest and most suggestive sayings. These, with an excellent frontispiece portrait and a tasteful binding, should make this one of the New Year's most popular gift-books.

YEAR BOOKS.

We have received the 1912 issues of the following indispensable Year Books:

FROM MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK.

Who's Who (10s. net), grown now to 2,354 pages, and including some twenty-four thousand biographies. Who's Who Year Book (1s. net) containing tables that form the complement of "Who's Who," and enable one to enjoy the full advantage of the larger companion volume. The Englishwoman's Year Book and Directory (2s. 6d. net); The Writers' and Artists' Year Book (1s. net); and The Social Guide (2s. 6d. net).

FROM MESSRS. HAZELL, WATSON & VINEY.

Hazell's Annual (3s. 6d. net) that invaluable footnote to the history of the past year, with its concise, well-informed articles on all the leading current topics, and its full record of the men and movements of the time. It is happily and accurately described as "a hundred Blue-books boiled down into one red one." The index is larger than ever, and contains about seven thousand references.

HOW TO HOUSE THEIR MASTERPIECES

Books to attain their full usefulness must have adequate housing. If kept in a fixed style bookcase, they are apt to be damaged through overcrowding. If left on unprotected shelves, they are open to the dust, to the little accidents of house cleaning, to the innocent maraudings of little children. The ideal storehouse for all books, and particularly the world's masterpieces, is the Bookcase that is "ALWAYS COMPLETE BUT NEVER FINISHED"—the

Globe-Wernicke
'ELASTIC' BOOKCASE.

Booklet No. 111 B describes how this Bookcase is built up unit by unit, how its units can be added at any time and arranged in various harmonious groupings. It also illustrates the latest of glass doors in each unit and other important features. Why not send postcard for a copy?

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers
44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, London, E.C. 1, 82, VICTORIA ST., London, S.W., and 98, BISHOPSGATE E.C.

Jan. 1912 RESOLVE to rid yourself of petty writing annoyances. Buy a Fountain Pen and make your pen-work a pleasure instead of a tedious task. Choose the pen with care buy only the world's best, the pen that does not go wrong. You know it by this mark—

Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

Made in four styles
Prices of Regular and Self-filling Styles 10/6, 15/6, and upwards. Of Safety and Pump-filling Styles 12/6 and upwards. (With Clip Cap 1/6 extra.) In Silver and Gold for presentation. Of Stationers

Jewellers & Booklet
free from L. & C. HARDT
MUTH, Ltd., Koh-I-Noor
House, Kingsway, London
(New York 171 Broadway, Paris 6 Rue de Hanovre, Brussels 14
Rue de la Vierge, Vienna
Milan, Dresden, Zurich)

"In language and thought it is gentle, lovable, and freshly bright." Times

LETTERS TO PATTY

By ROSAMOND NAPIER.

Author of "The Faithful Failure." Illustrated.
5s. net.

Patty's letters, like the letters in "The Lady of the Decoration," form a really remarkable book, a book with the perpetual joy of youth in it—a gay, brave, and altogether delightful record of how a child's soul awakens to the glory of the world. The authoress is supposed to be ill, she may not have long to live. She occupies her time in delving back into the happiest hours of her youth for her present happiness. The substance of what she remembers she sets out in her letters to her favourite sister Patty. "Letters to Patty" is a remarkable and beautiful book.

HODDER & STOUGHTON,
Publishers, LONDON, E.C.

The best Pencils for every purpose and the most economical too—are

'KOH-I-NOOR' PENCILS.

In 17 degrees (and Copying).

One for every purpose.

4d. each.

3/6 per dozen.

Of all Stationers. List free from
L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London.
(Paris, Brussels, Dresden, Milan, Vienna, Zurich, New York.)

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS

ON SALE AT

EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP,

Whyte-Melville's Society and Sporting Novels, handsome set, half-calf gilt, illus. 25 vols., $6 15s.
 Hood (Tom), Works, 10 vols. new, half-calf gilt, 1869, $3 8s.
 Dickens (Chas.), Works, The famous "Chas. Dickens Edition," now scarce, 21 vols. new, half-calf, gilt, $4 4s., 1867, etc.
 Carroll (Lewis), Doublets; a Word Puzzle, 2nd ed. cloth, rare, 30s. 1880
 ——— The Hunting of the Snark, 1st ed. cloth, 21s. 1876
 ——— Sylvie and Bruno, 1889, 1st ed., 25s.
 ——— Alice in Wonderland, 1878;
 ——— Through the Looking-Glass, 1872;
 2 vols., cloth, 21s.

LIST OF NUMISMATIC WORKS.

Akerman (J. Y.), Ancient Coins of Cities and Princes, Spain, France and Britain, 1846, scarce, 10s. 6d.
 ——— Coins of New Test, 1846, 5s.
 ——— Examples of Coffee House, Tavern, etc., Tokens, 17th Century (pamphlet), 1847, 4s. 6d.
 ——— Introduction to Study of Ancient and Modern Coins, 1848, 3s. 6d.
 ——— London Tradesmen's Tokens, 1849, 12s. 6d.
 ——— Numismatic, Manual half-calf, interleaved, 1832, 5s.
 ——— Ditto, cloth, 1840, 8s. 6d.
 ——— Rare and Unedited Roman Coins, 2 vols., 1834, 21s.
 ——— Tokens of Wiltshire Tradesmen (pamphlet), 17th Century, 1846, 4s. 6d.
 Batty (J.), Copper Coinage, Vol. I. Tokens, Vol. II. Regal, Vol. III. Canadian, 3 vols., 15s.
 Blade's Numismata Typographia, 4to, half-bound, 1883, 21s.
 Boyne's Tokens of 17th Century, 1858, 21s.
 Cardwell (E.), Lectures on Coinage of Greeks and Romans, 1832, 4s. 6d.
 Carter's Medals of the British Army (with extra pamphlet), 1861, 10s. 6d.
 Cochrane-Patrick (R. W.), Scottish Coinage (papers from Numismatic Chronicle), scarce, 25s.
 Folkes (Martin), English Silver and Gold Coins, 2 vols. 4to, 1745, 30s.
 Havercampus (Sigbertus), Numismata Aurea (Imperatorum Romanorum), Amsterdam, 1738, 10s. 6d.
 Hawkins (E.), Silver Coins of England, 1841, 15s.
 Henfrey (H. W.), English Coins (Gold, Silver and Copper), in 2 vols., 1870, 12s. 6d.
 Hill (G. F.), Greek and Roman Coins, 1899, 7s. 6d.
 Humphreys (H. N.), Ancient Coins, Embossed leather, 1850, scarce, 25s.
 ——— Coinage of British Empire, 1861, 10s. 6d.
 ——— Coins of England, 1846, 10s. 6d.
 Lindsay, Coinage of Scotland, with 2 Supplements, 4to, 1845, 21s.
 Madden (F. W.), Jewish Coinage, 1864, 15s.
 ——— Roman Numismatics, 1861, scarce, 6s.
 Mint Reports, 1870-1902 (except 1897-8) (some bound), scarce, $4 10s.
 Montagu (H.), Copper, Tin and Bronze Coinage of England, 1885, 10s. 6d.
 Numismatic Chronicle, Vols. XII. to XV., bound in 2 vols., 1872-5, 10s. 6d.
 Pinkerton (J.), Essay on Medals, 1784, 4s. 6d.
 ——— Ditto, 2 vols., 1789, 6s.
 Robertson (J. D.), Coinage of Scotland, sm. 4to, 1878, 12s. 6d.
 Simon (James), Irish Coins, 1749, 21s. (in same Vol. is "A Journal from Cairo to Mt. Sinai," 1753).
 Snelling (T.), View of the Silver Coin of England, folio, 1762, 12s. 6d.
 Stevenson, Smith, Madden, Dictionary of Roman Coins, 1889, scarce, $3 3s.
 Till (W.), Essay on Roman Denarius, 1846, 5s.
 Vaillant (J.), Numismata Imperatorum Romanorum, 2 vols., Paris, 1692, 21s.
 Walsh (R.), Essay on Ancient Coins and Gems, 1823, 4s.

Cranmer Bible, 1553, thick folio, calf, fine copy, $12 12s.

Lydekker's Royal Natural History, 6 vols. half-morocco, $2 10s.

Monthly Packet, 2nd, 3rd, and first 4 vols. of 4th series, 1866-92, 54 vols., and Christmas No.'s 1877-91 in 5 vols., 59 vols. in all, $4 4s.

Greenaway (Kate), first eds.—Language of Flowers, 16s.; A Day in a Child's Life, 16s.; The Royal Progress of King Pepito, 7s. 6d.; The English Spelling-Book, 7s. 6d.; Girls' Own Paper, 1892, 12s. 6d.; Under the Window, 21s.; Heartsease, 1880, 12s. 6d.; Routledge Christmas No. 1881, 16s.

Crane (Walter), first eds.—The First of May, a Fairy Masque, in Portfolio, 30s.; Wise's New Forest, Artist's edition, presentation copy, 25s. (only 50 pub.), 1883; The Work of Walter Crane with Notes by the Artist, "Art Journal," 1899, 10s. 6d.; Illus. to Shakespeare's Tempest, in portfolio, 1893, 15s.; Pan Pipes 21s.; A Masque of Days, 7s. 6d.; Queen Summer, 7s. 6d.; Procession of the Months, 21s.; Renaissance, 1891, 15s.

Walter Crane's Picture Books in 1 vol., 1900, 15s.

Lawrence (Sir Thos.), by Lord Ronald Gower, with 4 coloured plates and 48 other large illus., with 13 small plates and a catalogue of the Works by A. Graves, a fine book, pub. $8 net, price $5 5s.

Portraits, Burlington Fine Arts Club Mezzotint Portraits, folio, fine book, 1902, scarce, $7 7s.

Dugdale's Visitation of Yorkshire, with additions, edited by J. W. Clay, 2 vols., 1899, $2 2s.

Milner (Lord), England in Egypt, 1st ed., 1892, 18s.

Eliot (Geo.), Romola, with illus. by Sir F. Leighton, ed.-de-luxe, scarce, 1880, 2 vols., $3 3s.

Scott (Wm. Bell), Poems, Ballads, etc., with 17 etchings by the author and Alma Tadema, 1875, 25s.

Hunting (Haddon Hall Library), only 150 copies on hand-made paper pub., full vellum, 1900, 21s.

Caradoc Press Vicar of Wakefield, and Walton's Angler, full-calf, fine books, 15s. each.

Vancouver's Voyages, 3 vols., 4to, half-morocco, rare, 1798, $6 6d.

Ramsay (Dean), Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character, 2 vols., 1861, Presentation copy, 10s. 6d.

Encyclopædia Britannica, 11th ed. just issued, complete set of the India paper, ed. 1911 (costs now $32 9s. net), $25.

Trial Roger Tichborne, 9 vols., folio, profusely illus. in parts, rare, $2 10s.

— Reports of Trials for Murder by Poisoning, by Browne and Stewart, cloth, 1883, 21s.

Greeney's Monumental Brasses of Europe, folio, 1884, 35s.

Baldwin Brown, The Glasgow School of Painters, with 74 reproductions and portraits by J. Craig Annan, folio, 1908, pub. $2 12s. 6d.; $5 5s. net.

Albert Durer's Facsimiles, folio boards, 12s. 6d.

Gilbert (W. S.), first eds.—Original Plays, 1876, 12s. 6d.; Songs of a Savoyard, 1891, illus. by the author, 12s. 6d.; The Pinafore Picture Book, illus. by Alice B. Woodward, 1906, 10s. 6d.

Gilbert (William), King George's Middy, with 160 illus. by W. S. Gilbert, 1st ed.; cloth, 1872, 15s.

Rackham's Grimm's Fairy Tales, 15s.

— Land of Enchantment, printed on vellum, 21s.

Dulac's Sleeping Beauty, 15s.

Indian Mutiny, Walker's Through the Mutiny, 1907, 8s. 6d.; Wilberforce, An Unrecorded Chapter of the Indian Mutiny, 1894, 4s. 6d.; Major North's Journal of an English Officer in India, 1858, 10s. 6d.; A History of the Indian Rebellion, a folio collection of newspaper cuttings of the Period, unique, $2 2s.

Breeding Racehorses by the Figure System, by Bruce Lowe, $2 2s.

Cabinet of Genius, with 70 plates in brown, letterpress not quite perfect, a rare book, 1792, $2 10s.

Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d.

Naval and Military Trophies, personal relics of British Heroes, a series of water-colour drawings, a very handsome book, pub. $7 7s.; price 30s.

Warriner's National Portrait Gallery of British Musicians, a wonderful collection, any man of note will find his portrait here, pub. 14s.; 7s. 6d.

Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, etc., 2 vols., 1909, 6s. 6d.

Blackmore's Lorna Doone, beautifully illus., a fine presentation volume, pub. 35s.; 12s. 6d.

Sporting Books, Vyner's Notitia Venatica, Treatise on Fox-Hunting, Ackerman, 1847, cloth, $3 10s.; Jorrock's Jaunts and Jollities, coloured plates, by Alken, cloth, 1869, $3 10s.; Science of Foxhunting, by Scrutator, 1868, 25s.; Noble Science of Foxhunting, by Radcliffe, illus., 1839, cloth, 35s.; Taplin's Sporting Dictionary and Rural Repository, 2 vols., calf, 1803, 15s.; Nimrod's Northern Tour, cloth, 1857, 21s.; The Gentleman's Recreation, 1677, rare old book on Hunting, Hawking, Fishing, Fowling, etc., $2 2s.

Scott, first eds.—Ballads and Lyrical Pieces, boards, uncut, 1806, $2 2s.; Anne of Geierstein, 3 vols., boards, uncut, 1829, $1 10s.; The Antiquary, old, half-calf, edges uncut, rare, 1816, 42s.

Dickens, first eds.—Complete in parts, very rare, Bleak House, $2 2s.; Our Mutual Friend, 35s.; Little Dorrit, 42s.

— Sibson's Illustrations (69 plates), to Old Curiosity Shop, rare, $4 4s.

— Famous Household ed., 21 vols., 4to, cloth, 45s.

— Many odd parts in stock. State wants.

Austin Dobson, Vignettes in Rhyme, 1st ed. dedicated to Anthony Trollope, cloth, 1873, 35s.

Elliott (Frances M.), Old Court Life in Spain, 2 vols., 1893, 35s.

Merriman (H. Seton), From One Generation to Another, 2 vols., 1st ed., 30s.

Bute's Roman Breviary, $2 10s. 1908

Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, 1st ed., half-calf, 1839, 15s.

— Works, 30 vols., cost $3 15s. net for $2 2s. (Oxton Pub. Co.).

Standard Dictionary of the English Language, 5 vols., quarto, cloth, 35s., recent.

Encyclopædic Dictionary, 8 vols., 30s., pub. $4 4s. Cassell, 1908-3

Myers's Human Personality, 2 vols., very scarce, 88s.

Donnelly's Atlantis, scarce, 10s. 6d.

Bacon (Lord), Sylva Sylvarum, with portrait, folio, calf, $3 8s. 1635

Ruskin, Modern Painters, 5 vols., cloth, uncut, best ed., $10 10s. 1856-68

Donne (J. D.), Poems, original calf, rare, 1639, $6 6s.

Haggard's Rural England, 3 vols., 1st ed., 25s. 1902

Jack Harkaway Series of Boys' Books, 14 vols. bound in 9, profusely illus., now very scarce, $4 4s.

FitzGerald (Edward), Letters and Literary Remains, edited by Wright, 3 vols.; $2 2s. 1889

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS on Sale at EDWARD BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham
(Continued).

- Rawlinson's Sixth Great Oriental Monarchy, 1873, rare, £4 4s.
Wordsworth's Poems, rare, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1807, £3 3s.
Louis Morin, French Illustrators, folio, only 150 issued, 1893, 25s.
Symonds (J. A.), Giovanni Boccaccio as Man and Author, rare, 1st ed.; 1895, £2 2s.
— Walt Whitman, a Study, large paper, 1893, £2 2s.
— Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama, 1884, 1st ed.; £2 10s.
Free Review (The), edited by J. M. Robertson, 10 vols., 1893 8, £2 10s.
Robinson's Eastern Carpets (second series), folio, fine work, 30s. 1893
Wilmott's Warley Garden in Spring and Summer, fine plates, beautiful vol., folio, 21s.
The Cabinet of Irish Literature, 4 vols., 15s. 1880
James Hogg's Winter Evening Tales, 1st ed., 2 vols., boards, uncut, 1820, 30s.
Lady Caroline Lamb's Graham Hamilton, 2 vols., 1st ed., boards, uncut, 1822, £3 3s.
Anne Radcliffe's Gaston De Blondville, 1st ed., 4 vols., boards, uncut, £3 3s. 1826
Sir Walter Scott's Halidon Hill, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 21s. 1882
— The Doom of Devorgoil, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 30s. 1830
J. Fenimore Cooper's Afloat and Ashore, and the Second Series, Lucy Hardinge, 1st ed., 6 vols., boards, uncut, 1844, £2 10s.
Mather's Kabbalah Unveiled, 1st ed., cloth, 1887, £2 2s.
Mead's Simon Magus, very rare, 1892, 4to, wrappers, £2 2s.
Geographical Historie of Africa, by J. Leo, folio, calf, rare, £8 8s. 1600
Hamerton's Paris in Old and Present Times, large paper copy, 1885, £4 4s. for £2 2s.
Brontë's Poems, 1st ed., 1846, £2 2s.
Hall Caine's Politics and Art, 1880, very rare, £3 3s.
— Two Autograph Letters from "Greeba Castle," 15s.
Dublin University Magazine, vols. 1 to 53, £6 10s. 1833 59
Bradley's Ethical Studies, 1876, £2 10s.
Butler's Solar Biology, N.D., 21s.
Beardsley's First and Second Book of Drawings, 2 vols. with extra illus. from Juvenal and Lucian, "Studio" and other Sources, a unique lot, £6 6s.
Meredith (George), One of Our Conquerors, 1st ed., 3 vols., 1891, 25s.
Thackeray's Works, 13 vols., 1887, £2 5s.
Dickens' Works, early reprints with all the original illus., 15 vols., half-calf gilt, £8 10s., 1871, etc.
Halford's Dry Fly Entomology, 1897, rare, 30s.
Fitzgerald (E.), The Complete Works of, 7 vols., handsome set, pub. £8 5s., price £3 3s.
Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, Twelve Coloured Plates after drawings, by Abanindro Nath Tajore, to illus. the Rubaiyat, in portfolio, "Studio" Office, 15s. 1910
Works of Robert Herrick, edited, with Biographical Notice, by T. Maitland, 2 vols., half-morocco, 1823, rare, £2 10s.
Macaulay's Works, complete, edited by his sister, Lady Trevelyan, 8 vols., best Library edition, £2 10s. 1866
Dulac's Illustrations: Shakespeare's The Tempest, ed.-de-luxe, signed by the artist, £3.
Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, illus. by Heath Robinson, ed.-de-luxe, signed by artist, £2 15s.
Benson (A. C.), Poems, 1st ed., 1893, 35s.
— The Professor, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1900, 21s.
Henley's Song of the Sword, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1892, 10s. 6d.
Whistler, Illustrated Catalogue of the Whistler Memorial Exhibition, ed.-de-luxe, £2 2s.
D'Annunzio's Gioconda, trans. by A. Symons, 1st ed., 1901, 15s.
— The Dead City, trans. by Arthur Symons, 1st ed., 15s. 1900
Rothenstein's English Portraits, folio, rare, 1898, 35s.
Whympers Travels Amongst the Great Andes of the Equator, 1892, fine presentation copy from the author with inscription, 21s.
Whympers Scrambles in the Alps, 1st ed., cloth, 1871, 28s. 6d.
Muther's History of Modern Painting, 3 thick vols., cloth, scarce, 1895, £2 15s.
Old Time Punishments, by W. Andrews, F.R.H.S., L.P., only 100 printed, 4to, cloth, 1890, 25s.
Lang (Andrew), The True Story Book, large paper, 1893, only 150 issued, 21s.
— The Green Fairy Book, large paper, 1892, only 150 issued, 21s.
— Fairy Books, 1st eds. of Blue, Brown, Crimson, Grey, Green, Violet, Yellow, the lot, 7 vols., £3 3s.
— XXII. Ballades in Blue China, 1880, very rare, 1st ed., 30s.
— The Princess Nobody, illus. by Doyle, 1st ed., 15s.
— Johnny Nutt and the Golden Goose, 1st ed., 1887, 15s.
Hardy (Thos.), Wessex Tales, 1889, cloth, with an autograph letter inserted from the author, 25s.
Ouida's Pascarel, with an autograph letter from the author inserted, 15s.
Autograph Letters—over 40; including Mme. Modjeska, Sir H. Irving, H. Mapleson, J. L. Toole, H. S. Neville, S. B. Bancroft, Chas. Kean, Clement Scott, Joseph Hatton, Alice Lingard, Sims Reeves, etc., £5 5s.
Cox's Churches, Derbyshire, 4 vols., £3 3s.
Carter's Ancient Architecture of England, folio, £2 5s.
Charles I.: Pourtraicture of His Sacred Majesty, rare, 1st ed., original calf with Crown and C.R. on side, 1648, £5 5s.
Randolph Caldecott's Graphic Pictures, 4 vols., oblong pictorial boards, £2 2s.
Bernard Shaw's Quintessence of Ibsenism, 1st ed., cloth, 35s.
Matthew Arnold's "Cromwell," a prize poem in the original wrappers as issued, 1843, £3 3s.
The Satirist, 11 vols. with numerous coloured caricatures, 1808-12, £9 9s.
Tennyson's The Passing of Arthur, rare, in its original wrappers, £5 5s. 1884.
Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7 vols., £4 10s.
Sheridan's The Critic, 1st ed., £3 10s. 1781
— The Duenna, 1st ed., 1794, £3 3s.
Drayton's Poly-Olbion, folio, calf, 1613, imperfect, most rare, £3 10s.
Fraser's Magazine, 1866 to 1882, 34 vols., half-calf, gilt, £5 5s.
Boswell's Life of Johnson, 1st ed., 2 vols., 4to, calf, £2 10s. 1791
Johnson's Lives of the Poets, 4 vols., 1st ed., calf, 1781, 35s.
— Idler, 1st ed., believed to be large paper copy, wide margins, calf, most rare, £2 2s. 1761
— Lobo's Voyage to Abyssinia, 1st ed. 1735 (Lobo's Abyssinia was Dr. Johnson's first published prose work), 21s.
Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., best ed., pub. £3 3s.; price 21s.
George Eliot's 1st eds., original cloth—Mill on the Floss, 3 vols., 30s., 1860; Jubal and Other Poems, 1874, 15s.; Theophrastus Such, 1879, 10s. 6d.; The Spanish Gipsy, a Poem, 1868, 8s. 6d.; Felix Holt, 3 vols.; 1866, 25s.; Silas Marner, 10s. 6d. 1861
De Stendhal, La Chartreuse de Parme, trans. by Robins, 3 vols., 1896, 21s.
— Red and Black, a Chronicle of the 19th Century, trans. by Robins, 2 vols., 1898, 21s.
Pilochristus, Memoirs of a Disciple of the Lord, 1st ed., 8vo, cloth, 1878, £2 2s.
Anthony Trollope's 1st eds., cloth—Golden Lion of Granpere, 1872, 21s.; Travelling Sketches, 1866, 10s. 6d.; The American Senator, 3 vols.; 1877, 21s.; Sir Harry Hotspur of Humblethwaite, 1871, 15s.; An Editor's Tale, 1870, 21s.; Life of Cicero, 2 vols., 1880, 10s. 6d.
Hardiman's History of Galway, 4to, boards, Dublin, 1820, very rare, £6 6s.
Catlin's North American Indians, with 360 engravings, 2 vols., 1845, 35s.
Two hundred original Etchings by Rembrandt, Claude Hollar, etc., folio, full morocco extra, 1820, £4 10s., cost £10 10s.
Whistler Portfolio, pub. by the "Studio" Magazine, £2 2s.
Stevenson's 1st eds.—The Master of Ballantrae, 10s. 6d.; Island Nights' Entertainments, 7s. 6d.; Kidnapped, 21s.
Barrie's 1st eds.—Margaret Ogilvy, 10s. 6d.; Better Dead, rare, 25s.
Richardson's History of Sir Chas. Grandison, 7 vols., calf gilt, fine old set, 21s. 1770
Swinburne's 1st eds.—A Song of Italy, 6s. 6d.; Astrophel and Other Poems, 10s. 6d.; Locrine, 10s. 6d.; A Midsummer Holiday, 10s. 6d.; Study of Victor Hugo, 10s. 6d.; Laus Veneris, New York, 1866, very rare, £12 12s.
Eyton's Key to Domesday (Dorset), 21s.
Dove's Domesday Studies, 2 vols., rare, £3. 1841
Punch, Vol. I., rare, 15s.
Astrology, etc.—Waite's Black Magic, 1898, 42s.; Wilson's Dictionary of Astrology, £2 10s.; Conway Demonology and Devil Lore, 2 vols., 30s.; Raphael's Familiar Astrologer, 1835, 35s.; Crook's Phenomena of Spiritualism, 1874, rare, 30s.
(Wanted: I want to buy Pearce's Text Book of Astrology, 2 vols.; and Mead's Pistis Sophia.)
Oliver Wendell Holmes: John Lothrop Motley: A Memoir, 1889, 12s. 6d.
Fun, profusely illustrated, Vols. 1 to 4, 21s.
Dostoevsky's Novels, pub. by Vizetelly; The Friend of the Family; Injury and Insult; Uncle's Dream; Crime and Punishment; The Idiot; 18s. each.
Rome and Greece: Mahaffy's Rambles and Studies in Greece, 10s. 6d.; Rennell Rodds; The Customs and Lore of Modern Greece, 12s. 6d.; Curtius History of Greece, 5 vols.; cloth, 1873, rare, £3 10s.; Society in Rome under the Caesars, by W. R. Inge, 10s. 6d.; Mommsen's History of Rome, 5 vols., Bentley, London, 1867, £2 2s.
Sterne's Works, 10 vols., calf fine old set, £2 2s. 1788
Carlton House Magazine, curious plates, 4 vols., 1792, £6 6s.
Sir Thos. Browne's Works, 4 vols., Pickering, 1836, £3 10s.
Royall Game of Chess-play, 1656; containing fine bookplate of Sir Thomas Littleton, Baronet, Treasurer of Her Majesty's Navy, dated 1702, rare, £5 5s. 0d.
Hutchins's History of Dorset, 2 thick vols., folio, £3 3s.
Hall's Court Life under the Plantagenets, 1901, 6s. 6d.
Old and New London, by Walter Thornbury, 6 vols., profusely illustrated, £2 2s.
Merriman's Phantom Future; Dross; Prisoners and Captives; Suspense, 1899, 10s. 6d. each.
Dowden's Life of Shelley, 2 vols., 1886, 30s.
Moliere's Dramatic Works, best edition, rendered into English by Henri Van Laun, beautifully illus., 6 vols. roy. 8vo., cloth, £3 3s. 0d. 1876.

Books Wanted with Autograph Inscriptions written inside by Ainsworth, Jane Austen, George Borrow, Browning, Carlyle, Coleridge, Cruikshank, Dickens, George Eliot, Keats, Kipling, Chas. Lamb, Landor, Long, Meredith, Scott, Shelley, Stevenson, Tennyson, Thackeray, Oscar Wilde, Wordsworth, etc., also First Editions of Eminent Authors.

WARD, LOCK & CO'S FICTION

SIX SHILLINGS EACH

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS

THE ISLAND OF ENCHANTMENT

Justus M. Forman

"No lover of genuine romance will fail to find pleasure in Mr Forman's latest volume. There is not a single false or jarring note anywhere from cover to cover; every little word and phrase, each episode and incident, and every line in the character sketches is as true to its purpose as possible"—Irish Independent

SANDERS OF THE RIVER

Edgar Wallace

"Never has the atmosphere, the mystery, the magic, the grim humour, the pathos, and the tragedy of uncivilised Africa been brought out with such a realistic touch"—The Evening Times

FORTUNE'S FOUNDLING

L. G. Moberley

"Miss L. G. Moberley is, as our readers are aware, an extremely skilful weaver of mysteries and remarkably successful in keeping up interest in them"—Morning Leader

ONE OF THE FAMILY

Kehle Howard

"We are again indebted to Mr Kehle Howard for giving us a most amusing and cleverly written book. 'One of the Family' is excellent reading"—Evening Standard

FALSE EVIDENCE

E. Phillips Oppenheim

"A very absorbing story, and the interest of the reader roused strongly in the opening chapter, is sustained to the end"—Liverpool Daily Post

THE PROTECTOR

Harold Bindloss

"Mr Bindloss knows his ground and his people as few writers do, and in 'The Protector' he gives us of his best"—The Western Mail

IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE

A. W. Marchmont

"Rarely has Mr Marchmont written a more thrilling story than this. His narrative is full of vigour and originality, as refreshing as they are enjoyable"—Manchester Courier

New Nature Book

MORE KINDRED OF THE WILD

Charles G. D. Roberts

"Picturesque, full of character, instructive, entertaining, often thrilling, the stories are sure to be received with the same pleasure as their predecessors have been by both the naturalist and the lover of good literature. Illustrated"
[Sporting and Dramatic News]

WARD, LOCK & CO. LTD., SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Inimitable pictures of life at George III.'s Court.

"We owe a great debt of gratitude to Mr Frankfort Moore for presenting a work of the deepest human interest in a most attractive form"—Evening Standard.

THE KEEPER OF THE ROBES. By F FRANKFORT

MOORE. Fully Illustrated

16/- net.

"A charming volume which recaptures with notable skill the atmosphere and surroundings of the Court. Fanny Burney had quick eyes, a lively pen, a keen sense of humour, and, under a show of deference, plenty of spirit. It goes without saying that the book is well written, but we ought to add that it is finely illustrated with historical portraits.—Standard" It is no hard and-fast, cut-and-dried series of extracts, but a resume bearing on every page the marks of Mr Frankfort Moore's own delightful sympathy and humour. The story will correct many popular fallacies regarding King George III.—Evening Standard. It tells, in pleasant, gracefully written chapters, of the daily round of duties in the Queen's household, and draws neat literary vignettes of the princesses, the courtiers, and the dashing military heroes who were to be seen at Court. It takes a peep at the comedy of the intrigues of the day, and makes a highly imposing picture of the celebrated State trial of Warren Hastings, with Fanny Burney as the central figure, looking on. Always readable in itself, the book is made attractive to look at by many appropriate portraits of the great and distinguished ladies who appear in its pages.—Scotsman.

This fascinating volume by "the protector of Kings" is in great demand. "M. Paoli has drawn for us the most convincing set of portraits of European princes that the world has seen."—Evening Standard.

MY ROYAL CLIENTS. By XAVIER PAOLI. Illustrated. 12/- net.

"It is no light task to do the work as M. Paoli has always done it; to have your eyes everywhere, and to provide yourself with a staff of trustworthy men, clever enough to move amongst dangerous characters without being suspected. This task M. Paoli seems to have performed to perfection, and in such a way as to make real friends of many of his kings and queens, and grateful clients of all of them. These chapters are lively reading, and of all the rest it may be said that they throw valuable side-lights upon personages who have had much to do with the making of our modern history."—Times. "Most entertaining reading. M. Paoli is a man of a quick wit and of the keenest powers of observation, and what he has to tell of his 'Royal Clients' wants nothing in piquancy. His favourites, one presumes, were Queen Victoria, King Edward VII, and the Empress of Austria. His most trying client was the King of Cambodia; his youngest, King Alfonso VIII, and Queen Wilhelmina."—Morning Post. "Delightful volume of historical scenes."—Liverpool Daily Post.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW FICTION

.. Six-Shilling Novels ..

THE PIONEER Harold Bindloss

PRINCESS KATHARINE Katharine Tynan

THE MYSTERY OF THE RAVENSPURS Fred M. White

CHRISTINA L. G. Moberly

IN LOVE'S LAND Effie A. Rowlands

THE TRIANGLE Marie C. Leighton

GOD AND MAMMON (3/6) Joseph Hocking

The FEBRUARY

. WINDSOR .

Contains COMPLETE STORIES by

JUSTUS M. FORMAN

CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS

G. B. LANCASTER

JOHN BARNETT

And other Famous Authors.

THE PAINTINGS OF

H. STACY MARKS, R.A.

16 Beautiful Reproductions 16

With Coloured Plate.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

From Chatto & Windus's Spring List.

A NEW STEVENSON VOLUME.

RECORDS OF A FAMILY OF ENGINEERS

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. 6s.

BOSWELL'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

By PERCY FITZGERALD. Author of "Life of Boswell" "Life of Samuel Foote," etc. 12s 6d net

THE TRUTH ABOUT A NUN- NERY

The Story of Five Years in a Paris Convent School.
By MARION AYESHA BENHAM. 5s net

New 6s. Novels ready and in the Press.

THE CHILDREN'S BREAD MAUDE LITTLE

THE WISDOM OF WAITING MABEL INCE.

THE SHOE OF A HORSE CHRISTOPHER STONE.

COMMONERS' RIGHTS CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

THE MALABAR MAGICIAN F. E. PENNY.

THE ENDLESS JOURNEY, etc. NETTA SYRETT.

UP TO PERRIN'S MARGARET B. CROSS.

INNOCENCE IN THE WILDERNESS THEODOSIA LLOYD.

LONDON:

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED . . .

Charles Dickens

BY BELLE MOSES, author of
"Louisa M. Alcott."

Crown 8vo. 331 pages with frontispiece.

Cloth gilt top - - - 5s.

A volume which treats particularly of the Author's heroines and the influence of women on his life and work.

Appletons, Bedford Street, London.

Literary Work placed to the best advantage. Write for free prospectus of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. We placed a full-length novel, within a week of receipt, with a leading London Publisher at excellent terms! "Locksley," Presburg Rd., New Malden, Surrey.

Young Writers learn Style and Technique! Write for free particulars of the Literary Instruction Correspondence Courses of the Surrey Literary Agency. Prepared by a Practical Author. Success Guaranteed. Address as above.

LIBRARIES CATALOGUED by a gentleman, Graduate at Oxford, with Literary experience. Particulars, "G.V.", Manor House, Dunkinesly, Ireland.

THE GREENING BOOKS.

The Temperance Nove of the Century!

GUY THORNE'S

New and Powerful Work,

THE DRUNKARD
6/- THE DRUNKARD 6/-
THE DRUNKARD

By the author of "When it was Dark."

The public are invited to write to the publishers for a descriptive pamphlet of the scope of Mr. Guy Thorne's new work, which is a masterly study of the evils of intemperance under the guise of fiction, and which may be had at all book-sellers' and libraries.

THE PRESS ONE AND ALL PRAISE

DAVID WHITE LAW'S vivid romance,

THE SECRET OF CHAUVILLE.

LONDON.

"The heroine is thoroughly charming. Undoubtedly this book is as good as anything Mr. Whitelaw has yet written" — Morning Post.

ENGLAND.

"The author shows us steadfast loyalty and disinterested love, and we feel that we are not dealing with puppets in a play, but with men and women of like passions with ourselves." — Yorkshire Daily Observer.

SCOTLAND.

"Given a room, a fire, and a pipe, with 'The Secret of Chauville' for company, we can spend the most pleasant and comfortable of winter evenings." — Glasgow Evening Times.

WALES.

"From the first page to the last the interest is sustained at a high pitch, and the grip on the reader's imagination is so strong that he is more than likely to get through the book at one sitting." — Western Mail.

IRELAND.

"Mr. Whitelaw's characters are powerfully drawn—the interest of the reader is seized at the first page, and one will find it hard to leave the book aside unfinished" — Dublin Express.

STILL IN DEMAND IS WILLIAM CAINE'S

Amusing jeu d'esprit,

OLD ENOUGH TO KNOW BETTER.

Punch says:—"Mr. Caine has the true secret of fiction. His characters are living people."

OTHER GOOD FICTION INCLUDES—

THE GALLANT GRAHAM

Mav Wynne

AND THE STARS FOUGHT

Ena Fitzgerald

THE LEAGUE OF THE TRIANGLE

Lester Lurgan

THE BETTER MAN

Cyrus I. Braly

CARROW OF CARROWDUFF

Louise Stacpoole Kenny

RUSTEN, SON OF ZAL

G. S. Gardiner

LORD OF IRONGREY

J. B. Harris Burland

A COMEDY OF HONOUR

Guy Rawlence

AN IRREGULAR MARRIAGE

Sidney Warwick

THE SECOND WIFE

Thompson Buchanan

SIX SHILLINGS EACH. At all Libraries.

A New Work by the author of "Seen and Unseen,"

THE COPING STONE.

By E. KATHARINE BATES

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3/6 net.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LOTUS LIBRARY—

SIDONIE'S REVENGE.

By ALPHONSE DAUDET.

12mo, cloth, 1/6 net. Leather, 2/ net.

GREENING & CO., Ltd.,

91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

A PUBLIC SCHOOL STORY,
BY THE AUTHOR OF "RAFFLES."

Crown 8vo. 6/-

Fathers of Men

By E. W. HORNUNG, Author of "Raffles," "Peccavi,"
"The Rogue's March."

On February 22nd. Crown 8vo. 6/-

The House of Robershay

By EMMA F. BROOKE, Author of "A Superfluous Woman," "Sir Elyot of the Woods," "The Story of Hauksgarth Farm," &c.

With Portraits in Photogravure of Dickens, Thackeray, Wilkie Collins and Wills. Demy 8vo. 12/6 net.

Charles Dickens as Editor

Being Letters written by him to William Henry Wills, his Sub-Editor. Chosen and Edited by R. C. LEHMANN, Author of "Harry Fludyer at Cambridge," "The Sun Child," "Memories of Half-a-Century," &c.

Crown 8vo. 5/- net.

Thoughts on Education, chosen from the Writings of Matthew Arnold

Edited by LEONARD HUXLEY, Author of "Life and Letters of T. H. Huxley," "Time of the Apostles,"

Large Post 8vo. 7/6 net.

Recollections, Grave and Gay

By Mrs. BURTON HARRISON.

In February, with 32 pages of Illustrations and Maps.
Small royal 8vo. 10/6 net.

The Gambia

Its History, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern, together with its Geographical, Geological, and Ethnographical Conditions, and a description of the birds, beasts, and fishes found therein. By HENRY FENWICK REEVE, C.M.G., M.I.C.E., F.R.G.S., F.A.S., &c.

With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo. 3/6 net.

Murphy: a Tale of a Dog

By MAJOR GAMBIER-PARRY, Author of "Annals of an Eton House," "The Pageant of my Day," &c.

On February 1st, with a Portrait and 3 Illustrations.
Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

Life of Bishop Ernest Wilberforce

By J. B. ATLAY, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "The Victorian Chancellors," "Sir Henry Wentworth Acland: a Memoir," &c.

In February, with a Photogravure Portrait from a drawing by GEORGE RICHMOND. Small demy 8vo.
7/6 net.

Edward King, 60th Bishop of Lincoln

By the Rt. Hon. G. W. E. RUSSELL, Author of "Collections and Recollections," &c.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

The Great Dickens' Edition of the Centenary Year will be THE WAVERLEY DICKENS

A 20th-CENTURY EDITION.

In Thirty Half-crown Volumes.

This Edition will not be merely a reprint of Dickens on the old lines, but a Dickens that, while in no sense disturbing Dickens traditions, will add greatly to the interest of the stories, presenting valuable new features which will link up the master-creations of nineteenth century fiction with Twentieth Century Ideas and Aspirations.

IMPORTANT NEW FEATURES.

For this unique Edition the co-operation of many of the most eminent litterateurs and critics of the day has been secured, by whom Introductions have been specially written from the standpoint of our own time; and a most striking result is obtained, strengthening Dickens's hold on the public and inducing a desire to re-read the great novelist in the light of this newer criticism.

A Brilliant New Introduction to Each Novel

ANDREW LANG on "The Pickwick Papers"
G. K. CHESTERTON on "A Christmas Carol"
WM. DE MORGAN on "Our Mutual Friend"
A. E. W. MASON on "Barnaby Rudge"
JOHN GALSWORTHY on "Bleak House"
BERNARD SHAW on "Hard Times."
E. F. BENSON on "The Old Curiosity Shop."

HALL CAINE on "David Copperfield."
MAX PEMBERTON on "Martin Chuzzlewit."
A. C. BENSON on "Oliver Twist."
LUCAS MALET on "Dombey and Son."
JOHN OXENHAM on "Great Expectations."
W. PETT RIDGE on "The Uncommercial Traveller."

And other Eminent Authors in association with the other works.

The typography of the Waverley Dickens is worthy of the great master. The page has been designed and the type selected by Mr. C. HOME MCCALL, one of the greatest present-day authorities on the Art of Printing. The work itself is being executed at the Ballantyne Press, than which it is impossible to give higher commendation.

It is also claimed for THE WAVERLEY DICKENS that it will be one of

The Finest Illustrated Editions of Dickens ever Issued, comprising exquisite reproductions of

FRED BARNARD'S FAMOUS SERIES OF DICKENS ILLUSTRATIONS

IN COLOURS and

120 Entirely New Illustrations, full of life, character, and insight, by CHARLES PEARS, the well-known Punch artist.

This edition will form a superb Centenary tribute to the memory of the great novelist. The volumes will be published in monthly order. 4 vols in January, 3 in February, and so on, the whole issue being delivered before the end of the year.

An Illustrated Booklet

Of 16 pages, describing the Waverley Dickens in detail, and showing how the entire set can be obtained on the Waverley system of small monthly instalments, will be sent post free.

The Waverley Book Company,
7 & 8, OLD BAILEY, E.C. Limited.

FREE COUPON.

THE WAVERLEY BOOK COMPANY, LTD.,
7 & 8, OLD BAILEY, LONDON, E.C.

Please send me, free of all charge or obligation, your Illustrated Booklet on "The Waverley Dickens," with particulars of your special offer.

Name.....

Occupation

B.N. 1912 Address

The Year 1912 will be one of the most popular the "Century" has ever seen.

A Foreword of "The Century Magazine."

Few of us realise the effect our reading has upon us. Trashy reading will no more produce sturdy minds than poor food will produce strong bodies. That which is noblest and most beautiful in current literature and in art is reflected month by month in the pages of The Century Magazine.

Something about the "Century's"

History.

"Beginning the eighty-third volume." What a noble record is reflected in that announcement. How it brings before The Century reader a picture of the great novels, the famous short stories, the world-read biographies, and the wonderful art which that magazine has produced.

It was in November, 1870, that its first number was issued. Looking back over the forty-one years which have passed since then, one recalls the famous War Papers which Current Literature said at the time "created the greatest interest ever felt in any series of articles published in magazines." For this series General Grant was first induced to write his recollections of famous battles, the foundation of his well-known "Personal Memoirs," which the General finished on his dying bed, leaving a book which brought a fortune to his family. The war series was followed by the Life of Lincoln, written by Messrs. Nicolay and Hay, private secretaries to the President, who received over £10,000 for the right of serial-publication of their life work in The Century.

George Kennan's great exposure of the Siberian Convict system was another of the early successes of The Century; Sloane's "Napoleon"; Eugene Schuyler's "Peter the Great"; Morley's "Oliver Cromwell"; Hichen's "Egypt and Its Monuments," are fresh in the minds of magazine readers. Its place at the head of all the popular periodicals published in the English language is no longer disputed.

What it gives for the Money.

Every month it brings to its readers one hundred and sixty pages of the choicest literature and the best specimens of art that the markets of the world can produce. People who are brought up on cheap magazines wonder sometimes why The Century costs 1/4. Let them buy it for a few months and they will find out. There is an uplifting atmosphere, a healthful, optimistic tone, which is far removed from anything that smacks of muck-raking. It tries to keep on the right side of public questions, and to be of the highest use to its readers.

W. J. Locke's New Novel.

Continuing its custom of securing one of the most popular novelists of the world, The Century announces a new novel, "Stella Maris," by W. J. Locke, author of "The Glory of Clementina," "The Beloved Vagabond," and other famous books which have been read by hundreds of thousands during the past few years.

The 100th Anniversary of the Birth of Charles Dickens is to be celebrated in The Century with articles on Dickens, and with the publication of a hitherto unknown portrait, painted in America, which will have great interest to Dickens lovers.

A Selection from the Contents of the February Issue of

"The Century Magazine."

Hester Prynne of "The Scarlet Letter." Printed in colour from a painting made for The Century by SIGISMOND DE IVANOWSKI.

Germany's Foreign Trade. Her Present Position a Marvel of the Age. By JAMES DAVENPORT WHELFLEY, author of "The Commercial Strength of Great Britain."

Whistler as Decorator. With an Incidental Comparison of the Influence of Whistler and that of William Morris. By JOSEPH and ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL.

Stella Maris. A Novel. II. By WILLIAM J. LOCKE, author of "The Beloved Vagabond," etc. Picture by Frank Wiles.

Cole's Engravings of Masterpieces. Portrait by Rembrandt of himself. Engraved on wood by Timothy Cole.

The White Cockatoo. A story. By MARY AUSTIN, author of "The Arrow-maker," "Frustrate," etc. Pictures by Arthur I. Keller.

The Obviousness of Dickens. By SAMUEL MCHORD CROTHERS. Picture by Albert E. Sterner, portrait of Dickens as a young man, drawing by Cruikshank, autographs, and relics of Dickens in the collection of Harry B. Smith.

How the Hound got his Mouth. A Story. By HARRY SILLWELL EDWARDS, author of "Isam's Spectacles," "Two Runaways," etc. Picture by Carton Moorepark.

The Shears of Delilah. A Story. By PEARL WILKINS. Pictures by F. L. Blumenschein; one in colour.

The Middle West. Being Studies of its People in Comparison with those of the East. First Paper: "The Fibre of the People." By EDWARD ALSWORTH ROSS, author of "The Changing Chinese," etc.

"Back to the Farm!" Present Drawbacks and Future Prospects. By HARVEY W. WILEY.

Open Letters. How to Talk to an Irish Gentleman at Dinner (GRACE DURHAM)—On a Much-Needed Revolt in the Household (MARGERY BIANCÓ).

If you want the best and only the best in Art and Literature, subscribe to "The Century." Subscriptions may begin at any time. Price 16/- post free a year; single numbers 1/4.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

To the Publishers of
THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,
WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Please send me "The Century Magazine" for months, commencing with the issue. I enclose in payment.

Name

Address

.....

A SELECTION FROM
Messrs. HUTCHINSON & Co.'s
NEW BOOKS

NEW EDITION of
The Childhood and Youth of Charles Dickens

By ROBERT LANGTON, F.R.Hist.Soc.

With more than 80 fine high class Engravings on wood from original drawings by William Hull, Edward Hull and the Author

In Cloth Gilt, 6s.

A new edition of a much esteemed work which has been out of print for many years (Immediately)

JUST READY

A new novel by the talented Grand-Daughter of Charles Dickens

The DEBTOR

By MARY ANGELA DICKENS 6s.

A Year with the Gaekwar

By the REV EDWARD ST. CLAIR WEEDON, M.A.

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net. With Photogravure Portrait and 24 other Illustrations

Mr. Weedon was the first European to stay in the royal palace at Baroda, and to be admitted to the privacy of the Maharajah's family circle, and he has made good use of his exceptional opportunities (Immediately)

"A KING'S ENCHANTRESS"

My Lady Castlemaine

By PHILIP W. SERGEANT

With 17 Illustrations, including a Photogravure Frontispiece In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net

Barbara Villiers has been described as the finest woman in England, and whose portrait was more often painted than any woman who has ever decorated the English Court. A bishop who was among her contemporaries asserts that he never heard anyone commend her for anything except her beauty. There is no reason why this astonishing beauty, perhaps the greatest termagant that ever ruled a king, should not take her place in the literary gallery among her rivals in loveliness and frailty (JUST READY)

A SUPERB ART BOOK

JOHN OPIE And His Circle

By ADA FARLAND

In one large handsome volume, with 31 Illustrations, printed on art paper, and beautifully reproduced by a new process. 21s. net (READY)

COLOUR MUSIC

THE ART OF MOBILE COLOUR

By A WALLACE RIMINGTON, A.R.E., R.B.A.

Professor of Fine Arts, Queen's College, London

With 20 Illustrations in colour, black and white, and photography. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (Immediately)

HUTCHINSON'S New 6s. Novels

THE ORDER OF RELEASE	H. De Vere Stacpoole
THE SATANIST	Mrs. Hugh Fraser and J. I. Stahlmann
THE DEBTOR	Mary Angela Dickens
THE COWARD	Robert Hugh Benson
IN COTTON WOOL	W. B. Maxwell
SHARROW	Baroness Von Hutten
ADRIAN SAVAGE (4th Ed.)	Lucas Malet
THE GREEN CURTAIN	M. K. Braddon
CHRISTOPHER (3rd Ed.)	Richard Pryce
AN ACCIDENTAL DAUGHTER (2nd Ed.)	Cosmo Hamilton
THE ISLE OF THE DEAD	May Crommellin & A. Williams
FLOWER OF GRASS (2nd Ed.)	Kathlyn Rhodes
THE THIRD MISS WENDERBY (2nd Ed.)	Mabel Barnes Grundy
POPPIES IN THE CORN (3rd Ed.)	Madame Albanesi

London: HUTCHINSON & CO.

FOUR NEW STARS!

Mr. John Lane's Discovery

A NEW HISTORICAL NOVELIST

THE SHADOW OF POWER

By PAUL BERTRAM 6s.

* * FIRST REVIEW.—"Few readers having taken up THE SHADOW OF POWER and come face to face with Don Jaime de Jorquerra, will lay it down or refuse him a hearing until the book and his adventures come to an end.—TIMES
SECOND REVIEW.—"Enthralling with its passages of pure passion, and of grim terror. . . . It is pure romance of the best kind. . . . Superb grasp of the period. . . . Above all, it is literature."—DAILY MAIL.

A NEW MILITARY NOVELIST

HECTOR GRAEME 6s.

By EVELYN BRENTWOOD

* * An enthralling novel of military life in India and South Africa. The hero is a most extraordinary personality—a born leader whose contempt for orders and civil individuality militate against his chances of success

A NEW REALIST

THE STORY OF A PLOUGHBOY 6s.

By JAMES BRYCE

* * A record of personal experience. An autobiographical confession as frank as Rousseau's Pictures, almost brutal in their candour, drawn from life on the soil.

A NEW POET OF PASSION

THE PAGAN TRINITY

By BEATRICE IRWIN 5s. net.

* * In Mrs. Beatrice Irwin's work will be found verse which surpasses in passion the kindred poetry of Laurence Hope and Miss Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Perhaps no writer of such poems to-day displays a more complete mastery of form and glowing colour and such meteoric flashes of the Orient

RECENT SUCCESSES

INDIAN NATURAL HISTORY SKETCHES

JUNGLE FOLK 10s. 6d. net.

By DOUGLAS DEWAR

Mr. Dewar is the author of those notable successes "Bombay Ducks," "Birds of the Plains," "Indian Birds," etc.

By the Author of "LEAVES FROM A MADEIRA GARDEN"

ABOUT ALGERIA 5s. net.

By CHARLES THOMAS-STANFORD

With 8 Illustrations by F. DORRIEN THOROTON, and 24 reproductions from photographs

A FASCINATING NARRATIVE

THE ANARCHISTS Illustrated.

By ERNEST A. VIZETELLY 10s. 6d. net.

The first real history of the Anarchists ever attempted.

A BUILDER OF MODERN ITALY

MARGARET OF FRANCE DUCHESS OF SAVOY 1523-1574 Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

By WINIFRED STEPHENS

AN EXPERT IN CRIMINOLOGY

THE CRIMINAL AND THE COMMUNITY 6s. net.

By Dr. JAMES DEVON, Medical Officer at H.M. Prison, Glasgow.
"An epoch-making book." DAILY NEWS

AN AUTHORITATIVE WORK

NAPOLEON AND KING MURAT Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

By ALBERT ESPITALIER.

Translated by J. L. MAY.

IN THE FORESTS OF THE NORTH

UNDISCOVERED RUSSIA

By STEPHEN GRAHAM Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

Author of "A Vagabond in the Caucasus."

THE BODLEY HEAD,
VIGO STREET, W.

A literary event. "New light on George Borrow's fascinating personality. The letters so ably edited by Mr. Darlow will appeal to the man in the street no less than to the scholar."

THE LETTERS OF GEORGE BORROW TO THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Edited by T. H. DARLOW, M.A.

7/6 net

"These letters of Borrow are published without omission or alteration; the aim has been to let Borrow speak for himself. What notes I have added have only been to explain references. The most interesting fact about the whole publication is that it refutes the charges of invention that have been made against Borrow. When he went to Spain it appears that he had some idea of writing a book about it, and after his return he applied to the society for the loan of his letters. These were lent to him, and many of the most vivid scenes he has described are taken from them. The letters also throw new light on his character. They show conclusively that his religion was not assumed, it was a deep, absolutely sincere belief in the Bible. In one place he describes himself as a 'zealous though most unworthy member of the Church of England.' Perhaps he was, above all, a Bible believer with a rather Old Testament type of character. He showed himself, too, a remarkable man of affairs, and tactfully won his way among extraordinary groups of people."—From the Preface.

"The volume is in every way a delightful one, for Borrow had that art by which, if he was merely sending a statement of accounts, or stating the reasons for selecting a printer, the record becomes as enchanting as the most romantic record of his adventures."—Daily News. "We have here the raw stuff not only of 'The Bible in Spain,' but of an unwritten 'Bible in Russia.' While this volume is an indispensable supplement to 'The Bible in Spain,' it stands upon its own feet, and ought to have a place upon any shelf of Borrow."—Daily Chronicle.

This beautiful edition of Emily Brontë's works is limited to 1,000 copies for sale in Great Britain and the United States of America.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF EMILY BRONTË.

2 Volumes. Vol. 1.—THE COMPLETE POEMS OF EMILY BRONTË. Edited by CLEMENT SHORTER, with an Introductory Essay by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. Vol. 2.—WUTHERING HEIGHTS. With an Introduction by CLEMENT SHORTER, and many Facsimiles of Emily Brontë's Handwriting. 6s. net each.

"Until our own day Emily's work seemed to live by the reflected glory of the sister who survived her and had presented some kind of a portrait of her in the popular story 'Shirley.' All this is now changed. Both Charlotte and Emily have their separate bands of admirers. There is a countless host that appreciate both writers equally, but a considerable number glory in their preference for one or the other. . . . It is well that Emily Brontë should have her partisans, and it is time also that she should have a separate presentation of her published work. It has long been my ambition to offer this to that select public which to-day constitutes itself a Brontë cult."—CLEMENT SHORTER.

"Mrs. Byron can write a charming ballad."—Spectator.

THE WIND ON THE HEATH.

LYRICS AND BALLADS. By MAY BYRON.

5/- net

"If you read a few years ago a volume of Poems by M. C. Gillington (Mrs. Byron), you will open 'The Wind on the Heath' with great expectations, and, what is more, you will find that the book realises them. There was work in that earlier volume that marked Mrs. Byron as a poet of true and high inspiration, but there are poems in this new book that are better than the best that was in the old. . . . Mrs. Byron writes in divers moods, and has rare gifts of imagination, a sure sense of the magic of words, and a cunning in metrical harmonies that enables her to give poetic thoughts poetic utterance and to infuse into her ballads of glamorous rough adventure the fire and forcefulness of strenuous life."—Bookman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

THE COMPELLING BOOKS OF OUR GENERATION.

'The UNCLE TOM'S CABIN of the White Slave Traffic, and is likely, we believe and hope, to do all that Mrs. Beecher Stowe's famous work accomplished for the Black.'—Liverpool Post.

DAUGHTERS OF ISHMAEL

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN.

With a Preface by JOHN MASEFIELD

Price 6/-

"The kind of book that moves one to action, and may prove, like one or two famous novels before it, to be the inspiration of a great crusade."—Morning Post
 "A vivid, ruthless, and relentless account of the white slave traffic. It is not a nasty book. There is much that is horrible—horrible because we know it to be only too true. . . a book which, though in many ways ghastly, is nevertheless of such immense importance that every grown man and woman should read it. It is terrible from beginning to end, but above all the horror there is something, which makes you feel clean, better, more pitiful for a side of life which seldom incites pity. . . One of the most terrible stories I have ever read."—Richmond King in The Tatler
 "Appalling. Mr. KAUFFMAN faces the horrible facts with relentless candour. The work is inspired by a passion for moral and social cleanliness."—Liverpool Courier
 "That he is telling the truth the simplicity and candid honesty of his telling forces us to believe. . . an earnest and humanely balanced piece of truth telling."—Manchester Guardian

Original and full of force, this novel, containing as it does those elements of bigness so rare in these days, is a refreshing change to the ordinary run of fiction.

THE WOMAN WITHOUT SIN

By PHARAILL SMITH. 6s.

With a pen which is as powerful as it is restrained, the writer attacks convention and upholds his own ideas of freedom between the sexes.

"A relentless and terrible exposure of what has been called 'the white slave traffic.' It is both painful and powerful, and of its sincere purpose there can be no question. Mr. Kauffman's handling GIVES NO UNNECESSARY OFFENCE."—Times.

"Mr. Stephen Swift seems to be identifying himself with most of the coming men and women of brain and intellect."—The Tatler

"REMINDS THE READER OF ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN."—Spectator.

"Very much above the average, reveals its author as a writer with exceptional gifts of narration and a power of strong dramatic composition. It is well worth reading."—Liverpool Post

THE REVOKE OF JEAN RAYMOND

By MAY FORD. 6s.

"We strongly recommend this book to those interested in modern movements, social, political, or religious."

—Yorks. Factory Times

"A fascinating story."—Scotsman
 "Thoughtful, well-written, and not devoid of originality."—Time

IN A GERMAN PENSION

"Uncommonly bold and artistic."—Lancet & Law

"Vivid and often brilliant sketches of life."

Original and very forcible in style. extremely well written and in a sense so true that anyone acquainted with German life will keenly appreciate them. We have seldom read more vivid sketches with so great an economy of words. —Morning Post

A masterly piece of work. —World

STARTLINGLY REALISTIC.—Daily Telegraph

Send a postcard for list of "Books that Compel," post free, from STEPHEN SWIFT & CO., Ltd., 10, John St., Adelphi, London, W.C.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW—ONE SHILLING NET.

Another Great Poem

By JOHN MASEFIELD,

The Widow in the Bye Street.

Contributions by

Frederic Harrison,

George Moore,

John Galsworthy,

D. H. Lawrence,

Evelyn Underhill,

Henry Baerlein.

2 Important Articles on France and Turkey.The Breakdown of Turkey

E. J. DILLON.

The France of M. Caillaux

"VERAX."

Portrait of John Masefield by William Strang, A.R.A.

The New Sesame and Lilies.

The Flea and the Barnacle.

Play of the Month.

Books of the Month.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW can be obtained at the leading Booksellers, Smith's, Wyman's, and Willing's Bookstalls, or direct from 17 & 21, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

EXPOSITIONS OF DANTE. Dr. J. S. CARROLL'S books must prove invaluable to all who would understand Dante's life work

IN PATRIA: An Exposition of Dante's "Paradiso." By JOHN S. CARROLL, M.A., D.D. 10/6 net.

Dr. Carroll, with this volume, brings to a close his great study of Dante's famous poem, a labour which has taken many years to complete. The earlier volumes, "Exiles of Eternity" and "Prisoners of Hope," with the Inferno and the Purgatorio respectively for their subjects, have already brought their author universal recognition as one of the most scholarly students of Dante. The theology of the Paradiso, being in many ways the most difficult of any of the books of the trilogy, Dr. Carroll's expositions will be studied and read with peculiar interest.

"This volume furnishes the reader with just the sort and measure of exposition, appreciation, and other aid that he requires."—Scotsman. "Dr. Carroll may be congratulated on the successful accomplishment of his great trilogy."—Yorkshire Observer.

Uniform with "In Patria"

EXILES OF ETERNITY: An Exposition of Dante's "Inferno" 10/6 net.

"We feel that Dr. Carroll really understands Dante. We are not irritated by novel theories, or by ignorant criticism, but we are reading Dante in company with a true disciple who has assimilated all that the best workers in the almost boundless fields of Dante literature have given to us, and, above all, a disciple who knows his Dante and not merely what others have said about Dante. The symbolism is explained with great thoroughness, and not a detail is allowed to escape. . . . We strongly recommend this delightful book to Dante students."—Guardian.

PRISONERS OF HOPE: An Exposition of Dante's "Purgatorio" 10/6 net.

"The volume is to be warmly commended. It will go far to render more fascinating than ever to many minds the most intelligible and ethically useful portion of the wonderful poem in which a great spiritual genius, working under the restraints of the mediæval economy and discipline, seeks, in his own words, 'to remove those living in this life from a state of misery, and to guide them to a state of happiness'—an aim which, as his latest expounder truly says, is to be accomplished only by moral and spiritual means."—Scotsman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Inimitable pictures of life at George III.'s Court.

"We owe a great debt of gratitude to Mr. Frankfort Moore for presenting a work of the deepest human interest in a most attractive form."—Evening Standard.

THE KEEPER OF THE ROBES. By F. FRANKFORT MOORE. Fully Illustrated. 16/- net.

"A charming volume which recaptures with notable skill the atmosphere and surroundings of the Court. Fanny Burney had quick eyes, a lively pen, a keen sense of humour, and, under a show of deference, plenty of spirit. . . . It goes without saying that the book is well written, but we ought to add that it is finely illustrated with historical portraits."—Standard. "It is no hard-and-fast, cut-and-dried series of extracts, but a résumé bearing on every page the marks of Mr. Frankfort Moore's own delightful sympathy and humour. . . . The story will correct many popular fallacies regarding King George III. . . ."—Evening Standard. "It tells, in pleasant, gracefully written chapters, of the daily round of duties in the Queen's household, and draws neat literary vignettes of the princesses, the courtiers, and the dashing military heroes who were to be seen at Court. It takes a peep at the comedy of the intrigues of the day . . . and makes a highly imposing picture of the celebrated State trial of Warren Hastings, with Fanny Burney as the central figure, looking on. . . . Always readable in itself, the book is made attractive to look at by many appropriate portraits of the great and distinguished ladies who appear in its pages."—Scotsman.

This fascinating volume by "the protector of Kings" is in great demand. "M. Paoli has drawn for us the most convincing set of portraits of European princes that the world has seen."—Evening Standard.

MY ROYAL CLIENTS. By XAVIER PAOLI. Illustrated. 12/- net.

"It is no light task to do the work as M. Paoli has always done it; to have your eyes everywhere, and to provide yourself with a staff of trustworthy men, clever enough to move amongst dangerous characters without being suspected. This task M. Paoli seems to have performed to perfection, and in such a way as to make real friends of many of his kings and queens, and grateful clients of all of them. These chapters are lively reading, and of all the rest it may be said that they throw valuable side-lights upon personages who have had much to do with the making of our modern history."—Times. "Most entertaining reading. M. Paoli is a man of a quick wit and of the keenest powers of observation, and what he has to tell of his 'Royal Clients' wants nothing in piquancy. His favourites, one presumes, were Queen Victoria, King Edward VII., and the Empress of Austria. His most trying client was the King of Cambodia; his youngest, King Alfonso VIII. and Queen Wilhelmina."—Morning Post. "Delightful volume of reminiscences."—Liverpool Daily Post.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF CESARE BORGIA

By RAFAEL SABATINI. Coloured Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16/- net.

Mr Rafael Sabatini has undertaken the task of telling this tremendous and picturesque story. Ruthless, swift, and terrific does Cesare Borgia appear in the pages of this engrossing biography, yet a man of sound judgment, as just as he was merciless—too just, indeed, for mercy—a subtle statesman and a military genius.

* The only Life of Cesare Borgia printed in English.

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF THE VATICAN By Dr ANGELO S. RAPPAPORT.

Demy 8vo, illustrated 16/- net

His history of Rome and the Popes has often been treated in an exhaustive manner but there is scarcely any authoritative work dealing with the more intimate side of the affairs of the Vatican.

IN THE MAORILAND BUSH By W. H. KOBEL. Illustrated, 12/6 net

DUCHESS DERELICT (The Life and Times of the Wife of Cesare Borgia) By E. L. MIRON. Illustrated, 16/- net

SPAIN REVISITED (A Summer Holiday in Galicia) By C. GASQUOINE HARLEY. Illustrated, 12/6 net

NEW 6/- NOVELS

TWO WORLDS By C. L. ANDREW C. P. HALLARD

CAMILLA FORGETTING HERSELF By H. J. VADEY

MYSTERY OF REDMARSH FARM By ARCHIBALD MAC HALL

THE RED FLEUR-DE-LYS By MAY WYNN

THE ACTIVITIES OF LAVIE JUTT By MARCURELLE AND AMELIE BARCLAY

THE QUALITIES OF MERCY By CECIL ADAIR

LOVE'S OLD SWEET SONG By CLETON BINGHAM

THE BARON OF ILL FAME By HESTER BACON

GOD DISPOSES By ELLIOW HAWKER

THE LONG HAND By SIR WILLIAM MACNAY

RED REVENGE (and 11 others) By CHARLES J. PEARCE

THE DOLL (3rd Edition) By VIOLET HUNT

THE LOVELOCKS OF DIANA (2nd Ed.) By KATE HORN

THE FREE MARRIAGE By KENNEDY SNOWDEN.

STANLEY PAUL & Co., 13, Essex Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

“More than any other living poet Mr. Herbert Trench is the successor of Tennyson; he seems to represent for our generation the dignity of the poetical profession, the magnificent claim of the Poet to be concerned with the highest thought of the time.”

English Review, Jan., 1912.

LYRICS AND NARRATIVE POEMS.

By HERBERT TRENCH.

WITH PHOTOGRAVURE PORTRAIT - 5 - net.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

BOOKS.

Send a card for GLAISHER'S FEBRUARY CATALOGUE of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

MANY EXCELLENT BARGAINS.

— CATALOGUE GRATIS AND POST FREE. —

WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

LITERARY AGENCY.

The Wiener Agency, Ltd., 64, Strand, London, W.C.

EVERY FACILITY for PLACING WORK of all DESCRIPTIONS.

Apply for prospectus free, from—

MANAGER, LITERARY DEPARTMENT.

WANTED.—“BOOKMAN” for December 1911.—

G. E. STECHERT & Co., 2, Star Yard, Carey Street, London, W.C.

THE FIRST NEW NOVELS OF 1912

MESSRS. JOHN LONG'S List of New Novels is compiled with due regard to the prevailing tastes for reading, containing as it does Novels for Men and Women of the World and Novels for those who prefer Literature of the more quiet order

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

Now Ready at all Libraries and Booksellers.

- Two Men and a Governess OLIVIA RAMSEY
The Spindle ELIZABETH HARDEN
Chicane OLIVER SANDYS
The Last Stronghold ILLLEN ADA SMITH
The Secret Tontine R. MURRAY GILCHRIST
A Change of Sex CHARLES KINROSS
A Glorious Lie DOROTHY GERARD
A Fool to Fame J. F. HAROLD TERRY
The Guerdon of Faith MRS. CHAS. MARTIN
Dangerous Dorothy CURTIS YORKE
A Three-Cornered Duel BEATRICE KELSTON
At the Court of IL Moro L. M. STACPOOLE KENNY

JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS.

Messrs. JOHN LONG draw particular attention to the following deeply interesting Works of Biography, History and Travel, large supplies of which are now with the Libraries:—

- The Fair Ladies of Hampton Court. By CLARE JERROLD. Illustrated with Photogravure and other Reproductions from Paintings of the Beauties of the Period. 12s 6d net
Pilgrims to the Isles of Penance: Orchid Gathering in the East. By Mrs TALBOT CLIFFORD. With 54 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map. 12s 6d net
Prince Talleyrand and His Times: From the Reign of Louis XV. to the Second Empire. By FREDERIC LOLILL. English Version by BRYAN O'DONNELL M.A. This work contains material from recently-discovered documents now made public for the first time. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits. 12s 6d net
The House of Teck: A Romance of a Thousand Years. By LOUIS J. BLERMAN. Author of "Hungary and its People," etc. With Photogravure of Her Majesty, over 100 other interesting Portraits, Reproductions of Pictures and Illustrations depicting Family Rites, included in the volume by Special Permission of Her Majesty the Queen. 12s 6d net
The Fair Land of Central America. By MAURICE DE WAILLE. Preface by SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs. 7s 6d net
Many Coloured Mountains and Some Seas Between. A Book of Travel. By EMMA S. BOYD. With coloured frontispiece and several other Illustrations. 7s 6d net
My Recollections of the Sepoy Revolt. By Mrs MUTER. With Portraits, Illustrations, and a Plan. 7s 6d net
Big Game Hunting in North-Eastern Rhodesia. By OWEN LETCHER, FRGS. With Photogravure Portrait of Author, 52 Illustrations from Photographs, and a Map. 12s 6d net
The Seven Richest Heiresses of France. By the COMTE DE SOISSONS. With Photogravure and other Portraits. 12s 6d net

LONDON:

JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

Macmillan's List.

TENNYSON & HIS FRIENDS.

Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON.
With Portraits. 8vo. 10s. net.

The Future of England. By the Hon. GEORGE PEEL. 2nd impression. 8vo. 6s. net.

Ancient Hunters and their Modern Representatives. By W. J. SOLLAS, D.Sc., F.R.S., etc. Illustrated. 8vo. 12s. net.

The Times: "As a survey of our present knowledge of Prehistoric Man this book is absorbingly interesting and suggestive, not only to the student of anthropology, but to the general reader, who will here find the essential geological fact explained in the clearest language."

The Principle of Individuality and Value. The Gifford Lectures for 1911, delivered in Edinburgh University. By BERNARD BOSANQUET, LL.D., D.C.L., 8vo. 10s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Hieronymus Rides: Episodes in the Life of a Knight and Jester at the Court of Maximilian, King of the Romans. By ANNA COLEMAN LADD. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Victories of Olivia and other Stories. By EVELYN SHARP. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. Immediately.

The Healer. By ROBERT HERRICK, Author of "Together," &c. 6s.

The Standard.—"A fine book, the best book Dr. Herrick has so far given us."

NEW TWO SHILLING EDITION OF

The Novels of Maurice Hewlett.

In cloth binding. Crown 8vo. 2s. net each.

*. Two volumes of the series will be issued monthly.

- | | |
|------------------------------|-----------------------|
| 1. The Forest Lovers. | } Immediately. |
| 2. The Queen's Quair. | |

Macmillan's Editions of Dickens' Works.

The WORKS of CHARLES DICKENS.

With Introductions, Biographical and Bibliographical, by CHARLES DICKENS THE YOUNGER.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

American Notes, & Pictures from Italy
Barnaby Rudge
Bleak House
Christmas Books
David Copperfield
Dombey and Son
Great Expectations and Hard Times
Letters of Charles Dickens

Little Dorrit
Nicholas Nickleby
Martin Chuzzlewit
Old Curiosity Shop and Master Humphrey's Clock
Oliver Twist
Our Mutual Friend
Pickwick Papers
Sketches by Boz
Tale of Two Cities

ILLUSTRATED POCKET DICKENS.

Printed on India Paper Fcap. 8vo. With full gilt backs and gilt tops. Limp Cloth, 2s. net. Limp Leather, 3s. net. All the Volumes of the 3s. 6d. Dickens are included in this series, except "American Notes" and the "Letters."

DICKENS. By Adolphus William Ward.

Cr. 8vo. Library Ed. 2s. net. Popular Ed. 1s. 6d. Sewed, 1s. Pocket Edition, 1s. net. [English Men of Letters.]

*. Macmillan's Spring Announcement List post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

N.B. Mr. Heinemann has Ready

ROMANESQUE ARCHITECTURE IN FRANCE. Edited by DR. JULIUS BAUM. With over 250 full-page Illustrations, 4to. 25s. net.

BAROQUE ARCHITECTURE AND SCULPTURE IN ITALY. Edited by CORRADO RICCI. 4to. With over 250 full-page Plates. 25s. net.

A NEW LOGIC. By CHAS. MERCIER, M.D. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

THE LIFE STORY OF J. PIERPONT MORGAN. An Authorised Biography. By CARL HOVEY. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

MOVING PICTURES. By F. A. TALBOT. With 96 pp. of Illustrations, Diagrams, etc. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

THE MODERN PARISIENNE. By OCTAVE UZANNE. Introduction by BARONESS VON HUTTEN. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

Ready Shortly

EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE ART. An Outline History of East Asiatic Design. By E. F. Fenollosa. With over 100 Plates in monochrome and colour. 2 vols. Crown 4to. 36s. net.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF WM. SHARP. Edited by ELIZABETH A. SHARP. Uniform with the Works of Fiona Macleod. In 5 vols., crown 8vo. Each 5s. net. Ready Vol 1 Poems

IMPORTANT RECENT BOOKS

INDIA UNDER CURZON AND AFTER. By LOVAT FRASER. (3rd Imp.) Royal 8vo. 16s. net.

IN NORTHERN MISTS. By Dr. F. NANSEN, G.C.V.O., etc. With Maps, Plans, etc. 2 vols., crown 4to. 30s. net.

THROUGH TRACKLESS LABRADOR. By H. HESKETH PRICHARD. Illustrated. Crown 4to. 15s. net.

ON THE ART OF THE THEATRE. By E. GORDON CRAIG. Illustrated. 6s. net.

"Mr. Craig cannot be read without respect and pleasure; he is such an enthusiast for the theatre, so full of ideas, so charmingly provoking."—Evening Standard.

THE WAR GOD. By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. Small demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

"A great play"—JAS. DOUGLAS. "A noble piece of Art."—WM. ARCHER.

THE GREAT ENGRAVERS.

Artistic Reproductions of their Principal Works. Edited by ARTHUR M. HIND. 2s. 6d. net each.

- | | | |
|----------------------|-----------------------|--------------------------|
| (1) DURER ; | (2) MANTEGNA ; | (3) J. R. SMITH ; |
| (4) WATTEAU ; | (5) GOYA ; | (6) VAN DYCK . |

LITTLE BOOKS ABOUT OLD FURNITURE.

By J. P. BLAKE and A. E. REVEIRS-HOPKINS.

Illustrated. Each 2s. 6d. net.

- | | |
|------------------------------|------------------------|
| (1) TUDOR TO STUART ; | (2) QUEEN ANNE. |
|------------------------------|------------------------|

NEW AND RECENT 6s. NOVELS

HE WHO PASSED (To M. L. G.) ANON.
MAIDS' MONEY MRS. H. DUDENEY

LAURA CAROLINE GROSVENOR

THE REWARD OF VIRTUE (2nd Imp.) AMBER REEVES

A LIKELY STORY WM. DE MORGAN

JUGGERNAUT E. F. BENSON

ZULEIKA DOBSON MAX BEERBOHM

THE PILGRIM KAMANITA KARLGJELLERUP

THE SECRET GARDEN MRS. F. HODGSON BURNETT

(Illustrated in colour. 2nd Imp.)

THE DOP DOCTOR (12th Imp.) RICHARD DEHAN

Ready Shortly.

The PRISON WITHOUT A WALL

RALPH STRAUS

WM. HEINEMANN, 21 BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 245. VOL. XI.I.
Subscription rate 8s. per annum post free.

FEBRUARY, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES ..	225
"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS	230
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY	231
THE READER—
Charles Dickens. By B. W. MATZ ..	233
Charles Dickens and London ..	238
Charles Dickens: Some Personal Recollections and Opinions ..	246
About Poetry. By PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY	256
NEW BOOKS—
Bible Letters of George Borrow By THOMAS SECORRE ..
Three Queens By LEWIS MELVILLE ..	259

The Centaur ..	261
The Resurrection in Ancient Egypt. By A. E. WAILE ..	262
Post-Limnium. By DARRELL FIGGIS ..	263
More Sinned Against—? ..	263
Memoirs of a Highland Lady ..	264
William Allingham. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK ..	264
Songs and Singers. By EDWARD THOMAS ..	265
The War God. By F. G. BETTANY ..	267
A Prize Novel ..	267
Irish Humour ..	268

and White—The Green Curtain The Long Hand The Disputed Marriage—Old Enough to Know Better—The Revoke of Jean Raymond ..	269-270
---	---------

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE

Pastels under the Southern Cross -- Castellinaria and Other Sicilian Diversions -- A Keeper of the Robes -- The Childhood and Youth of Charles Dickens -- Shadows Cast Before -- Myths and Legends of the Celtic Race	271 272
---	---------

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 272

NOVEL NOTES—

The Goal of Fortune—Patches and Pomander—Brown Face
---	--

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration

News Notes.

The March BOOKMAN will be a Lady Thackeray Ritchie Number, and will contain a special article on Lady Ritchie and her work by Lewis Melville. Other important articles in this Number will be "The Eve of the Catholic Emancipation," by Dr. William Barry; "Beaumarchais and Lafayette," by A. W. Evans; "The Rowley Poems," by John H. Ingram; "Nietzsche," by Holbrook Jackson; "Tennyson and his Friends," by Cranstoun Metcalfe; "William Morris," by Edward Thomas; "The New Logic," by Professor John Adams; "Psychology of the Religious Life," by Dr. James Moffatt, etc.

Most of our Dickens pictures are reproduced by permission from Messrs. Chapman & Hall's new edition of Forster's "Life of Charles Dickens." We have already made reference to these two handsome volumes, which are enriched with five hundred illustrations, including numerous portraits of Dickens, his family and friends, facsimiles of his MSS., and photographs and sketches of places associated with him, the whole having been collected, arranged and carefully annotated by Mr. B. W. Matz, to whom and to Messrs. Chapman & Hall we are greatly obliged for the assistance they have kindly given us. Our thanks are also due to Mr. Matz for the loan of the photographs from which we have reproduced our presentation plate and the portrait of Dickens on the cover, the former being from a photograph by John Watkins, the latter from one by Gurney, of New York.

Charles Dickens.

From a sketch by Samuel Laurence in 1837, when "Pickwick" was appearing in monthly parts.

In former issues of THE BOOKMAN we have reproduced a good many selections from the work of Cruikshank, "Phiz," Fred. Barnard, Sir Luke Fildes, Frank Stone, and other of Dickens's early illustrators. He has been illustrated in colour by Frank Reynolds, Cecil Aldin, and several of the younger school of artists, and we have recently reproduced examples of this work. In the

Photo by Violette Cotton.

Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, K.C.

Youngest and only surviving son of Charles Dickens.

present issue, by the courtesy of the Waverley Book Co., the Educational Book Co., Messrs. A. & F. Pears and Messrs. W. Collins we are enabled to reproduce a half-dozen black-and-white illustrations by the latest of Dickens's illustrators.

In addition to the complete works of Dickens that Messrs. Chapman & Hall are now issuing, with all the original illustrations, in their beautiful Centenary Edition, there are charming editions of Dickens, with the original illustrations, published by Messrs. Macmillan; Messrs. Dent have included his works in their "Temple Classics;" Messrs. Blackie have them in two excellent series. Mr. Frowde issues various editions ranging in price from a shilling to three-and-six a volume; and Messrs. Nelson have published several volumes in their wonderfully cheap two-shilling series; the Daily Chronicle publishes a good sixpenny edition; and "Everyman's," the "World's Classics," Cassell's "People's Library," Collins's "Illustrated Pocket Dickens," and practically all the cheap fiction series include most of his novels. To make out anything like an adequate list would be a considerable labour; almost every publisher who has not published some of Dickens's books has published books about him, and many have done both.

The new edition of Dickens that the Waverley Book Co. is issuing contains introductions by Andrew Lang, A. C. Benson, William De Morgan, G. K. Chesterton, Bernard Shaw and other well-known writers; it is illustrated throughout with character-sketches by Charles Pears, and includes beautiful reproductions in colour of the famous character-drawings by Fred Barnard.

Messrs. A. and F. Pears publish a charming edition of Dickens's five Christmas Books, with introductions by Clement Shorter, and illustrations by Charles Green and L. Rossi.

Literature is no longer overlooked as it used to be when titles are being conferred on the distinguished men of the nation, and we warmly congratulate Sir H. Rider Haggard on the honour that has justly fallen to him. He has just added to the long list of books for which we are indebted to him a new novel entitled "Marie," in which he returns to some of the characters and scenes of his early triumphs and tells the story of the first love of the famous Allan Quartermain. The story is published by Messrs. Cassell, who are issuing also a new novel by Mr. Max Pemberton, called "War and the Woman."

Miss Jeannette Marks, the author of "The End of a Song," that was published last autumn by Messrs. Putnam, has been declared one of the winners

Photo by E. O. Hoppe.

Mr. Alfred Tennyson Dickens.

Dickens's fourth son, who died last month in America, where he had been giving a series of readings from his father's books.

Photo by Vandyk

Miss Mary Angela Dickens

Whose new novel, "The Debtor," Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing this month of the prize offered by Lord de Walden for a Welsh drama. It is probable that her two short plays, "The Welsh Honeymoon" and "The Cuckoo," will be produced before long on the London stage.

Miss Mary Angela Dickens, who is well known as the author of several successful novels, is a granddaughter of Charles Dickens. Her father, Charles Dickens the younger, was the novelist's eldest son. Her new novel, "The Debtor," which Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. have in press for immediate publication, centres on the restoration to health of an invalid by a miraculous power. Mary Chichester, a young widow, who has had an unhappy married experience, runs a successful tea-shop in Bond Street. She becomes engaged to Donaldson, a flying man, who, like herself, is an agnostic. Mrs. Chichester falls ill, and is declared by two specialists to be dying of heart disease. She pays a visit to a Catholic friend at Devonshire, who lives in a beautiful old house, to which is attached a simple chapel enshrining a small statue of the Virgin. The invalid prays earnestly before the shrine and is healed. The doctors conclude that their diagnosis was wrong, but one of them is not satisfied and ends by becoming a Catholic. This step causes her to break with Donaldson, and she ends by giving herself up to good work.

Mr. Arnold Bennett is recently home from a visit to America. A farewell dinner given in his honour by Mr. and Mrs. George Harven at the St. Regis Hotel, New York, was attended by a hundred distinguished Americans, including Mrs. Riggs (Kate Douglas Wiggin), Justus Miles Forman, Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Robert Goelet, Frank Craig, Harrison Rhodes, Charles Dana Gibson, Albert Bigelow Paine, John Kendrick Bangs, George H. Doran, Miss Marie Von Vorst and Miss Carolyn Wells. One of the most felicitous speeches was that of Kate Douglas Wiggin, who said: "The approach of Thanksgiving reminds me of a remark of Leigh Hunt, who said he was disposed to say grace for a dozen other things in the day rather than his dinner. This thought has been starting a train of others in my mind this evening. We have a form for blessing food; might we not have a private one for a walk in the woods, a homecoming, an open fire, a child's kiss, the sight of a dear friend, a wide view of sky and sea? Above all, why have we no grace for books, those intellectual and spiritual repasts—a grace for Milton, a grace for Shakespeare? I often think of it when I am reopening an old book or closing a new one, for I am ready to worship a new (authentic) idol as well as an old one. The new idols themselves sometimes have a disturbing way of refusing to bow at the shrines of their older brothers. But after all, you don't suffer keenly when you see your neighbour's idol rocking on its pedestal; for your own never budes a hair's breadth, no matter how fierce the attack! You may outgrow the author you have admired, but you never really outgrow the one you have loved. "However, I don't care what the new idols read, if only they can write! So I shall say in my Thanksgiving grace: 'May the Lord make us truly thankful for a man who has made books of insight, power and beauty rise from the dust and smoke and noise of the "Five Towns"—Arnold Bennett!'"

Photo by Falk, New York.

Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim.

Whose new novel, "Havoc," is published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Another English author who has lately been in America and been most hospitably and enthusiastically entertained there is Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim, whose new novel, "Havoc," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. He was the guest of the St. Botolph Club, at Boston, and the St. Botolphians caricatured him on their menu in the act of playing golf, and printed under it the following brief lyric composed in his honour:

"We've dined full many a famous guest
Within this happy home,
And for each literary fest
We've hammered out a pome.
The mill has creaked and groaned with toil,
Producing just a verse—
The subject was quite bad enough,
The product was still worse.

We never had a cinch in rhyme
Till you turned up, O Oppenheim."

Mr. Keene Abbott.

Author of "A Melody in Silver" (Putnam).

Miss Rose Schuster.

Whose first novel, "The Triple Crown," has just been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

In reviewing that excellent story, "A Melody in Silver," which was published last autumn by Messrs. Putnam, we spoke confidently of its author Keene Abbott as a woman, saying that no man could write about children with such complete understanding. Well, we were wrong. Keene Abbott is a man; he writes largely for the American magazines and is dramatic editor of the Omaha World-Herald. Happily, it seems, we were by no means alone in our guilt; several of our contemporaries fell into the same error, and Mr. Abbott says he is now trying to lead a ladylike existence in order to be worthy of the nice things we said of him, but he is not sure whether we regard him as a delicate young thing or as an old maid; if it is as the latter, he will fiercely resent it, but if we only consider him as "a nice, mild, sweet-tempered old woman (preferably a widow)" he will do his best to forgive us for mislaying his sex. We condole with Mr. Abbott on the fact that he is only a man; but we congratulate him on being the author of a delightful book that few women and fewer men could have written.

Miss Rose Schuster, whose first novel, "The Triple Crown," is published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, is probably one of the youngest novelists who ever had a book accepted. Her story is a romance dealing with the period of the War of the Roses.

A little over a century ago Mrs. Barbauld wrote a remarkable heroic poem, "Eighteen Hundred and Eleven," in which she took the gloomiest view of the conditions of life surrounding her, and in fervently eloquent terms prophesied the downfall of England. The Sunrise Publishing Company, Warrington, has re-issued this poem in a sixpenny volume, with a frontispiece portrait and an admirable critical and biographical introduction by Mr. Arthur Bennett. Mrs. Barbauld was a better poet than prophet, and this interesting philippic of hers should make chastening reading for the pessimists among us who are saying to-day much what she said a hundred years ago.

Photo by Romney, Glasgow.

Miss Maude Little.

Author of "The Children's Bread" (Chatto & Windus).

"The Children's Bread" (Chatto and Windus) is Miss Maude Little's third novel. Her other two, "At the Sign of the Burning Bush" and "A Woman on the Threshold," were published in 1910 and 1911, and not only won golden opinions from the critics but were immediately successful with the public. Miss Little has, happily, had no long struggle for recognition. Her first printed article appeared in 1908 in The Humane Review, to which she has remained an occasional contributor; she had two stories in the Daily Chronicle in 1909, a poem, "The Banshee," in the Spectator for January, 1910, and has won prizes for short stories in the London Quill Club, of which she is a member. She has already made considerable progress with her fourth novel, a study of middle-class life, the scene of which is laid in Glasgow, though the characters are chiefly Irish. She herself is of Irish extraction, but her home has always been in Glasgow.

Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie, whose new book of poems, "Emblems of Love," is published by Mr. John Lane, has had an education which has been more scientific than poetical. His first volume of poems was published some year or so ago by the same publisher, but he has more recently issued two little volumes as a private venture and says that the results show that, with intelligent method, poetry can easily find a profitable market nowadays. He is at present engaged on a poetical drama that will deal poetically with the lives of ordinary folk, and bring out the romance that is inherent in everyday events. He has lately completed a book of metaphysical Pyrrhonism in the form of dialogues that are chiefly fantastic in form, and this will be published shortly by Mr. Martin Secker.

For assistance with the general illustrations in this Number we are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Foulis, Messrs. Hutchinson, Messrs. Chapman & Hall, and Mr. John Murray.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS. FEBRUARY, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- II.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best alphabet after the manner of "A was an Archer who shot at a frog," concerning itself with any well-known living author, the names of his books, their and his leading characteristics, and so forth.
- III.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- IV.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JANUARY.

- I. THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Miss GWENDOLINE JONES, of 2, Mirador Villas, Uplands, Swansea, for the following:
AN ENEMY TO SOCIETY. By G. BRONSON HOWARD.
"To everybody's prejudice I know a thing or two;
I can tell a woman's age in half a minute—and I do."
W. S. GILBERT, Princess Ida.

We also select for printing :

THE HUMAN CRY. BY MRS. DAVID G. RITCHIE.
(Methuen.)

"Had I but plenty of money; money enough and to spare."
BROWNING, Up at a Villa,—down in the City.

(Miss M. Waller, 12, Buckingham Road, North Watford, Herts.)

THE HUMAN CRY.

"What will Mrs. Grundy say?"

THOS. MORTON, Speed the Plough.

(Rosie Speight, Parkdene, Armley, Leeds.)

THE CRITICAL ATTITUDE. BY FORD MADOX HUEFFER
(Duckworth.)

"The Carpenter said nothing but

"The butter's spread too thick."

LEWIS CARROLL, The Walrus and the Carpenter.

(Richard Goodfellow, 4, Morehampton Road, Dublin.)

THE DRUNKARD. BY GUY THORNE.

"There was a door to which I found no key."

OMAR KHAYYAM'S Rubáiyát.

(Violet L. Watkin, The Raven, Flint, North Wales.)

NO SURRENDER. CONSTANCE E. MAUD. (Duckworth.)

"For when his legs were smitten off

He fought upon his stumps."

Chevy Chase.

(Miss M. Hurlbutt, Queensferry Hall, Queens-ferry, Chester.)

A SOCIETY MOTIFER. BY EDMUND BOSANQUET.

(John Long.)

"At every word a reputation dies."

POPE, Rape of the Lock.

(Miss H. R. Wood, Glenlyon, Harrow.)

II.—We are dividing the Prize for the best new NURSERY RHYME, and are sending Two New Books to Miss FLORENCE M. WILSON, of The Greenan, Ballyholme, Bangor, Co. Down; and Two New Books to Mr. C. M. WALKERDINE, of 32, Crompton Road, Handsworth, Birmingham, for the following :

"I looked out at my Lady Moon,

Out of my mother's house,

And oh! she stepped in her milk-white shoon,

As soft as a peeping mouse!

But though she travels so far, so far,

She'll have to turn back again, -

And lock her door with a silver star,

And hide from the wind and the rain."

FLORENCE M. WILSON.

"Little Miss Pretty-toes,

What would you do,

If your shoes should wear out,

And your toes should come through?

"Count them all gaily,"

From one up to ten;

Then run to the cobbler's

For new shoes again." C. M. WALKERDINE

We also specially commend the NURSERY RHYMES sent in by Olivia Connolly (Brockley), N. Brown (North Shields), H. A. Cole (Newtownards), Miss E. Close (Hove), Charles Webb (King's Lynn), Miss F. Briggs (Crown Hill), Miss A. J. Briggs (Crown Hill), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Brighton), H. Caby (Fordham), L. White (West Ham), Rev. E. C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), R. H.
Evans (Constantinople), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Ethel M. Odell (Forest Gate), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), L. Port (Clapton), M. A. Newman (Badingham), R. S. Wyatt (Victoria Park), E. M. Karn (Gloucester),
Miss Porter (Ipswich), Miss G. D. Moore (Bolton), John
A. Scott (Hampstead), Phyllis Morris (Hove), Richard
P. McCoy (Gillingham), T. Gibson (Bolton), Rev. T. A.
Lindsay (Inverness), Miss M. M. Nicholson (Bridlington), Raymond Taunton (Coventry), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), Marie R.
Brown (Glasgow), Vivian Ford (Clifton), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), George K.
Grice (Alnwick), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), Mrs. Alice Binks (Westoe), Hester Travers Smith (Dublin), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), George Stanton (Leicester), Hilda M. Dowden (Dublin), Sarah Edmunds
Bell (Dublin), Evelyn Perres (Ramsgate), E. A. Pearson
(Fleet), Muresyn Appleby (Southend), E. Irene Seaton

(Boxmoor), Miss S. M. Northcott (West Kirby), M. C.
Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), Josephine Gregory (Bradford), Marion Burd (Solihull), Miss E. Browne (Royston),
S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), Miss B. M. Bennett
(E. Southsea), S. C. Smith (New Cross), L. M. Wagstaff (Leighton Buzzard), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), J. Swinscon (Tunbridge Wells), F. W. Lawfield (Sawston), J. Donald Malcom (Bacup), Mrs. J. E. M.
Featherstonehaugh (Rotherfield), L. A. Spilsbury (Hoylake), E.M.E. (Nottingham), Miss B. M. Wigglesworth (Sandhurst), Miss E. L. Conyers (Ben Rhydding).

III.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mrs. JOHN ADAMS, of 23, Tanza Road, Hampstead, N.W., for the following :

FELLOW PRISONERS. BY R. K. WEEKES. (Alston Rivers.)

This book grips one from the start; indeed, the end of Chapter I. is as dramatic as anything we have read for long. The author evidently knows prison life and routine well, and writes with insight. The story is in fugue, and is admirably managed.
The crippled villain is drawn with restraint, as, indeed, are all the characters, except Sybil Lenanton, the Girton don, who remains to the end, an extremely unconvincing figure. The style is excellent, the dialogue crisp and not too clever, and the interest is sustained to the last page. Certainly a book to read and remember.

Other good reviews received are :

THE BELLE OF SANTIAGO. BY G. B. BURGIN.
(Hutchinson.)

Mr. Burgin seems imbued with a spirit of true romance.
"The Belle of Santiago" is a worthy successor to his other novels, both in delicacy of treatment and ingenuity of plot.
The latter is out of the ordinary yet not wholly confined to the realms of fancy. The story, with its refreshing absence of present-day worldliness, has great charm; the atmosphere of romance which pervades the book, the passionate love of Señorita Mercedes, the honourable selfless devotion of Don Lopez, and the delightful union of Antony's son and Mercedes' daughter cannot fail to give pleasure to the twentieth century reader.

(Dorothy Smith, 78, Gravelly Hill, Birmingham.)

TANTE. BY ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK. (Edwin Arnold)

A masterly study of a musical genius of superficial charm, but appalling selfishness. Mrs. Sedgwick is to be congratulated upon the manner in which she has portrayed, with unflinching conviction, the fascination and villainy, yet withal pitifulness, of her heroine, entirely avoiding that irritating, though common, fault of continually thrusting before her readers the particular "points" of her story. Perhaps the infantile simplicity of Karen—who shares the post of heroine with her guardian—is a little wearying, but in Mrs. Talcott we have a perfect and unique picture of patient faithfulness, and in Gregory a fine specimen of straightforward manliness.

(Margery Wilkins, Utttoxeter.)

DAN RUSSEL THE FOX. BY E. C. SOMERVILLE and MARTIN ROSS. (Methuen)

If it were not that the authors definitely say there is no such thing, we should have classed this book as a sporting novel.
Sport and fiction run side by side through the tale, converging at critical moments. The most praiseworthy feature is the character drawing. John Michael is the exact contrast to his step-brother the M.F.H.; Mrs. Delanty is the usual clever widow who hunts for both foxes and a husband. Fanshawe, again, is the customary quarry of such, with money and no brains. But the heroine, Katharine, is altogether charming.
We should like another "episode" in her life.

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath.)

Of the numerous other reviews sent in (several of which are as good as some we have printed), we particularly commend those of E. C. Luin (Stamford Hill), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), Alice M. Morgan
(Sheffield), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone), Miss Bond (Pinner), Alice Mullins (Hampstead), M. A. Newman (Badingham), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), Miss J. A.
Jenkins (Liverpool), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough),
Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), A. Eleanor Pinnington
(Brighton), Florence Karn (Gloucester), Miss A. S. M.
Sopwith (Handsworth), I. Harrison (Bristol), William F.
Robinson (Cambridge), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow),
Naomi Isaac (Hove), Mrs. Chas. Wright (Sutton), J.
Ewance Griffiths (Warrington), Vivien Ford (Bristol),
George Stanton (Leicester).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO
"THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mrs. H. H.
PENROSE, of Deepcut Bungalow, Frimley Green, Surrey.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

February 1st to March 1st, 1912.

Messrs. George Allen & Co. (Incorporating Swan, Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd.)

- AUDSLEY, DR. G. C.—Amateur Joinery. No. 3 of Allen's Technical and Art Manuals. 4s. 6d. net.
 BINGHAM, DR.—Words to Wives. 3s. 6d. net.
 BURTON, LT.-COL. R. G.—Napoleon's Campaigns in Italy. No. 15 in Special Campaign Series. 5s. net.
 COX, REV. J. CHARLES, LL.D., F.S.A.—The Churches of Cornwall. No. 5 of County Church Series. 2s. 6d. net.
 DURANT, WM. SCOTT.—Chaucer Redivivus. 6d. net.
 FOGERTY, MISS ELSIE.—Love's Labour Lost. Adapted for Amateur Performance in Girls' Schools. Words only, 6d. net; Costume Edition, 2s. 6d. net.
 SEWELL, ROBERT.—Indian Chronography. 3rs. 6d. net.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

- MOSES, BELLE.—Charles Dickens: A Study of the Life of the great Novelist in relation to his Girl Heroines and his appeal to Girl Readers. 5s.
 NORTH, S. N. D., LL.D. (Editor).—The American Year Book for 1911. 15s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- BESANT, SIR WALTER.—South London: Completing the Survey of London. 30s. net.

Messrs. Wm. Blackwood & Sons.

- CALIWELL, J. M.—Old Irish Life. 10s. net.
 FORREST, G. W., C.I.E.—History of the Indian Mutiny. Vol. III. 20s. net.
 LINDSAY, REV. JAMES, D.D.—New Essays: Literary and Philosophical. 6s. net.
 LINDSAY, REV. JAMES, D.D.—Literary Essays. 3s. 6d. net.
 MACLEOD, OLIVE.—Sultans and Cities of Central Africa. Profusely Illustrated.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- ANSELL, MARY.—The Happy Garden. 6s. net.
 AYRES, RUBY M.—Castles in Spain. 6s.
 BARKER, ALDRED F., M.Sc., and PRIESTLEY, E.—Wool Carding and Comb-ing. 5s. net.
 COULEVAIN, PIERRE DE.—The Heart of Life. 6s.
 HOCK NG, JOSEPH.—The Woman of Babylon. 1s. net.
 MACKAY, ISABEL ECCLESTONE.—The House of Windows. 6s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—Lady Molly. 1s. net.
 PAIN, HARRY.—Exit Enza. 1s. net.
 PRAED, MRS. CAMPBELL.—The Body of His Desire. 6s.
 PRYCE, GWENDOLEN.—A Long Shadow. 6s.
 ROBERTS, REV. RICHARD.—The Resurgence of Faith. 6s.
 THOMAS, H. H.—The Complete Gardener. 10s. 6d. net.
 TOWNSEND, GEORGE A.—Practical Rabbit Keeping. 3s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, MRS. HELEN H.—The Open Valley. 6s.
 WOTTON, MISS MABEL L.—H. B. Irving. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- AUDOUX, MARGUERITE.—Valseme. 6s.
 COKE, DESMOND.—The Cure: a Psychologie Faïce. 6s.
 HAMEL, FRANK.—The Lady of Beauty. 15s. net.
 O'KANE, W. M.—The King's Luck. 6s.
 ROGERS, SIR JOHN.—Sport in Vancouver and Newfoundland. 7s. 6d. net.
 STRIGIENSKI, CASIMIR.—The Daughter of Louis XV. 10s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—George Borrow. 10s. 6d. net.
 YOUNG, ERNEST.—Finland, the Land of a Thousand Lakes. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- BENHAM, MARION AYESHA.—The Truth about a Nunnery. The Story of Five Years in a Paris Convent School. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Leonora: A Novel. Cheap Edition, 2s. net.
 FITZGERALD, PERCY.—Borwell's Autobiography. With 8 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 HYATT, ALFRED H.—Illustrated in Colour by HAROLD SUND.—The Charm of Venice. A New Edition. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 PERRIN, ALICE.—Idolatri: A Novel. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
 STERNE, LAURENCE.—Illustrated by T. H. ROBINSON.—A Sentimental Journey. Cheap Edition. 2s. net and 1s. net.
 STEVENSON, ROBERT LOUIS.—Records of a Family of Engineers. 6s.
 STONE, CHRISTOPHER.—The Shoe of a Horse: A Romance. 6s.
 SYRETT, NETTA.—The Endless Journey, etc.: Stories. 6s.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

- FARNELL, LEWIS, D.Litt.—Greece and Babylon: A Comparative Sketch of Mesopotamian, Anatolian, and Hellenic Religions. 7s. 6d.
 SMITH, PROFESSOR J. M.P., WARD, W. H. D.D., LL.D., and BEWER, PROFESSOR J. A.—Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Obadiah, and Joel (International Critical Commentary). 12s. 6d.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- ALLEN, F. B.A.—Tennyson: Enoch Arden. 1s.
 COLLINS, A. J. F., M.A., and GOGGIN, S. E., M.A.—Milton: Paradise Lost. Books 3 and 4. 1s. 6d.
 DUFFIN, H. C., M.A.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night. 2s.
 MOFFATT, C. W., PAGET, M.A., M.B., B.C.—Science: French Course. 3s. 6d.
 STEWART, R. W., D.Sc., and SATTERLY, JOHN, D.Sc., M.A.—Senior Sound and Light. (For the Cambridge Senior Local Examination.) 4s.

Mr. Henry Frowde.

- DELONEY, THOMAS.—The Works of. Edited by F. O. Mann.
 KEITH, A. B.—Responsible Government in the Dominions.
 MADAN, F.—The Early Oxford Press. New Edition.
 TACITUS.—Histories. Translated by W. H. Fyfe (Oxford Library of Translations).
 TOWNSEND, AURELIAN.—Poem and Masque. Edited by E. K. Chambers.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

- CLEEVE, LUCAS.—The Love Seekers. 6d.
 CONSTANTINE, ANNA.—Yesterday. 6s.
 FRANCE, ANATOLE.—Thais. 1s. net.
 GILBERT, FRED.—The Joys of Jones. 6s.
 GULL, C. RANGER.—Black Honey. 6s.
 GULL, C. RANGER.—The Glad Eye. 1s. net.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—The Tangled Skein. 6d.
 THORNE, GUY.—The Drunkard. 6s.
 WARDEN, FLORENCE.—The Beauty Doctor. 1s. net.
 WYNNE, MAY.—Hey for Cavalier! 6s.

Messrs. G. G. Harrap & Co.

- CABOT, EMMA L.—Character Training: A Graded Series of Lessons in Ethics. 2s. 6d. net.
 HUDSON, W. H.—Milton and his Poetry. 1s. net.
 KERSCHENSTEINER, DR. GEORG.—Education for Efficiency. With Introduction by Dr. Michael Sadler. 2s. 6d. net.
 LAURIE, A.—Mémoires d'un Collégien. Edited with Notes and Vocabulary by O. B. Super. 1s. 6d.
 MERCER, A.—Business English and Routine. 1s. 6d. net.
 MORGAN, A. E.—Scott and his Poetry. 1s. net.
 ROYDS, KATHLEEN E.—Mrs. Browning and her Poetry. 1s. net.
 WIMBOLT, S. E.—Spenser and his Poetry. 1s. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- BRYANT, MARGUERITE.—The Adjustment. 6s.
 CANNAN, GILBERT.—Little Brother. 6s.
 JACOMB, A. E.—Esther. 6s.
 HERBERTSON, J. L.—Borrowers of Fortune. 6s.
 TAUBMAN-GOLDIE, V.—Marjorie Stevens. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Old Wives Tale. 6s.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Love in a Snare. 6s.
 GERARD, MORICE.—Crenland Castle. 6s.
 MARCHEMONT, A. W.—The Ruby Heart of Kishgar. 6s.
 OXENHAM, JOHN.—Queen of the Guarded Mounts. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—The Gifted Name. 6s.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—The Coward. 6s.
 CHANNON, E. M.—Stonladies. 6s.
 CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—The Arrival of Anthony. 6s.
 DICKENS, M. A.—The Debtor. 6s.
 HAMILTON, COSMO.—The Outpost of Eternity. 6s.
 HUTTON, BARONESS VON.—Sharrow. 6s.
 JEPSON, EDGAR.—The House on the Mall. 6s.
 LANGTON, ROBERT.—The Childhood and Youth of Charles Dickens. New Edition. 6s.
 LE BLOND, MRS. AUDREY.—Charlotte Sophie, Countess Beutinck. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—In Cotton Wool. 6s.
 MCCABE, JOSEPH.—The Story of Evolution. 7s. 6d. net.
 MELVILLE, LEWIS.—Caroline of Brunswick. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 WEEDEN, THE REV. E. ST. CLAIR.—A Year with the Gackwar of Baroda. 1 vol., illustrated, 16s. net. Ad

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

- COLVIN, IAN D.—The Cape of Adventure.
 JACK, FLORENCE B.—Cakes, Hot Puddings. Domestic Arts Series.
 JACK, FLORENCE B.—Cooking for Invalids. 2s. net.
 MEW, EGAN.—Chinese; Dresden; Japanese; Old Bow. Royal Sevens; Chelsea and Derby-Chelsea. Masterpieces of Handicraft Series. 1s. 6d. net each.
 TURKAYNE, A. A.—Monograms and Ciphers. 2s. 6d. net.
 WHITTEN, WILFRED.—London Stories. Vol. I. 6s. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

- ADAMS, MRS. L.F.T.H.—Colour-Sergeant No. 1 Co. New Edition. 1s. net.
 BARTON, F. TOWNEND, M.R.C.V.S.—Cattle, Sheep and Pigs. Their Practical Breeding and Keeping. 7s. 6d. net.
 DE WINDT, HARRY.—A Woman in Black. 1s. net.
 HENDERSON, FRID.—The Labour Unrest: What it is and what it Portends. 2s. 6d. net.
 MIDDLETON, REV. ROBERT.—Not Far Off, or, The Gathering Signs of Christ's Speedy Return. 1s. net.
 MIDDLETON, REV. ROBERT.—Great Grandmother's Recipe Book. Paper, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.
 MITCHELL, GEO. H., Ex-Police Constable.—More Ballads in Blue. 2s. 6d. net.
 PLATTS, W. CARTER.—Angling done here. New Edition. 1s. net.
 QUEEN OF ROUMANIA.—Translated by A. W. EXNER.—Poems by Carmen Sylva. 2s. 6d. net. Leather. 4s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- ADAMS, H. C.—Women and Crime. 10s. 6d. net.
 COLLINS, C. W.—Great Love Stories from the Theatre. 12s. 6d. net.
 COX, KENYON.—A Classic Point of View: Lectures on Painting. 6s. net.
 HAY-EDWARDS.—Chifford's Inn. 1s. net.
 HERZ, DR. MAX.—New Zealand. 12s. 6d. net.
 STEARNS, FRANK P.—The Midsummer of Italian Art. 6s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

- ALLINGHAM, WILLIAM.—Arranged by HELEN ALLINGHAM.—By the Way. A Collection of Short Poems, Fragments and Notes.
 A Peasant Sage of Japan: The Life and Work of Sontoku Ninomiya. Translated from the Hotokuki by Tadasu Yoshimoto. With an Introduction by J. Estlin Carpenter, D. Litt. And an Appreciation by Kosuke Tomeoka, Secretary of the Hotokuki Society. 4s. 6d. net.
 BOUTROUX, EMILE.—William James. Authorised Translation by Archibald Henderson.
 CHEYNE, SIR W. WATSON and BURCHARD F. F.—A Manual of Surgical Treatment. New Edition, entirely revised and largely re-written. Vol. I. With 223 Illustrations. 21s. net.
 HOLBERG, LUDVIG (BARON HOLBERG).—Three Comedies: (Henry and Pernilla; Captain Bombastes Thunderton; Scatterbrains). Translated from the Danish by Lt.-Col. H. W. L. Hime.
 MOOKERJI, RADHAKUMUD.—Indian Shipping: A History of Indian Shipping and Maritime Activity from the Earliest Times. 7s. 6d. net.
 SLATTERY, CHARLES LEWIS, D.D.—Alexander Viets Griswold Allen, 1841-1908.
 TREVELYAN, R. GHT HON. SIR GEORGE OTTO, BART., O.M.—George the Third and Charles Fox: The Concluding Part of "The American Revolution." In 2 Vols. Vol. I., with Map, 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

BELLOC-LOWNDES, MRS.—The Chink in the Armour. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—A Man from the North. New Edition. 6s.
 BOWEN, MARJORIE.—The Quest of Glory. 6s.
 DANBY, FRANK.—Joseph in Jeopardy. 6s.
 DOYLE, CONAN.—Round the Red Lamp. New Edition. 1s. net.
 HIND, A. M.—Rembrandt's Etchings: Classics of Art. Two vols. 21s. net.
 LYDEKKER, R.—The Ox. 6s.
 Macbeth: Arden-Shakespeare. Edited by H. Cunningham. 2s. 6d. net.
 MALET, LUCAS.—Sir Richard Calmady. New Edition. 2s. net.
 NEVILL, LADY DOROTHY.—Under Five Reigns. New Edition. 1s. net.
 OGG, DAVID.—Cardinal de Retz. 6s. net.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—Fire in Stubble. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, A. M.—The Life and Work of Frank Holl. 12s. 6d. net.
 SNAITH, J. C.—The Principal Girl. 6s.
 SWABEY, HILDA M.—The Chief Commissioner. 6s.
 WEBLING, PEGGY.—Felix Christie. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

BENSON, E. F.—Room in the Tower. 6s.
 CLOUSTON, J. STORER.—His First Offence. 6s.
 CLOUSTON, J. STORER.—The Peer's Progress. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 COLE, SOPHIE.—The Thornbush near the Door. 6s.
 GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—The Love Story of a Mormon. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—Sons of State. 6s.
 HAMILTON, LORD ERNEST.—Involunt. 7s. 6d. net.
 KNOWLES FOSTER, FRANCES G.—The Written Law. 6s.
 LEBLANC, MAURICE.—The Frontier. 6s.
 TROUBRIDGE, LADY.—The Girl with the Blue Eyes. 6s.
 WRENCH, MRS. STANLEY.—Ruth of the Rowldrich. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

ANSON, CAPTAIN WALTER V., R.N.—Life of Admiral Lord Anson.
 ARMITAGE, MRS. E.—Early Norman Castles. With Drawings by D. H. Montgomerie. 15s. net.
 BANCROFT, LADY.—The Shadow of Neeme. 6s.
 FLETCHER, C. R. L.—The Making of Western Europe. With Maps.
 GLASPELL, SUSAN.—The Visioning. 6s.
 HOWORTH, SIR HENRY H., K.C.I.E.—The Birth of the English Church: Gregory the Pope, and Augustine the Archbishop.
 JENKINS, HERBERT.—Life of George Borrow, compiled from unpublished official documents: His Works, Correspondence, etc. 10s. 6d. net.
 MACAULAY, MISS R.—Views and Vagabonds. 6s.
 MACKELLAR, C. D.—Scented Isles and Coral Gardens. With Coloured and many other illustrations. 15s. net.
 NEVILL, CAPTAIN H. L., R.F.A., D.S.O.—Campaigns on the North-West Frontier of India. 15s. net.
 OWEN, SIDNEY J.—The Decline and Dissolution of the Moghul Empire.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Forest on the Hill. 6s.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Iscarlot. A poem, with illustrations.
 ROUTH, E. M. G., F.R.Hist.S.—Tangier: England's Lost Atlantic Outpost, 1661-1684. With numerous illustrations.
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part VIII. 21s. net.
 WRIGHT-HENDERSON, R. W.—Annabel and Others. 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Son.

CHESTERTON, G. K.—Manalive. 2s. net.
 DE WINDT, H.—From Paris to New York by Land. 1s. net.
 DICKENS, CHARLES.—David Copperfield. Vol. I., 6s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Le Rhin. 2 Vols. 1s. net each.
 "Q" (A. QUILLER-ROUCH).—True Tilda. 7d. net.
 WARD, MRS. HUMPHRY.—Eleanor. 7d. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co.

Nisbet's Medical Directory, 1912. 8s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, REV. JOHN (IAN MACLAREN).—Children of the Resurrection. 2s. net, cloth; 3s. net, leather.
 WILKINSON, W. CAMAC, M.D.—Tuberculin in the Diagnosis and Treatment of Tuberculosis. 21s. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

BUTLER, REV. D., D.D.—Unity, Peace and Charity: A Tercentenary Tribute to Archbishop Leighton. 1s. net.
 The Churches' Task in Social Reform: Report of the Proceedings of the United Free Church Congress on Social Problems held in Edinburgh, 31st October and November, 1911. Cloth, price, 1s. 6d. net; paper covers, 1s. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

AITKEN, ALF. BRUNTON.—The Garden of Adam. 2s. net.
 ARMYTAGE, H.—Darwin and the Bible. 6s. net.
 BALFOUR, ETHEL.—In Time's Storerooms. 6s.
 BECHAMP, A.—The Blood and its Third Anatomical Element. 6s. net.
 BOWER, H. M.—The Temple of Demos. 6s.
 CAMERON, MRS. LUCY.—Hearts and Spades. 2s. 6d. net.
 FIELD, GEORGE.—Four Months. 2s. net.
 FRASER, MRS. ALICK.—The Minister's Marriage. 6s.
 FRASER, PROFESSOR J. NELSON, M.A.—In Foreign Lands. 7s. 6d. net.
 "ISHBEL."—Where the Hedgerows End. 1s. net.
 MANSEL, SIR COURTENAY, BART.—Masque of King Charles VI. 2s. 6d. net.
 MUSGROVE, CHARLES D.—The Voice of the Siren. 6s.
 "NOMAD."—The Woman Decides. 6s.
 POPHAM, R. B., F.R.C.P.E., F.L.S.—Finger Posts to Animal Life. 5s. net.
 SADLER, MRS.—The Bothers of Married Life. 2s. net.
 STOCK, E. ELLIOT.—Land of the Lord's Marchers. 5s. net.
 SMART, A. D.—The Chief of St. Donat's. 2s. net.
 TROTTER, CANON E. B., M.A., V.D.—The Royal Progress of our Lord. 5s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN.—The Motor Book. 10s. 6d. net.
 BAKER, CAPTAIN GRANVILLE.—A Winter Holiday in Portugal. 12s. 6d. net.
 BEDFORD, LOUISA.—Maids in Many Moods. 6s.
 BROUGHTON, RHODA.—Between Two Stools. 6s.
 DIEHL, ALICE M.—Their Wedded Wife. 6s.
 DRUMMOND, HAMILTON.—The Three Envelopes. 6s.
 DUNCAN, SAKAH JEANETTE.—The Consort. 6s.
 GREEN, E. EVERATT.—Duckworth's Diamonds. 6s.
 LAFFIN, MRS. DE COUREY.—A Book of Short Plays. 2s. 6d. net.
 LLOYD, J. A. T.—A Great Russian Realist. 10s. 6d. net.
 LORIMER, NORMA.—Second Woman. 6s.
 McIVROY, CHARLES.—Brazen Faces. 6s.
 SLADEN, DOUGLAS.—The Unholy Estate. 6s.
 STEVENSON, PHILIP.—Love in Armour. 6s.
 SYMONS, BERYL.—Priest and Prince. 6s.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BAYLEY, E. J.—Drapery Business Organisation: Management and Accounts. 2s. net.
 BERRY, A. J.—Europe's Childhood and Growth. 2s.
 BITHELL, J.—Commercial German Grammar. 2s. 6d. net.
 COLLAR, G.—Industrial and Social History. 2s.
 GARNETT, LUCY M. J.—Mysticism and Magic. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 HEBLIS, F.—The Theory and Practice of Commerce. Vol. 1., 2s. 6d. net.
 HOLLAND, R. W., M.A., B.Sc.—Law of Contract. 1s. 6d. net.
 HOLLAND, R. W., M.A., B.Sc.—Shipping Shorthand Writer's Phrase Book and Guide. 1s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, G. F.—Rural Handicrafts. 2s. 6d. net.
 LEAHER, J. A., B.A., LL.B. (Lond.)—Pitman's Commercial Encyclopedia, and Dictionary of Business. Vol. I. Cloth, 7s. 6d. net; Half leather, 10s. 6d. net.
 LONGFORD, PROFESSOR J. H.—Japan of the Japanese (Countries and People's Series). 6s. net.
 PARKER, JOHN.—Who's Who in the Theatre. Cloth, 6s. net; leather, 8s. 6d. net.
 RANKIN, H. A.—Pastel Work, or Colour with Crayons. 32 Coloured Plates. 4s. net.
 RUTTER, W. P.—Examination Notes on Geography. 1s. net.
 SHALEY, THE REV. VERNON.—Considerations for Lent. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.
 SHAW, FLORENCE.—Needlework Manuals. Books 3, 4, and 5. Each, 3d. net.
 SPENCER, F. H.—Students' Guide to Political Economy. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

MACKELLAR, DORA, and BEDFORD, RUTH.—The Little Blue Devil. 6s.
 McNAIR, L. J., M.A.—A Guide to the Study of English History. Part I., 1s. net.
 PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—A Fairy Land Forlorn. 6s.
 WESTRUP, WILL.—The Impossible Ideal. 6s.

Messrs. Sampson, Low, Marston & Co.

CAMPBELL, DR. WILFRED, and DR. BRYCE.—The Scotsman in Canada. 21s. net.
 KEITH, J. GRAY.—The Human Eye. 21s. net.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

DANSON, CHARLES.—The Mirror of Oxford: A Catholic History of Oxford, with many illustrations. 3s.
 GASNET, ABBOT.—Abbot Wallingford: An Examination of the Relations of St. Albans with Cardinal Morton. 2s. net.
 MESCHLER, M., S.J.—The Humanity of Jesus. Translated from the German. 2s. 6d. net.
 SPILLMAN, JOSEPH.—Valiant and True: A Tale of the French Revolution. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

ALLEN, REV. ROLAND, M.A.—Missionary Methods: St. Paul's or Ours. 1s. net.
 CHADWICK, REV. W. EDWARD, D.D.—Through Discipline to Victory: Instructions for Lent, Holy Week, and Easter.
 JOYNT, REV. CANON R. C.—The Message of the Church. 3s. 6d. net.
 LITTON, THE LATE REV. E. A.—Introduction to Dogmatic Theology on the Basis of the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England. 10s. 6d. net.
 LYTTELTON, REV. THE HON. EDWARD.—Character and Religion. 5s. net.
 OTTLEY, REV. R. L.—The Rule of Faith and Hope. 5s. net.
 PLUMMER, REV. ALFRED, D.D.—The Churches in Britain. Vol. 2. 5s. net.
 ROSTRON, REV. S. EDOUARD, D.C.L.—The Christology of St. Paul. 5s. net.
 WALPOLE, RIGHT REV. C. H. S.—The People's Prayer Book. 2s. 6d. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co.

BITHELL, J., M.A.—Contemporary French Poetry. 1s.
 IBSEN, HENRIK.—Rosmersholm; A Doll's House; and The Lady from the Sea. 1s. net.
 TAYLOR, DUNCAN.—The Composition of Matter, and the Evolution of Mind. 3s. 6d.
 TOLSTOY, COUNT.—Where Love is, there God is also; The Godson; What Men Live by; If you neglect the Fire you don't put it out; and What shall it Profit a Man? 1s. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

BOJER, JOHAN.—Treacherous Ground. 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BOREL, HEWIN.—The New China: A Traveller's Impressions. 10s. 6d. net.
 CRAWFORD, MARY CAROLINE.—Goethe and his Women Friends. 10s. 6d. net.
 D'OLLONE, VISCONTI.—The Forbidden China: An Account of the D'OLLONE Mission, 1906-9. 22s. 6d. net.
 DULOF, O. J., and DENMAN, R. D.—English Apprenticeship and Child Labour: A History. 10s. 6d. net.
 HARDY, REV. E. J.—The Unvarying East: Modern Scenes and Ancient Scriptures. 7s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, WALTER.—Wimbledon Common: Its Geology, Antiquities and Natural History. 5s. net.
 LIVEN, HERBERT M.—Earth and Her Children. 5s. net.
 LOUNSBURY, T. R.—The Early Literary Career of Robert Browning. 4s. 6d. net.
 LUMSDEN, JAMES.—Our National Food Supply. 1s. net.
 WINTER, WILLIAM.—Shakespeare on the Stage. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

"A MOTHER."—More Than Minutes with Mothers. 1s. net.
 HELLIS, NELLIE.—Where the Brook and River Meet (The "White" Library Series). 1s. net.
 NEWBOLT, REV. CANON W. C. E.—Confirmation. 6d. net.
 OWEN, REV. CANON E. C.—The Plain Man's Creed. 2s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, REV. SIDNEY.—The Heavenly Way: A Book for the Aged. 1s. net.
 RUSSELL, GEO. W. E.—One Look Back. 10s. 6d. net.
 STACPOOLE, MISS FLORENCE.—The Mother's Book: On the Rearing of Healthy Children. 1s. net.
 WALE, J. CHARLES.—Porches and Fountains. 10s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

CHARLES DICKENS.

SOME DESULTORY NOTES.

BY B. W. MATZ.

THE literary atmosphere of the last few months has been permeated with Dickens. Readers of every nationality have been turning to his books again—some persons have made acquaintance with them for the first time. In the process one has come across a Philistine or two, who, being of the latter category and having chosen the story of "Oliver Twist" to start with, has exhibited in his conversation a burning desire to "tick it off" in a twelve-line review after the present fashion of criticising novels, half-read and undigested. Such a judge is quite satisfied with himself if he has discovered a few faults in the construction of the story, and having entirely overlooked the many qualities which have made it the great book it is, he presumes to stand aghast at the novelist's popularity, and to wonder how it was ever attained. He is not really serious; a little pedantic perhaps, as befits the modern manner, but easily and willingly forgiven, and perhaps as easily convinced that the test of time is after all the best, the absolute touchstone of greatness.

Speaking generally the books of Dickens—almost all of them—have stood this final test, and although there may be—indeed we know there are—certain readers who say that they do not care for them, as there are persons who have yet to learn the fascination of golf or the pleasure of eating asparagus, it is an indisputable fact that the reverse is the prevalent and popular opinion, and the fact remains that Dickens's books have never lost their hold on the English-speaking race, or for the matter of that upon any other race into whose language they have been translated. His reputation as the most popular novelist in the history of literature is, at the moment of the celebration of the centenary of his birth, actually at its highest, with no indication of its being sullied in the immediate future.

There have been in the past those, who, whilst admiring his greatness at the time, have predicted an eventual eclipse of his genius. The case of the critic in the Quarterly Review in 1837, who, speaking of Dickens's undoubted qualities at that time, predicted that, having gone up like a rocket, he would come down like a stick, will be remembered. On the other hand, an American critic said sixty years ago, in remarking how solidly Dickens's reputation was established, that "the deluge of swashy literature may pass over it, the wind's shallow waves of changing fashion, or superstition, or politics, without shaking it; because it is founded on a rock. . . . In short, the works of this author . . . shall be admired at some later day, not on account of antiquity, but in spite of it; because they have set forth nothing less general than the truth of nature, and appeal to all men by a common bond."

To-day we know the truth: posterity has inherited the treasure of his books, and on the brink of the centenary of his birth no one denies posterity's right, even if some cavil at it.

For many months past all eyes have been fixed on the day—February 7th, 1912—particularly those of the student and enthusiast: and it had been hoped that the anniversary would see permanently established in London something of a practical nature and value connected with Dickens's name, such as one of his London homes secured to the nation, as Shakespeare's at Stratford, Carlyle's in Chelsea, or Scott's at Abbotsford; and the present writer expressed a hope in the pages of THE BOOKMAN for November, 1910, that some such scheme might be consummated this year. But other schemes have taken the place in the public eye which such a scheme required, and so we have had to bow our heads and wait awhile.

Charles Dickens, 1868.

However, whether or not the year of Dickens's centenary comes and goes, leaving nothing behind of a tangible form as a connecting link between his greatness and his association with his own great city, there is every indication that the nation is proud of its heritage, and that so unexampled a genius will retain the affection

Photo by Ben Gurney, New York.

John Dickens.

Father of the Novelist. From a painting by John W. Gilbert, in the possession of Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, K.C.

Elizabeth Dickens.

Mother of the Novelist. From a painting by John W. Gilbert, in the possession of Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, K.C.

and regard of his countrymen, not merely as its premier novelist, but as one of its most notable men.

There is no intention in these few words to attempt to estimate the comparative value of Dickens or of his books as an asset of the nation. That has been done so often and so ably in volume after volume, and all the pages of THE BOOKMAN are not available to us, even were we bold enough to make the attempt. Nor is there a single phase even of their many-sided variety that could be approached with the hope of saying anything that has not been said before, although it is possible (as the monthly publication of a contemporary proves) to be continually adding fresh light to various incidents in his books and life, topographically, bibliographically, and pictorially. But avoiding the temptation to select some phase which might only appeal to the student, and be of interest only to him of the meticulous mind, it may be more appropriate to glance at the more generally attractive features of Dickens's life and personality as they are revealed in his books.

Most novelists, we presume, adapt certain incidents from their own lives to certain requirements of their novels. The creation of a character has its genesis in someone they have known or have met, and the more the writer is endowed with the imaginative genius, the more he elaborates and embroiders upon the fabric of his own observation. The fact that Dickens had this power to a greater extent than most men is not to be taken as indicating that he was in any sense a copyist rather than a great creative genius, but that he realised better than other writers that Nature, human or otherwise, was the truest and most permanently valuable material for his purpose, because it is universal. He not only saw with an eye and realised with a mind abnormal in their quality but he placed on record what he saw and conceived in character and scenes, in such a manner as to make the reader see and conceive as clearly and as vividly as he had done.

387, Mile End Terrace, Portsmouth,

where Dickens was born, February 7th, 1812.

Reduced facsimile of Marriage Certificate of Charles Dickens and Catherine Thomson Hogarth.

He had this power when a lad, and it matured as years went on. In his first sketches the art of dramatising, so to speak, incidents of his childhood days at Chatham came naturally to him. The people he met there when only eight or nine years of age furnished him with models, as incidents of their lives furnished him with action. And when he became a young man in a business office, he found material for other sketches, of which "Making a Night of it" is but one instance. Those who have read his letters to his friend Kolle will find how faithfully the environment of those days is conveyed into the "Sketches," whilst the prototype for this sketch referred to will be easily discovered.

And so on through all his books the same thing occurs. In some cases his portraiture of friends and acquaintances, such as Squeers, Skimpole, Boythorn, Miss Mowcher, caused him some uneasiness for the pains he had taken. But when he put himself into his books it mattered to no one at the time because no one knew. Yet he is in many of his own books. The most notable and lifelike, of course, is "David Copperfield." Here we have, on his own evidence, given to his friend Foister, certain details of his life as boy and young man pathetically and dramatically pictured for us. David's career is not, of course, a minute account of Dickens's early experience, but phases of David's life are identical with phases in the life of Dickens.

The blacking-factory period of his life is reflected in the similar period of Copperfield's, with the wine-bottle trade substituted for the blacking-bottle in 1840, when he was writing "The Old Curiosity Shop." From a painting by R. J. Lane in the possession of His Majesty the King trade, and we know that the novelist loathed his post as much as Copperfield did his. But although he kept his secret from his own family and friends until years after Dickens did not hesitate to introduce it into his books. How this early period of his suffering boyhood affected him, and how accurately it is described in fiction, is as familiar as are the details of the real history told in his biography. Foister did not hesitate to give them to the world as told him by the novelist, because nothing could better exemplify the courage and fortitude of his friend, or show what a noble character and genius had emanated from hardship and incredibly uncongenial discouragements. When one thinks of it all, and realizes how Dickens brought himself by his own determination to be one of the greatest men of his age, one can see how easily, without heroism, his genius might have been snuffed out.

Charles Dickens

Without such strong will his life and character must have been different. The experiences of his early days affected him throughout his career, and many times in his other books we find his thoughts have drifted back to Hungerford Stairs, although he confesses to a horror of going near the place, and studied to avoid it. Take the following passage describing Clennam:

"A man who had, deep-rooted in his nature, a belief in all the gentle and good things his life had been without. Bred in meanness and hard dealing, this had rescued him to be a man of honourable mind and open hand. Bred in coldness and severity, this had rescued him to have a warm and sympathetic heart. Bred in a creed too darkly audacious to pursue, this had rescued him to judge not, and in humility to be Dickens's Chambers in Furnival's Inn, 1836-7.

Drawn by F. G. Kitton. Dickens was living here when he began to write "Pickwick," and it was here that Thackeray called with proposals to illustrate it.

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell.

48, Doughty Street, where Dickens lived 1837-9. Here he finished writing "Pickwick" and wrote "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby."

merciful, and have hope and charity." This is but the recollection of his own trials coming vividly into his mind, with the added joy and satisfaction in the knowledge that good could come from such a life.

Nor did he confine his personal touches to his own career. We have pictures of the domestic troubles of his father, the interlude in the Marshalsea Prison and the whole struggle for existence of the family in those grey days, presented in his masterpiece, not in dull narrative, but with the magic of a romantic story exhibiting all its attendant humour and pathos—real in itself, yet with its actual reality veiled.

The Four Elder Children of Charles Dickens—Charlie, Mamie, Katie and Wally—with "Grip" the raven.

From a drawing by Maclise in 1842.

In the same book we get his first love affair glowingly described in Copperfield's love for Dora, for we know from his own lips that there was a Dora in his real life, and the recent publication of the letters which passed between them have further revealed the details of this youthful love affair. He refers to it again in an article entitled "Gone to the Dogs" in Household Words, where he speaks of "his bright-eyed Araminta (with the obdurate parents)—the inheritance I myself entered on at nineteen years of age." This bright-eyed Araminta became, as we all know, on renewed acquaintance many years later,

Mr. Winkle goes a-hunting.

From "The Pickwick Papers," Illustrated by Charles Pears. (Waverley Book Co.)

Silas Wegg at his Stall near Mr. Boffin's house.

From "Our Mutual Friend." Illustrated by Charles Pears. (Waverley Book Co.)

and after considerable remodelling, Flora in "Little Dorrit," whilst Clennam, as we have hinted, doubtless possessed many traits of the novelist's own character.

We have suggested that many of the "Sketches by Boz" are but incidents of his early days both at Chatham and during his youthful apprenticeship as a solicitor's clerk, and we know how much of his experiences found their way into the "Pickwick Papers." His schooldays and school-fellows are faithfully made history in "Our School," his reporting escapades have furnished him with many a chapter and exciting story, and his family and friends were used as models, such as his father as Mr. Micawber, his mother as Mrs. Nickleby, his sister as Mrs. Gargery, his sister's little son as Tiny Tim, Mrs. Roylance as Mrs. Pipchin, and scores of others. In his own weekly paper, Household Words, he frequently contributed an autobiographical chapter in the shape of a sketch or story. Two occur to me at the moment, entitled respectively "Gone Astray" and "New Year's Day," both dealing with his boyhood, the former relating how he was lost in London, and the wonderful things he saw during the time, the second telling how he was taken out to see the Soho Bazaar by "a grim and unsympathetic old personage of the female gender," whom he refers to later as Mrs. Pipchin. This paper forms a delightful sketch which was, as he suggests, founded on fact "to the best of my remembrance and self-examination of the past."

But perhaps the member of his family who figured in and influenced certain of his writings most was his wife's girl-sister, Mary Hogarth, whose early death dealt him such an irreparable blow. She was but seventeen when she died suddenly soon after he went to live at Doughty Street, and whilst he was writing "The Pickwick Papers." So terrible was the crushing blow to him, and so utterly prostrated was he, that a part of his immortal book had to be postponed in consequence. She had endeared herself to him by her sweetness of nature "even more," as we have been told, "than by graces of person," and she had made herself an ideal in his life. And throughout his career, he used her amiable good nature as the model for such characters as Rose Maylie, Little Nell, and more than one other of his charming young women, and never seemed to let her pure nature out of his memory. In his letters to Forster he refers to the subject of her death more than once as years rolled by. On one particular occasion when abroad he describes a vision he had, in which he saw her and recognized her voice and "knew it was poor Mary's spirit"; and on another, he reminds his friend that "this day eleven years poor dear Mary died." There can indeed be no doubt that the loss of his "dear friend and companion" affected him greatly, and inspired many of the affectionate and gentle thoughts of young life which are to be found in his books.

Charles Dickens in his Study at Gads Hill.

Except for the addition of the figure of Dickens, this is evidently a copy of Sir Luke Fildes' famous painting, "The Empty Chair."

One might enlarge upon the theme that the books of Dickens contain not only cameos of his own life and that of his friends and family, but, as will be seen from the article which follows this, pictures of the places he knew and loved. Wherever the novelist found himself, either on a holiday or business journey, there he found material for his books, and such material has become far more living and real, and far more valuable for creating and establishing the atmosphere of the world he knew, than any minute description of history. It is in this way that we have got to know the novelist with so personal an intimacy, and have become so well acquainted with all his doings and all the places and scenes of his books. • He aimed through all his writings at securing the confidence and respect of his readers. He wrote to please them first, and he wrote of those things and people whom they could understand. And therein, like Shakespeare, his books have the universal appeal, and like him also, because "he does not depict men as kings, but kings as men; not men as peasants, but again peasants as men."

The following words which Dickens puts into the mouth of David Copperfield when the latter is struggling for a livelihood as an author, may be taken to express the thoughts of the novelist himself:

"In pursuance of my intention of referring to my own fictions, only when their course should incidentally connect itself with the progress of my story, I do not enter on the aspirations, the delights, anxieties, and triumphs of my art. That I truly devoted myself to it with my strongest earnestness and bestowed upon it every energy of my soul, I have already said. If the books I have written be of any worth, they will supply the rest. I shall otherwise have written to poor purpose, and the rest will be of interest to no one."

It is unnecessary to ask if the books of Dickens are of worth. Posterity has decided for us.

"I rest my claims to the remembrance of my country upon my published works, and to the remembrance of my friends upon their experience of me in addition thereto," was the novelist's own memorable utterance. No expressed desire of any great man has ever been more completely realised.

CHARLES DICKENS AND LONDON.

I.

ALTHOUGH born in Portsmouth Charles Dickens may be said to have been essentially a Londoner. His father brought him to the city when he was but two years of age, and for a very brief period they lived at 10, Norfolk Street (now Cleveland Street) by the side of the Middlesex Hospital, when an appointment in Chatham took the family there. In 1823 they again returned to London, and took up their residence at 16, Bayham Street, Camden Town. From this time onward until Charles Dickens acquired Gad's Hill Place in Kent in 1860 he resided in London, leaving it only for either holiday purposes, or in search of new environment and change in writing his books.

That he loved London is but half truth. London with all its alluring associations of men, places and things was to him a sheer fascination. It became and remained a part of his very existence. He would walk about its streets for hours as a relief from work, always "seeing many little things, and some great things, which because they interest me," he says, in the preface to the "Uncommercial Traveller," "I think may interest others." And when away from it he pined and longed for it, as for instance when he was in Genoa working on his Christmas book, "The Chimes." Writing to a friend he says, "I seem as if I had plucked myself out of my proper soil when I left Devonshire Terrace; and could take root no more until I return to it. . . . Did I tell you how many fountains we have here? No matter. If they played Nectar, they would not please me half so well as the West Middlesex water-works at Devonshire Terrace." He craved for the London streets, and so missed the long night-walks before beginning anything; that he seemed, as he said, dumbfounded without them. "Put me down at Waterloo Bridge at eight o'clock in the evening, with leave to roam about as long as I like, and I would come home, as you know, panting to go on. I am sadly strange as it is, and can't settle."

Many such outbursts of desire for his beloved London came from him when away from it; its streets were as a lodestone to him. He knew London as perhaps no other person knew it, and there is scarcely a story, long or short, written by him that does not exhibit his knowledge with loving accuracy. Indeed his novels are great prose epics of London, mirroring its life and manners in characters and scenes.

And so London of his day has come to be known as Dickens's London, with houses, streets and places made memorable by his facile pen as Dickensian landmarks.

The houses he lived in himself and in which his masterpieces were conceived and written have the first interest.

10, Norfolk Street, where his family lived from 1814-16, and 16, Bayham Street, Camden Town, the first London abode which has any vital association with the novelist's early life, have been referred to. The latter was a small house of the cottage type, and not, as Forster described it, "a small mean tenement." It was demolished a few months back, but it played so touching a part in the boyhood of Dickens that one laments its loss. The lad occupied a small garret in the house, and no doubt it is that one described in "David Copperfield" as the room occupied by its hero when lodging with the Micawbers.

"My room," says little David, "was at the top of the house at the back—a close chamber, stencilled all over with an ornament which my young imagination represented as a blue muffin and very scantily furnished." The description fitted it admirably when I visited it prior to its demolition—except so far as the "blue muffins" were concerned, the absence of which a witty member of the party accounted for, by suggesting that Time had had them for tea long long ago.

From here Dickens began to acquire his knowledge of London and its types, and in this very room he no doubt pondered over those first real beginnings of authorship which he thought "so clever," but which he was too nervous to show anyone. When later he conceived that wonderful "Christmas Carol" this very house must have been in his mind for it exactly tallied with the home of the Cratchits, even to the outhouse in the back garden where the pudding was boiled in the copper that famous Christmas. Bob, it will be remembered, lived in Camden Town, and it is curious, too, to notice that, with few exceptions, Dickens's own residences until he finally deserted London for his favourite Kent, were within a short radius of this particular spot.

From Bayham Street the family took rooms in a larger house at 4 Gower Street, North, likewise demolished, where the novelist's mother made that courageous effort to start a school as a solution to the falling family fortunes. But notwithstanding the fact that little Charles, as he has told us "left at a great many doors a great many circulars, nobody ever came to the school . . . nor do I recollect that anybody ever proposed to come, or Charles Dickens at the age of 39 (1842).

From a painting by Francis Alexander, of Boston, U.S.A.

"The artist's rooms were at No. 41, Tremont Row. . . . The doorway and stairs leading to the painter's studio were thronged with ladies and gentlemen eagerly awaiting his [Dickens's] appearance. The crowd waited till the sitting was over, and saw him back again to the 'Tremont' and this was repeated every morning while he was sitting for his picture."—From "Charles Dickens in America," by W. Glyde Wilkins (Chapman & Hall)

10, Norfolk (now Cleveland) Street, Fitzroy Square,

where Dickens lived, 1814-16

16, Bayham Street, Camden Town,

where Dickens lived, 1823-24

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell

The little back garret in Bayham Street.

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell

The Blacking Warehouse, 3, Chandos St., Covent Garden.

that the least preparation was made to receive anybody." This failure necessitated another removal and the family went to live with Mrs. Roylance at 37 Little College Street, still in Camden Town. Things went from bad to worse and shortly after, the novelist's father succumbed to the rigour of the law and removed to the Debtor's prison in the Borough.

During this period little Charles then at work in the blacking warehouse in Hungerford Market lodged in a house in Lant

Street, Borough, to be near his parents. It was in Lant Street that Bob Sawyer lived, and its dismal aspect was humorously pictured by the novelist in narrating the story of the famous party Bob gave to his friends. Released from the Marshalsea prison, John Dickens and family returned to Mrs. Roylance in Little College Street, thence in 1825 removed to 13, Johnson Street, Somers Town, N.W. Here they remained for five years and the fortune of the family having improved, Charles was taken from his uncongenial work and sent again to school—the Wellington House Academy in the Hampstead Road—which school he so minutely

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell

Little College Street (now College Place), Camden Town,

where Dickens lived, 1824-25

Wellington House Academy, Hampstead Road, where Dickens went to school in 1824.

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell.

Lant Street, Borough, where Dickens lodged, 1825, whilst his father was a prisoner for debt in the neighbouring Marshalsea.

described in "Our School" many years after. The Johnson Street house exists to-day and has recently been honoured with a County Council tablet announcing the fact that it was once the residence of Charles Dickens.

The next few years of the novelist's life do not receive very minute attention of his biographer, John Forster, but recent researches reveal the fact that after leaving Johnson Street, his father lodged in a house in the Polygon, Somers Town, during 1829, and then took lodgings in Fitzroy Street, Fitzroy Square. The exact house in this street has not so far been traced, but the publication in America of the correspondence between Dickens and Marie Beadnell and of his letters to his friend Kolle, prove that he lived there from 1830 to 1833, for many of the letters are dated from Fitzroy Street, each, however, devoid of a number. These were the days when he was a lawyer's clerk, and incidentally a young lover. But that is another story.

In 1833 his family moved to 18, Bentinck Street, Cavendish Square, again as lodgers, and there is a significant interest attached to the house, for during its occupancy Charles Dickens entered the House of Commons as a reporter, and first blossomed out as an author. It is also evident that at this time Charles Dickens left the family hearth and took lodgings for himself, for it is on record that he resided for a period in Cecil Street, and

Charles Dickens.

From a drawing by Baugniot (1858.)

probably also in Buckingham Street, Strand. The description of David Copperfield's chambers, under the care of Mrs. Crupp, in the latter street, may possibly be recollections of his own in either or both of these streets. He had by this time determined on a literary career, and anticipating success he took more commodious chambers in Furnival's Inn, Holborn, in 1835, where he wrote most of his "Sketches by Boz" and "Pickwick Papers." It was whilst here that he took to himself a wife. He rented lodgings at 11, Selwood Terrace, Fulham, for a few weeks, necessary to the marriage being consummated at St. Luke's Church, Chelsea. The honeymoon was spent at Chalk, a village in Kent, and the couple returned to Furnival's Inn, where they remained until 1837. In that year 48, Doughty Street, Mecklenburgh Square, was rented, where it may be said the novelist and his wife started their first home. Here he completed "The Pickwick Papers," wrote "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby."

In 1839 he moved to a larger house at 1, Devonshire Terrace and remained there until 1851, during which period were written "The Old Curiosity Shop," "Barnaby Rudge," "Martin Chuzzlewit," "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "A Christmas Carol," "The Cricket on the Hearth" and "The Haunted Man." From here he made brief changes for holiday and other reasons, staying on different occasions at 4, Anna Park Villas, Twickenham, 1838; Wylde's Farm, Hampstead, 1839; and Elm Cottage, Petersham, 1839; at Cobley's Farm, Finchley, 1843; 9, Osnaburgh Terrace, Euston Road, 1844; and

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell.

13 (formerly 29),
Johnson Street,
Somers Town,

where Dickens lived, 1825-29.

Photo by T. W. Tyrrell.

18, Bentinck Street,
Cavendish Square,

where Dickens lived, 1833-34.

1, Devonshire Terrace, Marylebone Road,

where Dickens lived, 1839-51.

From a sketch by Daniel Maillie.

1, Chester Place, Regent's Park, 1847. In 1851 he moved to his new residence Tavistock House, Tavistock Square, remaining there until 1860 when Gad's Hill Place, which he so admired in his early days, and so desired for a residence, became vacant. He at once purchased it and lived there until his death.

At Tavistock House were wholly or partly written "Bleak House," "Hard Times," "Little Dorrit," "A Tale of Two Cities," and "Great Expectations," and here, too, many of the famous amateur theatrical performances in which he took so keen a delight were enacted.

At Gad's Hill the rest of the novelist's work was conceived, and the last page of "Edwin Drood" written.

It is not in the scope of this article to deal with his residences outside of London.

As we have suggested he frequently left his home for a short period for change of environment to finish certain scenes in books or to create new ideas, and during his tenure of Gad's Hill he would take a house for the London season, bringing his work with him. These houses naturally have an interest for the reason that certain portions of his books were written in them although they cannot be rightly called his homes.

They are as follows: 5, Hanover Terrace, N.W., 1861; 16, Hyde Park Gate, W., 1862; 57, Gloucester Place, W., 1864; 16, Somers Place, W., 1865; 6, Southwick Place, W., 1866; 5, Hyde Park Place, W., 1870.

This latter was his last London residence. He came there in January for his last readings at St. James's Hall and remained until the 30th May when he returned to Gad's Hill. It was at this address the greater part of "Edwin Drood" was written and where he read the parts as they were finished to his friends. The actual last page was penned in the chalet in the garden of Gad's Hill.

[Photo by T. W. Tyrrell.

58, Lincoln's Inn Fields, where John Forster lived.

Forster says, in the "Life of Dickens" (Chapman & Hall): "He saw his little book 'The Chimes' in its final form for publication; and to a select few brought together on Monday the end of December [1844] had the opportunity of reading it aloud." Among the select few were Douglas Jerrold and Carlyle. Forster's rooms, where this reading took place, were the originals of Tulkinghorn's chambers in "Bleak House."

John Forster.

Engraving by C. H. Jeens.

II.

G. A. Sala, himself an authority on London, once described himself as encountering Dickens in the oddest of places and most inclement weather, in Ratcliffe Highway, on Haverstock Hill, on Camberwell Green, in Gray's Inn Lane, in the Wandsworth Road, at Hammersmith Broadway, in Norton Folgate, and at Kensal New Town. "A hansom" he said, "whirled you by the Bell and Horns at Brompton, and there he was, striding, as with seven league boots, seemingly in the direction of North End, Fulham. The Metropolitan Railway sent you forth at Lisson Grove, and you met him steadily plodding towards the Yorkshire Stingo. He was to be met rapidly skirting the grim brick wall of the prison in Coldbath Fields, or trudging along the Seven Sisters Road at Holloway, or bearing, under a steady press of sail, underneath Highgate Archway, or pursuing the even tenor of his way down the Vauxhall Bridge Road."

This is probably no exaggeration of what really happened, and throughout all his books we find the fruit of these pleasurable exertions. I suppose there is no part of London or of what were its suburbs in his time, that is not associated in some way with his books. Houses, streets, hotels, effigies, pumps, monuments, have become familiar to us through that association and have added glory to existences which otherwise would never have been noticed at all. In this it may be said that Dickens discovered London for the Londoner, and has made him acquainted with its streets quite as much as he has made him acquainted with persons who walk them.

Hablot K. Browne.

"Phiz,"

who succeeded Seymour as illustrator of "Pickwick," and illustrated ten other of the novels.

see the kind of house that Riah lived in as manager of Pubsey & Co., with an elaborately-laid-out garden on the roof which so attracted the doll's dressmaker. We can take a view of the Little Wooden Midshipman still existing at Messrs. Norrie & Wilson's in the Minories, whose shop in Leadenhall Street had been the original of old Sol. Gill's, and make a special excursion to Aldgate Pump as Mr. Toots did. If time and inclination served, a visit might be made to the scene of the Brick Lane

If we start from any point in the metropolis we immediately come in contact with a Dickensian landmark. The City itself has many. The Guildhall where the Bardell and Pickwick case was tried; Bevis Marks, the home of Sampson Brass, which immediately conjures up the picture of the Marchioness and Dick Swiveller and also reminds us that the "Red Lion Inn" patronised by the said Richard, was on the opposite side of the way, so that having found the inn the position of Sampson Brass's home can be fixed. We can stroll into St. Mary Axe and

George Cruikshank.

The first illustrator of "Sketches by Boz" and "Oliver Twist."

Branch of the United Grand Junction Ebenezer Temperance Association in Brick Lane, and to the original of Titbull's almshouses, both down Whitechapel way. Having taken lunch at "The George and Vulture" in George Yard, Lombard Street, where Mr. Pickwick and Sam were "suspended" after the former's scontretemps with Mrs. Bardell, or at the Albion Hotel in Aldersgate Street, where the dinner to celebrate the publication of "Nicholas Nickleby" was given, we would naturally stroll on to Goswell Street from the painting by W. P. Frith.

Charles Dickens.

(1859.)

Richard Doyle.

who collaborated with Leech, MacLise and Stanfield in illustrating "The Chimes," etc.

(now Goswell Road) where Mr. Pickwick lodged, and contemplate its situation much as Mr. Pickwick did himself when he threw up his bedroom window on that memorable morning when he and his friends started on their journey. Not far away is the City Road, changed of course in atmosphere from the time when Mr. Micawber who illustrated "A Christmas Carol" and other of the Christmas books.

John Leech.

lived in Windsor Terrace there. Yet we shall find a pleasure in peeping at it. Retracing our steps towards Holborn, passing through Little Britain, where Mr. Jagger's offices once were and having special thought for Mr. Wemmick, into Smithfield, not "the shameful place . . . all asmeared with filth and fat and blood and foam" as Pip found it, we come out facing Newgate Prison. The fact that this is not the Newgate Prison of Dickens's day or of the Gordon Rioters' time matters not. It was on the very spot and very like it in general appearances, and the sight of it will bring to mind the riotous scenes of "Barnaby Rudge" and remind us that Wemmick escorted Pip through its interior and what a depressing scene he found there.

Turning down Snow Hill there will still be found a "Saracen's Head"—closed as I write, but to be re-opened by an enthusiastic Dickensian manufacturer who is to preserve the Nickleby associations with it by decorating its exterior with Dickensian statues, etc. This is not the "Saracen's Head" where Mr. Squeers and his pupils foregathered, although the present building stands on part of the old coach yard, but its name and associations inspire the same feelings as the original would have done.

Wandering round about this district, we should come to "that open square in Clerkenwell which is yet called by some strange perversion of terms "The Green," associated with Oliver Twist, Charlie Bates, the Artful Dodger and Mr. Brownlow; to No. 54, Hatton Garden, which was the Police Court presided over by Mr. Fang, the Magistrate, before whom Oliver Twist was brought.

Bleeding Heart Yard still exists, although nothing like Mr. and Mrs. Plornish's residence could be found there.

Charles Dickens.
(1859.)

From a photograph by J. & C. Watkins.

Wandering along Farringdon Street visions of many associations with Pickwick would crowd our thoughts—the old Farringdon Market, the Fleet Prison standing on the site of which is the Memorial Hall where many Dickens celebrations have taken place. Behind is La Belle Sauvage Yard, the one time coaching yard of a famous Inn where Tony Weller as coachman ended and started many a journey.

Wending our way over Blackfriars Bridge, which as Dickens has told us was his way home from the blacking warehouse, we naturally would go "down that turning which has Rowland Hill's Chapel on one side and the likeness of a golden dog licking a golden pot over a shop door on the other," (both of which landmarks still exist although the former is no longer a chapel); but we would look in vain for the boot-lace shop, the hatters, or the show van with "the fat pig, the wild Indian and the little lady," all of which so fascinated him in those days. However the drab atmosphere will recall all the feelings which these recollections of the novelist brought back to him. We might unconsciously look about as we pass Southwark Bridge, (the "Iron" Bridge of "Little Dorrit,") for the house that the boy in his attempt to conceal his home from Bob Fagin, bade him adieu at, making believe that he lived there. And by easy stages we find ourselves in Lant Street, the very street where a back attic was taken for him. "The little window" he remembered "had a pleasant prospect of a timber-yard; and when I took possession of my new abode, I thought it was a paradise."

This neighbourhood, with streets named after Quilp, Little Dorrit and Arthur Clennam is a veritable piece of real Dickens-land, having its numerous associations with "Little Dorrit," "The Old Curiosity Shop," "Oliver

Mrs. Charles Dickens (Dickens's wife), who died in 1879.

Twist," "The Pickwick Papers." Almost opposite Lant Street is St. George's Church where little Dorrit was christened, where she slept in the vestry on one occasion, and where she was eventually married; the site of the Marshalsea Prison of the same book; the public gardens, locally known as Little Dorrit's Play Ground, with the remaining walls of the prison as a background on which is a printed notice informing the world of the fact that the Marshalsea prison was immortalized by Charles Dickens in "Little Dorrit"; and at one time John Chivery's shop could be found in Union Road.

The "White Hart Inn" in the Boro', where Sam Weller came from, is of course demolished. But a visit to the "George Inn" will convey to the pilgrim the best idea obtainable in reality of what it was like. And one can still see the steps of London Bridge where Nancy and Mr. Brownlow had that momentous interview. The enthusiast may wander round the Monument with a view of getting the real atmosphere of Mrs. Todger's boarding-house, or try to identify Daniel Quilp's home on Tower Hill.

Charles Dickens.
(1867.)

From a photograph by Mason & Co.

But there are other places in London to visit less conjectural. The Temple will revive many memories. Pip and his friend Pocket had chambers in Garden Court, to which Magwitch came one night and revealed himself as Pip's unknown benefactor. In Pump Court Tom Pinch was installed as librarian, and Fountain Court is famous as the spot where Ruth Pinch met her lover. Paper Buildings was where Sir John Chester had chambers, as did Mr. Stryver, K.C., whom Sydney Carton served as "Jackal." Just outside the Temple is Essex Street, where Pip found a lodging for his friend Magwitch, and going down it on to the Thames Embankment, through Charing Cross Gardens, we pass the bottom of Buckingham Street where Mrs. Crupp's house once stood, and reach Charing Cross Station, built on the site of old Hungertord Market, where the blacking factory stood, at which Dickens was the drudge. Opposite the station is the Golden Cross Hotel, whose name reminds us of the stirring incident between Mr. Pickwick and the cabman, although the original hotel stood where Nelson's Column now stands. Within a small radius of here Dickens associations and memories throng upon the pilgrim. Down Parliament Street is the "Red Lion" where young David Copperfield gave his "magnificent order" for a glass of the "genuine stunning," an actual incident of Dickens's own life; there is St. Martin's Church on whose steps old Peggotty met David Copperfield that stormy night; Chandos Street, Covent Garden, to which was removed the blacking shop in whose window Dickens sat pasting labels on the pots; Maiden Lane, where he patronised the coffee shop; Covent Garden Market, where he wandered about as a lad, and resorted later to get materials for his books; Hummum's Hotel where Pip slept on a certain notable night,

Photo by I. W. Turrell

5, Hyde Park Place.

where Dickens stayed in 1870, whilst he was writing "Edwin Drood."

The Chalet, Gad's Hill.

Forster says, in his "Life of Dickens" (Chapman & Hall): "On the 8th June he passed all the day writing in the Chalet. He came over for luncheon, and, much against his usual custom, returned to his desk." He was taken ill that evening and died the next day, June 9th, 1870.

David Copperfield and Uriah Heep,

as drawn by "Phiz."

From "David Copperfield" (Chapman & Hall)

and Tavistock Hotel where Dickens himself stayed; Broad Court in Drury Lane, where Miss Snellicci lived, and Tom-All-Alones used to be not far away. Across the Strand there is Osborne's Adelphi Hotel where Mr. Wardle and his friend stayed after Mr. Pickwick's release from prison, and partook of supper; the Adelphi Arches through which the lad Dickens was fond of wandering, and many other places which the reader of the early chapters of Forster's "Life of Dickens" will recall. Along the Strand we come to Norfolk Street, where Mrs. Lirriper had her lodgings, on the corner of which street stands the house occupied by Messrs. Chapman & Hall at the time "The Pickwick Papers" were originally published, and from whose stall Dickens had previously purchased the magazine containing his first published story. Across the road is St. Dunstan's Church, the church of Trotty Veck's encounter with the Bells.

The old Inns of Court all figure more or less in Dickens's books or his life. Clifford's Inn behind St. Dunstan's Church has its most prominent reference in "The Pickwick Papers" as the scene of a gruesome tale told by the old man in the "Magpie and Stump"; Lincoln's Inn Hall, where the case of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce "dragged its slow length along"; "Barnard's Inn" where Pip and his friend Pocket lived before removing into the Temple, and a terrible place according to Pip, where "dry rot, and wet rot, and all the silent rots that rot in neglected roof and cellar—rot of rat, and mouse, and bug, and coaching stables near at hand besides—addressed themselves faintly to my sense of smell, and moaned 'Try Barnard's Mixture'"; Sergeant's Inn where Mr. Pickwick obtained his habeas corpus for getting into the Fleet; Symond's Inn, now no longer existing, "a little pale, wall-eyed, woe-begone Inn, like a large dust-bin of two compartments and a sifter"; "Staple Inn" where Mr. Grewgious occupied a set of chambers behind the doors with those mystic letters "P.J.T."; "Furnival's Inn," where the novelist himself lived and wrote "Pickwick," upon whose site stands the Prudential Assurance Building with the sacred Dickensian spot marked by a bust of the novelist; "Gray's Inn" where Traddles lived and before his time Mr. Perker.

Indeed the whole environment of these legal Inns is

David Copperfield and Uriah Heep,

as drawn by Fred Barnard.

From "David Copperfield" (Chapman & Hall).

Charles Dickens presiding at the Newvenders' Dinner, April 5, 1870 two months before his death.

From Pan, April 23rd, 1870.

"Like Falstaff, but with a modification almost as large as himself, I shall try rather to be the cause of speaking in others than to speak myself to-night."—"Dickens's Speeches" (Chatto & Windus).

crowded with Dickensian nooks and corners. There is Took's Court (the original of Cook's Court) Chancery Lane, where Snagsby's stationers' shop was; John Forster's house in Lincoln's Inn Fields, the original of Mr. Tulkinghorn's; New Square and Raymond's Buildings associated with Dickens's own legal education, as well as with creations in his books; "Thavie's Inn" in Holborn, where we are reminded of Mrs. Jellyby and Peepy with his head between the area railings. Going westward along Holborn, with visions of Bill Sikes and Oliver tramping to Chertsey on the burglary expedition, we think of the Gordon Rioters sacking the distillery—a distillery is still there on the site of the old one—of the "Black Bull" where Sairey Gamp nursed Mr. Lewsome, and Kingsgate Street where she lodged over Pol Sweedlepipe's barber's shop, both buildings, by the way, now demolished; passing Southampton Street, where Miss Twinkleton and Rosa lodged with Mrs. Billickin, on to Newman Street, Oxford Street, the scene of Mr. Turveydrop's dancing academy, through Golden Square, past Ralph Nickleby's House, not forgetting Dr. Manette's residence in Carlisle Street, off Soho. And so by easy stages we could reach the more aristocratic West End, and think of Silas Wegg with his wooden leg and stall, watching a certain house in Wimpole Street, where Mr. and Mrs. Boffin resided. We might find Mr. Dombey's House, dreadfully genteel, in the region between Portland Place and Bryanston Square. Tite Barnacle's in Mews Street, Grosvenor Square, Mrs. Witterly's in Cadogan Place, where Kate Nickleby acted as companion, "which is in Sloane Street but not of it" for the people of Cadogan Place "look down upon Sloane Street and think Brompton Road low."

As a matter of fact, we could wander in all directions, North, South, East, West, as far afield as Jack Straw's Castle for a "red hot chop," as Camberwell, in company with Wemmick to his castle, as Bow, in search of Mrs. Nickleby's cottage and the house of the "gentleman next door," as Richmond, in search of the "House by the Green," where Pip drove Estella, and find many more landmarks and associations on the way. But space forbids, and enough has been said to indicate that London to-day is still Dickens's London. And in spite of the fact that the flight of time and the house-breakers have swept much away, there are scores of Dickensian landmarks yet remaining to keep the novelist's memory green in the city he loved best and that plays so large a part in all his writings.

CHARLES DICKENS.

SOME PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS AND OPINIONS

BY THOMAS HARDY, G. BERNARD SHAW, DR. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, SIR F. C. BURNAND, ANDREW LANG, F. ANSTLEY, M. E. BRADDON, J. ASHBY STERRY, PERCY FITZGERALD, RICHARD WHITEING, HARRY FURNISS, I. ZANGWILL, JEROME K. JEROME, CECIL ALDIN, ROBERT HICHENS, G. S. STREET, JOHN HASSALL, LUCAS MALET, BEATRICE HARRADEN, FRANK REYNOLDS, ARTHUR MORRISON, MARY E. MANN, W. J. LOCKE, WILLIAM DE MORGAN, PERCY WHITE, AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

THAT in our days Dickens meets with some depreciation is no sign that his vogue is on the wane. He has always had his depreciators. Even in the first great days of his abounding popularity there were some who stood apart and sniffed. Emerson said (in those Journals of which Messrs. Constable have just published the fifth and sixth volumes) that Dickens could not write dialogue and had no insight into character, and that "Oliver Twist" "begins and ends without a poetic ray, and so perishes in the reading." But he thought better of some of the later books. The Quarterly was cold to "Pickwick"; the Saturday wrote contemptuously of "A Tale of Two Cities" when it first appeared, and in general if you compare what was written of the work of Dickens when he was living with what is written of it now you are brought to a conclusion that the appreciation of him is growing rather than diminishing.

By way of putting this to the test, we sent an application to a selection of representative authors, artists, and men and women eminent in English public life, and asked them to favour us with a note of: (1) Any personal recollection they had of, or connected with Dickens; (2) whether their life or work owed anything to his influence; (3) their personal opinion of the value of his novels; whether they considered his humour appealed as strongly to readers of our time as of his own, and which they would rank as the greatest of his books. And they have very kindly responded in the following terms:

THOMAS HARDY

and the influence of Dickens:

In reply to your inquiries I regret to say that I have no information to give that can be of much service to you. I did not know Dickens, though when a young man in London I heard him read from his books in the Hanover Square Rooms.

But as I was thinking more of verse than of prose at that time, I do not know that my literary efforts owed much to his influence. No doubt they owed something unconsciously, since everybody's did in those days.

Your other questions I cannot answer.

THOMAS HARDY.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

thinks all Dickens's later works magnificent:

(1) None.

(2) Obviously a great deal. My works are all over Dickens; and nothing but the stupendous illiteracy of modern criticism could have missed this glaring feature of my methods—especially my continual exploitation of Dickens's demonstration that it is possible to combine a mirrorlike exactness of character drawing with the wildest extravagances of humorous expression and grotesque situation. I have actually transferred characters of Dickens to my plays—Jaggers in Great Expectations, to You Never Can Tell, for example—with complete success. Lomax in Major Barbara is technically a piece of pure Dickens. It is not too much to say that Dickens could not only draw a character more accurately than any of the novelists of the nineteenth century, but could do it without ceasing for a single sentence to be not merely impossible but outrageous in his unrestrained fantasy and fertility of imagination. No combination of phonography and cinematography could reproduce Micawber, Mrs. Sparrit, and Silas Wegg from contemporary reality as vividly as Dickens; yet their monstrous and side-splitting verbal antics never for a moment come within a mile of any possible human utterance. That is what I call mastery: knowing exactly how to be unerringly true and serious whilst entertaining your reader with every trick, freak, and sally that imagination and humor can conceive at their freest and wildest.

(3) Dickens was one of the greatest writers that ever lived: an astounding man, considering the barbarous ignorance of his period, which left him as untouched by Art and Philosophy as a cave man. Compared to Goethe, he is almost a savage. Yet he is, by pure force of genius, one of the great writers of the world. His greatest and deepest contemporaries, Carlyle and Ruskin, William Morris and Tolstoy, knew this perfectly well. All his detractors were, and are, second-raters at best.

There is no "greatest book" of Dickens: all his books form one great life-work: a Bible, in fact. But of course the tremendous series of exposures of our English civilization which began with Hard Times in 1854, and ended with Our Mutual Friend, throw his earlier works, entertaining as they are, into the shade. Little Dorrit is the work of a prophet—and no minor prophet: it is, in some respects, the climax of his work. Great Expectations is equally wonderful as a study of our individual struggles. But all are magnificent. G. BERNARD SHAW gives some early recollections:

Dr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE

Although a life-long admirer of Dickens, and a reader of almost the whole of his works, many of them several times over, I have little to say of him, as I never had the opportunity of making his acquaintance. I first heard his name during the last year of my school-life at Hertford (1836) when the four masters in the school were in a state of excitement about a story which was appearing in monthly parts, and was handed about from one to another. It was spoken of by them as something quite new, and exhibiting marvellous humour and talent. The title, however "The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club," was not very attractive to a schoolboy of thirteen, and I do not think I read it till some years afterwards. A little later, however, I heard my brother William speaking of it to a friend, and saying that the style of humour was above less-educated readers. As an example he referred to the description of the scene in the club meeting, when Mr. Winkle "threw himself upon the chair" to stop the quarrel between Mr. Pickwick and the "haberdasher."

I only saw Dickens once, when I heard him give a reading in St. James' Hall, one of the passages read being the account of the young doctor's supper party, and strange to say, I thought it was not well-read and did not bring out the humour of the scene as many other public readers would have done.

Charles Dickens giving a Reading (1859).

From a photograph by H. Watkins.

My opinion of his novels is a very high one. I have recently ranked him with Sir Walter Scott as the two most remarkable novelists the world has produced. His greatest story is, I think, "A Tale of Two Cities," followed very closely by "Barnaby Rudge." I owe most to his teaching as to the unity of human nature, showing, as did Herbert Spencer, that virtue and vice, wisdom and folly pervade all classes in an approximately equal degree; while he has confirmed my deep-seated conviction of the inherent injustice and cruelty of our whole system of law, criminal and civil, which another great man, Jeremy Bentham, had pierced with scathing ridicule.

Notwithstanding all that can be said against his mannerisms and exaggerations, I believe that the myriad characters Dickens has given us constitute a portrait gallery of English life and manners during the mid-nineteenth century that will be read with delight so long as the English language continues to be spoken.

ALFRED R. WALLACE.

SIR FRANCIS BURNAND

pictures Dickens as he saw him:

(1) I saw Charles Dickens several times. Vidi tantum. I remember his coming into the stalls at the "Lyceum" to see Fechter, who at that time was performing in some melodrama. Dickens was not in evening dress, but wore a black velvet coat, white waistcoat, and a brilliant red tie. He did not stay for the last act. I heard him read the trial scene from "Pickwick" at St. James's Hall, and was greatly disappointed by his rendering of his own inimitable humour.

While my "Happy Thoughts" were appearing in Punch, I was introduced to Edmund Yates at the house of Montagu Williams, and I have never forgotten how immensely pleased I was when Yates informed me that Charles Dickens had told him how greatly he appreciated this work of mine.

(2) I suppose that in some way or other my work has been influenced by the writings of Charles Dickens.

(3) I do not think that his humour appeals to so many at this time as it did; but it appeals as forcibly—and, speaking for myself, it appeals more forcibly than ever it did. His mere sentiment does not appeal to me: it seems theatrical. His strongest situations are melodramatically arranged, as for "a curtain."

I think I should select as my own special favourites "Pickwick," "David Copperfield," and "Oliver Twist." But his "characters" in all his books, without exception, are every one of them my constant friends and most amusing and interesting companions.

F. C. BURNAND.

ANDREW LANG

wonders who buys Dickens:

I never saw Dickens, and my life and work, such as they are, owe nothing to his influence so far as I am aware. The readers of our day, of course, do not

"How should you like to grow up a clever man, and write books?" said the old gentleman.

"I think I would rather read them sir" replied Oliver.

"What! Wouldn't you like to be a book-writer?" said the old gentleman.

Oliver considered a little while, and at last said he should think it would be a much better thing to be a bookseller; upon which the old gentleman laughed heartily, and declared he had said a very good thing, which Oliver felt glad to have done, though he by no means knew what it was.

Vide Oliver's Tryst in which the old gentleman does not say, though I do, that Chapman and Hall are the best of booksellers past, present, or to come; and my trusty friends, which I give under my hand for the benefit of Edward Chapman, his book, this fourteenth day of November 1839.

Witness D. O. R.

Montagu Williams

Miss Georgina Hogarth.
(About 1850)

From a painting by Augustus Egg.

see the point of his "topical" jokes and, as he is not up-to-date, I often wonder who the purchasers of his books can be—the same mystery surrounds the purchasers of Scott's.

No doubt "Pickwick" and "David Copperfield" tie for first place among his works.

A. LANG.

F. ANSTEY

in praise of Dickens:

(1) I have no personal recollection of, or connected with, Dickens.

(2) I think it very probable that, as I have been a constant reader of Dickens from the time I was ten years old, both my life and work have been influenced by him, though it is naturally difficult for me to say to what extent, or in what degree.

(3) I consider that the combined humour and humanity of his novels give them the highest conceivable value. Judging from the fact that his works are as widely read as ever, if not more widely, I should say that his humour appealed at least as strongly to readers of our day, as of his own.

I rank "David Copperfield" as his greatest book. "Great Expectations" a very close second, and "A Tale of Two Cities" third.

F. ANSTEY.

MISS M. E. BRADDON

and the influence of Dickens:

I regret that my time is so closely occupied that I cannot possibly enter upon a theme upon which I could say much, namely, the influence of Dickens on my thoughts and work. I think it is impossible for anybody to have lived in the Mid-Victorian age and not to have been influenced by that most powerful and remarkable writer. But I can say further that his books were a considerable factor in the happiness of my younger years.

MARY MAXWELL.

(M. E. BRADDON.)

J. ASHBY-STERRY

tells of his meetings with Dickens:

As a youth I can remember it was a great delight to me to meet Dickens in the street and I used frequently to encounter him in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden, which was his quickest way from the office of All the Year Round to Charing Cross Railway Station. Sometimes, after staring hard at him, I would bolt down one of the alleys into the Strand and, something like Trabbs' Boy, turn up in another direction and meet him again. The last time I saw him—save at some of the final readings at St. James's Hall—was on the West Pier at Brighton. It was a miserable day, blowing hard and raining, and I thought I had the whole place to myself. But on walking round the head of the pier, behind the curved glass shelter, I beheld the author of "Pickwick"! He had his coat collar turned up and he was looking bronzed and hearty. Quite heedless of rain and flying spray he peered through the mist and gazed upon the huge billows rolling in. He seemed like a sturdy pilot who was steering the pier through a very difficult bit of navigation. I passed slowly, very slowly, by him, raised my hat and went away heartily congratulating myself on my good fortune.

The influence of Dickens on the writers of his day was something extraordinary. It has never been sufficiently admitted what a wonderful school for young authors was Household Words and All the Year Round. He not only had a wonderful eye for talent, but he knew exactly how to employ that talent in the right direction, and how to make the very best of the writers on his staff. It is difficult to understand why a list has never been made of those who first appeared in print in the aforesaid publications. Such a list would comprise those who eventually became some of the most brilliant writers of their time. Why is it we have no journals nowadays like the two already named? Is it that we cannot get the writers, or that the readers are not forthcoming? It is more probable that the editor is not to be found.

It is very difficult to say which are one's favourites in the whole series of Dickens's novels. But if I might name three, I would say "David Copperfield," "Great Expectations," and "Dombey & Son." The last, independent of its merits, has a great claim on my affection, as it was the first work by Dickens that I ever read, when about nine years old. Walking down Leadenhall Street after reading the description of Sol Gill's establishment, I at once spotted the Wooden Midshipman, outside the original of the shop described in the story, and it was long afterwards that I found my surmise to be correct. A good many years subsequently when the shop was moved to the Minories and the house was demolished, I wrote the history of the Wooden Midshipman and its associations in All the Year Round for Charles Dickens Junior. My juvenile explorations in Dickensland have been continued all my life, but the real spots alas! are getting fewer and fewer and soon there will be none of them left.

J. ASHBY-STERRY.

PERCY FITZGERALD

looks backwards:

Some forty-two years have gone since Charles Dickens's death. It is singular that now we are celebrating his centenary and, looking round to see who is with us that knew him personally (no one had such troops of friends as he had—practically all the literary men of his day were friends of his as of course) we find only two or three remaining. There is no writer now, poet or novelist, who receives such general homage as he did. He was known by sight everywhere as he walked, and everybody was at his service. His name was a general passport. I remember going round with him on one of his Reading Tours, and when I was expressing my thanks for the great enjoyment he had given me, he broke out with his hearty exuberance: "No, no! this is nothing—you must come with me to Edinburgh, Glasgow, and let us make the whole Leith tour together. The railway directors will give us a saloon and we shall victual it, with all good things and have a rare royal time of it." But an important domestic event in our family deprived me of this pleasant junketing.

Once indeed, I saw him subjected to an incivility at an Irish railway-station. The companies not only placed a saloon carriage at his service, but never charged him anything for carrying his rather heavy apparatus, gas-fittings, screens, etc., and this was mentioned to a rough, coarse station-master. "I don't care whether it's Dickens or anybody else. He must pay all the same, like other people."

But as we look round now the eye does not fall on these crowds of friends. All have disappeared; three at most remain—one a personal friend to whom he was attached, viz., Mr. Marcus Stone; another, Sir Luke Fildes, and the third a literary one—myself, in fact. It is a fortunate thing, however, that this survivor should have been on terms of closest intimacy with him and was bound up with the traditions and methods of his two journals. No one in fact was more closely connected with those papers than myself or wrote so much

Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A.

From a photograph taken about the time he was illustrating "Our Mutual Friend" for them. No one now could tell so much of him. I had free entry to him at any hour. "Of course Mr. Dickens will see you," was the formula, and I often found him at lunch, when he might have excused himself instead of inviting me to sit down and join him. I may mention, without imputation of vanity, some little facts which will show the position I held. As a matter of course everything I offered was printed at once, or if the subject was not quite suitable, he would insist on paying for it. Again, it was surely a high privilege, in the case of a journal for which he himself, Lord Lytton, Wilkie Collins, and Mrs. Gaskell wrote novels, to find oneself commissioned to write a long three-volumed novel. One felt proud to be in such company, and I wrote no less than five such novels for him.

The adding to the other duties of his strenuous life, the editing of a highly-popular journal, entailed a constant weekly supervision and a never-ceasing drudgery upon Dickens for he discharged every duty in the most thorough and conscientious fashion—was indeed needlessly scrupulous, reading every article sent to him or commissioned by him, and correcting all the proofs. And the correcting was so profuse, as those who have seen it know so well, as often to amount to a re-writing: that is, he introduced so many fresh sentences, even adding a line here and a word there, with extraordinary deftness and skill. Not only this, but he would write explanatory letters and often apologetical ones giving his reasons, etc. He was indeed a wonderful being.

Not half enough has been said of Bob's native character which seemed inconsistent with the usual tradition of the successful author. He was unspoiled to an incredible degree, took no airs, had no "swelled head," was ever modest and unassuming. He was content with the second or third place when he should have had the first, wished rather to listen than to speak.

And then his never-failing good humour, and amiability! He was ever ready with a pleasant jest. It was a delightful thing to watch in that marvellously expressive

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald.

The only surviving member of Dickens's staff on Household Words and All the Year Round.

face, as I often did, "the kindly engendure" of one of his lively conceits. He would "rally" a friend in the pleasantest, most waggish fashion, taking stock of some little failing or peculiarity, but with a delightful and airily light touch. He had often a sly jest at my ways, particularly on a certain uncertainty, owing to the embarrassment I felt when he pressed his repeated hospitalities. I would note a peculiarly whimsical smile when this came about, as though he were saying to himself "Now he is going to hesitate." He might be standing there yonder, his hands deep in his pockets, a favourite pose of his, and looking downwards. I was before him. He was about to reply. First, the sparkling, ever-searching eyes began to rove about and twinkle; some humorous quip was occurring to him. Then you saw it descending to his deeply-furrowed cheeks, where all the muscles, the very "cordage of his face" (as was said of, or by, Macklin) seemed to quiver, to relax and light up with internal enjoyment. Then it passed still farther downwards, stole under his rather grizzled moustaches, when

Sir Luke Fildes, R.A.

From a photograph taken about the time he was illustrating "Edwin Drood."

the muscles round the mouth set to work in their turn; and finally, thus heralded, came the quip itself in a burst of joyous laughter! Delightful being! He enjoyed the detection of any little inequalities. Indeed:

"A merrier man
Within the limits of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk without
His eye begets occasion for his tongue;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest."

Here the Bard has assuredly drawn his portrait.

PERCY FITZGERALD.

RICHARD WHITEING:

A personal recollection and some opinions:

(1) I did not know Dickens personally. I last saw him at the great dinner given to him some time in the mid-'Sixties at Freemasons Tavern. It was on the occasion of his departure for America for the second visit that was to make amends for Martin Chuzzlewit and "American Notes." There was a mighty gathering, but nearly every name I recall now is the name of a dead man. Bulwer was in the chair; Maclise was of the company; my neighbour at table was Henry Thompson the surgeon, then a rising man; Sala was not far off. He seemed to resent the allusions to Dickens as the life and soul of Household Words, and muttered low, thunderous discontent as who should say: "I am the real Simon Pure!"

(2) Willy, nilly, every writer of fiction who touched the time of Dickens owes something to his influence. He swung us round into the sense of our real subject, the uncommemorated million, and our real patron, that million itself. He wrote for the average man; and that man in his multiplex personality surged up to him in gratitude and admiration like a whole people acclaiming its chief. The democratic movement in literature had come to town.

(3) I think he is the greatest in his line the world has seen since Aristophanes, or, if you like, since Rabelais. Both necessarily lose a lot by the mere lapse of time, which mars the freshness and the felicity of their strokes—the all in all. At least, I judge so by the translations in which alone the Greek master is accessible to me. Dickens will lose, has already lost, by such wear and tear, but enough of other quality will remain for many generations to prove his mastery. He was a veritable portent when he appeared, and they all saw at a glance what he was driving at. That ought to be enough to place him for ever.

"Martin Chuzzlewit" (if only for the sake of Mark Tapley) is, I think, the greatest book. Mark is a thing of imagination all compact. It is a whole philosophy of endurance and great endeavour—Epictetus, Marcus, The Bhagavad, and the Little Flowers of St. Francis—in a flash of idealistic caricature that carries to its highest point the frolic gaiety of heroism smiling in the face of death. All the others go mumchance through this ordeal; this one takes it in a coranto. How Dickens came by it and to it I could never make out. Perhaps it was some Christmas present from the skies.

RICHARD WHITEING.

HARRY FURNISS:

What he owes to Dickens:

(1) I never saw Dickens—he died when I was a boy. Charles Dickens, however, created for us delightful imaginary friends we seem to have known, and our mutual friend, Charles Dickens himself, is of these the greatest.

(2) I cannot say that my life has been influenced by Dickens, or by any author or artist, but as the only artist who has ever illustrated all Dickens's works (90,000 volumes of which have been sold in less than two years) I owe this success entirely to the influence of and my admiration for the author.

(3) I have lectured on Dickens for two years, and it takes me one hour and forty minutes to answer your third question. Whether I consider his humour appeals to readers of our day as of his own, is answered in my reply above. "Great Expectations" I have always considered his greatest book—long before I knew that Dickens himself held the same opinion.

HARRY FURNISS.

Mr. Riah and Miss Wren at the Six Jolly Fellowship Porters.

"Stop a bit," interposed Miss Wren. "I'll give the lady my card." . . . Miss Abbev with manifest tokens of astonishment read the diminutive document."—From "Our Mutual Friend," Edited by J. A. Hamerton. Illustrated by Harry Furness (Educational Book Co.).

I. ZANGWILL tells how he first read Dickens.

When I was nine or ten a schoolboy friend lent me a coverless book without a title-page which I kept hidden in my locker and read in school hours with all the surreptitious sweetness of stolen blisses. The stories it contained seemed to me infinitely more vivid than any I had ever read, not excluding even those of "The Boys of England." There was a particularly haunting passage about tripe. Years afterwards I discovered that the volume was by one Charles Dickens and was entitled "Christmas Books."

ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

JEROME K. JEROME thinks he once met Dickens:

I have the idea that, when a little lad, I met and talked with Dickens one evening in Victoria Park. I made use of the incident in "Paul Kever."

I should doubt the possibility of any living reader not having been influenced in life and work by Dickens.

To myself his humour appeals as strongly now as when at first it broadened and sweetened my outlook on life. "David Copperfield" I have always considered his greatest book.

JEROME K. JEROME.

CECIL ALDIN on illustrating Dickens:

I regret I have no personal recollection of Charles Dickens.

I never enjoyed anything so much as when I was illustrating "The Pickwick Papers."

An artist might illustrate Dickens all his life, and never repeat himself. Every page of his work suggests an illustration.

The humour of Dickens must appeal, in any age, to any one who has any sense of humour himself.

CECIL ALDIN.

ROBERT HICHENS pays tribute:

I have no "personal recollection" to give you. I never saw Charles Dickens. I don't know that my work owes anything to that great man and unique genius. My life owes many hours of intense pleasure. I think his novels of immense value. I prefer "David Copperfield," as a whole, to the others. His humour seems to me undying. Can Mrs. Gamp, can Pecksniff, can Betsy Trotwood, Pickwick, Micawber, a hundred others die? I don't believe it. We pass, but they remain, to move new worlds to laughter. I not only admire Dickens's work. I love it.

ROBERT HICHENS.

G. S. STREET and the humanising power of Dickens:

I reply to your inquiry about Dickens as a matter of courtesy, but without the slightest hope that my opinion can be of any value, because, since I read him as a boy, I have very seldom even looked into him. There is a good deal of accident, I think, in one's re-reading of great authors: Thackeray, Sterne, Meredith, and some others I re-read constantly; Dickens, never. I don't possess an edition of him. When I do take up one of his books I turn to passages or characters I remember and read again with pleasure and admiration, but not with the feeling of familiar attraction I get from the others.

I think, of "the value of his novels," that they have done much to make English people more humane and kindly: but that they have promoted such a vast amount of joy and laughter is enough for gratitude. There is a fashion in modes of humour, no doubt: but real humour is real humour for always, and if anyone cannot be amused by Dickens he must be humourless.

G. S. STREET.

JOHN HASSALL translated "Pickwick" into German:

Personally, of course, I have no recollection of Charles Dickens, though my grandfather, the Rev. J. B. Owen, of Chelsea, used to meet him at dinners where all the guests used to hang on every word the great novelist uttered. My mother's impression of Dickens's readings of his Carol, in some hall somewhere near St. Martin's Lane, is chiefly of the ready manner in which he moved the audience to hearty laughter or real tears. This to me in his books is the chief charm, the mixture of true humour and deep pathos, which is exactly what happens in everyday life. I have no preference for any one volume, but I am no longer keen on the delightful "Pickwick Papers," as when I was at school in Germany we had to translate it (about three-fourths of it) into German! How the author would have wept if he could have understood the translations! This taught me patience, endurance and resignation, and my possession of these qualities can be indirectly attributed to his influence.

JOHN HASSALL.

The Death of Mr. Tulkinghorn.

"Mr. Tulkinghorn's time is over for evermore; and the Roman pointed . . . helplessly at him from night to morning, lying face downwards on the floor, shot through the heart."—From "Black House." Illustrated by Harry Furniss (Educational Book Co.)

LUCAS MALET

thinks him the greatest of all Novelists save Balzac.

(1) I have, I regret to say, no personal recollections of Charles Dickens.

(2) I am not conscious of any direct influence which he has had upon my life or work, save in so far as he has procured me an immense amount of enjoyment and taught me to understand many aspects of the English character.

(3) In my opinion, Charles Dickens, although lacking in knowledge of certain sections of society—learned and aristocratic—is not only the greatest of English novelists, but probably the greatest of all novelists, save Balzac. He is the first, and, so far, remains immeasurably the finest, writer of fiction produced by modern democracy in England. This fact will, indeed must, secure to him lasting interest and influence. As "a writer with a purpose" he is never guilty of sinking the artist in the reformer to the injury of his drama—a merit which cannot be too highly extolled.

I have no means of judging whether his humour appeals to readers of our day as strongly as to those of his own. But, I venture to assert, that those to whom his humour does not appeal must be rather hopelessly deficient in that most reconciling sense.

Among so many masterpieces, I hesitate to pronounce as to the greatest. Personally, "David Copperfield," "Nicholas Nickleby," and "The Tale of Two Cities," appeal to me most.

MARY ST. LEGER HARRISON.

(LUCAS MALET.)

BEATRICE HARRADEN

prefers "Oliver Twist" and the "Tale of Two Cities."

I love, and have always loved Dickens's books. I suppose "David Copperfield" is his greatest, but my favourites are "Oliver Twist" and "The Tale of Two Cities."

BEATRICE HARRADEN.

FRANK REYNOLDS

on Dickens's humour :

I think that any feeling I may have for character and character drawing is very largely due to reading Dickens as a boy. With regard to his humour, he certainly amuses me, but then I've grown up with him—as it were—and this no doubt makes a difference. People who find him laborious and out of date appear to forget that he is still the source of a good deal of modern humour. Of all his books I prefer "Pickwick," though the early part of "Copperfield" strikes me as his finest work.

FRANK REYNOLDS.

ARTHUR MORRISON

finds all Dickens's works delightful :

I fear it is quite impossible to give my opinion of the value of the novels of Charles Dickens in any such space as I have time to fill now. Whether or not his humour appeals as strongly to readers of this day as to those of his own, depends on the readers. If it does not, I am sorry for them and for their loss; but I see no reason to suppose any such sudden national decadence. Nor can I say which I consider his greatest book; for it is a peculiar property of his books to seem to me but one long and very delightful work, as easy and unfettered in form and progress as any of its separate chapters.

ARTHUR MORRISON.

MARY E. MANN

remembers a Dickens' reading :

(1) I was taken as a child to hear him read in order that for all my life mine might be the honour and glory of having seen Charles Dickens. I remember that I was bored through the trial scene from Pickwick, and recall that my father—a Dickens devotee—grumbled that "the man did not realise his own conception of Buzfuz." I remember, too, waking up to delighted recognition when Dickens, in the person of little Bob Cratchit, carried Tiny Tim on his shoulder across the stage. It is evidence perhaps of the vividness of this representation that now so many years are passed, I have to call my reason to confute the illusion that the immortal child in the flesh was not in his creator's arms.

(2) Certainly not my work. For I have always held that Dickens is inimitable and that his imitators are and should be accursed.

(3) That they are invaluable. That I cannot imagine what my own life, especially my youth, would have been without the companionship of Mrs. Nickleby, of darling Paul Dombey (loved and wept over, in spite of my better judgment) of Toots, and the Marchioness, and little Pip, of Fanny Squeers and the Dorrit family. His humour does not appeal to the present age. Hardly any school boys or girls read Dickens for choice. Booky youths and maidens speak of him as a negligible acquaintance, they no longer hail him as one supremely loved. The general reader, escaped in some inexplicable way from his thralldom, pronounces him vulgar, and does not perceive that he is divine. The men and women and children, rich and poor, great and lowly, cultured and uncultured, whose idol Charles Dickens was, were emphatically not of this generation.

MARY E. MANN.

W. J. LOCKE

on the superior person and the greatness of Dickens:

(1) For a writer to "gauge the influence that another" writer has had on his work is an exceedingly difficult matter, unless he boldly and avowedly imitates his hero, or unless it is a question of mere tricks of style; and for one who holds that colour in all forms of art should be clear and not muddy to say what he owes to such a crystal clear colourist as Dickens is more difficult still. I can, however, safely state that I have never been conscious of Dickens in any of my work, whereas I have often had to

"shoo" away the tricky ghost of Sterne or (dangerous and delectable phantom!) the will-o'-the-wisp spirit of Anatole France. That, generally, Dickens has had a profound influence on my literary life there can be no doubt. But then so have Shakespeare, the Bible and Rabelais and other immortals whom I have chosen as intimate deities.

(2) The mere fact of my putting Dickens among the immortals answers the first point. His humour, compounded of the divine elements of tears and laughter, ought to be eternal. Of course there will always be the superior person (generally very young) to whom Mr. Micawber, Sairey Gamp, and Mr. Pickwick make no appeal; but, thank Heaven, those who wear the whole armour of culture are, after all, few in this world, and the simple-minded (and of such is the kingdom of the immortals) are many.

(3) I think "David Copperfield" is his greatest work—on account of the balance of its construction, the subtle playfulness of its humour and the restraint of its deep pathos.

W. J. LOCKE.

WILLIAM DE MORGAN

believes he owes Dickens everything:

(1) Unhappily I have no personal recollections. I wish it were otherwise.

(2) In my opinion I owe Charles Dickens everything that a pupil can owe to his master—to his head-master. Whether I have succeeded in rising above mere imitation is a point I leave to my readers. My own memory of Charles Dickens is simply one of unmixed gratitude and plenary acknowledgment of obligation.

(3) It is impossible to assign a value to any work without a standard of comparison. In the case of the two great novelists of last century, Dickens and Thackeray, there is no such unit among English writers, except Shakespeare. To make the comparison would be presumptuous, unless one gave to it the study of a lifetime. Humour always appeals most to its own age. Keeping this in view, I should say Dickens's humour showed an exceptional vitality. I meet people now and then who deny it, but have always found their own samples of humour, produced at my request, the reverse of exhilarating.

I think there can be no doubt which is his greatest book. But autobiographic parallel is such a powerful engine in fiction that it is scarcely fair to his other works to place them in competition with it. Conceive the

"In easy state upon this couch, there sat a jolly Giant, glorious to see; who bore a glowing torch."

From "A Christmas Carol," Illustrated by Charles Green.
(Messrs. A. & F. Pears.)

difficulty of writing the "Tale of Two Cities," as against "David Copperfield."

WM. DE MORGAN.

PERCY WHITE

describes a Dickens reading :

When I was a boy I heard him give one of his last readings, and I still vividly recall the impression he made on me. The reading was given in the Hall, afterwards known as Mellison's Skating Rink, which had just been built, and was used then for "entertainments" for the first time. The scene he acted, rather than read, from "David Copperfield," dealt with the flight of Little Em'ly. What chiefly struck me was the enormous vitality—"magnetism" they now call it—of the man. He swept his audience away on the stream of his own emotions, thrilled them with every tone and suggestion his voice, words and brilliant eyes conveyed. The intense mental activity blazing in his face, his beautiful moving voice held the audience

Charles Dickens. 1869

From a photograph by Ben Gurney, New York spellbound. It was a magnificent exhibition of a man's control of human feeling; "theatrical," perhaps, to some extent, judged by modern methods, yet unforgettable. The physical strain of those readings, however, was even to my boyish eyes tremendous, and I doubt not that the great novelist paid for those triumphs by a shortened life.

PERCY WHITE.

G. K. CHESTERTON is brief but emphatic :

(1) Personal recollection . . . —Nothing.

(2) Whether life or work owes anything to influence . . . —Everything.

(3) Personal opinion of value of his novels—His novels have long been independent of anybody's personal opinion. I consider that his humour appeals more to readers of the present day. I think his greatest book is "Pickwick."

G. K. CHESTERTON.

ABOUT POETRY.*

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

IT has not been uncommon amongst those, each for his time, unique personages the Professors of Poetry at Oxford, to divide their pralections between continuous "courses" and individual discourses. Mr. Mackail has already communicated his own exercises in the former kind to the world; now he gives the latter, with some additions originally delivered to extra-academical audiences. The book is welcome, and its contents are interesting. We have an initial attempt at that Dark Tower (which, unlike the other, lies in the middle of the fairest possible champaign) the "Definition of Poetry," and a corresponding coda on the "Progress of Poetry." Between them there is an eleven of miscellaneous essays—"Poetry and Life"; two on Virgil and Virgiliana; two on Arabian poetry; one on Dante; two on Shakespeare; one apiece on the "Poetry of Oxford," "Imagination," and "Keats." These subjects undoubtedly compose a good lucky-bag; neither will the dipper therein often dip in vain.

Some such dippers are most likely to be disappointed if they draw the "Arabian" articles. There could be no reason against, but much for, the selection of the subject. Among the greatest critical products of the

* "Lectures on Poetry." By J.W. Mackail. 10/6 net. (Longmans.)

Chair—with no companions indeed (I do not, of course, speak of living past occupants) except the work of Copleston, Keble and Arnold—ranks the De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum of Lowth; and Hebrew certainly might make room beside her for her younger sister, Arabic. But, unfortunately, we learn at once that Mr. Mackail knows no Arabic except from translations; and (apologising for bluntness) it must be said that he who knows nothing about poetry except from translations knows nothing about it at all. Nor is this the worst. He has two translators before him—Sir Charles Lyall and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt. Sir Charles's knowledge of literary Arabic is well-known; Mr. Blunt's intimacy with the Arabs of recent and present times is already a matter of history. Which of them gives the original more exactly the present writer cannot say, for, like Mr. Mackail, he knows no Arabic. But what he can say, as a practised critic in divers languages at divers times, is that Mr. Blunt's versions are very much more like late nineteenth century English poetry than Sir Charles Lyall's. And Mr. Mackail obviously, indeed confessedly, prefers them. It is, of course, possible that Arabian poets of the "times of ignorance" wrote like the Sonnets of Proteus, but it is difficult not to fancy that it is the Protean quality, that attracts Mr. Mackail rather than the Arabian. At any rate one impartial reader has been constantly reminded during the perusal of these essays of the innocent Blair's open avowal that when he thought so highly of Ossian it was because Ossian was like Homer and Virgil and the Bible.

This objection applies nowhere else ; and though there may be others they are less fatal, indeed, not fatal at all as one fears this is. You never can make a Definition of Poetry ; and Mr. Mackail knows it, and says it, thereby proving himself to be a not unworthy or unsavoury professor of Poetry itself. You can only make shots at it, and your St. Sebastian catches the nearest arrows in his hand, and casts them away with a gracious smile. Mr. Mackail's shot, describing rather than defining poetry as a matter of "pattern" and "repeat," appears to have annoyed some people very much ; why, it is impossible for others to see. "Pattern" is no doubt an unlucky word, especially when it is frequently repeated in Mr. Mackail's somewhat Arnoldian fashion. In sense it is rather mechanical ; in sound it rhymes to "slattern" and suggests "patter" and "patten" with a compound pictorial image, arising in consequence, which is not perhaps happy. But in itself it goes as near to one side of "the martyred body of our saint" as well may be. Moreover, Mr. Mackail, in many places of the three more abstract essays, the two first and the last, is all but absolutely sound on the most important thing of all, the independence of poetry as regards Subject. It is curious that he should have thought it "a paradox" to say that "no subject is in itself more or less poetical than another," that "no subject is poetical at all except in so far as poetry takes it," that "a subject does not inspire poetry ; it is poetry that inspires a subject." This is Apollo's own truth : but Patrizzi and Pinciano had said it centuries, Hazlitt and Hugo decades, before Mr. Mackail was born. So, too, there is a golden sentence, in one of his Virgilian essays, in which he ventures to point out that an "Ur-Iliad" never existed. But one is sometimes tempted to ask whether these admirable deliverances, as well as others, in which, like Coleridge, he almost or altogether admits that metre is essential to poetry, are not in a manner resipiscences. If "the subject does not inspire poetry" how is it that the "fully socialistic commonwealth" will "produce a nobler poetry" ? It is only the subject that will have changed there. So, too, the sentence about the Ur-Iliad would be infinitely more comforting if it did not come pages after (therefore not disannulling) a most disheartening statement that "the delicate and rigorous processes of modern analysis" have fixed the Ciris "within twenty years, or thereabout, after the death of Catullus," and that "it was written by Gallus" at the time when he and Virgil were friends. O Bakespearism ! O days when people used to deal out Henry VI. like a pack of cards to Marlowe and Peele and Kyd and Greene and the rest of them ! Here are all our old friends of that time back again, and Mr. Mackail is of the company ! How, in the name of that delicate and rigorous instrument, the fiddlestick, can you be certain that a particular piece of a literature—of which infinitely the greater part is lost and of which the very literary history, so to speak, is almost a blank save for later traditions—was "written within twenty years or thereabout" of "Barkis is Willin', says you."

From "David Copperfield." Illustrated by W. Groom.
(W. Collins, Sons & Co.)

a given date ? The present writer loves criticism as well as he loves anything short of poetry ; but this is not criticism, it is "hariolation."

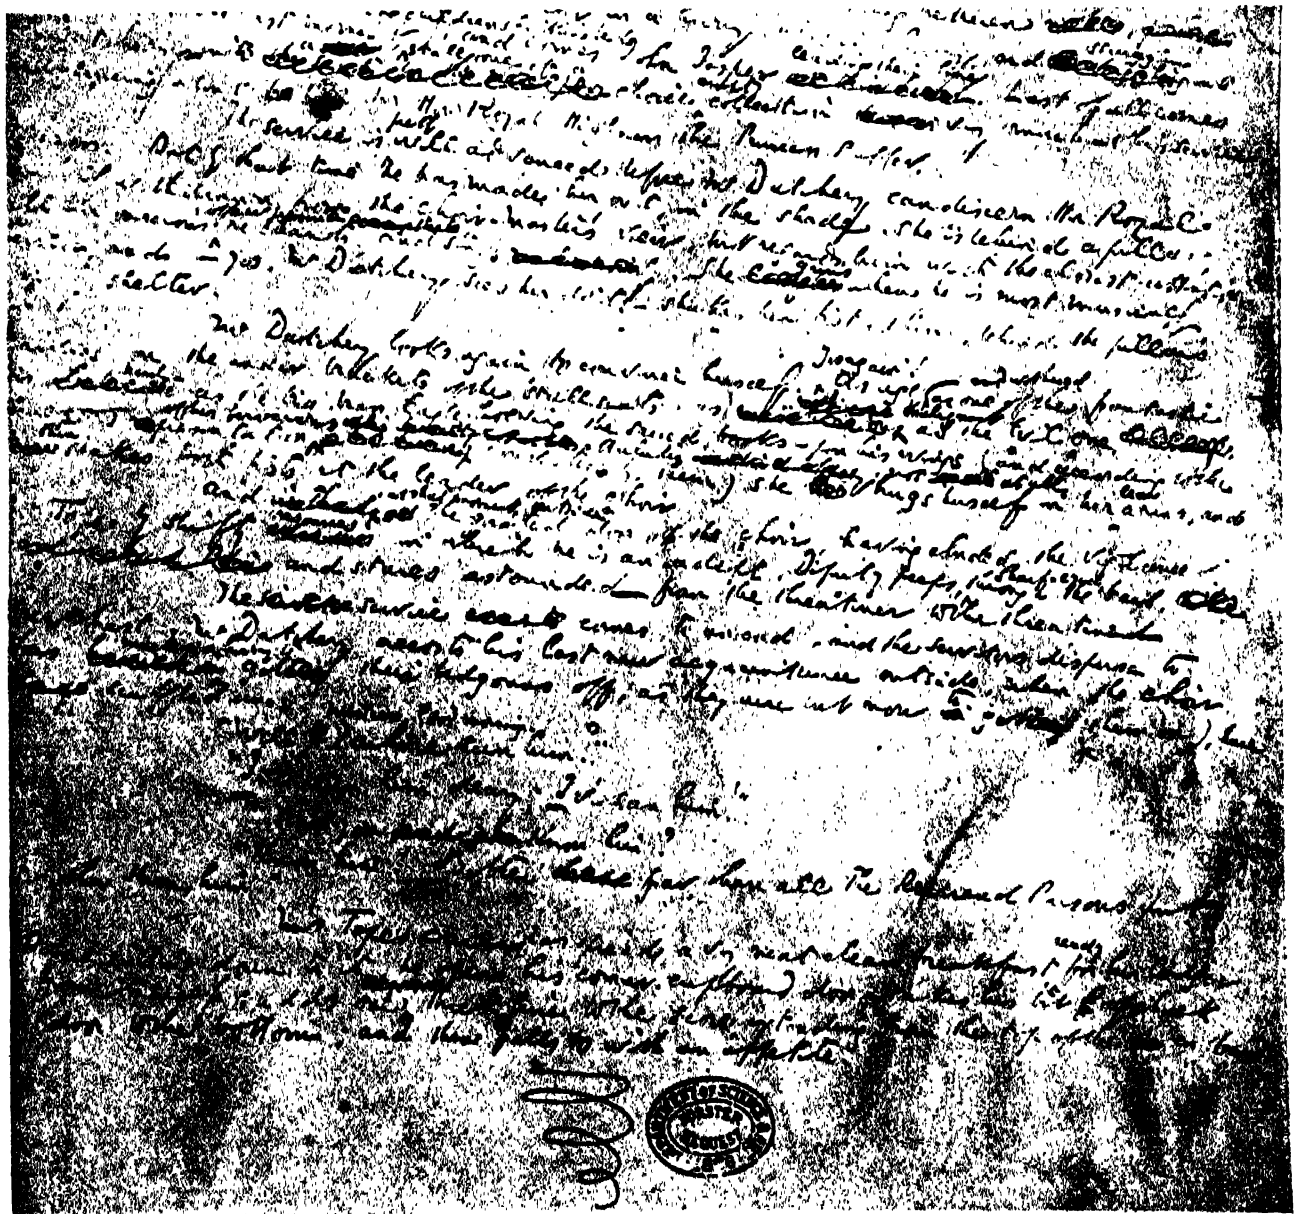

However, Mr. Mackail is so sound on most of the major questions that one has no desire to pick a quarrel with him. He is perhaps rather hard on Macaulay when he contrasts his phrase of "illusion" with Shelley's of "revelation" for Poetry. "Illusion" meant to Thomas Babington almost exactly what "revelation" meant to Percy Bysshe ; and though the state of the latter was in a more gracious heaven, it was not relatively so different. In the paper on "Poetry and Life," the apparently promised working out of a parallel between Hesiod and Langland in contrast to Homer and Chaucer seems to stop short somehow ; and the Greek poet of the people is rather left out in the cold while Mr. Mackail is warming his socialist fingers over Piers Plowman's fire. And is Troilus and Criseide a "greater" poem than the Vision ? There are critics who would say that they are incommensurable though both great. The Virgilian pair has especial interest because of the many lines which Mr. Mackail's enthusiasm takes. Perhaps, from the cool point of view of general criticism, there is nothing more in Virgil's favour than the extremely different sides from which "Maronolaters" seem to approach their idol. The Roman patriot, the nature-poet, the ideal of "correctness," the ingenious patcher and piecer of almost every constituent of the school-epic into a sort of sealed pattern of it ; the consummate exponent of "pity"—he is all this to them, and it is certainly much. The veriest Devils' Advocate, or the critic who says: "All this is true, but somehow the total does not appeal to me," must admit a kind of uniqueness in it. Mr. Mackail seems to be specially attracted to the "pity" side; but he puts them all well. And, though there are very many false doctrines on the subject, the True God of Criticism loves an enthusiastic praiser, so long as he is likewise intelligent, beyond any other of his servants.

It is difficult to be other than desultory in reviewing such a book as this, which is itself necessarily quodlibetal. But there are a few other points that we may mention. In his remarks on the distinction between poetry and prose Mr. Mackail seems, naturally enough, to have given more attention to poetry, and while he has made the division clear on that side he has left it rather cloudy on the other. A true distinguo requires clearness on both sides. In regard to the Arabian matter it seems rather a pity that, if he dealt with it at all, he did not follow out in a different direction his fruitful conjecture of a possible relation between the Eastern Greek poets of the Anthology and the Arabs; and he might, perhaps, consider whether a reversal of the Eastern-Western influence which he, like most people, assumes, might not be traced in another and Western-Eastern line. Chansons de Geste certainly existed before the first Crusade; and such a story as that of Zumurrud and Ali Shahr (unaccountably left out of the Gallandian versions of the Arabian Nights though duly given by Lane) is infinitely more suggestive of a Western romance corrupted by Eastern touches than of the opposite.

One or two positive errors or over-statements may be noticed, arising chiefly from an apparent dislike on Mr. Mackail's part to the "perhaps" or the "I think," which others use. That Chaucer "established the decasyllable in English" may be allowed: for there is a certain blessed ambiguity in the word "established." But in none of the senses of that word is it true that he established the octosyllable, which was firmly niched more than a century before his birth. So, too, to call "The Two Gentleman of Verona" obiter "the earliest of the plays" is somewhat unscholarly. An early play it must be; one of the earliest it may very well be; but there is no evidence of any kind whatever to show that it is "the" earliest. Anyone may think it so, and say that he thinks it so; nobody, at least nobody of Mr. Mackail's class, should say that it is.

Facsimile of the last page of "Edwin Drood."

"Of the sentences he was then writing, the last of his long life of literature, a portion has been given in facsimile on a previous page; and the reader will observe with a painful interest . . . its evidence of minute labour at this fast-closing hour of time with him."—Forster's "Life of Dickens" (Chapman & Hall).

The essay on the open puzzle of the title "Commedia" is one of the best of the whole, though, perhaps, the writer considers (as one may, without impertinence, hold to be rather his way), somewhat too curiously, and does not, on the whole get very much beyond War-ton's eighteenth-century common-sense solution of the problem. And on the Sonnets, that is to say Shakespeare's Sonnets, he is not to be blamed if he does as others do—famously so long as they show others to be wrong; less when in non-destructive work they go beyond an "O Altitudo!" But let us close with two things, one the best, the other the worst in the book. Whether the popular notion, accepted by Mr. Mackail, of Shakespeare's having gone through some particular period of mal moral at the time of the great tragedies is anything but moonshine, may be a debatable point. But the present writer never knew it justify itself so well as in a passage here. The critic, comparing the episode to Dante's famous passage through the bath of fire at the top of Purgatory, proceeds to quote the incomparable sequel of the apparition of Matilda in Paradise, and simply adds "Her name in Shakespeare is Miranda, Perdita, Imogen." "It is only a conceit," somebody may say. Perhaps, but there are some who think that not a few of the greatest things in literature are to be found among conceits, and one William Shakespeare seems not to have disagreed with them.

So agreeable is it that one has to go back to it, and to its suggestion of the waters of Lethe and Eunoe, to wash away if possible, and to forgive at least as a critical Christian, a terrible phrase which meets us almost in the very last lines of the book. Here, Mr. Mackail, as "a son of Oxford," speaks of his mother as "that elderly but irrepressible enchantress." Now, enchantresses are sometimes old, or look so (for they are not really), but they are never "elderly." And though they always are, or ought to be, irresistible, they leave to quite a different class of persons the quality of being "irrepressible." An "elderly but irrepressible enchantress" suggests, no doubt, divers actual types—Mrs. Bardell, Flora Finching, possibly even Blanche Amory

Charles Dickens and Little Nell.

A statue group by Frank Edwin Elwell, in Frank Park, Philadelphia, U.S.A.

when she had been for some years Madame la Comtesse de Montmorenci de Valentinois. But Oxford? However, there is no need of extended comment. As a poet whom Mr. Mackail knows very well once wrote in another matter:—

"Besides, it is King Guilbert's lot, Whatever he says, she answers not."

Nor need any of her other sons answer for her.

New Books.

BIBLE LETTERS OF GEORGE BORROW.*

A linguistic friend recently told the writer that, when he was about to learn a new language, the first step he took was to go to the British and Foreign Bible Society for a New Testament in that particular tongue. Polyglottism has always been the special hobby of the Society and it was in the work of building up this reputation for linguistic versatility that George Borrow succeeded in proving his value. It is far from easy as a rule for a linguist to make a substantial mark. Some have maintained that the special faculty of acquiring languages rapidly is associated, more often than not, with a small brain capacity. Cardinal Mezzofanti was a case in point, and so it has been held was Sir Andrew Aguecheek, who had Greek and Latin as well as any man in Illyria. Dr. Walsh maintained, with some skill, that no man could attain more than one language in anything approaching perfection. Some who repudiate these ideas would adopt the view that Borrow was never a great linguist or anything like it, but was at best a mere smatterer in out of the way tongues. But even granting him linguistic capacity, it is no easy matter on such a basis to find such a man as Borrow a legitimate and profitable field for the exercise of his talents. Migration is the condition which sets this gift upon a pedestal. It may be done mentally, by translation, or physically, by travel. But translation in an ordinary way is one of the worst paid industries in the world. Travel to be profitable must usually be commercial, diplomatic or scientific. Borrow was not a man of science, nor was he, like Prior, Lowell or Motley, a man of letters and diplomat interchangeable. Eventually, he assumed almost every rôle to which traveller could aspire; he was in a way a commercial agent, a literary colporteur, a diplomatist and a linguistic explorer. His "Letters to the Bible Society," now first published in full, make clearer than ever before that he was engaged at first solely in the capacity of an expert. He was favourably known to persons of influence on the Society's Committee as an adept at learning hard languages. He was wanted to go to

* "Letters of George Borrow to the British and Foreign Bible Society." Published by Direction of the Committee. Edited by T. H. Darlow. 7s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Charles Dickens
(1864)

From a photograph by Mason.

St. Petersburg and to superintend the preparation, cleaning and printing-off of a Manchu translation of the Bible the printed formes of which had been injured by the great flood of the Neva in 1824. This translation had gone through many vicissitudes, and it seems to have sprung in the first instance from a version made by a Jesuit, named Puerot, in days when the Manchu or Mandchou was a much more vital tongue than it subsequently became. In later days it was spoken only by the children of heaven; and, when spoken before Europeans, had first to be translated into Chinese and then retranslated from that comparatively familiar idiom. A good deal of the Bible was retranslated or revised by a writer in the Asiatic Department of the Russian Foreign Office, named Lipofstsoff, between 1821 and 1826. Why Lipofstsoff should not have been paid to pass this translation through the press himself is not very clear. Borrow was eventually selected for the work and we get a unique portrait of him in these pages showing off his paces in the most artless manner as an apt student of official Chinese. He had only had the necessary books a month when we find him writing to point out errors and mistranslations in his predecessor's version. The editorial secretary hardly sees how he can make effective progress without a Manchu grammar; but Borrow writes to show that the secretary is ludicrously mistaken. After six months study he gets the post at £200 a year and sets out for Petersburg armed with introductions to influential persons in the Russian Capital (July, 1833). Borrow had obtained a reputation in Norwich in days gone by as a rather scurrilous and, in the phrase of that day, "atheistic" person where sacred themes were under discussion. He had certainly belonged to a godless Taylorian clique in the city. His views may of course have changed; but it was not altogether surprising that some of his old associates should have laughed at his new found piety, his great zeal for hymns, homilies and pious tags, his profound earnestness in the cause of religion and virtue. More amusing though, because more characteristic, is the way in which he holds forth to the Rev. Mr. Jowett, the Editorial Superintendent of the Bible Society in his letters, upon the progress he is continuing to make in the Mandchou tongue. He is careful to select as a tutor a man who was twelve years a resident in Peking, and who speaks in the soft, subtle, and refined accent of the capital. He pays him about six shillings a lesson and grudges it not, inasmuch as the perfect acquisition of Mandchou is one of his most ardent wishes. He can already write Mandchou faster than English! He composes hymns in Mandchou. But he proceeds to warn the society explicitly against it. It is one of those deceitful tongues, the seeming simplicity of whose structure induces you to suppose, after applying for a month or two, that little more remains to be learned, but which after a year's assiduous study begin to reveal themselves in their true and formidable colours. He is soon submitting epigrams in Mandchou for the delectation of Bible House. The preparation of the type progressed apace and, by October, 1834, Borrow was writing to the excellent Mr. Jowett, "my proof-sheets are rushing in so fast that time is exceeding precious to me and I grudge every moment that is not devoted to my Maker or to my great undertaking." He was certainly not defective in the optical power of magnifying his undertaking. If moved "one inch" from his own proper course he threatens disaster to the whole enterprise. "I want no assistance but that of God and will accept of none." Borrow hoped that he might be employed to distribute Mandchou Bibles in central Asia and complete his journey home by way of Peking. He was disappointed in this ambition, but he did the journey in imagination so vividly that he came later on to believe that he had actually accomplished it in fact. As a solatium he obtained the roving commission which has made the "Bible in Spain" a sort of household word in Protestant circles. The application of Borrowian adventure to provincial meetings of the society had in fact proved a most valuable stimulus. Borrow sailed for Lisbon in November 1835. The four hundred and seventy pages that follow are mainly concerned with his wanderings in the Peninsula and are very largely identical with the text of the well-known classic. But to the curious student they supply an abundance of sidelights and characteristic touches. Here for instance is a letter from the Foreign Office to the Secretary of the Society in which one may recognise the Palmerstonian tartness among a thousand. It ends thus "I am directed to add that, under the circumstances, Lord* Palmerston considers it to be extremely desirable that the Bible Society should for the present prevent its agents from pursuing a system which is not only calculated to endanger the security of British subjects residing in Spain, but which at the same time cannot fail to be injurious to the cause which the Society are endeavouring to advance. When the civil war shall be over, and the internal affairs of that country shall have become more settled the benevolent exertions of the Society will have a better chance of being successful." We see Borrow's adventure here from the inside. His relations with his colleague (Lieutenant Graydon) and with his committee at home were far more precarious than we might have supposed. Externally his position was a good deal more secure than we might have had reason to think after a perusal of "The Bible in Spain." Borrow knew how to enhance our sense of these perils in the most delicious manner and to convey the impression that St. Paul's adventures and voyages after his were relatively humdrum. The pecuniary side of the story and its details, the frequency of Borrow's appeals for money, and the minute care with which this Daniel in the Lion's Den provides for the immediate future insensibly undermines our former implicit belief in the nonchalant heedlessness and childlike faith of our Spanish Apostle. The letters administer an ingredient which Borrow sedulously eschewed. The world at large will probably continue to prefer the documents in the artistic and sophisticated form given them by the Word Master. But all who are curious as to the evolution of a masterpiece, all who like to get behind the scenes, all those who hunger to know how literary proprietary articles are made and to resolve them into their constituent components of aloes, ginger, and soap, will not fail to study this extremely interesting and decorative volume, which looks externally like a Tudor Translation and has, indeed, as many will think, a good deal of the old Buccaneer-of-the-Spanish-Main attraction about it. Borrow's expressions at times are worthy of a period when men of English birth foamed with fury at the thought of the Spanish Inquisition. "Dark Madrid," he says, but dark is an epithet which "I thank God I may now drop, for can that city justly be called 'dark' in which thirteen hundred Testaments at least are in circulation and in daily use?" The interest in Borrow can hardly be anything other than very much alive at the present day in which it is no recondite fact that no less than three distinct lives of the great Gilano are in a state of active preparation. To all really interested in the facts, as contrasted with the fictions, of his career this book cannot fail to prove of capital importance.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

THREE QUEENS*

In a day when the rapid book-maker flourishes, when a writer "gets up" his subject in the same way as a barrister his brief, it is refreshing to come across such a work as Miss Greenwood's "Lives of the Hanoverian Queens of England." Miss Greenwood works leisurely. The first volume of this work appeared in 1909, and at the end of 1911 the second volume was issued. It is clear, therefore, that the author is making a bid for a higher renown than do most writers of the present day, and consequently it is due to her that she should be judged by a standard higher than that applied by an amiable reviewer to the authors who aspire to no more than a cursory reading during the season in which their book appears. The latter class appeals to the circulating library public that wants history or biography in solution, with the romantic side of the subject—which is also too often the fictitious side—brought out into strong relief. Miss Greenwood's "Queens of England" will doubtless command a handsome proportion of the circulating library public, but its appeal is less to that than to the serious historical student, who will assuredly put it on his shelves as a companion, as well as a sequel, to Miss Strickland's volumes on the predecessors of the Hanoverian Queens of England.

* "Lives of the Hanoverian Queens of England." By Alice Drayton Greenwood. Vol. II. Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Queen of George III.; Amelia Elizabeth Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of George IV.; Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen, Queen of William IV. 10s. 6d. net. (George Bell & Sons, Ltd.)

If these queens are happy in their biographer, it must be confessed that the biographer is happy in her subjects. The unhappy Sophia Dorothea of Celle, the clever managing Caroline of Anspach, the narrow-minded Charlotte Sophia, the irresponsible Caroline of Brunswick, and the sober Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen, are a quintet that, while it may tax the powers of character-drawing of any writer, must give great variety to the labour of whosoever attempts to depict it. Therein is material for the exercise of judgment. Was Sophia Dorothea of Celle guilty or merely foolish? Was Caroline of Brunswick innocent or more than vastly indiscreet? Perhaps these are not the most important questions: they are without doubt those upon which Miss Greenwood's opinions will be sought and discussed. That is human nature. No one ever talks of Queen Adelaide, though that royal lady will take a higher place in many minds when Miss Greenwood's essay has been read. One's opinions of Caroline of Anspach and Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz are fixed. But the compelling interest is in Dorothea and the second Caroline. There is in their lives that touch of drama, that touch of tragedy too, that makes the whole world turn to whatever is written about them. The others by comparison led humdrum lives: these two are among the heroines of history—the women remorselessly persecuted by persons from whom there was practically no appeal. Caroline, it is true, enlisted the sympathies of Parliament in her earlier days, and contrived to hold up to obloquy a shameless husband; and in later days secured the suffrages of the people to such an extent that the highest tribunal in the land dared not allow to pass a Bill that declared her guilty. Even those who believed she had sinned could not bring themselves to pronounce her guilty, rightly holding that whatever she had done was condoned by the behaviour of her consort. Had the House of Lords found Caroline guilty, the House of Commons would certainly have thrown out the Bill. But had the Lords passed the Bill, it is possible that the Bill would never have come to the Lower House, for such, indeed, was the temper of the people at this time that an adverse verdict might have meant the overthrow of the monarchy. The Prince Regent hated his wife so much that he would have faced the risk; but the ministers could not consent to do so, and there can have been few scenes in the entire history of Parliament since Cromwell ejected the members more dramatic than when Lord Liverpool rose, and moved that his own Bill be read that day six months.

In that part of her preface which deals with authorities, Miss Greenwood writes: "Southey's 'Authentic Memoirs of George III.,' which sometimes appears in lists, seems to be an imaginary reference. No such work is to be traced, unless it is a misnomer for the anonymous 'George III.: His Court and Family' (2 vols., 1820)." These lines are peculiarly interesting to the present writer, as he is one of those who, in a list of contemporary books on George III., has included Southey's (not Southey) "Authentic Memoirs of George III.," and he can assure Miss Greenwood that this is not an imaginary reference, nor is the work confounded with "George III.: His Court and Family," which latter (why deponent knoweth not) is usually ascribed to John Gait, who was not innocent of the crime of pot-boiling. Indeed, the present writer is the proud possessor of a copy of the "Authentic Memoirs," no other copy of which he has yet been able to trace in any public or private library, though doubtless there are many in existence. The full title-page is as follows:

"Authentic Memoirs of our late Venerable and Beloved Monarch George the Third, whose Exemplary Piety and Virtues have shed during the longest Reign, over a period the most eventful and important in the Annals of History, so bright a lustre. Compiled chiefly from private sources of authenticity, and comprising numerous interesting Anecdotes of his late Majesty, the Royal Family, Nobility, &c., never before published. To which will be added particulars of his late Majesty's illness, Funeral Ceremonies, &c., with the Correspondence of the present Queen, on the Subject of the Coronation. By Robert Southy, Esq. 'I wish that every poor child in my Dominions should be able to read the Bible.' Expression of our late Pious and Benevolent King. London: Published by J. Jones & Co., No. 6, Warwick Square, Paternoster Row, and Sold by all Booksellers and News-men. 1820. Entered at Stationers Hall."

In spite of the promise of the title-page, any value that the book may possess is entirely due to its rarity. Who Robert Southy was no one seems to know. Can it be that he was some poor denizen of Grub Street desirous to lure a careless public to buy his book under the impression that it was by the author of "The Life of Nelson"? Perish the thought!

LEWIS MELVILLE.

THE CENTAUR.*

What Maurice Guérin dared not do, Mr. Algernon Blackwood has done, and done triumphantly. Taking the wildest and strangest of old Greek myths, he has brought it into close relation with the actual life of the modern world. His "Centaur" is the masterpiece of the new romantic movement. The ingenuity with which it is composed is, however, somewhat too patent: it draws off the attention from the main idea. Instead of putting his extraordinary study in mysticism in a modern frame, Mr. Blackwood makes, so to speak, a series of sandwiches, with alternating layers of his strange, beautiful, philosophical romance and of his ordinary matter-of-fact atmosphere. Certainly he manages to get in this way the connection between life and imagination at which he aims, but we often find ourselves admiring his literary skill, when we ought to be carried away by the strength and passion of his feelings. The simpler and easier form of composition would, we think, have been more effective.

Yet in spite of the way in which it is interrupted, his story makes the impression he intended. It touches the imagination and fills the mind with new ideas. Conceived in a very curious vein of pagan mysticism, "The Centaur" is both the interpretation of an ancient view of nature and a study of the modern romantic temperament. Much of its strange force is due to the fact that a multitude of persons in Christendom is now in a frame of mind similar to that of the classic pagans. Robbed of the beliefs of their fathers, and yet unwilling to acquiesce in the vision of annihilation which is all that science can offer them, they build up, out of their restless and unsatisfied longings, the old, wild, superstitious ideas of heathendom. Rather than let their feelings starve and wither, they are ready to deify the blind forces of nature, or let their imagination run riot amid the fancies of Oriental gnosticism. To these temptations of the modern spirit, Mr. Blackwood has fallen in some of his earlier tales of horror and mystery. He felt he would rather surround himself with the terrors and ghosts of primitive days, than let his feelings grow slack and cold for want of exercise. As a merchant of antidotes against the comfortable dullness of civilisation, he was as remarkable as Mr. Rudyard Kipling and Mr. Henry James. Lately, however, he has found in the works of William James a clearer and higher source of inspiration.

Terence O'Malley, the hero of "The Centaur," was an Irishman of the modern pagan mystical school. In him, the romantic desire to escape from civilisation became something more than the call of the wild. He loved the wilderness only because he obtained there strange ecstasies of the spirit in which he seemed to reach to the souls of things.

* "The Centaur." By Algernon Blackwood. 6s. (Macmillan.)

All the material universe was to him a spiritual system : the earth lived, and the creatures that she carried on her bosom were but incarnations of her moods. Mr. W. B. Yeats, it will be remembered, is inspired by a pagan mysticism of this sort ; but it is with a certain timidity that he uses it in trying to revive the faery myths of ancient times. Mr. Blackwood is bolder and, it may be, more sincere. His Centaur is put forward as a real embodiment of a mood of nature : he stands for everything vaguely working in the neo-romantic mind of the present day—the desire to escape from our mean and stifling civilisation, the wild longing for a larger personality, and for some miraculous control over the material part of life. The extraordinary truth of feeling with which Mr. Blackwood portrays O'Malley, who represents the best qualities of the modern romantic temper, makes the introduction of the Centaur as natural and inevitable as anything in modern fiction. Finding then that the way of escape into the larger freedom of the spirit means a loss of his personality, O'Malley at first hesitates, but after seeing in a vision the lovely life of the spirit, he goes out on the great adventure. The whole tale is a beautiful allegory, close in touch with actual life but somewhat pagan in feeling. It is quite the best thing that Mr. Blackwood has yet given us.

THE RESURRECTION IN ANCIENT EGYPT.*

It should be understood in the first place that, according to the mind of Dr. Budge and by the negative testimony of all extant memorials, there is no reason to postulate, in connection with the cultus of Osiris, the existence of any expectation that the physical part of the Egyptian believer would be raised from the death-state. At the same time there did enter into the life of the other world a certain spiritual body which continued "for ever and ever," as the vehicle of the individual soul, and this transit was termed a resurrection. It appears to have lived thereafter in a state of liberation and had the freedom of heaven and earth. The resurrection of this body depended on religious ceremonies performed by priests on earth. These in their turn depended on the life and immortality brought to light by the divine mission of Osiris. The ceremonies were funereal, and were accompanied by sacrificial offerings which seem to have been equal in importance with the liturgical rites and the rest of the great body of observances. Why in connection with these it was necessary, or at least desirable, to embalm the physical corpse does not appear from the texts ; but Dr. Budge supposes (a) that "the eternal welfare of its spiritual constituents" somehow depended thereon, for the simple reason (b) that the Egyptians were much too practical to have undertaken the task otherwise. This notwithstanding, he tells us otherwise, that the fate of the body was unimportant, comparatively speaking, "provided that the sacred words of the liturgy of the dead had been said over it." I am putting here with the uttermost simplicity what is in truth an involved question, because more than one kind of soul and more than one spiritual body were recognised in Egypt. Of these it is impossible to speak in a brief notice ; and so also I omit from consideration what may have happened to the majority of the dead, for example, on the field of battle, who were deprived of funereal ceremonies, to say nothing of the embalming process. The intimations are wanting on this subject, but they may have benefited in some way by the priestly recitation, "probably at regular intervals during the year," of the spells, incantations and other formulæ contained in the oldest known recension of the "Book of the Dead."

The immortal and impassible body, vehicle of the higher soul, was a counterpart of that which the individual bore on earth. It was certainly an arch-natural body, but it is described throughout in the terms of flesh and blood. So also the beatified life in the kingdom of Osiris, which was attained by the justified man, was in the image and likeness of this world. But behind such surface teaching lies all that which is implied by many indications that the redeemed being, and citizen of the heavenly kingdom, was made one with the creative power which operates in the universe, and that he was incorporated with the supreme rulership of Osiris. The titles for the attainment of this state are summarized in the word justified, which I have just used. Those who attained to the kingdom so did in virtue of sanctity, or sanctity at least is presupposed concerning them. They had "satisfied all requirements" and were not "accused of sin." As such, the resurrection to the life beyond was made in them perfect ; they entered into the divine generations and counted no longer amidst those of earth. The pantheon of Egypt, represented by the palmary divinities therein, was concerned actively in the raising of the faithful dead. Horus included him among the company of the gods ; Horus gave sight to his eyes ; Isis and Nephthys endued him with divine strength ; he was united with Osiris and was in a sense identified with him, as indeed with all gods in turn. Their stories were his stories ; their acts and attainments were his

To what extent the required sanctity was of the vital order, and to what extent it was artificial or imputed, is difficult to determine. Dr. Budge says that, according to the texts, life everlasting "could only be acquired by those who had lived righteous lives on earth." But he says also (a) that the sin of yesterday was blotted out by the offerings of to-day ; (b) that every offence was atoned for in this manner ; and (c) that "ceremonial cleanliness of body" made pure in every way. The question arises whether certain texts, separated from certain practices, did not represent a standard which came to be regarded as impracticable. Dr. Budge implies this when he says that "as no man could possibly fulfil the demands of the law, it was the mercy of Osiris which ultimately decided the fate of the soul." He who himself had risen and entered into the radiant life of heaven was the resurrection and the life of those who died in the faith of him, having also lived in that faith, in any case so far as external observances were concerned. The ground of the great mystic possibility was that Osiris himself had been once an inhabitant of this earth and was "the first man who had raised himself from the dead." So rose the believer, so also ascended on the ladder of the gods, to be joined with his own spirit in the second birth of the life beyond

The next question and it is one which is most important of all—is whether the root-matter of the history of Osiris—his life, his death and dismemberment, his resurrection and ascension—can be credited with a meaning which would lift it out of the common path of mythologies. In a word, is it simply part and parcel of the story-making which built up the gods of old, or is there any mystic sense veiled thereby ? We know well enough that in many countries and at many ages of the world the progression of the initiated soul is presented under the aspects of mystical death, mystical rising and translation to heaven. Unfortunately, there is no hint of such a possibility in the critical apparatus of these volumes, otherwise so elaborate. To myself as a mystic, the scattered materials by means of which Dr. Budge has been enabled to reconstruct, firstly, the legend of Osiris and, secondly, the legend of the soul in its redemption, speak to me with trumpet voices, but it is after another manner than the message conveyed in external ritual procedure and the great host of observances and beliefs by which the texts were overlaid. The doctrine of integration in the divine nature appears in these texts plainly ; the path by which it was attained is also plain ; it was one of devotion and of a perfect moral law. The fact that the code was much too high for general observance in Egypt and the fact that artificial substitutes were devised to get over the difficulty do not leave the original intent less clear. But if this sanctified law and this mystic doctrine are at the root of the religion of Osiris, one who is not an Egyptologist is disposed to wonder whether texts like the "Book of the

* "Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection." By E. A. Wallis Budge, M.A. Litt. D. Illustrated after drawings from Egyptian papyri and monuments. 2 vols. £2 net. (Lee, Warner.)

Dead " contain only funeral ceremonies ; and I understand that there is a growing tendency at the present day, among scholars of repute, to recognise the possibility of a more mystical interpretation of Egyptian doctrine and ritual than Dr. Budge might be prepared to acknowledge. It may be that there is an aspect of resurrection in Egypt which has not yielded its secret to all the care and learning in these memorable volumes. The author tells us on his own part that behind the whole mystery of religion in Egypt there is that of the ineffable God—unnamed, unknown and inscrutable. The veil of Isis has not been therefore lifted as to all that which was signified thereby and therein.

We know in conclusion the distinguished position occupied by Dr. Budge in his particular department of research. His latest contribution to the literature of Egyptology is perhaps the greatest of all. In a wonderful manner, as it seems to me, he has elucidated the obscurities of Egyptian religious beliefs, on their external side, by reference to those of modern African peoples, which in his view are perpetuations or reflections from the predynastic period.

A. E. WAITE.

POST-LIMINIUM.*

There is about all Lionel Johnson's work an austerity, a grave dignity, such as one might imagine, never having seen or spoken with him, to have been no less characteristic of the gesture of his hand or the poise of his head in speech or in thought. It holds itself aloof, and yet, from that remoteness, makes an appeal even more sure than if it had spoken intimacies in our ear. It was, in the curious and subtle meaning of that word, like its maker, aristocratic. None could have called it great ; and it had not that inevitable swiftness that startles the mind and holds fascinated the imagination. It was patient, rather ; and reserved. But its dignity had the effect of grandeur ; and its austere deliberation gave it an even excellence that, if it masked spontaneity on the one hand, shut out weakness on the other.

This was naturally most marked in his poetry, for poetry, even as it is the highest of arts, is the purest expression of a man's personality. It is also the chief characteristic of his prose. But in his prose one may see him unbend ; and the act conveys a curious sense of shock, inasmuch as it comes after a passage of grave earnestness, and is forthwith succeeded by further passages of that same earnestness. For example, he writes of Blake thus : " 'Blasted by excesses of light,' he may be, and too full of 'that fine madness,' common, as Plato knew, to poets : not a man for the straight waistcoat and the padded cell, but certainly touched somewhere." No one who has ever read his poetry, no one who has read such a poem as "Winchester" with its high manner and balanced workmanship, could ever conceive of his speaking of Blake as "touched." It strikes, somehow and somewhere, on a discordant note, that is not altogether set at rest by the flowing passages that follow after.

This is, however, a matter awoken by the circumstances of these "Essays and Critical Papers." They are, for the greater part, reviews of books in such papers as The Academy, The Spectator, The Outlook, The Speaker and The Daily Chronicle ; and they suffer from the natural difficulties that beset a man who cannot freely choose a subject or the manner of its delivery. As we look back on Lionel Johnson it becomes apparent to our minds that it was not he who was distinguished by writing for these papers, but these papers that were distinguished by association with his name ; and we therefore fall into the way of thinking, in our sentimental retrospect, that they no doubt recognised that honour and accorded him what books he wanted. Instead of which, he doubtless had to take such books as were sent him, thereby adjusting his quality to their quality, and to take trouble to maintain himself on the various reviewing staffs. Moreover, he had to write to the editorial column-measure : which is not always an inspiring thing to do ; and, more important still, he did not write with an eventual public in mind.

The result of this is that in not all these essays does he show that finished care and sense of balance that we look for in him. Mr. Whittemore speaks of this as an "unpretentious book." We may feel that it is a pity that an unpretentious book should lead the van in a collected edition of Lionel Johnson's works ; but the fact that Johnson did indeed find discomfort in the restrictions spoken of, may be discovered in the sudden sense of freedom we feel in the handful of essays in this book that are truly essays and not "critical papers," meaning reviews. This is chiefly remarkable in what has hitherto been virtually the only one of Johnson's short essays that has become at all known, "Party and Patriotism in Ireland," that Mr. Yeats had printed at the Cuala Press over three years ago with one of his own. It may be partly owing to the fact that it was first written for delivery as a lecture, but the fact remains that it is entirely unconstrained and unconfined ; it moves with flowing ease and inspiring cadence : qualities which are not always characteristic of all these essays. So again in the youthful lectures on "The Fools of Shakespeare," which, in its very circumlocutory manner, is full of a charm that is at freedom to exercise itself.

All this is only to say that Lionel Johnson was so fine and finished a writer that we expect the very best of him. There are not many critics who, from their hours of hack-work, could give us a volume such as "Post Liminium." Take, for example, the four essays on Walter Pater ; particularly the last of the four, the essay from The Fortnightly Review. There is more of the glow of true appreciation in these than in any of the one or two more pretentious books on Pater. So, too, when he writes on "O rare George Borrow !" or "Clarence Mangan" (an almost lonely article on the Irish bard) or "Coventry Patmore's Genius" or "Cardinal Newman." In each the subject gives a happy and accordant cue to the essayist, with the result that we receive an appreciation that sets us at one with the writer who woke it into being—which happens to be almost the only service a true critic can achieve.

Mr. Whittemore tells us that the title he has chosen for this book is "an old legal one" that "alludes to the right of a man, after a lapse of time, to enter into his own, over his former threshold." There can be no doubt surely, that the Collected Edition promised us, of which this is the first volume, will bring Lionel Johnson into his own. But it seems from the enclosed Prospectus that his best-known prose book "The Art of Thomas Hardy," is not to be included. It seems incredible, for the Poetry (the next volume to be issued) is his first title to his right ; "The Art of Thomas Hardy" is his second title ; and this present volume, full of excellent things as it is, is his third and completed title. And altogether a body of work remains that, if not for the general, will at least with the lovers of the finished things of literature be a continued joy and possession.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

MORE SINNED AGAINST—? *

It is seldom our lot to review a book of such interest and importance as this biography by Mr. Rafael Sabatini of one of the greatest figures in history. That Cesare Borgia was no saint Mr. Sabatini is the first to admit. He was beyond all doubt a remorseless egotist, cold, terrible, cruel and treacherous in an age when the same attributes were to be found in practically every man of first-rate importance throughout Europe and, above all, throughout the Italian peninsula. But Mr. Sabatini maintains, and, we think, rightly maintains, that Cesare's character has been undeservedly aspersed. This is not to say that Mr. Sabatini has set out with the express intention of "whitewashing"

* "The Life of Cesare Borgia." By Rafael Sabatini. 16s. net. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

* "Post-Liminius : Essays and Critical Papers." By Lionel Johnson. Edited by Thomas Whittemore. 6s. net. (Elkin Matthews.)

the Borgias. What he has done is to collate carefully, where necessary, the various sensational accounts upon which have been reared the myth of the stupendous infamies of the Borgias and to turn upon them the light of common sense and reason. To some extent this has already been done. No historian to-day accepts the picture of Lucrezia Borgia as given by Dumas and Victor Hugo. And in the same way Dr. Richard Garnett, writing in "The Cambridge Modern History," declines to saddle Cesare Borgia with the murder of the Duke of Gandia. But much still remains to the account of Cesare which, if not actually inaccurate, is at least "non-proven."

We may select as an example of Mr. Sabatini's methods the passage in which he deals with the accusation that Cesare caused the death of his brother-in-law, Alfonso of Aragon. He takes the narrative of Paolo Capello and examines individually the various remarkable statements of which it is composed. He shows that several of these statements are absolutely incredible and that others are highly improbable, and he sums up:

"This conclusion, however, it is fair to draw: if, on Capello's evidence, we are to accept it that Cesare Borgia is responsible for the death of Alfonso of Aragon, then, on the same evidence, we must accept the motive as well as the deed. We must accept as equally exact his thrice-repeated statement in letters to the Senate that the prince had planned Cesare's death by posting crossbow-men to shoot him."

One other charge against Cesare with which Mr. Sabatini deals very lucidly is that of his having poisoned the Cardinal of Modena. This charge is accepted as true by the German scholar Gregorovius, who follows Giovio in declaring that the poison was contained in the Borgia's "infallible white powders." But Giovio, as Mr. Sabatini points out, convicts himself by naming the poison—"Cantarella," i.e., Cantharides. In other words we are expected to believe a man who can describe the green, very acrid and burning Cantharides as "a white powder of a faint and not unpleasing savour." Other examples of Mr. Sabatini's careful criticism could be adduced, but it were superfluous so to do. We will conclude our notice by saying that Mr. Sabatini has not only done much to clear the character of Cesare from unsubstantiated accusations but has also given a clear and picturesque account of the career of a man who was a distinguished administrator and a magnificent if somewhat reckless soldier.

MEMOIRS OF A HIGHLAND LADY.*

This is the fifth reprint within four years, but there must still be some who need to have the praises of the book sounded in their ears. Sir John Grant got himself and his family into financial troubles, owing largely to his electioneering expenses in connection with an English pocket-borough, and in 1827, he accepted a judgeship in Bombay. But his daughter, Elizabeth, fortunately kept vivid memories of their life in England, Edinburgh, and Rothiemurchus, which her niece has edited with a few notes. The result is an extraordinary fascinating record of domestic and social life in their family during the first quarter of the nineteenth century. The father continued his studies for the bar in Edinburgh and London, even after he inherited the property. "The French Revolution had made it a fashion for all men to provide themselves with some means of earning a livelihood, should the torrent of democracy reach to other lands." The girls were educated by governesses, and a rough record it is. William, the older son, was sent to Eton. "I look back with horror on that school of corruption, where weak characters made shipwreck of all worth." Of Oxford, in 1810, the authoress retains a memory which is also on the north side of friendly. She went to stay with her uncle, the Master of University College, and enjoyed herself on the whole. But she was struck with "the ultra-Tory politics and the stupidity and frivolity of the society," and as for the religion of the place it "appeared in those days to consist in honouring the King and his ministers, and in perpetually popping in and out of chapel." But Speyside made up for all the disappointments of England. The home-life there had its drawbacks; parental severity and favouritism clouded the household now and then; money troubles were added, before very long. Still, the girls felt at home at Rothiemurchus as they did not even in Edinburgh, and the most delightful pages in this journal describe their employment, amusements, and neighbours.

* "Memoirs of a Highland Lady." The Autobiography of Elizabeth Grant, of Rothiemurchus, afterwards Mrs. Smith, of Baltbays, 1797-1830. Edited by Lady Strachey. With Illustrations. 6s. net. (John Murray.)

The authoress claims to have been one of the set who introduced quadrilles into Edinburgh society in 1817. She saw Mrs. Siddons act. She remembers the appearance of the Waverley novels, which she chronicles with curious curtness. And she narrates how George the Fourth gave offence to the Lowlanders by wearing Highland dress at the levée in Holyrood Palace. "However," she adds, "this little slur on the Saxon was overlooked, and it gave occasion for a laugh at one of Lady Saltoun's witty speeches. Some one objecting to this dress, particularly on so large a man,

"The Author."

From "Memoirs of a Highland Lady" (John Murray).

'Nay,' said she, 'we should take it very kind of him; since his stay will be so short, the more we see of him the better.'"

But indeed the whole book is a treasure of good things. Pathos and humour are mixed in these memoirs, and the graphic sense of character. It is a gain, for which we are indebted to Mr. Murray, that the volume now appears at a price which will carry it into still wider circles of the reading public, and especially of those who love Scotland and in Scotland Speyside.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.*

Perhaps, when all is said, William Allingham will owe his literary immortality to the fact that he had a genius for friendship. His poems are graceful and have a delicate, flower-like charm, and flower-like they are fading, though his delightful nursery song, "The Fairies," is always sure of a life in the Anthologies. He wrote a cultured and pleasant prose, and after serving for a while as sub-editor, succeeded Froude as editor of Fraser's Magazine; but happily he was a hero-worshipper and had the luck to meet or took the trouble to get introduced to many of the greatest authors and artists of his time, and the letters in this volume, most of which were written to him whilst he was away in Ireland where he was engaged in the Customs Department, and the recently published "Diary," scrappy as much of it is, in which he recorded something of his intercourse with his famous contemporaries, are, I think, his surer passports to lasting remembrance.

* "Letters to William Allingham." Edited by H. Allingham and E. Baumer Williams. 7s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

Less than a score of these letters are written by Allingham; all the rest are written to him, and many of them by such men as Tennyson, Ruskin, Browning, Rossetti, Carlyle, Thackeray, Burne-Jones, Kingsley, William Morris, Patmore, Landor, and other of the Victorian giants. But it is a truism that it takes two persons to make a good letter—no one can write well except to a correspondent who is well worth writing to, and these are a sort of letters that owe not a little of their value and interest to the character of the recipient. If you do not know it already, you gather from them that Allingham must have been a brilliant as well as an eminently likeable man. He had the faculty that never goes with a small nature of recognising superior greatness in others, though he had a healthy conviction of his own powers; also he had something of Boswell's knack of drawing people out, and it is characteristic of him that he invariably brought out what was best, most genial and most kindly in them. His own letters, adroitly provocative of replies, are good enough reading to make us sorry no more of them were available. "You describe better," Leigh Hunt wrote to him, "than any letter-writer I have had since the time of Shelley, and I dare not say you were surpassed even by him."

Leigh Hunt was his first correspondent of note. Allingham was nineteen when their correspondence began, and in 1847, when he was twenty-three and Hunt sixty-three, they met, and through Leigh Hunt he made acquaintance with many of the great men of his day. The letters that passed between these two throw interesting little lights on the literary world of the 'Fifties and show what an affectionate regard the old poet grew to feel for the younger one. They chat of books, criticise each other's work; Hunt, as urbanely gossiping as in his essays, replying, when Allingham mentions that he is reading Chaucer almost for the first time:

"I envy you your first acquaintance with Chaucer. It is as if you had never beheld the sunrise before, or found yourself in any great company of your fellow creatures out of the pale of Shakespeare. Chaucer is all earnestness, and sympathy, and morning freshness, and faith; ay, faith even when he banters; for he finds everything human worth making an impression on him, whatever it be, and receives it so deeply that he transfers it with like force to the reader. He laughs and weeps like an unspoiled child, and yet has all the knowledge of a man."

There are beautifully natural, self-revealing letters from Madame Bodichon—none in the book that are more spontaneous, more breathingly alive; and several written in the gayest of humours by Burne-Jones, two or three reproduced in facsimile and adorned with caricatures of the artist by himself. "Do 'ee come there's a dear," he concludes one, and another, "Adoo—transpire as soon as you can. You are always a comfort to me." And this latter sentiment finds different expression in many of the letters of other hands. Even Carlyle is eagerly remorseful that unintentionally and by sheer mischance he had slighted Allingham; otherwise his communications are rather ponderous, but that was Allingham's fault—he brought it on himself by writing to the sage asking advice as to the study, first of Irish history, then of general history, and then as to the value of College Lectures, and Carlyle replied each time at length and with due seriousness; but the letters from Mrs. Carlyle are delightfully characteristic. She writes in one, from Malvern:

"We are here till the end of the month—Mr. C. taking the water cure, and I looking at him taking it. A lady told me the other day that it was 'quite delightful to hear from the bath-man how sweetly Mr. Carlyle took his baths!' his only regret, the bath-man said, being that he was not kept longer in the pack! So you see the cold water must be acting favourably on his faculty of patience and resignation, if on nothing else."

And in another:

"What you say of Ruskin's book is excellent. 'Claret and buttermilk,' till one don't know which is which! But what could be expected from a man who goes to sleep with, every night, a different Turner's picture on a chair opposite his bed that 'he may have something beautiful to look at on first opening his eyes of a morning' (so his mother told me). . . . He is amiable and gay, and full of hope and faith in—one doesn't know exactly what—but, of course, he does."

"Twice last summer he drove Mr. C. and me and Nero out to his place at Denmark Hill, and gave us a dinner like what one reads of in the 'Arabian Nights,' and strawberries and cream on the lawn; and was indulgent and considerate for even Nero! I returned each time more satisfied that Mrs. Ruskin must have been hard to please. One feels always one could manage other women's husbands so much better than they do—and so much better than one manages one's own husband!"

She goes on to mention that they had been living lately in the same house with Tennyson—Lord Ashburton's; and Tennyson had read his "Maud" to the company there: "He seemed strangely excited about Maud—as sensitive to criticisms as if they were imputations on his honour; and all his friends were excited about Maud for him! and an unknown Cambridge gentleman wrote to Mr. Carlyle to ask him to be so good as to inform him what was his opinion of Maud! You may imagine how Mr. C. would toss the letter into the fire, sending a savage growl after it!"

There are letters from Emerson giving high praise to some of Allingham's poetry; and it is interesting to find A. H. Clough incidentally telling Allingham, "I had a line from Emerson the other day introducing a friend—a Mr. Henry James—who is staying here and whom I rather like." Aubrey de Vere expresses surprise at the sudden popularity of Browning's poems—"his publishers told me that in fifteen years he had hardly sold fifteen copies of them; and all at once they have leaped into popularity so great that I hear the young men at the Universities run after him more than Tennyson." There are letters from Dickens asking for and acknowledging a contribution for the 1853 Christmas Number of Household Words; a half dozen from George Eliot, in one of which she compares Allingham's "narrative of homely life," "Laurence Bloomfield," with Crabbe, and considers it is "touched with a higher poetry than his." Such criticisms of Allingham's work and that of many of his contemporaries are scattered all through these letters. Mrs. Browning is not alone in failing to admire Tennyson's "Idylls of the King"; Ruskin agrees that neither Lowell nor Longfellow wrote good poetry yet he adds:

"From Lowell I have received more help than from any other writer whatsoever. I have not learned so much—but I have got help and heart from single lines, at critical times. For real ability, I think his shrewd sense and stern moral purpose worth all Keats and Shelley put together. I don't compare him to Keats, but I go to him for other articles—which I can't get from Keats—namely, Conscience, Cheerfulness and Faith."

One must make an end of quoting, but the letters are full of good things; they are the complement of Allingham's "Diary"—the two books together form an entertaining and a valuable addition to the literary chronicles of the Victorian era; and one cannot but be grateful to the man who inspired such letters and to the editors who have so admirably arranged and annotated them.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

SONGS AND SINGERS.*

"Songs of Joy" is Mr. Davies' fourth volume of poems, and the best things in it are his very best, while the flaws

* "Songs of Joy, and others." By William Davies. 2s. 6d. net. (A. C. Fifield.)—"A Sicilian Idyll and Judith." By T. Sturge Moore. 2s. net. (Duckworth.)—"Emblems of Love. Designed in Several Discourses." By Lascelles Abercrombie. 5s. net. (John Lane.)—"Six Lyrics from the Ruthenian of Shevchenko." By E. L. Voynich. 1s. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

and failures are less than in the other books. Several of the shorter pieces are perfect—"Fancy's Home," for example, "The Owl," "To Sparrows Fighting," and "The Sleepers." They are simple, instantaneous and new, recalling older poets chiefly by their perfection. As he advances—and he does advance both in range and fineness—Mr. Davies repeats himself more and more seldom, so that it is harder than ever to do him some kind of justice by quoting one poem. I would quote "Fancy's Home" but people would mutter "Blake!" and condemn it. I will quote "To Sparrows Fighting" in spite of the "Herrick!" with which some may deafen themselves:

"Stop, feathered bullies!
Peace, angry birds;
You common Sparrows that,
For a few words,
Roll fighting in wet mud,
To shed each other's blood.

"Look at those Linnets—they Like ladies sing;
See how those Swallows, too,
Play on the wing;
All other birds close by
Are gentle, clean and shy.

"And yet maybe your life's
As sweet as theirs;
The common poor that fight
Live not for years
In one long frozen state
Of anger, like the great."

That is a summary and perfect example of what Mr. Davies has hitherto done. It has his characteristic simplicity and delicacy; the light spirit of it, and the thought, are peculiarly his own. His thought deepens without darkening or over-weighting his verse. He has also done several things which are new to him, like the lines "To a Bore," and like "Christ the Man," which opens in a style that perhaps foretells yet farther advances. In his love poems he makes his most unquestionable steps forward; for he has gained in depth, and in variety, and is grave and light with equal charm and truth. His longer poems in blank verse—one of thirty and one of nearly two hundred lines—are also good. They are familiar without commonplace: both abound in gusto, and "The Child and the Mariner" has magic in it.

Mr. Davies does his good and his indifferent things by the grace of God or the lack of it. Mr. Sturge Moore probably knows, or has tried to know exactly the effects he is producing, and has spared no conscious labour to make them clear and consistent. I doubt whether he has left anything in these two dialogues to provide against the needs of those who care nothing for the poet's aims. There is nothing in them which seems to have a life of its own, a wild life, I mean; all is tamed and trained to the performance. But to-day at least the blitheness and lucidity of the "Sicilian Idyll" are irresistible. The whole dialogue is as clear seen as the boy Amvntas:

"Twelve or thirteen he seemed, with clinging feet
Poised on a boulder, and against the sea
Set off. His wide-brimmed hat of straw was arched Over his matted black and abundant curls
By orange ribbon tied beneath his chin;
Around his arms and shoulders his sole dress,
A cloak, was all bunched up. He leapt, and lighted
Upon the boulder just beneath; there swayed,
Re-poised,
And perked his head like an inquisitive bird,
As gravely happy; of all unconscious, save
His body's aptness for its then employment;
His eyes intent on shells in some clear pool,
Or choosing where he next will plant his feet."

Writing like Mr. Sturge Moore's has an exalted pedigree, but not exactly a tradition. Consequently it has only itself to depend on, having to convert the reader before gaining his ear. How good it is, then, in its kind, may be gathered from its perfect success in the "Sicilian Idyll" and a very severe pictorial beauty which it creates in the difficult story of Judith and Holofernes.

Mr. Abercrombie also handles the story of Judith as well as of Vashti, of some Scottish girls in 1745, and some prehistoric warriors. Mr. Abercrombie is a lyric poet of such abounding vitality that with that alone he can keep his drama alive. Another generation may ignore the dramatic form of these long lyrics, and in so doing may be able to pass over even the passages, here and there, which are neither dramatic nor essential to the lyric effect, as when Ozias says to Judith, whom he loves:

"And yet I still
Feared for my dream, even as a maiden fears
The body of her lover."

Mr. Abercrombie is not strong enough to make us forget that Ozias is supposed to be speaking when we come to the lines:

"Judith, shall we not thus together make Death admirable. . . ."

or to make us forget that he himself is really saying:

"Yea, I that know thee, Judith, know thy soul,
Worse rankling hath in it from heathen insult
Than flesh could take from steel bathed in a venom
Art magic brewed over a charcoal fire,
Blown into flame by hissing of whipped lizards."

But these two hundred pages are really too good to have a word said against them in a notice of this size. In them all the vitality is constantly at fever heat. He cannot make green wood ooze in the fire without saying:

"As green wood bleeds its hissing sap
In the red heat of a fire."

This Scotch girl, Jean, thinks of watching a man's love for her as "a wild adventure of glee":

"To see the sight of you pour into his senses,
Like brandy gulpt down by a frozen man,
A thing that runs scalding about his blood."

She says again:

"Yes, love is strong. I have well thought of that.
It drops as fiercely down on us as if
We were to be its prey. I've seen a gull
That hovered with beak pointing and eyes fixt
Where, underneath its swaying light, some fish
Was trifling, fooling in the waves: then, souse!
And the gull has fed. And love on us has fed."

Mr. Abercrombie's imagery is wonderful. It is his native air. None of his characters can speak without it, as often as not using the imagery, not as a comparison but as the thing itself. As in:

"The king's mind is a summer over us;
Thou with a storm wilt fill him, and the hail
That shelters thee will leave us bruised and weeping."

Vashti has seen a spectre. One of her women asks:

"Was it the kind with nose and mouth grown sharp
To an eagle's bill, and claws upon its fingers,
The curve of them pasted with bloody glue?"

Arnold said that if Shakespeare had written an epic he would have died of a plethora of invention. Mr. Abercrombie shows at least that he can keep long poems alive by a beautiful, bewildering plethora of invention. If poetry were a matter of brilliant passages these dialogues would surpass not only the same writer's earlier work but most of his contemporaries'. As it is, not one of these poems is equal as a whole to "Blind" and "Indignation" in his "Poems and Interludes."

Mrs. Vöynich's biographical sketch of Shevchenko, the peasant poet of the Ukraine, is more telling than her translations of his lyrics. Her style is pure and transparent and interposes nothing between us and the original which could possibly have been excluded; she allows us to see how beautiful the original must be, and in "Only friend, clear evening twilight," does something more; but six short pieces are insufficient when they are so quiet. The narrative poem from the Russian of Lermontov is not more successful; and is left in a state which would prove it a translation without any other proof. The work fails, in fact, by being a neither perfectly literal translation nor creative reconstruction.

EDWARD THOMAS.

THE WAR GOD.*

Few arts tend to become so stereotyped as that practised by the playwright. It used to be said that from an intellectual point of view the theatre always lagged a generation behind the times. With a Bernard Shaw kept busy among us, and actually become popular at last, the old gibe can hardly be urged against our stage to-day. But in the playhouse, especially, the revolutionaries of one era may impose the conventions of the next, and it is just possible that at some distant date it might be imperative to start a reaction against the tyranny of Shavian "artificiality." Imitation, the bane of all art, is peculiarly rife in this most conservative of atmospheres, and though old themes are welcome enough, if treated freshly, and the emotions on which a dramatist must play vary from age to age in degree rather than in kind, there is need of a constant influx of ideas, of resolute endeavours to make the microcosm of the theatre approximate to the world it is supposed to mirror, if it is to remain a vital force in our midst or to preserve our respect. It is just because Mr. Israel Zangwill has recognised this necessity, and has stated in dramatic form one of the most urgent and puzzling problems of modern civilisation that his "tragedy" of "The War God" ought to provoke interest, and command admiration. In the world-politics of our day there are two opposed schools of thought and diplomacy which solicit our suffrages. There are the patriots and practical politicians who tell us that a nation's chief asset is its prestige, that its essential for growth and even life is commercial or territorial expansion, that to secure such advantages rivals must be held in check, and peace under these circumstances can only be guaranteed by preparedness for war. There are the humanitarians who deprecate a resort to the arbitrament of the sword, deplore the current competition in armaments as insane, and preaching the doctrine of the brotherhood of man denounce war, and the trade movements or diplomacy which rely on the "mailed fist" as flatly defying the better conscience of mankind. Between these alternative creeds the man in the street halts in a curious bewilderment. Both schools represent a policy to which he is drawn, either by sentiment or by a realisation of the facts and instincts of human nature; both in their relentless logic present an ultimatum to which he is unwilling to subscribe. Yet on a score of occasions as a citizen of Empire, as a voter faced with conditions he did not create, he has to make up his mind to throw in his lot with one or other of these extremists. His quondary, his hesitation between arguments which alternately drag his judgments and his feelings this way or that, furnishes the subject of Mr. Zangwill's drama.

In the imaginary European state of Gothia that supplies the setting of "The War God" such a conflict of opinion is seen operating and is typified by two rival geniuses, a Chancellor who is a man of blood and iron, and a Count turned peasant and literal interpreter of Christ's gospel who is an advocate of peace and non-resistance. Obviously Mr. Zangwill has shaped his Torgrim and Frithiof on the historical models of Bismarck and Tolstoy, and as obviously his borrowing of their personalities has increased the realism of his stage-appeal as well as saved him trouble in characterisation. Both sides are allowed their full say though the author's sympathies are with the party of peace, and the clash of ideals and temperaments his protagonists provide makes an excellent basis for drama. But in point of fact he offers us declamation rather than action, and if his statesman and his prophet escape being mere rhetoricians his play certainly resolves itself for the most part into a set of alternate harangues, while such incidents as he does employ are of far too violent and melodramatic a kind. In the majority of these sensational scenes his revolutionary Maid of Honour, Norna takes a prominent part—a woman she who herself kills the saintly Frithiof, because he disapproves of forwarding the cause of peace by violence, and is ready in turn to assassinate the Chancellor, though she is in love with his son. Heroines of social revolt have before now murdered officials they deemed tyrants and said good-bye to their lovers, but where are we to find a match for so crazy a termagant as Norna outside the pages of an irresponsible romance or the absurdities of extravaganza. The real strength of Mr. Zangwill's drama is to be sought in the Nemesis which he prepares for his unscrupulous champion of war, and in the skill with which he makes the teaching of the dead Frithiof bung about the Chancellor's discomfiture in the very height of his success. Secretary, son, king all desert him, and we behold him in the end childless, robbed of office and power and work, left with no interests and no objects for his affections, contemplating a future in which men of his type and views can have no share. If only the comic-operative crowd of Frithiof's hymn-singing disciples could be banished from the stage at that moment, we should have had few more impressive tableaux in the modern theatre than that on which Mr. Zangwill finally rings down his curtain, and the technical shortcomings of the playwright notwithstanding, it is impossible to overlook the exalted idealism, the eloquence, the humour, the irony which inform his plea—for it is his plea—for international amity and concord.

The medium which Mr. Zangwill adopts for his play is that of blank verse, and since this has never been actually discarded on our stage he scarcely needs justification for its use. It lends a certain dignity to his language in keeping with the subject, and the sort of blank verse he affects is at once fluent and supple, suiting itself either to epigram and broadly humorous effects or to the loftier flights of oratory. Two samples of it will serve to indicate its quality. Hear Frithiof scolding his great enemy:

"I hear the cannon booming peace and love.
Poor soul! I came in love to bring you peace,
That peace of God which passeth understanding.
Why squat here spinning crafty labyrinths,
Jetting your filthy network o'er the globe?
You think to bind the future? Poor grey spinner Fate, the blind housewife, with her busy broom Shall shrivel at one sweep your giant web,
And leave a little naked scuttling spider."

And now for Torgrim, defending his policy of brute force:

"Dominance—
There rings the password of the universe.
Who knows it, he is free of every camp.
Equality, your level, endless cornfield,
However fat and fair and golden-stalked,
Would set us pining for the snow-capped peaks
And barren glaciers. Life is fight, thank God!
Come, bare your forehead to the fierce salt Truth.
Take war away and men would sink to molluscs,
Lumpets that wait the tide to wash them food.
The nations would grow foul with lazy feeding
What Heaven loves is breeds with life a-tangle,
Swift gliding, flashing, darting fear at rivals,
Men fearing God and with no other fear."

Fine rhetoric, you will perceive, but no more than that; indeed you must not expect great poetry from Mr. Zangwill, you must be content with facility rather than inspiration. You will note, also, that the voice can rest naturally almost at the end of every line. The author is rather short-breathed in his verse, indulges in what is known as the end-stopped line, does not deal much in enjambement and so can be said to resort to a pre-Shakespearean, not to say, pre-Miltonic mode. Such a vehicle can hardly lift a poet into the regions of the sublime, but it allows for an orderly and, on the whole, a stately progress. F. G. BRITANY.

A PRIZE NOVEL.*

Mr. Melrose is to be congratulated on another successful Novel Prize Competition. A Prize Novel may be very good, and yet disappoint us, for we open it in the natural expectation that we are going to read something of quite exceptional merit. Here is a story that in open competition with several hundred others has outdistanced all competitors. It comes to us, moreover, wearing a guarantee of its excellence signed by such notable judges as Mr. A. C. Benson,

*"The House of Lisronan." By Miriam Alexander. 6s. (Andrew Melrose.)

* "The War God." A Tragedy in Five Acts. By Israel Zangwill. 2s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

Mr. A. E. W. Mason and Mr. W. J. Locke. Surely, then, it must be a novel of no ordinary qualities, if it is going to satisfy the anticipations that are thus aroused in us.

It is a romance of the days of William III.; its earlier chapters pass in Ireland and England, then it crosses over into France for a while, and returns home to Ireland to take up the threads of an old wrong and weave them to a strong and vividly dramatic conclusion. It is a story of love and hate, of political intrigue, injustice and the wreaking of a righteous vengeance, written with a vigour and ease and resourcefulness of invention that can only be compared to Stanley Weyman at his best. Meinherr Van der Wynykt, that swollen, drunken Dutch savage, is one of the most loathsome and most memorable villains of recent fiction; his abhorrent shadow is over all the book—even over those many chapters of it in which he plays no visible part. When he first arrives on the eleventh page you feel, before he makes his entry, that he is bringing disaster in his train and that the instinctive fears of Ethna, the beautiful young widow, the lady of Lisronan, are no mere outcome of a timorous fancy. Those were the days when the Catholics suffered persecution, and the Papist in Ireland held his estates on sufferance and might be easily ousted from them by a Protestant informer who had influence in the right quarter. The Lisronans were Catholics, and Van der Wynykt had lent the King money and was a power at Court, and therefore to be propitiated by those who had possessions he might take away from them. But his gross behaviour whilst she is acting as his unwilling hostess forces Ethna to rebuff and offend him, and her patient lover Owen D'Arcy practically turns him out of the house: an indignity he never forgives and is swift to visit upon them without mercy.

The scene in which he returns, armed with authority, and brutally evicts Ethna's household, with the incident of Ethna's own escape from his horrible embraces at that juncture, is a wonderfully realistic and live piece of writing. Her broken life thereafter, D'Arcy being dead; the flight of her young son Dermot with her out of the country, and Dermot's adventures in France, always with the resolve at the back of his mind, despite her dying wishes, to go home again when he is fully of age and have a reckoning with the monster who was responsible for their woes, is unfolded graphically and with a ripe narrative skill. And the fateful love of Dermot for the pretty, frightened girl who is for long believed to be Van der Wynykt's daughter, and his final realization of his dark dreams make a fitting and powerful end to one of the ablest and most telling romances we have read in these many years. Miss Alexander has imagination, a sure gift in the presentation of character and the born story-teller's cunning in capturing and holding a reader's interest. In a word, "The House of Lisronan" is a very remarkable first novel, and if Miss Alexander is going to write a second that is better, or even as good—then, beyond question, there is a place waiting for her among the most popular of our novelists.

S. J.

IRISH HUMOUR.*

All who have read those delightful books, "Spanish Gold" and "The Seething Pot" will realise that Mr. Birmingham is just the man to write a book on "The Lighter Side of Irish Life." Nor will the most ardent admirer of his novels be disappointed in the present work. It is always interesting when an author treats as matter of fact the same themes which he is wont to put to fictional uses. It is at once a guarantee of good faith, and an instructive exhibition of the raw material of his craft. Mr. Birmingham has made good use of the humours of Ireland in his stories.

* "The Lighter Side of Irish Life." By George A. Birmingham. Illustrated by Henry W. Kerr, R.S.A. 5s. net. (Foulis.)

Here he gives us choice specimens of the same in, so to speak, the unmanufactured state. Some idea of the scope of the book may be gathered from the list of contents. "As Others see Us," "As We see Ourselves," "The Irish Clergy," "The Irish Official," "The Irish Peasant," "The Brogue," "Old Customs and Superstitions," "The Yank," "Wit and Humour." Such are some of the suggestive chapter-headings. The traditional Irishman, who greets you with "the top of the morning to ye," and calls you "a broth of a boy" has been effectually exploded by Mr. Bernard Shaw and other honest folk. Nor does Mr. Birmingham seek to foist him on us. On the contrary, he is most scrupulous in giving us the real article, and nothing but the real article. But his Irishman, the Irishman of fact, is at least as attractive as the puppet who for so long usurped his place in the Saxon imagination. Mr. Birmingham protests against the English expectation that Irishmen shall always be amusing, and he illustrates his point by the story of the Irishman who recited Tennyson's "Revenge," which the audience insisted on considering a comic poem.

Nevertheless, as its name implies, this book abounds in entertainment. It is full of good stories well told, such as that of the priest who "settled the controversy between the two Churches in a short and easy fashion. Taking a Bible he opened at the first and longest of St. Paul's epistles. "Tell me now," he said, "who did the Apostle write that to?" "The Romans," said his opponent. "That's enough," said the priest. "You show me the epistle he ever wrote to the Protestants, and I'll give in to you." Not the least attractive part of an attractive book are the illustrations, beautifully reproduced in colour, of Mr. Kerr. The whole production, indeed, has that charm which one associates with the publications of Mr. Foulis.

Home from the Fair.
A Financial Muddle.

From a water-colour drawing by Henry W. Kerr, R.S.A., in: "The Lighter Side of Irish Life," by George A. Birmingham. (Foulis.)

Novel Notes.

"THE GOAL OF FORTUNE." By E. E. Towgood. 6s. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

"The Goal of Fortune," is a first novel by Miss E. E. Towgood, which made its appearance in the loud confusion of the Christmas publishing season. The time could hardly have been more unfavourable, for Miss Towgood has none of the arts which can challenge the assured popularity of "annuals" and "gift-books." A delicate, rather precise, faculty of expression, a fidelity to observed life, a fanciful appreciation of character, are the chief items in her equipment, and with these there is a kind of picture-sense which enjoys and employs the details which make up scenes. To summarise her story would convey nothing of its total effect, for "The Goal of Fortune" is an account rather of people than of events, and Miss Towgood is to be congratulated on making her debut with a book which is so definitely a thing achieved. There are too few novels by women which really express the woman's view, perhaps because the models which have most acceptance are the work of men. Miss Towgood's models, if she has any, are sound; she has gained from them a direct and workmanlike manner of presentation, briskness of dialogue, compactness of form. For the rest she writes as she feels and knows, within the limits of her experience. I think it was Fanny Burney who went the length of never leaving two male characters alone together, because no woman could possibly know how they would then talk and behave. The author of "The Goal of Fortune" has not hesitated to step in where the author of "Cecilia" feared to tread, but it is always a feminine imagination that supplements a feminine observation. There are many charming moments of illumination, gleams of sympathetic and whimsical insight. Alison, the heroine of the tale, has humour, brains and purpose, but it was "inevitable that she would fall in love with her first serious wooer." It helps the reader to a realisation of Alison better than a dozen pages of narrative. Miss Towgood's novel is an earnest of work yet to come—work, I hope, more spacious in compass in which her undoubted gifts shall have a larger field for their exercise. Readers of her first book will look with interest for the development which is to be expected in her next.

PATCHES AND POMANDER By Arthur Brebner 6s. (Blackwood.)

In "John Saint" Mr. Arthur Brebner wrote a first novel of unusual promise, which has borne fruit in a somewhat unexpected manner in "Patches and Pomander." The author no longer concerns himself particularly with seafaring, and his new book is also an historical study of the times of King Charles II. instead of a modern adventure story. But it does seem to us that Mr. Brebner has found his métier. His touch throughout is sure, and he handles the "costume" portion of his story with much ability. The book opens with a description of the death of Simon Rutherford, now a searcher for the Philosopher's Stone, but once—well, perhaps it would spoil the reader's enjoyment in the book to say what he once was. Rutherford is a rich man, but besides leaving all his property to Anthony, he also gives him some very incoherent details as to the whereabouts of certain valuables. The manner of the book then changes into a highly spirited account of Anthony's quest. There is a pleasant love interest, and the result of all is a novel that no lover of historical fiction should neglect.

BROWN FACE AND WHITE. By Clive Holland. 6s. (Hurst & Blackett.)

"Mixed marriages have always appeared to me a radical mistake often fraught with grave social as well as moral consequences." The problem is being discussed by Evelegh, an English missionary stationed with his wife and child in a small inland Japanese town. A fellow countryman of theirs, Villiers, who manages a neighbouring tea-plantation, has succumbed to the fascination of a beautiful Japanese girl, Kusatsu, and the missionary's only hope of frustrating what he believes to be a disastrous marriage lies in the provision of an English mate for the lonely Villiers. The desirable person arrives in the shape of Evelegh's sister-in-law, but the happy consummation of his little plot is only attained after the girl Kusatsu has sacrificed her life to save the man she loves. Mr. Holland conveys the local colour with conscientious skill, and though the action of the novel moves rather slowly at the outset, the telling of the siege of Evelegh's party by an armed mob of rioters egged on by the native priests and by the frequenters of "The Golden Kitten," a tea-house of ill repute, soon fans the reader's excitement into full flame.

THE GREEN CURTAIN. By M. E. Braddon. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

That an author who had already to her credit no less than seventy-two novels should in her seventy-third write her most distinguished, her most convincing, and her least sensational work, is surely something to wonder at. Yet this is what Miss Braddon has accomplished in "The Green Curtain." This story of a great young actor who flourished during the Regency and met an untimely death at the hand of the brother of the great lady whom he was on the eve of marrying, is not only a first-rate, an engrossing tale, it is, to use a tedious phrase, a most intimate and finished psychological study, the finest full-length picture of a player which we have met with in contemporary fiction. George Godwin, who electrified Drury Lane audiences in such great Shakespearean rôles as those of "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Othello," and "King Lear," and who, by the way, in career and temperament has not a few points in common with Irving and Forbes Robertson, is fully individualised and quite startlingly alive. Fanny Fountain, the fair, frail, affectionate creature he marries—and discovers to have been some time mistress to the Prince of Wales—is radiantly vital. And no less full of life, no less carefully studied, is the sketch of Isabel (Lady Beaumont), the gracious, deep-souled woman who at the last moment is robbed of her long-delayed happiness by the brooding, fanatical brother to whom she has devoted herself from his childhood. Equally admirable too is the depiction of the minor characters, of Sally Merritt, Godwin's ever-faithful foster-mother, of the old Duchess of Pentland, his patroness and friend, and of the Rev. Patrick O'Brien, M.A. of T.C.D., his confidant and earliest tutor. But we scarcely see why Lady Holland should be disguised as Lady Bayswater, or why the Countess of Jersey should masquerade as Lady Guernsey. And, without taking the trouble to consult such authorities as Genest and "The Annual Register," we dare affirm off-hand that "Mantred" was never staged at Drury Lane about 1818, and that the nation which was celebrating the third anniversary of the battle of Waterloo was one scarcely likely to go in fear of a Napoleonic invasion! This question of dates brings us indeed to a very interesting question of literary ethics and conventions. Is the author of a historical novel justified in inventing a great historical character? Or rather—and this is in what Miss Braddon's audacity consists—is she justified in substituting a fictitious historical character for a real one? The great actor who, flouting the Kemble School of stately port and gesture and measured declamation, captured the town what time Byron, Whitbread, Douglas Kinnaird and Peter Moore were managing the affairs of Drury Lane Theatre, who won the enthusiastic plaudits of critics so temperamentally divergent from one another as Hazlitt, Talfourd, Campbell, Fanny Kemble and Keats, was not George Godwin, who never existed, but that wayward and erratic genius Edmund Kean. And, save for his glowing eyes and doubtful parentage—Godwin is described as the offspring of a peer's liaison with an actress—Miss Braddon's Drury Lane hero has not one single point of resemblance to the real Simon Pure. When a notice of one of Godwin's performances is quoted as having actually been penned by Hazlitt, surely the very generous licence usually granted to the romantic novelist is being rather outrageously transgressed?

THE LONG HAND. By Sir William Magnay, Bart. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

Probably a good many writers find it difficult to make a satisfactory beginning to their books, but Sir William Magnay clearly does not. In "The Long Hand" he is well in his stride on the second page, the reader's interest is aroused, and there is promise of exciting developments before the dénouement is reached. Again, the author has chosen a scene and period which are, to say the least of it, unfamiliar to English readers. Munich at the end of the eighteenth century, during the time when Count Rumford was Regent of Bavaria, offers practically an untouched field for the English romancist. We may wish that the whole novel had borne out the promise of the first fifty pages—which, unfortunately, it does not—but there can be no doubt that Sir William Magnay has engineered a thoroughly readable and interesting story with its full share of adventure and excitement, and a pretty love interest. In fact, although it is not one of his best books, "The Long Hand" ought fully to satisfy Sir William Magnay's numerous admirers.

THE DISPUTED MARRIAGE. By Lilian Street 6s. (J. M. Dent & Sons.)

It is not easy, however distinct and nobly charming a personality you may possess, to play an unconventional game with the emotions, or an unconventional part in your social circle, without bringing some sharp verdicts upon yourself. So Barbara Lulworth, most charming of women, we understand, met with some severe criticism, for her sentimental friendship with Jack Stafford, a married man, whose wife lived an (outwardly) pious life at Monte Carlo, and such-like spots. The book is written in the form of letters, and Jack Stafford (who is a hero of the first water, be it understood) writes, for instance, to Barbara of her portrait which hangs opposite the table of Dennis, the artist, "What I want to buy is his portrait of you . . . but perhaps it would make me long too often and too much for you." Then follow the lines beginning: "Guard her for ever for my great love's sake." It may be seen that had the unlovable woman, Jack's wife, been "nasty" she might have reasonably joined in the condemnation of sweet friendship between husbands and charming ladies. However Barbara becomes engaged to the artist, and then the love-story of herself and her devoted men is told with sympathy and simple charm by means of a well-varied correspondence.

OLD ENOUGH TO KNOW BETTER. By William Caine. 6s. (Greening & Co.)

A recent novel, "A Man with a Past," contained a diverting sketch of a certain Mr. Patten, a whimsical music-hall song writer, who was wont to dislocate the even tenor of his conversation by sheering off suddenly into impromptu verse. Mr. William Caine in this amusing novel of his has struck an equally happy vein in Messrs. Blooter and Salt, the World's Champion Cat-laffian Cross-talk Combination, whose habit of breaking into absurdly inconsequent patter and "business" on the slightest provocation proves wholly irresistible. Other "pros" whose oddities enliven the story include a retired Strong Man and an active Strong Woman, who rejoices in a contortionist for a husband. The retired Strong Man keeps a tea and beer garden in the Vale of Health, Hampstead, where the wholesale flirtations of his flashy daughter Emily involve no fewer than five victims. Carpenter, the principal victim, is an impossible young author, whose dislike for doing anything that is obvious plunges him into a series of farcical escapades. The description of the way in which Carpenter is slowly but inevitably drawn into Emily's net is one of the best things in the book. Mr. Caine exhibits a keen relish for the practical joke, but he does not despise subtler forms of humour, which ever and anon find play in witty digressions on the fads and foibles of mankind—Hampstead mankind in particular. If you do not want to laugh don't read "Old Enough to Know Better," for it will certainly make you laugh if you do.

THE REVOKE OF JEAN RAYMOND. By May Ford. 6s. (Stephen Swift & Co.)

The author of this novel imposes a two-fold strain on the reader by the somewhat excessive use of the "long arm," and by raising a constant suspicion of a didactic intention. There are few, probably, who will share her creator's admiration for Jean Raymond, who proclaims her independence and unconventionality, with a rather irritating persistence and shrillness. Jean's marriage with Bernard Gretton imposes a distinct strain upon our imagination, which is not lessened by the description of their conjugal infelicities; for when Jean ultimately leaves her husband, it is for a reason that would scarcely hold good in the most obliging of transatlantic courts, the incompatibility in this case being due to Gretton's boring his wife to death with his passion for Wordsworth and his interest in vivisection. The futility of Gretton suggests that the author was thinking more of her "case" than of reality; and in spite of all his fatuity we have some sympathy for Gretton's impatience with Mary Margetson, the "bachelor-friend" of his wife, whose excellencies and socialistic enthusiasms were sufficient to wreck the peace of any home. Miss Ford has put good work and good writing into her book, but when she next essays to administer a powder we hope she will be more liberal with her jam.

The Bookman's Table.

PASTELS UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS. By Margaret L. Woods. 6s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

"Pastels are a light ephemeral means of recording impressions. Take them out of the frame and they will not long survive." But those before us, judged by the Rosebery or any other just standard of criticism, should outlive many a contemporary volume. They are delicate, yet incisive; light, but acutely informed. And they are essentially entertaining as well as instructive. When, on the voyage out, the gentle Frau B., having listened to the German sergeant's account of the sensation caused by his progress with a comrade and in uniform along Oxford Street, a sensation which led to the police having to take them both away in a cab, is recorded as asking in distress: "Were the Londoners indeed so hostile?" what a light is thrown on England and the English as seen through German eyes. The continuation of the narrative has its point also: "The sergeant smiled, his red and-white cheeks swelled, his moustache curled and curled, his billiard-ball eyes glowed with amusement. Hostile! dear ladies! It was pure admiration. Never, never before had those Londoners seen two such handsome fellows." And so we pass on to a night view of St. Helena, a glimpse of Round Table Mountain, follow the Northward Trek, pause at the grave of Cecil Rhodes, halt awhile at Bulawayo, explore Zimbabwe and its wonderful ruins, enjoy "a five o'clock" on the veldt, are impressed with the majesty of the Victoria Falls, journey on to Salisbury and listen to a thrilling account of an episode of the Mashona Rebellion, take part in a discussion on hotels, wreckage, Umtali, and "the white missus," and finally take train to Beira, and ship for the East Coast voyage home. One of the impressions that are deepest in our mind, at the conclusion of the trip, is that of the immense advantages that Rhodesia holds for the "odd women" here at home.

CASTELLINARIA AND OTHER SICILIAN DIVERSIONS. By Henry Festing Jones. 5s. net. (Fifield.)

The cult of specialisation to-day is nowhere more diligently practised than in the literary world. Our novelists have portioned out the world between themselves: some writers deal, so to speak, in continents, others only in obscure corners of continents; but they seldom reach beyond their self-imposed confines or trespass on what they would regard as other authors' territory. The author of the book before us, Mr. Henry Festing Jones, has annexed Sicily as his literary domain. "Divisions in Sicily" was a most interesting and unconventional travel book, and "Castellinaria" is equally diverting. We must admit, however, that the Sicilian dialogue puzzles us not a little. In a chapter entitled "Malagigi" we read the following: "'I saw her die at Trapani. The Empress Marfisa came and found her dying of grief in a grotto for the loss of her husband, Ruggiero da Risa.' 'Precisely. She was Marfisa's sister-in-law because she married Marfisa's brother Ruggiero da Risa.' 'Then who was the cavaliere errante, Ruggiero Persiano?' 'He was the son of Marfisa and Guidon Selvaggio, and this Guidon Selvaggio was the son of Rinaldo.' 'Had Bradamante no children?'" It is space only that forbids us quoting more of this entertaining conversation, which is nevertheless rather puzzling to the lay mind. Save for a few more unintelligible passages, we have found the book fresh and interesting, and the sketches entitled "Earthquake Echoes" (of Messina, 1908) are exceedingly good.

A KEEPER OF THE ROBES. By F. Frankfort Moore. 16s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Frankfort Moore has a genius for gold-digging. He takes a diary which is simply a sealed book to the ordinary reader from its mass of trivialities, and washes out the intolerable deal of worthless sand it contains, until there are left a few glittering pieces of gold which all the world will snatch at. Out of Fanny Burney's inordinately long diary he has extracted a narrative of extraordinary power and value. Ostensibly the narrative derives its value from the humanity with which it clothes two royal figures, giving flesh and blood to what with most people are nothing more than names. On this aspect of it the editor himself lays full stress in his brilliant preface, one of the most fascinating pieces of work ever seen from his pen. But with all his excellent historical intentions the editor is gradually overmastered by the charms of another creature of flesh and blood, the humanity of Fanny Burney herself. And so it must be with the reader. Absorbed though his natural man may be for a time by the introduction into the sacred precincts of Court life, his higher self is captivated by the strange vicissitudes of the little lady's fortunes. Accustomed to move in the highest literary circles, herself "not least but honoured of them all," accustomed to the society of Burke, of Bruce the African explorer, of Count Orloff the Russian almost-Emperor, of Reynolds, who stayed up all night reading her novel "Evelina," and of the great Dr. Johnson himself, whose letters to her Boswell ineffectually implored her to hand over to him, that he might "show him as gay Sam, agreeable Sam, pleasant Sam"—after moving amidst this galaxy of talent the popular authoress became a mere tirewoman, compelled to rise at six and refused leave to go to bed till after midnight. She might never move beyond the sound of the Queen's bell. She had to stand and stand while the Queen's hair was being curled and crimped and powdered. She mixed the royal snuff, and was treated as a scullion by the head Keeper of the Robes, a perfect Cerberus. In one country house gold laced superciliosities regarded her as a nonentity, and to avoid starvation she was feign to eat apricot and bread from an equerry's pocket. The palace too was freezing in winter—"wind enough in these passages to carry a man-of-war." There were compensations: the reverend "reader" who "practised a thousand mischievous tricks to confuse me in the royal presence," the comedy of the visit to Oxford, the engrossing Warren Hastings trial. But there were also dreadful seasons, when the Palace felt the slow approach of the King's madness. "Talking -talking -talking, till he is thus terribly hoarse. . . . The Queen almost overpowered with some secret terror. . . . A stillness the most uncommon reigned over the whole house." And finally the "terror walking by night."

THE CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH OF CHARLES DICKENS. By Robert Langton (Hutchinson.)

This is a revised and timely re-issue of a very interesting book that was first published privately in 1883. Mr. Langton has since then been gathering together new facts, which are now all incorporated in his pages, and add not a little to our knowledge of the early days of Charles Dickens. To some extent, of course, Mr. Langton has had to rely on Forster's invaluable "Life," but he has hunted tirelessly after people who knew Dickens personally in his youth, and has obtained records and anecdotes from his old nurse, from some of his schoolfellows, and from divers friends and neighbours of the Dickens family when they were living at Chatham, Rochester, and elsewhere. He gives the words of a duet that Dickens and his sister Fanny sang, standing on the dining-room table of Mr. Tribe, then landlord of the "Mitre," at Rochester, the Tribe and the Dickens children being playfellows, and he traces Old Orlick's song, "Beat it out, beat it out, Old Clem!" to doggerel rhymes that used to be sung by the Chatham blacksmiths when Dickens lived there as a child. One way and another he throws a good deal of light on characters, incidents and references in the novels, and incidentally makes it clear that Dickens's boyhood was not such a wretched and neglected one as Dickens, looking back in his later years, was too apt to imagine it had been. Altogether Mr. Langton has written a pleasantly gossipy chronicle that forms a very useful supplement to the biography of the great novelist whose centenary we are now celebrating. The illustrations are numerous and full of interest.

The Leather Bottle, Cobham, Kent.

"Having returned to Dingley Dell by the Muggleton heavy coach, Mr. Pickwick found that Mr. Tupman had gone away during his absence, but was to be heard of at 'The Leather Bottle,' Cobham, Kent, and the three friends at once resolved to follow him there."—From "The Childhood and Youth of Charles Dickens," by Robert Langton (Hutchinson).

SHADOWS CAST BEFORE. By Claude Field. 2s. 6d. net. (William Rider & Sons.)

Mr. Claud Field's "Shadows Cast Before" is a collection of anecdotes concerning prophecy and prevision. Some of the instances related are probably apocryphal, for they include accounts of the fulfilled dreams and premonitions of many ancient worthies—Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, Cicero and Tacitus. But for the most part they are well-authenticated, and reasonably credible in the light of modern physical science. Thus we have Browning's story of a fulfilled dream of his sister-in-law concerning the time of her own death; Theodore Parker's prophecy of the American Civil War; Abraham Lincoln's foreboding of his own assassination, and the divinations of Madame Lenormand. But we should hardly have thought the well-known story of Lord Beaconsfield's prediction, as a young man, of his coming greatness suitable for inclusion in the book. There was nothing very "occult" about that. It doubtless arose simply from a sense of power and self-confidence. Mr. Field's little volume is perhaps rather too "scrappy," but as a work of reference it has its uses and will interest the general reader.

MYTHS AND LEGENDS OF THE CELTIC RACE. By T. W. Rolleston. With sixty-four full-page illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Harrop.)

There are few men, on the side of knowledge, more competent to write such a book than Mr. Rolleston. His only drawback is that he clearly disbelieves the majority of the tales he tells. That is a drawback indeed. Yet, as he disguises this scepticism in the excellence of his telling, it will probably not obtrude itself on the reader. It would be a pity if it did; for we can imagine few mythologies so wondrous or glorious as the Celtic. It has all the strength of the Norse without its crude hurly-burly. It has all the beauty and grace of the Greeks, without its statuesque immobility. Mr. Rolleston traces first the true characteristics and geographical definition of all the Celtic tribes before he proceeds to tell their tales, cycle by cycle. The cycle to which the greater numbers will at once turn, will naturally be the Cuchullid Cycle. Nor will they be disappointed in what they find there. We have already read it many times over; and are likely to read it yet many times more. But this is only one of the cycles. There is the famous Ossianic cycle. There are the less known tales of the remoter Cymry with which the book closes. And there is an admirable chapter of the "Religion of the Celts." Altogether this is a book to possess and to read.

Notes on New Books.

MR. B. T. BATSFORD.

Mr. J. Starkie Gardiner's new book is devoted to the short period soon after the accession of William and Mary, during which the art of ironwork in England "experienced an extraordinary development, which continued to the middle of the eighteenth century." As the author says, the achievements of this period "form one of the most brilliant phases in the history of English craftsmanship." English Ironwork of the XVIIth and XVIIIth Centuries is very handsomely produced, and contains eighty-eight colotype plates and some hundred and fifty illustrations in the text. It is certainly the last word on its subject.

MR. WERNER LAURIE.

Kennedy Square, by F. Hopkinson Smith (6s.) is an intensely interesting story, pervaded throughout with an air of quiet charm. The plot deals with a love affair of sixty or more years ago, in which Harry Rutter and Kate Seymour play the principal parts, watched over by Harry's fairy godfather, St. George Temple; and a more loveable character than St. George it would be difficult to find in modern fiction. The romance of it all hinges on a certain act of Harry's at a great ball given by Colonel Rutter to celebrate the engagement of his son and Kate Seymour. Harry and St. George look upon Harry's behaviour from one point of view; Kate and Colonel Rutter regard it from another; and so the lovers become estranged and Harry is banished from his father's house; the other inhabitants of Kennedy Square being divided in their opinions on the subject. The reader is at first uncertain where his sympathies lie, as the author pleads eloquently and earnestly for each side in turn. The chapter in which Edgar Allen Poe makes a dramatic appearance is particularly impressive. This is emphatically a book to be read.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Mr. H. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C., is already well known as an accomplished writer of detective stories, and "Young Beck" (6s.) will do no harm to his high reputation. Further than that we can hardly go, for, although the author displays the greatest ingenuity in the construction of his tales, he can hardly disguise the improbability of their setting. Frankly, it is inconceivable that one small family should have been the storm centre of so many attempted crimes. But, with this granted, it must be confessed that young Beck is a worthy successor to his father and mother in the detection of crime. Readers will find that the book contains many dramatic moments, and several very pleasing mysteries.

MESSRS. MURRAY & EVENDEN.

Michael; by Evelyn Barber (6s.) is a charming and brightly written love story, which has much of the fragrance of a country garland, though it does not lose sight of the deeper issues of life. The characters are sketched with insight and vivacity, some of the subsidiary ones proving almost as interesting as the principals; though the plot chiefly centres in the meetings between Michael and Philippa. Michael, a young, town-bred solicitor, has all the grit of a sound North-country Englishman; but his inner nature lies to a great extent dormant, till, during a Lakeland holiday, he meets Philippa, a delightfully fresh but albeit serious-minded English country girl. Their growing love is prettily yet naturally drawn, and all goes well till a well-depicted lovers' quarrel paves the way for fresh developments. Philippa is not in the least degree a prig, she is far too frank and natural; but her idealising mind dreams of a perfect knight, and she impulsively reproves her lover for a fault which vexes her. He is too headstrong to stand such reproof, and pride keeps the pair apart till their fate proves too much for them. Such are the simple outlines of a story which leads the reader on by the unaffected verve with which it is written. It is decidedly an idyll, yet it never loses touch with the facts of life. Miss Barber is to be congratulated, and we shall look forward to her next novel.

MESSRS. ALSTON RIVERS.

Miss Eva Lathbury's new novel The Moving Camp (6s.) is decidedly a good book, but the vagaries of its heroine are perhaps a little bewildering. We can believe in her, but we cannot altogether understand her, for she is one of those troublesome people who possess an artistic temperament. Also she is a little aggravating. Up to a point things go so very much her way; and her attitude of "I told you so" may jar upon the reader, and he may had with some relief the partial discomfiture which eventually overtakes her. Morag O'Brien is a lady whose past is wrapt in mystery, which is gradually revealed in the course of the story, but her future—as a singer—seems assured. She is a dangerous person to thrust into a middle class Lancashire family, even for a short time, and the results of her machinations are sketched in some detail by the author. The Moving Camp is a book which deserves careful reading. It possesses a number of lifelike characters, and the scenes which are laid in and around Dresden are particularly effective.

MESSRS. JOHN LONG, LTD.

The only thing which we have against Mr. Murray Gilchrist's latest novel The Secret Tontine (6s.) is its title. To some extent it gives away the mystery of a very well-told sensational story. The scene is laid in the Peak District, which Mr. Gilchrist has already familiarised in a number of excellent novels; the characters are well drawn, and there is a faint but very attractive love interest, while the author displays much skill in the construction of his plot. In fact, The Secret Tontine is a rattling good story, and we are sorry for the people who will not be thrilled by it.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

The Qualities of Mercy by Cecil Adair (6s.) is a very interesting novel, with one of the most attractive heroines we have ever met between the covers of a book—a girl with plenty of spirit, yet sympathetic and altogether lovable, whom we are introduced to as a child of six, and whose adventures we follow with increasing interest as she grows from childhood and girlhood to womanhood, retaining the same sweet personality through all. There are other well-drawn characters in the book which is rich in mystery and dramatic incidents. We can thoroughly recommend The Qualities of Mercy, to all who enjoy good fiction.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS.

In For Kirk and King (3s. 6d.), Mr. J. A. Macrae gives us the "memoirs of John Paterson of Whiteford"—an imaginary character. It is a well-written, strong and stirring novel, which gives the reader a vivid insight into the life and warfare of the Scottish Covenanters, and the author may be congratulated upon his very efficient handling of a difficult theme. Mr. Lauchlan Maclean Watt contributes an appreciative introduction.

The . . . Poems of Cale Young Rice . . .

IMMORTAL
LURE 5/- net

MANY GODS 5/- net

SONG
SURF 5/- net

NIRVANA
DAYS 5/- net

PLAYS AND LYRICS 7/6 net

A NIGHT IN AVIGNON 2/6 net

Some Opinions of Cale Young Rice's Poetic Works.

Richard Mansfield says: "I was greatly impressed with it and derived a sense of personal encouragement from the evidence of so fine and lofty a product for the stage."

THE BOOKMAN says: "Of the two plays 'Yolanda of Cyprus' and 'David,' the latter is perhaps the more moving and impressive. Yet in each play there is an equal command of imaginative dramatic utterance, of picturesque effectiveness and of metrical harmony."

The Glasgow Herald says: "Both the plays are excellent. 'Yolanda' especially is finely constructed, the irregular blank verse admirably adapted for the exigencies of intense emotion, the characters firmly drawn; and the climax serves the purpose of good stage-craft and poetic justice."

T.P.'s Weekly says: "The plays might well stand the difficult test of production, and the volume will be welcome to all who care for serious verse."

The Scotsman concludes: "Mr. Rice's work as a whole is everywhere marked by true imaginative power and elevation of feeling."

Sydney Lee declares: "The volume betrays wide sympathies with life and nature, and a welcome originality of sentiment and metrical harmony. The plays are well constructed and possess distinct dramatic power."

Sydney Lee: It is a dramatically told episode, and the metre is most effectively handled, making a welcome change for blank verse, and greatly enhancing the interest."

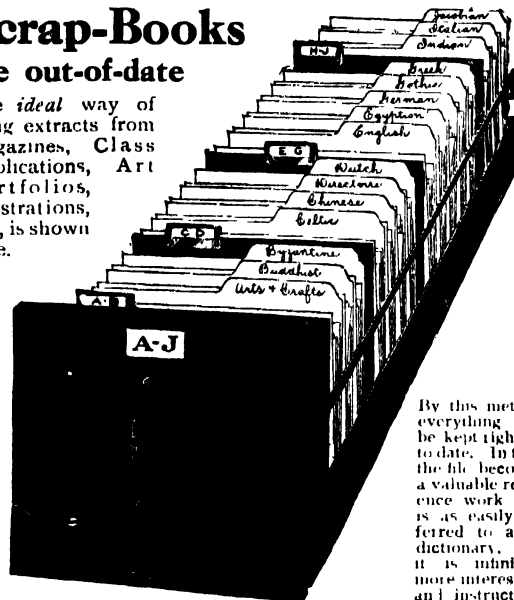

Margaret Anderson: "Mr. Rice is one of the few present-day poets who have the steadiness and weight for a well-sustained drama."

Minnie Madden Fisk says: "No one can doubt that it is superior poetically and dramatically to Stephen Phillips's work," and that Mr. Rice ranks with Mr. Phillips at his best has often been reaffirmed.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Scrap-Books are out-of-date

The ideal way of filing extracts from Magazines, Class Publications, Art Portfolios, Illustrations, etc., is shown here.

By this method everything can be kept right up to date. In time the file becomes a valuable reference work that is as easily referred to as a dictionary, and it is infinitely more interesting and instructive.

The Globe-Wernicke Vertical File

affords a simple yet dependable method of filing everything that is worth keeping. The extracts and clippings are put into tabbed folders which are alphabetically arranged according to subject. (See illustration above.) One can also file private correspondence, legal documents, MSS, etc. Handsomely furnished cabinets, mounted on leg bases, are furnished in Quartered Oak or Mahogany. Ask for Booklet No. 15 B; also special pamphlet, "How to File and Find Papers."

Packing Free. Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London. 82, Victoria Street, S.W.
99, Bishopsgate, E.C.

KOH
I NOOR

TRY
ONE
NOW

KOH
I
NOOR

If you have never tried a "Koh-i-noor" you cannot know how delightful

it is to use, how free it is from grit, how durable it is in wear.
On the score of economy alone the 'Koh-i-noor' is cheap, for it outlasts
SIX ordinary Pencils.

KOH-I-NOOR PENCILS

4d. each or 3/6 doz.
Of Stationers, Artists,
Colourmen, etc., etc.,
everywhere. List free.
L. & C. HARDMUTH Ltd.,

Koh-i-noor House,
Kingsway, London.
(Paris, Brussels, Dresden, Zurich, Milan, Vienna, New York.)

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS

ON SALE AT

EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP,

14-16, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

BOOKS
BOUGHT.BOOKS
EXCHANGED.

Whyte-Melville's Society and Sporting Novels, handsome set, half-calf gilt, illus. 25 vols., 28 15s.

Hood (Tom). Works, 10 vols. new, half-calf gilt, 1869, 23 3s.

Dickens (Chas.). Works, The famous "Chas. Dickens Edition," now scarce, 21 vols. new, half-calf, gilt, 24 4s., 1867, etc.

Carroll (Lewis). Doublets; a Word Puzzle, 2nd ed. cloth, rare, 30s. 1880

— The Hunting of the Snark, 1st ed. cloth, 21s. 1876

— Sylvie and Bruno, 1889, 1st ed., 25s.

— Alice in Wonderland, 1873; Through the Looking-Glass, 1872; 2 vols., cloth, 21s.

Cranmer Bible, 1553, thick folio, calf, fine copy, 212 12s.

Lydekker's Royal Natural History, 6 vols. half-morocco, 22 10s.

Monthly Packet, 2nd, 3rd, and first 4 vols. of 4th series, 1866-92, 54 vols., and Christmas No.'s 1877-91 in 5 vols., 59 vols. in all, 24 4s.

Greenaway (Kate), first eds.—Language of Flowers, 16s.; A Day in a Child's Life, 16s.; The Royal Progress of King Pepito, 7s. 6d.; The English Spelling-Book, 7s. 6d.; Girls' Own Paper, 1892, 12s. 6d.; Under the Window, 21s.; Heartsease, 1880, 12s. 6d.; Routledge Christmas No. 1881, 16s.

Crane (Walter), first eds.—The First of May, a Fairy Masque, in Portfolio, 30s.; Wise's New Forest, Artist's edition, presentation copy, 25s. (only 50 pub.), 1883; The Work of Walter Crane with Notes by the Artist, "Art Journal," 1899, 10s. 6d.; Illus. to Shakespeare's Tempest, in portfolio, 1893, 15s.; Pan Pipes 21s.; A Masque of Days, 7s. 6d.; Queen Summer, 7s. 6d.; Procession of the Months, 21s.; Renaissance, 1891, 16s.

Walter Crane's Picture Books in 1 vol., 1900, 15s.

Lawrence (Sir Thos.), by Lord Ronald Gower, with 4 coloured plates and 48 other large illus., with 13 small plates and a catalogue of the Works by A. Graves, a fine book, pub. 28 net, price 25 5s.

Portraits, Burlington Fine Arts Club Mezzotint Portraits, folio, fine book, 1902, scarce, 27 7s.

Dugdale's Visitation of Yorkshire, with additions, edited by J. W. Clay, 2 vols., 1899, 22 2s.

Eliot (Geo.), Romola, with illus. by Sir F. Leighton, ed.-de-luxe, scarce, 1880, 2 vols., 23 3s.

Scott (Wm. Bell), Poems, Ballads, etc., with 17 etchings by the author and Alma Tadema, 1875, 25s.

Hunting (Haddon Hall Library), only 150 copies on hand-made paper pub., full vellum, 1900, 21s.

Caradoc Press Vicar of Wakefield, and Walton's Angler, full-calf, fine books, 15s. each.

Ramsay (Dean), Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character, 2 vols., 1861, Presentation copy, 10s. 6d.

Trial Roger Tichborne, 9 vols., folio, profusely illus. in parts, rare, 22 10s.

— Reports of Trials for Murder by Poisoning, by Browne and Stewart, cloth, 1883, 21s.

Baldwin Brown, The Glasgow School of Painters, with 74 reproductions and portraits by J. Craig Annan, folio, 1908, pub. 22 12s. 6d.; 25 5s. net.

Gilbert (William), King George's Midday, with 150 illus. by W. S. Gilbert, 1st ed.; cloth, 1872, 15s.

Dulac's Sleeping Beauty, 15s.

Gilbert (W. S.), first eds.—Original Plays, 1876, 12s. 6d.; Songs of a Savoyard, 1891, illus. by the author, 12s. 6d.; The Pirates Picture Book, illus. by Alice H. Woodward, 1902, 12s.

Greeney's Monumental Brasses of Europe, folio, 1884, 35s.

Rackham's Grimm's Fairy Tales, 15s.

— Land of Enchantment, printed on vellum, 21s.

Indian Mutiny, Walker's Through the Mutiny, 1907, 3s. 6d.; Wilberforce, An Unrecorded Chapter of the Indian Mutiny, 1894, 4s. 6d.; Major North's Journal of an English Officer in India, 1858, 10s. 6d.; A History of the Indian Rebellion, a folio collection of newspaper cuttings of the Period, unique, 22 2s.

Breeding Racehorses by the Figure System, by Bruce Lowe, 22 2s.

Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d.

Naval and Military Trophies, personal relics of British Heroes, a series of water-colour drawings, a very handsome book, pub. 27 7s.; price 30s.

Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, etc., 2 vols., 1909, 6s. 6d.

Blackmore's Lorna Doone, beautifully illus., a fine presentation volume, pub. 35s.; 12s. 6d.

Sporting Books, Vyner's Notitia Venatica, Treatise on Fox-Hunting, Ackerman, 1847, cloth, 23 10s.; Jorrock's Jaunts and Jollities, coloured plates, by Alken, cloth, 1869, 23 10s.; Science of Foxhunting, by Scrutator, 1868, 25s.; Noble Science of Foxhunting, by Radcliffe, illus., 1839, cloth, 35s.; Taplin's Sporting Dictionary and Rural Repository, 2 vols., calf, 1803, 15s.; Nimrod's Northern Tour, cloth, 1857, 21s.; The Gentleman's Recreation, 1877, rare old book on Hunting, Hawking, Fishing, Fowling, etc., 22 2s.

Scott, first eds.—Ballads and Lyrical Pieces, boards, uncut, 1806, 22 2s.; Anne of Gelestein, 3 vols., boards, uncut, 1829, 21 10s.; The Antiquary, old, half-calf, edges uncut, rare, 1816, 42s.

Dickens, first eds.—Complete in parts, very rare, Bleak House, 22 2s.; Our Mutual Friend, 35s.; Little Dorrit, 42s.

— Sibson's Illustrations (69 plates), to Old Curiosity Shop, rare, 24 4s.

— Famous Household ed., 21 vols., 4to, cloth, 45s.

— Many odd parts in stock. State wants.

Austin Dobson, Vignettes in Rhyme, 1st ed. dedicated to Anthony Trollope, cloth, 1873, 35s.

Elliott (Frances M.), Old Court Life in Spain, 2 vols., 1893, 35s.

Merriman (H. Seton), From One Generation to Another, 2 vols., 1st ed., 30s.

Bute's Roman Breviary, 22 10s. 1908

Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, 1st ed., half-calf, 1839, 15s.

— Works, 30 vols., cost 23 15s. net for 22 2s. (Caxton Pub. Co.).

Encyclopedic Dictionary, 8 vols., 30s., pub. 24 4s. Cassell, 1902-3

Myers's Human Personality, 2 vols., very scarce, 38s.

Donnelly's Atlantis, scarce, 10s. 6d.

Bacon (Lord), Sylva Sylvarum, with portrait, folio, calf, 23 3s. 1635

Ruskin, Modern Painters, 5 vols., cloth, uncut, best ed., 210 10s. 1856-68

Donne (J. D.), Poems, original calf, rare, 1639, 26 6s.

Haggard's Rural England, 2 vols., 1st ed., 25s. 1902

Jack Harkaway Series of Boys' Books, 14 vols. bound in 9, profusely illus., now very scarce, 24 4s.

FitzGerald (Edward), Letters and Literary Remains, edited by Wright, 3 vols.; 22 2s. 1889

Rawlinson's Sixth Great Oriental Monarchy, 1878, rare, 24 4s.

Wordsworth's Poems, rare, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1807, 23 3s.

Louis Morin, French Illustrators, folio, only 150 issued, 1896, 25s.

Symonds (J. A.), Giovanni Boccaccio as Man and Author, rare, 1st ed.; 1895, 22 2s.

— Walt Whitman, a Study, large paper, 1893, 22 2s.

— Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama, 1884, 1st ed.; 22 10s.

Free Review (The), edited by J. M. Robertson, 10 vols., 1893-8, 22 10s.

Robinson's Eastern Carpets (second series), folio, fine work, 30s. 1893

Wilmott's Warley Garden in Spring and Summer, fine plates, beautiful vol., folio, 21s.

Sir Walter Scott's Halidon Hill, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 21s. 1882

— The Doom of Devorgoll, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 30s. 1830

Mather's Kabbalah Unveiled, 1st ed., cloth, 1887, 22 2s.

Mead's Simon Magnus, very rare, 1892, 4to, wrappers, 22 2s.

Geographical Historie of Africa, by J. Leo, folio, calf, rare, 23 3s. 1600

Hamerton's Paris in Old and Present Times, large paper copy, 1885, 24 4s. for 22 2s.

Brontë's Poems 1st ed., 1846, 22 2s.

Hall Caine's Politics and Art, 1880, very rare, 23 3s.

— Two Autograph Letters from "Greeba Castle," 15s.

Dublin University Magazine, vols. 1 to 53, 26 10s. 1833 59

Bradley's Ethical Studies, 1876, 22 10s.

Butler's Solar Biology, N.D., 21s.

Beardale's First and Second Book of Drawings, 2 vols. with extra illus. from Juvena and Lucian, "Studio" and other Sources, a unique lot, 26 6s.

Meredith (George), One of Our Conquerors, 1st ed., 3 vols., 1891, 25s.

Thackeray's Works, 13 vols., 1887, 22 5s.

Dickens' Works, early reprints with all the original illus., 15 vols., half-calf gilt, 26 10s., 1871, etc.

Halford's Dry Fly Entomology, 1897, rare, 30s.

Fitzgerald (E.), The Complete Works of, 7 vols., handsome set, pub. 28 5s., price 23 3s.

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, Twelve Coloured Plates after drawings, by Abanindro Nath Tajoore, to illus. the Rubaiyat, in portfolio, "Studio" Office, 15s. 1910

Works of Robert Herrick, edited, with Biographical Notice, by T. Maitland, 2 vols., half-morocco, 1823, rare, 22 10s.

Dulac's Illustrations: Shakespeare's The Tempest, ed.-de-luxe, signed by the artist, 23.

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, illus. by Heath Robinson, ed.-de-luxe, signed by artist, 22 15s.

Benson (A. C.), Poems, 1st ed., 1893, 35s.

— The Professor, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1900, 21s.

Henley's Song of the Sword, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1892, 10s. 6d.

Whistler, Illustrated Catalogue of the Whistler Memorial Exhibition, ed.-de-luxe, 22 2s.

Rothenstein's English Portraits, folio, rare, 1898, 35s.

Whympers's Travels Amongst the Great Andes of the Equator, 1892, fine presentation copy from the author with inscription, 21s.

Whympers's Scrambles in the Alps, 1st ed. cloth, 1871, 28s. 6d.

Muther's History of Modern Painting, 8th ed., vols., cloth, scarce, 1895, 22 15s.

Old Time Punishments, by W. Anderson, F.R.H.S., L.P., only 100 printed, 4to, cloth, 1893, 25s.

Lang (Andrew), The True Story Book, 1st ed., 1898, only 150 issued, 21s.

— The Green Fairy Book, large paper, 1892, only 150 issued, 21s.

— Fairy Books, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1892, 21s.

— Fairy Tales, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1892, 21s.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW FICTION

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

GOD AND MAMMON. (3/6)Joseph Hocking.

A purposeful novel of enthralling interest. "God and Mammon" is sure to be widely read and much discussed.

FOR THE QUEEN.E. Phillips Oppenheim.

"For the Queen" is a book that will be read, enjoyed and remembered. It shows that master of mysteries, E. Phillips Oppenheim, at his best; diplomatic intrigue and exciting mystery are the principal features.

THE PIONEER.Harold Bindloss."Mr. Bindloss may with confidence be relied upon for a good, breezy, wholesome story of outdoor life, containing . . . strenuous endeavour, adventure, de. ently restrained love-making, womanhood sweet and true; manhood—muscular, chivalrous."—*The AthenæumPRINCESS KATHARINE.*Katharine Tynan."Tender, pathetic, and indeed moving. The picture of the mother is both just and gentle; and the Irish background is delightful."—The Athenæum.CHRISTINA.*L. G. Moberly."Miss Moberly's story has plenty of incident, and is a very excellent and wholesome play."—Morning Post.THE MYSTERY OF THE RAVENSPURS.*Fred M. White."Woven with Mr. White's well known ingenuity and skill, the book excites the attention at the turn of every page, and not until the last line has been read is the reader disposed to lay it aside."—The Scotsman.IN LOVE'S LAND.*Effie A. Rowlands.

"In Love's Land" is a novel likely to please all library readers, and be much talked about.

THE TRIANGLE.Marie Connor Leighton.

Amongst library readers the author of "Convict 99" is a great favourite, and "The Triangle" is a novel that will appeal to them immensely.

WARD, LOCK, & CO., LIMITED, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Chatto & Windus's New 6s. Novels.

THE MALABAR MAGICIAN.

By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Rajah," etc. With a Miniature by G. L. PENNY.

THE ENDLESS JOURNEY, etc.

By NETTA SYRETT, Author of "Dreder's Daughter."

THE SHOE OF A HORSE.

By CHRISTOPHER STONE, Author of "They Also Serve," etc.

THE WISDOM OF WAITING.

By MABEL INCE. With a Frontispiece by the Author.

THE CHILDREN'S BREAD.

By MAUDE LITTLE, Author of "At the Sign of the Burning Bush," etc.

COMMONERS' RIGHTS.Shortly.

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY, Author of "Mothers and Fathers," "Service," etc. With 8 Illustrations by MAXWELL ARMFIELD.

UP TO PERRIN'S.Shortly.

By MARGARET B. CROSS, Author of "A Question of Means," etc.

INNOCENCE in the WILDERNESS.By THEODOSIA LLOYD. A story of deep emotional understanding. Shortly.

London: Chatto & Windus, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

NEW POETRY AND ESSAYS

FIRES: BOOK I. THE STONE and other Tales.

By Wilfrid W. Gibson. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net. Wrappers 1s. net.

SOME POEMS OF LIONEL JOHNSON.

Newly selected. With an introduction by Louise Imegen Guiney. 80 pp. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

VERSES. By Agnes Fox. Royal 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.SONGS OF A SYRIAN LOVER.

By Clinton Scollard. Imperial 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.

IN MANTLE BLUE.

By F. Gwynne Evans. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

STORM SONG AND OTHER POEMS.

By Pallister Barkas. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

POEMS. By W. E. Lutyens. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.THE SLUM-CHILD AND OTHER POEMS.

By E. H. Visiak. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net.

STRANGERS AND FOREIGNERS: being

Translations from the French, Italian, German, etc. Done into English Verse by Lois Saunders. Roy. 16mo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE FUTURE OF POETRY.

By F. P. Osmaston. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

An essay on the various theories of poetry.

ANIMA CELTICA.

By Reginald L. Hine. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CAMPAGNA OF ROME: A Symphony.

By Stanhope Bayley. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

Uniform with two recent volumes of delicate essays, viz., "A Singer of Dreams" and "Anima Fanciulla."

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

THE FIRST & SECOND EDITIONS OF GUY THORNE'S GREAT TEMPERANCE AND RELIGIOUS
THE DRUNKARD

have already been disposed of.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.
THE DRUNKARD

By the Author of "When it was Dark."

Q This is a book which stands by itself. The publishers believe that nothing quite like it has been published before.

Q It is a book of POWER "Power fitted to the season." In the very first pages the reader is gripped by the drama which pulses and throbs through the whole story of Gilbert Lothian and his devil-ridden life.

Q The tale is one of action. As the drama unfolds itself the pictures of contemporary life are real and vivid; varied to an unusual extent also. The lovely suffering wife; the famous doctor with his priest-like mission of hope and regeneration; Lothian's treacherous and egotistic friend; the subtle study of Rita Wallace "lightly laughing, sweetly speaking," and yet with black ruin and hideous crime as her gifts—these characters really live. And finally the whole psychology of Alcoholism, the TRUTH of it—presented for men and women of the world for the first time in English fiction—will be found here.

THE DRUNKARD

By the Author of "When it was Dark."

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS. At All Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW FICTION.

MICHAEL KAYE'S New Romance,

THE HONOUR OF BAYARD

By the Author of "The Cardinal's Past," etc.

WILLIAM CAINE'S Humorous Story. 6s.

OLD ENOUGH TO KNOW BETTER

By the Author of "Boom."

ENA FITZGERALD'S New Story. 6s.

AND THE STARS FOUGHT

By the Author of "Patcola," etc.

GUY RAWLENCE'S New Novel. 6s.

A COMEDY OF HONOUR

By the Author of "The Romantic Road."

HARRIS BURLAND'S New Novel. 6s.

LORD OF IRONGRAY

By the Author of "The Financier," etc.

The Story of the Successful Musical Play at the Shaftesbury Theatre.

THE MOUSMÉ

By MICHAEL KAYE 3s. 6d.

A Cheap Edition of THE MOUSMÉ is also issued at One Shilling net.

New Volume in the Lotus Library.

SIDONIE'S REVENGE

By ALPHONSE DAUDET.

12mo. Cloth 1s. 6d. net. Leather 2s. net.

A New Work by the Author of "Seen and Unseen,"

THE COPING STONE

By E. KATHARINE BATES.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

Send card for list of GREENING'S POPULAR CLASSICAL Music Dept. (B.), GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

WORKS BY MISS THACKERAY

(LADY RITCHIE).

Uniform Edition, in 10 Volumes. Each Volume Illustrated with a Vignette Title-Page. Large crown 8vo. 6/- each.

1. Old Kensington.
2. The Village on the Cliff.
3. Five Old Friends and a Young Prince.
4. To Esther, and other Sketches.
5. Bluebeard's Keys, and other Stories.
6. The Story of Elizabeth; Two Hours; From an Island.
7. Toilers and Spinners; and other Essays.
8. Miss Angel: Fulham Lawn.
9. Miss Williamson's Divagations.
10. Mrs. Dymond.

Blackstick Papers

By LADY RITCHIE. With Portraits, including a portrait of W. M. Thackeray, from a miniature painting. Large post 8vo. 6/- net.

With 2 Portraits, 32 pages of Illustrations and 3 Maps. Small royal 8vo. 10/6 net.

The Gambia

Its History, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern, together with its Geographical, Geological, and Ethnographical Conditions, and a description of the birds, beasts, and fishes found therein. By HENRY FENWICK REEVE, C.M.C., M.L.C.E., F.R.G.S., F.A.S., &c.

With a Photogravure Portrait from a Drawing by GEORGE RICHMOND, R.A. Small demy 8vo. 7/6 net.

Edward King, 60th Bishop of Lincoln

By the Right Hon. G. W. E. RUSSELL, Author of "Collections and Recollections," etc.

Large post 8vo. 7/6 net.

Men and Measures: a History of Weights and Measures, Ancient and Modern

By Lieut.-Col. EDWARD NICHOLSON, F.R.C., etc. Author of "The Story of Our Weights and Measures."

Crown 8vo. 5/- net.

A Nurse's Life in War and Peace

By E. C. LAURENCE, R.R.C. With a Preface by Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart. G.C.V.O., C.B., &c.

With a Map and 48 Illustrations from Photographs. 8vo. 12/6 net.

Plain Towns of Italy: the Cities of Old Venetia

By EGERTON R. WILLIAMS, Author of "Hill Towns of Italy." * * This is a companion volume to Mr. Egerton Williams' "Hill Towns of Italy," published some eight years ago.

With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo. 3/6.

Murphy: a Message to Dog Lovers

By Major GAMBIER-PARRY, Author of "Annals of an Eton House," "The Pageant of my Day," etc.

* * If a dog can have a soul, then Murphy possessed one; and this is the story of his sensitive intimacy with his master.

NEW 6/- FICTION.

Fathers of Men: a Public School Story

By E. W. HORNUNG.

Denham's: or a Web of Life

By ALEXANDRA WATSON.

The House of Robershay

By EMMA F. BROOKE.

The Common Touch

By AUSTIN PHILIPS.

Love Gilds the Scene, and Women Guide the Plot

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

A SELECTION FROM

Messrs. HUTCHINSON & CO.'S New Books

"INSIDE INDIA"

A YEAR with the GAEKWAR

By E. ST. CLAIR WEEDEN, M.A.

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net. With 25 Illustrations

"This volume fills a niche of its own in English literature. To very few indeed does it fall to make so prolonged and intimate an acquaintance with the life of a Native Prince and the inner working of his State. Mr. Weeden has made good use of his opportunities, and given us a real insight into what was before but a dimly lighted interior" Standard

COLOUR. MUSIC

The Art of Mobile Colour.

By A. WALLACE RIMINGTON, A.R.E., R.B.A.

Professor of Fine Arts, Queen's College, London

With 29 Illustrations in colour, black and white, and photography

In crown 8vo cloth gilt, 6s. net.

It is no exaggeration to say that this is an epoch-making volume dealing with what is, to all intents and purposes, a new art, raising questions of great importance to present-day culture and civilization, and opening up a fairy-land of artistic possibilities.

2nd EDITION

"A RARE FINE YARN"

SIXTY YEARS

LIFE and ADVENTURE in the FAR EAST

By JOHN DILL ROSS.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net.

With 3 Photogravure Plates, 20 other Illustrations and a Map.

THE CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH OF
CHARLES DICKENS

By ROBERT LANGTON, F.R.Hist.Soc.

With Photogravure Frontispiece and 80 fine high-class Engravings from original drawings by William Hull, Edward Hull, and the Author

In handsome cloth gilt and gilt top, 5s.

"A KING'S ENCHANTRESS."

MY LADY CASTLEMAINE

By PHILIP W. SERGEANT

In cloth gilt, 16s. net. With Illustrations

The Story of Evolution

By JOSEPH McCABE

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. With Illustrations and Maps.

The Times says—"For such a task as the popular statement of modern scientific theories and discoveries on the subject of evolution in its wildest sense Mr. McCabe's experience as a lecturer, etc., has given him many qualifications; he is easy to follow, has read widely, and writes with ease, point, and lucidity"

A SUPERB ART BOOK

JOHN OPIE

And His Circle.

By ADA EARLAND.

In one large handsome volume, with 31 Illustrations, printed on art paper, and beautifully reproduced by a new process, 21s. net.

HUTCHINSON'S NEW 6s. NOVELS

Selected from the best Novels of the Spring

By

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE

THE ORDER OF RELEASE
(4th Edition)

MRS. HUGH FRASER and

J. I. STAHLMANN

THE SATANIST
(4th Edition)

MARY ANGELA DICKENS

THE DEBTOR
(2nd Edition)

W. B. MAXWELL

IN COTTON WOOL

ROBERT HUGH BENSON

THE COWARD
(4th Edition)

COSMO HAMILTON

THE OUTPOST OF ETERNITY

BARONESS VON HUTTEN

SHARROW

MRS. CROKER

THE SERPENT'S TOOTH

F. FRANKFORT MOORE

THE RED MAN'S SECRET

DOROTHEA CONYERS

THE ARRIVAL OF ANTONY

By

MRS. BAILLIE SAUNDERS

LADY Q

G. B. BURGIN

DICKIE DILVER

EDGAR JEPSON

THE HOUSE ON THE MALL

E. M. CHANNON

STONELADIES

LUCAS MALET

ADRIAN SAVAGE
(4th Edition)

RICHARD PRYCE

CHRISTOPHER
(3rd Edition)

M. E. BRADDON

THE GREEN CURTAIN

MABEL BARNES-GRUNDY

THE THIRD MISS WENDERBY
(2nd Edition)

MRS. HUGH FRASER and

HUGH FRASER

THE QUEEN'S PERIL

PUNCH says:—"Life is short. Books to be reviewed are multitudinous, and available space in Mr. Punch's columns is exceedingly small. But my Baronite rarely resists the temptation to take up a novel bearing the brand HUTCHINSON. They must have a taster of uncommonly quick, true instinct."

London: HUTCHINSON & CO.

GAY & HANCOCK'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

NOVELS

The Luck of Rathcoole.

A charming historical romance of the time of Washington's first administration, with a mysterious hero, a swiftly moving plot, and a most pleasing ending.

By JEANIE GOULD LINCOLN, Author of "Marjorie's Quest."

The Garden of the Sun.

Reveals an intimate knowledge of Army life in the Philippines, with its gaieties, its flirtations, and its scandals.

By Capt. T. J. POWERS.

The Modern Evangeline.

An English Officer's adventures in Morocco.

By CATHERINE WILSON.

The Secret of Frontellac.

A romance of present day France.

By FRANK K. SCRIBNER.

Secretary of Frivolous Affairs.

A Society romance, introducing the love of entertaining celebrities, scandals and mysterious jewel robberies. A cynical humour pervades the volume.

By MAY PUTRILL.

Sweet Danger.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

The Carpet of Bagdad.

By HAROLD MACGRAITH.

POETRY

Poems of Revolt and Satan Unbound.

3/6 net.

By G. CONSTANT LOUNSBERY.

These poems attempt to formulate the various cries of the victims of life for liberty. Satan Unbound sums up the evolutionary struggle for the real freedom of humanity, and centres on the thought of the individual poems.

A Little Book of Home-Spun Verse.

3/6 net.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Heart Hath Said.

1/6 net.

By Rev. J. H. NEWSHAM TAYLOR.

Examining and Domestic Chaplain to the Bishop of Birmingham.

TRAVEL, &c.

The Log of the "Easy Way."

Fully Illustrated, 6/- net.

By JOHN I. MATTHEWS.

An account of a remarkable journey in a house boat of the author and his wife down the Mississippi to New Orleans, living a life of idyllic charm for four or five months.

Sailing Sunny Seas.

Fully Illustrated, 5/- net.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

A story account of Mrs. Wilcox's recent travels in the West Indies.

Pickwick Riddles and Perplexities.

By PERCY FITZGERALD.

LONDON: GAY & HANCOCK, LTD., 12 & 13, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

CENTURY MAGAZINE

PART OF THE CONTENTS FOR MARCH.

STELLA MARIS. A Novel III. By WILLIAM J. LOCKE, Author of "The Beloved Vagabond," etc. Picture by FRANK WILES.

COLE'S ENGRAVINGS OF MASTERPIECES. THE MILL. By REMBRANDT. Engraved on wood by TIMOTHY COFF.

THE TRAINING OF CHINESE CHILDREN. By HARRIET MONROE. Pictures by THORNTON OAKLEY.

AT A CHINESE TEMPLE. Three Pictures by THORNTON OAKLEY.

THREE ADVENTURES IN THE YOSEMITE. By JOHN MUIR. Author of "The Mountains of California." Picture from photograph.

THE POORHOUSE. By SARA TEA-DALE.

THE DOT-AND-DASH ALPHABET. By EDWARD I. MORSE. Newly Discovered Evidence that it was Invented by Morse. Pictures from portrait, facsimiles, etc.

CHRISTINA OF DENMARK, DUCHESS OF MILAN. By JULIA CARSWRIGHT. Author of "Beatrice d'Este," "Isabella d'Este," etc. Portrait of Princess Christina from the painting by Holbein.

THE WHITE FEET OF ATTIS. By HENRY ANDERSON LAFER. Decorations by OLIVER HERFORD.

THE STAGE WISDOM OF JOSEPH JEFFERSON. By MARY SHAW. Picture by RENE VINCENT, and portrait from photograph.

"A TIME FOR LAUGHTER AFTER TEARS." By CLARE GILPIN.

"HARD-HEARTED BARBARY ALLEN." By LUCY LURNAN. A Kentucky Mountain Sketch. Picture by F. R. KRUGER.

RUSSIAN "MOUSE-TRAPS." By GEORGE KENNAN. Author of "Siberia and the Exile System."

FLORIZEL AND FORTUNATUS OR THE UNINTENTIONAL HUMOR OF ILLUSTRATORS. A Story. By WALLACE IRWIN.

TWO ITALIAN MONUMENTS. The New Campanile at Venice and the Victor Emmanuel Monument from the Forum. From lithographs by JOSEPH PENNELL.

THE WOMAN'S CLUB "CONCENTRATES." By FRANCES R. STERRETT. Picture by F. C. YOUNG.

TSCHAIKOVSKY. By H. G. DWIGHT.

THE NJURY OF TOBACCO. By CHARLES B. TOWNS.

A POET PASSES. By M. L. BURIER.

THE WIDOW'S STRATEGY. A Story. By L. FRANK TOOKER. Pictures by CHARLES JOHNSON POST.

MR. WANHULL BOUNDER. A Story. By J. W. MULLER.

TOPICS OF THE TIME. Tariff Reform and Extravagance—The Clergy in the Wrong Box—Grace Before Lawlessness.

OPEN LETTERS. On the Hold up for Charity (MARGUERITE MERRINGTON). On the High Cost of Living (LOUISE HEARICK WALL).

MISS HOODER & STOUTON confidently recommend "The Century Magazine" to readers of THE BOOKMAN. It may be obtained of all booksellers, monthly, price 1s. 4d. A yearly subscription costs 16s. payable in advance. A specimen copy of "The Century Magazine" will be sent on request. Address all communications to HOODER & STOUTON, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

JOHN GALSWORTHY'S NEW PLAY

The Pigeon.

Cloth 2s. net; paper 1s. 6d. net; postage 4d.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS' CENSORED PLAY

The Secret Woman.

Cloth 2s. net, paper 1s. 6d. net, postage 3d

The above are published in Duckworth's Modern Plays Series. A full list of volumes can be had post free Three Clever Novels by New Writers.

Duckworth & Co have pleasure in introducing three new novelists

Janet Dodge

Arthur H. Holmes

A. B. Le Sage

"Messrs. Duckworth & Co have a flair for discovering talent. When they publish a novel by a new writer a reader knows it will be a 'serious' work" Manchester Guardian

Tony Unregenerate - By Janet Dodge

A Novel of Italy, Art and Music.

Twinkle - By Arthur H. Holmes

A thoughtful novel of English country life

In the West Wind By A. B. Le Sage

A Cornish mining tale.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS CROWN 8vo 6s. EACH.

JOHN TRAVERS' NEW NOVEL.

In the World of Bewilderment.

An Anglo Indian Tale By the Author of "Sahib" Crown 8vo 6s.

RICHARD HARDING DAVIS'S NEW BOOK

The Man Who Could Not Lose.

Five Stories By the Author of "Soldiers of Fortune" Crown 8vo 6s.

A very successful New Series.

The Readers' Library.

Copyright Works of Individual Merit and Permanent Value by Authors of Repute.

TWENTY-NINE VOLUMES NOW READY.

New Volumes just published are.

Between the Acts. By H. W. Nevinson.

The Bettsworth Book. By George Bourne.

Villa Rubein. By John Galsworthy.

The Heart of the Country. By Ford Madox Hueffer.

The Hills and the Vale. By Richard Jefferies.

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net a volume; postage 4d.

A special Descriptive Catalogue of the Series can be had post free.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

General Literature.

THE POCKET EDITION OF THE WORKS OF CHARLES AND MARY LAMB.

Edited by T. V. Lucas. With 1200 pieces in Photogravure. In Six Monthly Volumes. Leaf 8vo. Gilt top. 5s. each. The volumes are: I. Miscellaneous Prose. II. The Last Essays of Elia. III. Books for Children. IV. Plays and Fables. V. and VI. Letters. [Vol. I. March 7.]

MACBETH. Edited by H. Cuningham. Demy 8vo. 5s. 6d. net. [The Arden Shakespeare.]

REMBRANDT'S ETCHINGS. By ARTHUR M. Hind. With Catalogue and a Complete set of Illustrations. 10 Volumes. Wide Royal 8vo. Gilt top. 21s. net. [The Arden Shakespeare.]

THE LIFE AND WORK OF FRANK HOLL, R.A. By A. M. Reynolds. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [March 7.]

CELLINI. By ROBERT H. Hobart Cope. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 3 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Gilt top. 5s. 6d. net. [Little Books on Art.]

WILLIAM THE SILENT. By JACK COLLINGS SQUIR, B.A. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [March 14.]

THE GROVE FAMILY OF HALESOWEN. By JAMES DAVENPORT M.A., F.S.A. Author of 'The Washburn Family of Little Washbourne and Wichenford.' Royal 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [March 21.]

A POET'S CHILDREN: HARTLEY AND SARA COLERIDGE. By ELIZABETH A. JOWITT. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 5d. net. [March 28.]

CARDINAL DE RETZ. By DAVID OGILBY. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

CROMWELL'S ARMY: A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH SOLDIER DURING THE CIVIL WARS, THE COMMONWEALTH AND THE PROTECTORATE. Book the First. Lecture delivered in the University of Oxford, 1911. By C. H. LUTHER. M.A., F.R.S. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [March 7.]

THINGS THAT MATTER. PAPERS ON SUBJECTS WHICH ARE OF GREAT IMPORTANCE FOR DISCUSSION. By J. G. CHIOZZA MONTE. M.P. Author of 'Riches in Life.' Demy 8vo. 5s. net. [March 7.]

A PHILOSOPHY OF SOCIAL PROGRESS. By P. H. F. S. J. J. URWICK. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. [March 21.]

GLADSTONE AND IRELAND. IRISH POLICY IN PARLIAMENT FROM 1855-1894. By LORD LITTLETON. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [March 7.]

CHRISTIAN MYSTICISM. Considered in Eight Lectures delivered before the University of Oxford (The Temple Lectures, 1911). By W. K. JACOB. D.D. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [March 14.]

THE DRAMATIC POEM OF JOB. By the REV. W. JENNIS. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. [March 28.]

BACTERIA AS FRIENDS AND FOES OF THE DAIRY FARMER. By WILLIAM SALTER. Lecture and Demonstration at the Midland Agricultural and Dairy College, King's College, Derby. With an Introduction by JOHN GIBBS. F.R.S. With 11 Plates. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. [March 21.]

TEN THOUSAND MILES THROUGH CANADA. By JOSHUA ADAMS. 'Camping in' 'The Field' Author of 'The Gentle Art of Angling.' With 5 Illustrations and 1 Map showing the Author's route. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. [March 28.]

REPTILES, AMPHIBIA, AND FISHES. By R. L. JENNIS. B.A., F.R.S., and others. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [March 14.]

THE OX. By R. L. JENNIS. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. [March 21.]

GEM-STONES, AND THEIR DISTINCTIVE CHARACTERS. By G. L. HURTER. SMITH, M.A., D.Sc. (Oxon.) of the British Museum. With 3 Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. [March 21.]

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

THE MATADOR OF THE FIVE TOWNS. Arnold Bennett

A MAN FROM THE NORTH. Arnold Bennett

THE GUESTS OF HERCULES. C. N. and A. M. Williamson

JOSEPH IN JEOPARDY. Frank Danby

THE QUEST OF GLORY. Marjorie Bowen

FIRE IN STUBBLE. Baroness Orczy

THE PRINCIPAL GIRL. J. C. Snaith

THE CHINK IN THE ARMOUR. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes

FEELING CHRISTIAN. Peggy Webling

THE HUMAN CRY. Mrs. David Ritchie

FORGED IN STRONG FIRES. John Ironside

CHRISTINA HOLBROOK. Margaret Hope

THE REVOLT. Putnam Weale

ANTON OF THE ALPS. W. Victor Cook

A QUEEN OF CASTAWAYS. John Barnett

THE CHIEF COMMISSIONER. Hilda M. Swabey

THE SHIP THAT CAME HOME. A. G. Herbertson

IN THE DARK. Annie E. Holdsworth

DAME VERONA OF THE ANGELS. I. Clarke

PRISONERS' YEARS. I. Clarke

MY FRIEND THE CHAUFFEUR (2s. net) C. N. and A. M. Williamson

SIR RICHARD CALMADY (2s. net) Lucas Malet

FELIX (2s. net) Robert Hichens

METHUEN'S SHILLING BOOKS

Fcap 8vo. 1s. net.

The following are the new volumes —

UNDER FIVE REIGNS. Lady Dorothy Nevill

FROM MIDSHIPMAN TO FIELD-MARSHAL. Sir Evelyn Wood

ROUND THE RED LAMP. Sir A. Conan Doyle

THE HALO. Baroness von Hutten

METHUEN & Co., Ltd., 36, Essex Street, LONDON, W.C.

CANADIAN MASTERPIECES

PUBLISHED BY THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED, TORONTO.

1. FRAGMENTS OF SAM SLICK.
L. A. Burpee.
2. A LITTLE BOOK OF CANADIAN ESSAYS.
L. A. Burpee.
3. SONGS OF FRENCH CANADA.
L. A. Burpee.
4. BY CANADIAN STREAMS.
L. A. Burpee.
5. FLOWERS FROM A CANADIAN
GARDEN.
L. A. Burpee.
6. A CENTURY OF CANADIAN SONNETS.
L. J. Burpee.
7. HUMOR OF THE NORTH.
L. J. Burpee.
8. THE ROMANCE OF CANADIAN TOWNS.
L. J. Burpee.
9. HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN CANADA.
L. J. Burpee.
10. CANADIAN PATHFINDERS.
L. J. Burpee.
11. CANADIAN ELOQUENCE.
L. J. Burpee.

UNIFORM WITH ABOVE—

12. MADAME JANVIER'S CHURCH.
Mary E. Hickson.
13. CANADA MY HOME, and Other Poems.
Grant Balfour.
14. THE OTHER WISE MAN.
By Van Dyke.

All the above are obtainable in three styles of binding.

CLOTH	-	-	-	-	2/-	NET EACH.
LAMBSKIN	-	-	-	-	4/-	NET EACH.
VELVET PERSIAN, LIMP	-	-	-	-	6/-	NET EACH.

HEAD OFFICE, TORONTO, CANADA.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED.
MANSION HOUSE CHAMBERS, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, E.C.

SPRING PUBLICATIONS.

The Hunting Year

By W. SCARTH DIXON. Imperial 16mo. Illustrated.
Price 6/- net. (March.)

Sketches of many seasons in many countries, showing how a hunting man may find something in connection with his favourite sport to interest him in every month of the year.

Nights at the Play

By H. M. WALBROOK. With Portraits. Crown 8vo.
Price 5/- net. (Ready.)

"No one with a real interest in the Drama of to-day will be able to put down Mr. Walbrook's volume easily."—The Observer.

The Open Secret of Ireland

By Professor T. M. KETTLE. With an Introduction by Mr. J. E. Redmond, M.P. Crown 8vo. Cloth.
Price 3/6 net. (Ready.)

"In writing the present volume Mr. Kettle has added to the good books about Ireland—to the literature of affection, as opposed to the literature of detestation. Witty, epigrammatic, philosophic, he gives us a light-hearted bird's-eye view of the case for Irish political Nationalism which will amuse, gladden, and convince many whom the Irish question has hitherto only bored."—The Daily News.

"Unquestionably a brilliant piece of composition and a captivating presentation of the case for Home Rule."—Irish Independent.

Algiers, The Sahara and the Nile

By RACHEL HUMPHREYS. Imperial 16mo. With 32
Illustrations. Price 5/- net. (March.)

A very interesting and picturesque book of impressions and experiences, full of bright and amusing comments, and illustrated from original photographs.

Reminiscences of a Blackwall Midshipman

By W. L. DOWNIE. Crown 8vo. Cloth. Price 3/6 net.
(March.)

Gives the reader a personal record of life on the old sailing ships, full of amusing anecdotes of a form of travel that has now passed.

Hither and Thither

By R. BROOKS POPHAM. Crown 8vo. Cloth. Price
3/6 net. (February.)

A well-written, breezy and modest account of the author's wanderings in China, India, Japan, Africa, and other places.

X-Rays on Roulette Systems

By L. RASCH. Small Crown 8vo. Cloth. Price 5/- net.
(February.)

The author claims to explain how impossible it is to "beat the bank" by the use of systems before the public.

FORTHCOMING FICTION.

THE TEMPLE OF DREAMS

By PAUL BOLD. [MARCH.]

THE RICH MAN'S WIFE

By DICK DONOVAN and E. WAY ELKINGTON. [MARCH.]

DR. BROWN'S PARTNER

By IAN THE CAVENDISH. [MARCH.]

ROGER'S LUCK

By ROSAMUND SOUTHEY. [APRIL.]

CLARICE AND OTHERS

By H. ROBERTSON MURRAY. [APRIL.]

THE GIRDLE OF KAF

By CORA MINNETT. [APRIL.]

GURTH

By CAPTAIN GAMBIER. [MAY.]

LOVES ARTIST

By MRS. MONTAGU BRIGSTOCKE. [READY.]

LONDON:

W. J. HAM-SMITH, 6, John Street, Adelphi.

BEST BOOKS.

From Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SPRING LIST.

Caesar Borgia. A Study of the Renaissance. By JOHN LESLIE GARNER. With 17 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

The Roman Campagna. By ARNALDO CERVESATO. Translated by LOUISE CAICO. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

The Building of the Alps. By T. G. BONNEY, Sc D., LL.D., F.R.S.; Past President of the Alpine Club. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. By EDGAR THURSTON, C.I.E., late Superintendent, Ethnographic Survey, Madras Presidency. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

The Secret of the Pacific. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S., Author of "The Anles and the Amazon," etc. With 50 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

In Forbidden China. An Account of the D'Ollone Mission, 1206—1909. By VISCOUNT D'OLLONE, Major in the French Army. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

Lights and Shadows of Chinese Life. By the Rev. J. MACGOWAN, Author of "Sidelights on Chinese Life," etc. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

On the Backwaters of the Nile. Studies of some Child Races of Central Africa. By A. L. KITCHING, M.A. With a Map and 57 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12/6 net.

Cracow: The Royal Capital of Ancient Poland. Its History and Antiquities. By LEONARD LEPSZY, Member of the Imperial Academy of Science at Cracow. With 120 Illustrations. Crown 4to, cloth, 10/6 net.

English Apprenticeship and Child Labour: A History. By O. JOCELYN DUNLOP. With a Supplementary Section on "The Modern Problem of Juvenile Labour," by O. JOCELYN DUNLOP and RICHARD D. DENMAN, M.P., formerly Chairman of the London Juvenile Advisory Committee. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net.

James Hutchison Stirling: His Life and Work. By AMELIA HUTCHISON STIRLING, M.A. With a Preface by LORD HALDANE and eight Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net. (Ready.)

The New China. A Traveller's Impressions. By HENRI BERT. With 48 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net.

Modern Hungary. By FERDINAND L. LEIPNIK. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net.

Sozial Life in the Insect World. By J. H. FABRE. With 23 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net. (Ready.)

Sea Fisheries, Their Treasures and Toilers. By MARCEL HERUBEL. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7/6 net. (Ready.)

The Unvarying East: Modern Scenes and Ancient Scriptures. By the Rev. E. J. HARDY, M.A., Author of "How to be Happy Though Married," etc. With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7/6 net. (Ready.)

Modern Democracy. A Study in Tendencies. By BROUGHAM VILLIERS (F. J. SHAW), Author of "The Socialist Movement in England." Demy 8vo, cloth, 7/6 net.

Butterflies and Moths at Home and Abroad. By H. ROWLAND BROWN, M.A., F.E.S. With 21 Coloured Plates and numerous Figures. Large crown 4to, cloth, 7/6 net.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "CHATS" SERIES,
Illustrated. 5/- net each.

Chats on Old Jewellery and Trinkets. By MACIVER PERCIVAL.

Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture. By ARTHUR HAYDEN.

Write for a Copy of the New Announcement List.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

From HODDER & STOUGHTON'S SPRING LIST.

NEW NOVELS NOW READY.

HAVOC. By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM. Author of "The Illustrious Prince," "The Falling Star," etc. Illustrated in colour. 6/-

THE OLD WIVES' TALE. By ARNOLD BENNETT. New edition, with preface and photogravure portrait. 6/-

LOVE IN A SNARE. By CHARLES GARVICE. Author of "The Other Girl," "The Heart of a Maid," etc. 6/-

QUEEN OF THE GUARDED MOUNTS. By JOHN OXENHAM. Author of "Their High Adventure," "Barbe of Grand Bayou," etc. Illustrated. 6/-

THE RUBY HEART OF KISHGAR. By A. W. MARCHMONT. Author of "The Case of Lady Breadstone," etc. 6/-

CRENLAND CASTLE. By MORICE GERARD. Author of "The Last Link," "Rose of Blenheim," etc. 6/-

THE GIFTED NAME. By Mrs. FRED REYNOLDS. Author of "These Three," etc. 6/-

CORPORAL VIOLET. By L. T. MEADE. Author of "The Lady Cake Maker," "That Brilliant Peggy," etc. 6/-

THE BRIDE'S BREVIARY. ANONYMOUS. 6/-

HONESTY. By M. E. FRANCIS. Author of "The Tender Passion," etc. 6/-

THE FOURTH WATCH. By H. A. CODY. Author of "The Frontiersman." 6/-

THE HIGH CALLING. By CHARLES SHELDON. Author of "In His Steps." 6/-

THE SICK-A-BED LADY. By E. H. ABBOTT. Author of "Molly Make-Believe." 6/-

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Oxford University Press.

THE WORKS OF
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY

Arranged and Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

In Seventeen Volumes, with 1,942
Illustrations. Crown 8vo.

Cloth, per volume - - - - - 2s. net.
Cloth extra, gilt edges - - - - - 2s. 6d. net.
Paste grain, leather, gilt top - - - - 3s. 6d. net.

Also in superior Bindings—Half-Persian, Half-Calf,
Half-Morocco, &c.—at higher prices.

On OXFORD INDIA PAPER.

Cloth, gilt top - - - - - 2s. 6d. net.
Smooth lambskin, gilt top - - - - - 3s. 6d. net.

Also in superior Bindings at higher prices.

Athenaeum.—"Now that the whole set is available, its cheapness is clearly seen to be extraordinary. Many of the later volumes run to an unusual length, the store of illustrations is exceptional, and the type and appearance of the whole are irreproachable. Prof. Saintsbury is, as always, interesting in his comments."

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM
Mr. ANDREW MELROSE'S SPRING BOOKS.

DR. JOHNSON AND FANNY
BURNEY. BY C. BREWSTER TINKER.

Demy 8vo, Cloth. Illustrated. Price, 7s. 6d. net.

SOYER'S STANDARD COOK-
ERY. A Complete Guide to the Art of Cooking Dainty, Varied, and Economical Dishes for the Household.

BY NICHOLAS SOYER.

Late Chef to Brooks's Club, Author of "Soyer's Paper Bag Cookery."
With Coloured Plates, Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price, 5s. net.

NEW NOVELS AT 6s.

250 Guineas Prize Novel.

THE HOUSE OF LISRONAN.

BY MIRIAM ALEXANDER.

NOTE.—The advance orders for this book were so heavy that it was reprinted five times before publication.

(Two Editions exhausted before Publication.)

THE DEVIL'S WIND.

BY PATRICIA WENTWORTH (MRS. G. F. DILLON),
Author of "A Little More than Kin," "A Marriage under the Terror," etc.

THE DAMSEL DARK.

BY CLARA TURNBULL.

THIS "first novel" took a high place in the selected MSS. which were submitted to Messrs. A. C. Benson, A. E. W. Mason, and W. J.
Locke, in Mr. Melrose's Prize Novel Competition.
In his report, Mr. A. C. Benson, while putting "The House of Lisronan" first, says, "From the point of view of direct and popular appeal, 'The Damsel Dark' is probably the most effective."

THE WHITE SHRINE.

BY GERALD VILLIERS-STUART.

Author of "The Soul of Cræsus," etc.

Popular Edition of a well-known Book.

LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH.

BY ALEXANDER BRYCE, M.D.

Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price, 2s. 6d. net.

ANDREW MELROSE, PUBLISHER, LONDON.

JOHN LONG'S
NOTABLE NOVELS

6/- Now Ready at all Libraries and Booksellers 6/-

A Transplanted American ELISE LATHROP
Memory Corner TOM GALLON
Austin's Career VIOLET TWEEDALE
Clouds CHARLES IGGLESDEN
Anna Strelitz LOW LATHEN
The Eternal Struggle NEWMAN HARDING
The Compromising of Jane ANNE WLAVER
Two Men and a Governess OLIVIA RAMSEY
The Spindle ELIZABETH HARDEN
Chicane OLIVER SANDYS
The Last Stronghold ELLEN ADA SMITH
The Secret Tontine R. MURRAY GILCHRIST
A Glorious Lie DOROTHEA GERARD
A Fool to Fame J. E. HAROLD TERRY
The Guerdon of Faith MRS. CHAS. MARTIN
Dangerous Dorothy CURTIS YORKE
A Three-Cornered Duel BEATRICE KELSTON

JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. JOHN LONG draw particular attention to the following deeply interesting Works of Biography, History and Travel, large supplies of which are now with the Libraries:—

The Fair Ladies of Hampton Court

By CLARE JERROLD. Illustrated with Photogravure and other Reproductions from Paintings of the Beauties of the Period. 12s. 6d. net.

Pilgrims to the Isles of Penance:

Orchid Gathering in the East. By Mrs. TALBOT
CLIFTON. With 54 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map. 12s. 6d. net.

Prince Talleyrand and His Times:

From the Reign of Louis XV. to the Second Empire. By FREDERIC LOJEE. English Version by BRYAN O'DONNELL, M.A. This work contains material from recently-discovered documents now made public for the first time. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.

The House of Teck: A Romance of a

Thousand Years. By LOUIS FELBERMAN. Author of "Hungary and its People," etc. With Photo-gravure of Her Majesty, over 100 other interesting Portraits, Reproductions of Pictures and Illustrations depicting Family Relics, included in the volume by Special Permission of Her Majesty the Queen.
12s. 6d. net.

The Fair Land of Central America

By MAURICE DE WALEFFE. Preface by SIR ARTHUR
CONAN DOYLE. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

Many Coloured Mountains and Some

Seas Between. A Book of Travel. By EMMA S.
BOYD. With coloured frontispiece and several other Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

My Recollections of the Sepoy Revolt

By Mrs. MUTER. With Portraits, Illustrations, and a Plan. 7s. 6d. net.

Big Game Hunting in North-Eastern

Rhodesia. By OWEN LETCHER, F.R.G.S. With Photogravure Portrait of Author, 52 Illustrations from Photographs, and a Map. 12s. 6d. net.

The Seven Richest Heiresses of

France. By the COUNT DE SOISSONS. With Photo-gravure and other Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.

LONDON

JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

Macmillan's List.

Ruins of Desert Cathay.

Personal Narrative of Explorations in Central Asia and Westernmost China. By M AUREL STIEN. With numerous Illustrations, Colour Plates, Panoramas, and Maps from Original Surveys. Two vols. Royal 8vo. 42s. net.

"Scotsman"—One of the most attractive books of travel that have appeared in any language for many years past this volume owes its attraction to the sheer merit of the achievements it records. The book is excellently printed, and the illustrations are admirable. The coloured plates and the photographic reproductions are exceptionally clear.

The True Temper of Empire with Corollary Essays. By Sir CHARLES BRUCE, GCMG. Author of "The Broad Stone of Empire." 8vo. 5s. net.

"Scotsman"—"A book that should be read with profit by all readers interested to have clear news of the nature and trend of Imperialism is a force in living politics."

A History of the British Constitution.

By Rev J HOWARD B MASTERMAN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

The Political Economy of Art:

Unto This Last—Sesame and Lilies—

The Crown of Wild Olive. By JOHN RUSKIN. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

[Library of English Classics.]

* * Other volumes of the Series can be had in uniform binding with this vol.

NEW NOVELS.

AN HISTORICAL ROMANCE BY A NEW WRITER.

Hieronymus Rides. Episodes in the Life of a Knight and Jester at the Court of Maximilian, King of the Romans.

By ANNA COLIMAN LADD. 6s.

"Morning Post"—"The episodes related in this remarkable book keep the reader engrossed from first page to last for they are so cleverly conceived and are told with such an appearance of truth that it is difficult to realise that they do not form a record of the career of an historical character."

The Victories of Olivia and other

Stories. By EVELYN SHARP. Author of

"The Youngest Girl in the School," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Charwoman's Daughter.

By JAMES STEPHENS. Extra crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW TWO-SHILLING EDITION OF

The Novels of Maurice Hewlett.

With Frontispieces. In cloth binding. Crown 8vo. 2s. net each. Two volumes issued monthly.

- | | | |
|---------------------------|---|--------|
| 1. The Forest Lovers | } | Ready |
| 2. The Queen's Quair | | |
| 3. Little Novels of Italy | } | March. |
| 4. Richard Yea-and-Nay | | |

ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE:

RECORDS of TENNYSON, RUSKIN, and BROWNING. Globe 8vo. 4s. net.

[Eversley Series.]

CHAPTERS FROM SOME MEMOIRS:

8vo. 10s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's Latest 6/- Novels

LITTLE BROTHER - Gilbert Cannan

ESTHER - Agnes E. Jacobson

THE ADJUSTMENT - Marguerite Bryant

MARJORIE STEVENS - V. Taubman-Goldie

"A NEW ANONYMITY IN FICTION"

HE WHO PASSED (to M. I. G.) - Anon

"This extraordinary narrative of a woman's life held me absolutely enthralled. If it is not the novel of the season the reason is not likely to give us anything much later." - Field and King in the Teller

"A very remarkable and powerful novel... distinction among the best." - 1st Weekly

"This is a notable book. It cannot be overlooked." - Morning Leader

"If authentic, poignant to tears, if not inventively invented. Here is sorrow too deep for words." - Daily Mail

The PRISON Without a WALL - Ralph Straus

"A novel that counts." - Observer

"Mr. Straus style is a delight, it reminds us of Leacock, Thackeray, Lamb, of all the genial sentimentalists who have loved a kindly friend, a cheering glass, a happy phrase." - Standard

MAIDS' MONEY - Mrs. H. Dudeney

"Brilliant character sketches sufficient to make Maids' Money one of the most interesting novels which we have read." - Saturday Review

The REWARD of VIRTUE (2nd Imp) - Amber Reeves

"The style of the book is a remarkable achievement for a first novel, it is at once effective and unobtrusive." - Athenaeum

A LIKELY STORY - Wm. de Morgan

"A Likely Story is no common work of every day fiction. I only wish five per cent of the published books were one half as good." - The Teller

THE PILGRIM KAMANITA - Karl Gjellerup

"It is a fascinating picture of Japanese life." - Daily Chronicle

THE DOP DOCTOR (12th Imp) - Richard Dehan

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS

ROMANESQUE ARCHITECTURE in FRANCE.

Edited by Dr JULIUS SAILLANT. With 61 full-page plates. 4to. 25s. net.

A glance through the pages of this volume would tell more about the essential differences between French and English Romanesque than could be gleaned from a very considerable amount of reading. The illustrations of sculpture are particularly interesting and instructive. - Scotsman

BAROQUE ARCHITECTURE and SCULPTURE in ITALY.

Edited by CORRADO RICCI. With 24 full-page plates. 4to. 25s. net.

Students of architecture who wish to learn what the Baroque means at its best and in some cases at its worst will be able to learn almost all they need from this most excellent book. - Scotsman

THE MODERN PARISIENNE.

By OCTAVE UZANNI. Introduction by Baroness VON HUTHEN. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

An arresting and significant study. - Pall Mall Gazette

A remarkable book, precise in statement and lucid in style. - Country Life

J. PIERPONT MORGAN: His Life Story.

By CARL HOVEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

An art connoisseur, as benefactor and master organiser Mr. Morgan lives convincingly in these pages. - Daily News

Mr. Morgan the banker the man of affairs—the various stages of his business career traced with dramatic instinct. - Times

MOVING PICTURES.

By F. A. TAIHOT. With 96 pp of illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

Just the book for those who are interested and amused by the moving picture and wish to know something of its history and to learn how it is made. - Morning Post

A comprehensive exposition of a fascinating subject. - Westminster Gazette

A NEW LOGIC.

By CHARLES MERCIER M.D. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

A book of real fascination. Those who usually avoid this subject will find real zest in studying it under Dr. Mercier's guidance. - Sheffield Daily Telegraph

"It would be safe to prophesy a great and lasting success for 'A New Logic' might challenge comparison with that of John Stuart Mill himself." - Sunday Times

ON THE ART OF THE THEATRE.

By E. GORDON CRAIG. Illustrated. 6s. net.

"Mr. Craig cannot be read without respect and pleasure; he is so full of ideas, so charmingly provoking." - Evening Standard

THE PLAYS OF W. S. MAUGHAM.

Cloth, 2s. 6d., Paper, 1s. 6d. (1) Lady Frederick, (2) Jack Straw, (3) A Man of Honour

THE PROHIBITED PLAY.

THE NEXT RELIGION. A Play in Three Acts.

By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. Small demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE WAR GOD. A Tragedy in Five Acts.

By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. Small demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Wm. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 246. VOL. XLI.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

MARCH, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 275

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 280

THE READER—

Lady Thackeray Ritchie. By
LEWIS MELVILLE 283

'THE BOOKMAN' PRIZE
COMPETITIONS 290

The Catholic Revival. By DR.
WILLIAM BARRY 293

NEW BOOKS—

Logic Old and New. By PRO-FESSOR JOHN ADAMS .. 296

John Opie. By MRS. STURGE
GRETTON 296

The Rowley Poems. By JOHN
H. INGRAM 297

Later Letters of Dr. Marcus
Dodds. By DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 298

A Woman who expected the Impossible. By COULSON
KERNAHAN 298

William Morris. By EDWARD
THOMAS 300

Tennyson and his Friends. By CRANSTOUN METCALFE .. 301

Beaumarchais and Lafayette.
By A. W. EVANS 301

Miss Meynell's Novel. By C. E.
LAWRENCE 302

Lady Castlemaine 303

The Grand Style: A Troubadour and Prospero. By MISS
F. EMILY PHILLIPS 304

The Theatre. By DARRILL
FIGGIS 304

The Life of Sir George Newnes.
By STANHOPE W. SPRIGG .. 305

Plots—Ancient and Modern.
By L. Q.-C. 305

Psychology of the Religious Life.
By DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 306

A Strange Holiday. By J. E.
PATTERSON 307

The Trend of Modern Music.
By H. FITCHEW 308

Wheels within Wheels. By M.
H. H. MACARTNLY 309

The Austere Art. By DIXON
SCOTT 309

The Complete Nietzsche. By
HOLBROOK JACKSON 310

NOVEL NOTES

The Cure—Fire i' the Flint—
The Barn of Ill-Fame—Penny Monymenny—The Breath of the Desert—Love on the Happy Hill—Daughters of Ishmael—An Irregular Marriage—Christopher—Maid's Money—The Principal Girl
311-314

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

The Roll of the Seasons—The Works of Man—An Actor's
Notebooks—Masters of English Journalism—Cassanova—and his Time—Floreat Etona
.. In a German Pension 314-316

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 316

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The April BOOKMAN will be a Spring Double Number and a Robert Louis Stevenson Number in one. It will include a large and fully illustrated Supplement dealing with the new season's books, and among the principal contents will be a special article on Stevenson by Neil Munro, articles on Cardinal Newman, by Dr. William Barry; George Borrow, by Thomas Seecombe; Joseph Conrad's Recollections, by Perceval Gibbon; The Art of the Short Story, by A. St. John Adcock; Lafcadio Hearn, by Francis Bickley; Augustus Toplady, by Dr. James Moffatt, etc., etc.

Mr. Harold Begbie has been making a journey through Ireland, in view of the forthcoming Home Rule struggle, and will contribute to the Daily Chronicle a series of articles dealing with his observations and experiences of the country and its people.

Mr. Heinemann publishes this spring a "Life of Nietzsche" written by his sister, Frau Foerster-Nietzsche, who was the philosopher's constant companion and nurse in his later years. It will be in two volumes, the first being devoted to "The Young Nietzsche."

"The Sad Shepherd," by Henry Van Dyke, is a companion volume to his "Story of the Other Wise Man," and treats of Love in much the same way as the other book treated of Worship. It will be published immediately by Messrs. Harper.

The Hon. Mrs. Arthur Henniker, whose new novel, "Second Fiddle," has just been published by Mr. Eveleigh Nash, is the daughter of the first Baron Houghton, who is still better known in the world of letters as Monckton Milnes, and with her father's wonderful charm of manner and genius for friendship she inherits also his capacity for drawing into her social circle, as it was said that he did into his, almost "everybody worth knowing" in literature, in art, and in the public life of the day. She married in 1882 the late Major-General the Hon. Arthur H. Henniker, and published her first novel, "Sir George," in 1891; following this with "Foiled," in 1893; and "In Scarlet and Grey" in 1896, one story in which volume, "The Spectre of the Real," she wrote in collaboration with Mr. Thomas Hardy; in 1898, she published "Sowing the Sand," and in 1903, "Contrasts." Moreover, Mrs. Henniker has twice appeared successfully as a dramatist: with "The Courage of Silence," a four act play, at the King's Theatre, Hammersmith, in 1905, and "Our Fatal Shadows," in 1907. "Second Fiddle," which we review on another page, offers the presentment of an entirely commonplace woman. There are many charming short stories of Mrs. Henniker's still lying uncollected in the back numbers of magazines, some of them very striking and faithful sketches of military life, and it is possible her next book may be a volume of these.

In 1896 Mrs. Henniker acted as President of the Society of Women Journalists, and she has always taken an active and a sympathetic interest in the affairs of the world she writes about. She has done much good work among the poor of London, is an enthusiastic supporter of those societies whose object is the protection of animals and birds, and, her books reflecting herself, a broad humanitarianism is the natural keynote of all her writings.

"Little Incidents," a volume of stories and sketches by Mr. Frederick Watson, a son of the late Ian Maclaren, is to be published immediately by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. Mr. Watson has edited several books, and is well known as a contributor to Punch, Chambers' Journal, The Windsor, and The Westminster Gazette, but "Little Incidents" is the first book to which he has put his own name.

"By the Way: A Collection of Poems, Fragments and Notes" by William Allingham is to be ready this month. The book is arranged and edited by Mrs. Allingham. We are sorry that in reviewing last month the "Letters to William Allingham" we mentioned Messrs. Macmillan as the publishers. That volume, like this new one, "By the Way," is published by Messrs. Longmans.

Mr. J. E. Patterson has made his reputation as a novelist, but he began his literary career as a poet with a little book called "The Mermaid," that was printed by subscription for private circulation. This narrative poem, thoroughly revised and enlarged, is included with many of Mr. Patterson's songs and ballads that have not before been collected in a volume that Mr. Heinemann is publishing shortly under the title of "Daughters of Nereus." At present, Mr. Patterson is engaged on a novel of modern political life that is to be ready for publication this autumn.

The Countess of Warwick has written, for Messrs. Jack's "Pilgrim Books" series, a volume on William Morris which is illustrated with crayon drawings by A. Forestier.

Lafcadio Hearn and his wife.

From "Lafcadio Hearn, his Life and Work," by Nina H. Kennard (Nash), which we are reviewing next month.

Mr. Patrick MacGill, whose "Gleanings from a Navy's Scrapbook," was reviewed in our January Number, has another collection of his poems in the press, and the volume will be ready by the end of March. It is gratifying to know that his first book not only had a very considerable sale, but has aroused a very considerable literary interest in him and his work. As before, Mr. MacGill will be his own publisher and will issue his new book from his present address, 4, The Cloisters, Windsor.

The Literary Year Book, which has long taken its place among the indispensable reference books that the literary worker must needs have on his table, will in future, we understand, be published by Mr. John Ouseley.

Messrs. Stephen Swift & Co. are issuing shortly "Leaves of Prose, Interleaved with Verse," by Miss Annie Matheson, a selection of short studies in literature, art, sociology and nature. The volume includes two papers specially written for it by Miss May Sinclair.

Mr. Martin Secker is publishing immediately "Robert Ket and the Norfolk Rising," by Mr. Joseph Clayton—the story of the great agricultural revolt of the sixteenth century that was led by Ket and had its centre at Norwich.

"Some Thoughts on 'Hamlet,'" a lecture delivered last year by Mr. H. B. Irving before the Chancellor and Senate of Sydney University, has been published over here in pamphlet form by the Australian Book Company. It is a brilliant and incisive essay on Shakespeare's dramatic art, arguing subtly against the reality of Hamlet's madness; incidentally, it drives a strong nail into the coffin of the theory that Bacon was the author of the plays.

One of the most important books of the spring publishing season is "The Memoirs of Francesco Crispi," which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are issuing immediately. The Memoirs consist mainly of pages from Crispi's journals, official documents and letters that are now made public for the first time. Signor T. Palamenghi-Crispi linking the whole together with a luminous commentary and narrative of events. Incidentally, the book will vindicate the transactions of Crispi's closing years, and throughout it throws many new and sometimes sensational sidelights on the political history of the nineteenth century.

Annie E. Holdsworth
(Mrs. Lee-Hamilton), whose new novel "Dame Verona of the Angels" (Methuen) is reviewed on page 306.

"The House of Windows," by Isabel Ecclestone Mackay, is a story of Canadian life that Messrs. Cassell are publishing. Miss Mackay is well known as a contributor of short stories to the Canadian magazines, and in 1904 she published a volume of verse, "Between the Lights," that met with an unusually favourable reception. She was the first President, and is now Vice-President (representing British Columbia) of the Canadian Women's Press Club.

Miss Isabel Ecclestone Mackay.

Messrs. Dent are publishing at the end of this month "Famous London Houses," by A. St. John Adcock. It contains chapters on Some Celebrated Cockneys, on Shakespeare in London, describes the personalities of certain great authors and artists, and tells the story of so much of their lives as was passed in existing London houses that they once occupied. The volume is illustrated with portraits and with seventy-four drawings by Mr. Frederick Adcock.

Mr. James Baker is at work upon a new book about Austria, that is to be illustrated in colour by Mr. Donald Maxwell. The two-shilling edition of Mr. Baker's novels that Messrs. Chapman & Hall are issuing has reached its fourth volume, the fourth being "Mark Tillotson."

This month Messrs. Constable will commence the publication of a new quarterly to be called "Bedrock: A quarterly review of Scientific Thought." Its aim is to deal with all the greater problems of modern science in a manner both fundamentally scientific and that shall be generally interesting to the educated public. The contents of the first Number will include "The Value of a Logic of Method," by Professor J. Welton, M.A.; "Recent Researches on Alcoholism," by G. Archibald Reid, M.B., F.I.S.E.; "Darwin and Bergson as Interpreters of Evolution," by E. W. Poulton, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S.; "Social and Sexual Evolution," by the Hermit of Prague; Notes on Current Research, etc., etc.

Another new quarterly that has published a first Number is "History: A Quarterly Magazine for the Student and the Expert." It purposes to do for the student and the teacher what the English and the Scottish Historical Reviews do for the scholar of ripe erudition, and among its contents are articles on "John Stow and London Life in the Reign of Elizabeth," by C. L. Kingsford, M.A.; "Significant History for the Upper Standards," by Frank J. Adkins, M.A.; "The Place of History in Education," by Professor F. J. C. Hearnshaw, M.A., I.L.D.; "The Relations of History and Geography," by Professor Ramsay Muir, M.A.; "Norway's German Problem," by Harold F. B. Wheeler, etc.

Mr. John Long asks us to contradict very emphatically a rumour he keeps meeting in the publishing world to the effect that he contemplates retiring from business. The recent important changes that have been made in his publishing staff may, he thinks, have given rise to this misunderstanding. Though Mr. Long has been actively engaged in publishing for nearly thirty years, he is still on the right side of fifty, and has no inclination yet to rest on his laurels. He has a sound constitution, is as full of vigour as ever, and we agree with him in thinking that a glance at his photograph should reassure anybody who fancies he may be fading and feeling delicate.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. John Long.

Miss Gwendolen Pryce.

Messrs. Cassell are publishing a new novel "A Long Shadow," by Miss Gwendolen Pryce, that tells the story of the long shadow which, according to the proverb, "a little man may cast," and how it affected the lives of the people who came under its influence. Miss Pryce writes of Wales and the Welsh with a first hand knowledge of her subject. She is the daughter of a Welsh clergyman and was brought up, one of a large family, in a remote rural district. She and her four sisters all played stringed instruments, all wrote, or tried to write, all rode and swam and climbed, and in holiday time she and her brother would wander about together amusing themselves with helping or hindering in the village workshops, or spending one day at the heels of the gamekeeper, and the next with a poacher who was out fishing or rabbiting, and the next perhaps lounging and sharing the sailors meals aboard some smack that was anchored in the bay, and something of all these early impressions and experiences Miss Pryce has set herself to recapture in this latest book of hers.

Messrs. Jack issued a day or two ago the first twelve volumes in a new and important series that they are calling "The People's Books." The series is to cover science, history, philosophy, religion, social and economic questions and general literature, each book being specially written for it from a popular standpoint by authors who are recognised authorities on the subjects they will undertake. We hope to deal adequately with these and with the latest additions to Messrs. Williams & Norgate's admirable Home University Library next month.

Thirty-nine further volumes have just been added to Messrs. Dent's valuable Everyman's Library, bringing the total number of volumes up to six hundred. The new thirty-nine are an excellent selection, and everybody will particularly welcome among them "Froude's History of Queen Elizabeth's Reign"; "Piers Plowman"; Mr. Canton's "Invisible Playmate", W. V. "Her Book", and "In Memory of W.V."; "Tolstoi's Childhood, Boyhood and Youth"; Morris's "Life and Death of Jason"; "Stow's Survey of London"; "Lives of Mazzini, Constable, and Mozart"; "Dryden's Dramatic Essays"; and "Whitman's Leaves of Grass and Democratic Vistas."

In the "Autobiography of Boswell," which Messrs. Chatto & Windus are publishing, Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has developed an interesting theory as to the origin of Johnson's "Life"

Mr E. H. Visiak has turned from smugglers and salt-water heroes in a new volume that Mr. Elkin Mathews is publishing, and has joined that growing company of latter-day poets who find their inspiration in poverty and the drab lives of the city. His book is called "The Slum-Child and other Poems," and will contain an introduction by Mr. W. H. Helm

Messrs. Mills & Boon have just published a new novel by Mrs. Stanley Wrench, "Ruth of the Rowld-rich," a story of conflict between love and ambition between the quiet life among her own people in the country, and the call of London and the charm of the literary life as it is lived in town. Mrs. Stanley Wrench has written a good many stories for the magazines in collaboration with her husband, and they are now collaborating in the first novel they have written together, and expect to have it ready for publication this autumn.

Photo by G. C. Beresford

Miss Margaret Legge.

Author of "A Semi-Detached Marriage," which Messrs. Alston Rivers are publishing this month.

Photo by G. C. Beresford

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Wrench.

Messrs. Mills & Boon are publishing a book on "The Italians of To-Day," by Mr. Richard Bagot. Few Englishmen know more of Italy as it is than Mr. Bagot, and he devotes himself in his new work to describing the home life of all classes of the Italian community and refuting and, we understand, disproving the charges of inhumanity that have been brought against the Italian troops in Tripoli.

Mr. Oliver Onions has completed a new novel, "In Accordance with the Evidence," which will be published this month by Mr. Martin Seeker.

An important book of particular interest just now is one that Mr. Andrew Melrose is publishing this spring on "Germany and the German Emperor," by Mr. G. H. Perris. It offers a close study of German character, and a strong indictment of the temperament and aims of the Kaiser as they are reflected in his famous World Policy.

Every month almost brings us some new book about London, and still the subject remains unexhausted. We look forward with especial anticipations of pleasure to Mr. Chancellor Beresford's "Annals of Fleet Street," that Messrs. Chapman & Hall are issuing next week.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce a new novel by Margarete Böhme, whose previous book, "The Diary of a Lost One," has already sold over a hundred and fifty thousand copies and been translated into every European language. Her new romance, "The Department Store: A Novel of To-day," deals realistically with life in the modern emporium—the huge stores that have become such prominent features in all modern cities. The author's first aim has been to tell a living and interesting story, and incidentally to reveal the effects that life in these department stores has on the assistants who work in them and the public who shop there. Margarete Feddersen was born and spent her early youth at Husum, in Holstein. Her first husband was Mr. Böhme; later she married Mr. Schuler, a large manufacturer. For many years she made her home in the Rhine district, but for the last ten years she has settled down in Berlin, where her books have been written.

Margarete Böhme.

Our photograph of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald last month was taken by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, and is their copyright. We regret that we did not know this in time to make due acknowledgment under the portrait.

Our thanks are due to Messrs. Smith Elder & Co. with whose kind permission we have been able to reproduce many of the interesting drawings that illustrate our article on Lady Thackeray Ritchie.

For much assistance with the general illustrations in this number we are indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eveleigh Nash, Messrs. Cassell, Messrs. Alston Rivers, Messrs. Appleton, Messrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Heinemann, Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co., and Messrs. Greening.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

March 1st to April 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Allen & Co. (Incorporating Swan, Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd.)

CARPENTER, E.—The Drama of Love and Death. 5s. net.
SMITH, REV. E. STAFFORD—Pastoralia: Parish Readings for the Clergy. With a preface by Dr. J. Nevill Figgis. 2s. 6d. net.
STERREY, C. E.—A Voice from the Night: Novel. 6s.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

BÖHME, MARGARETE.—The Department Store. 6s.
CHAMBERS, ROBERT W.—The Adventures of a Modest Man. Illustrated. 6s.
PHILLIPS, DAVID GRAHAM.—The Conflict. 6s.

Mr. Edward Arnold.

BENSUSAN, S. L.—Father William. 5s. net.
COHEN, PROFESSOR I. B. and RUSFON, A. G.—Smoke: A Study of Town Air. 5s. net.
CORNFORD, F. M.—From Religion to Philosophy. 10s. 6d. net.
CROSTHWAITE, SIR C. K.C.S.I.—The Pacification of Burma. 16s. net.
FOAKES JACKSON, P. J., D.D. (Edited by).—The Parting of the Roads: Studies in the Development of Judaism and Early Christianity. 10s. 6d. net.
HOME, SURGEON-GENERAL SIR A. D., V.C., K.C.B.—Service Memories in Four Continents. 12s. 6d. net.
LUNN, ARNOLD (Edited by).—Oxford Mountaineering Essays. 5s. net.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith.

ANSTEV, F.—The Tinted Venus. Reprint. 1s. net.
BELLUC, HILAIRE.—The Green Overcoat. With Illustrations by G. K. Chesterton. 6s.
CONWAY, HUGH.—Called Back. Reprint. 1s. net.
MARTIN, MISS CLARA.—A Little Aversion. 6s.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

BARRINGTON, MRS. RUSSELL.—Through Greece and Dalmatia. 7s. 6d. net.
BRALBY, J. T.—How to Make an Orchard in British Columbia. 1s. 6d. net.
FERNIE, F.—Dry Fly Fishing in Border Waters. 2s. 6d. net.
PINNEMORE, JOHN.—Delhi and the Durbar. 1s. 6d. net.
GORGES, MARY.—Killarney (Beautiful Britain). 1s. 6d. net.
GURNEY-SALTER, EMMA.—Nature in Italian Art. 7s. 6d. net.
HARDIE, MARTIN (Editor).—Artists' Sketch-Book Series: London, by Lester G. Hornby; Edinburgh, by Lester G. Hornby; Rochester, by R. Kimball; Paris, by Eugene Rejot. 1s. net each.
JONES, EDGAR R., M.P.—The Art of the Orator. 3s. 6d. net.
MACKIE, ALEXANDER.—The Art of Worm Fishing. 2s. 6d. net.
MANSON, JAMES A.—The Complete Bowler.
SHENESSEY, S.—The Children's World. 1s. 6d.
WALTER, L. EDNA.—The Fascination of Switzerland. 1s. 6d. net.
WALTER, L. EDNA.—The Fascination of Holland. 1s. 6d. net.
WYSS, C. VON.—Gardens in their Seasons. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

ASKEW, ALICE AND CLAUDE.—The Englishwoman. 6s.
 BALL, OONA K.—A Quiet Holiday. 1s. net.
 Book of Cookery Recipes. 6d. and 1s. net.
 Healthy Habits and How to Train Them. 1s. net.
 Health Culture for Busy Men. 1s. net.
 HOWARD, KEBLE.—Smiths of Valley View. 6d.
 MARSIL, RICHARD.—Violet Forster's Lover. 6s.
 PATRIARCHE, V.—Rory of Willow Beach. 3s. 6d.
 SHELDON, J. PRINCE.—Dairying. 7s. 6d. net.
 Success for Boys. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, H. H.—The Garden at Home. 6s. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

ARCHER, WILLIAM.—Play-making. 7s. 6d. net.
 CHANCELLOR, E. BERSFORD.—The Annals of Fleet Street. 7s. 6d. net.
 CULLUM, RIDGELL.—The Turns of Suffering Creek. 6s.
 HAMEL, FRANK.—The Lady of Beauty. 1s. net.
 HAMMOND, FRANCES.—The Fly in the Ointment. 6s.
 STRYIENSKI, CASIMIR.—The Daughters of Louis XV. 10s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—George Borrow. 10s. 6d. net.
 YOUNG, ERNEST.—Finland: The Land of a Thousand Lakes. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

AYESHA, MARION.—The Truth about a Nunnery. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Leonora. Popular Edition. 2s. net.
 BESANT, WALTER.—London. A New Edition. 5s. net.
 CROSS, MARGARET B.—Up to Perinus: A Romance. 6s.
 HORNIMAN, ROY.—Israel Round. Popular Edition. 2s. net.
 HYATT, A. H.—The Charm of Venice. Illustrated by Harold Sund. 5s. net.
 LLOYD, THEODORE.—Immersion in the Wilderness: A Novel. 6s.
 MERWIN, H. C.—The Life of Bret Harte. 10s. 6d. net.
 SMEDLEY, CONSTANCE.—Commoners' Rights: A Novel. 6s.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

ALLCROFT, A. H., M.A.—Cæsar's Gallic War. Books 4 and 5. In 1 Vol. With Lexicon. 2s. 6d.
 ALLEN, F. B.A.—Jennyson. Lnoch Arden. 1s.
 DUFFIN, H. C., M.A.—Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night". 2s.
 GILL, C. B.A.—Key to Senior French Course. 2s. 6d. net.
 LYSTER, R. A., M.D.—Text Book of Hygiene for Teachers (for use in Normal Training Colleges and Certificate Classes). 4s. 6d.
 MOFFATT, C. W. P.A.B.I., M.A.—Science French Course. 3s. 6d.
 SATTERLY, JOHN, D.Sc., M.A.—Junior Heat. (For the Oxford and Cambridge Junior Local Examinations). 2s.

Messrs. A. C. Fifield.

FARR, FLORANCE.—The Solemnisation of a Marriage. 6s.
 FROGLEY, C. H.—Poems. 1s. net.
 HALL, DR. WINSLOW.—Metrical Playlet. 1s. net.
 INKSTER, DONARD.—Vale: A Book of Verses. 1s. 1.
 PICKERING, J. F.—The Cup of Cain. 1s. net.
 STIRNER, MAX.—The Igo and his Own. 6d. net.

Messrs. Gay & Hancock, Ltd.

FUTRELL, MAY.—Secretary of Privileged Affairs.
 LINCOLN, JEANIE GOULD.—The Luck of Rathcoole.
 MATTHEWS, JOHN L.—The Fog of the Easy Way.
 NEWSHAM-LAYLER, REV. J. H.—The Heart Hath Said.
 POWERS, CAPTAIN T. J.—The Garden of the Sun.
 SCHRIENER, FRANK K.—The Secret of Frontellac.
 WILCOX, ELIA WHEELER.—Sweet Danger.

Messrs. G. Harrap & Co.

BARTER, AMY.—A Treasury of Prose and Poetry for Learning by Heart. In 6 parts. 6d. each.
 CAROL, E. L.—Character Training: A Graded Series of Lessons in Ethics. 2s. 6d. net.
 DOPP, K. L.—The Tree Dwellers: The Age of Bear. 1s.
 DOPP, K. L.—The Early Cave Men: The Age of Combat. 1s. 3d.
 DOPP, K. L.—The Later Cave Men: The Age of the Chase. 1s. 3d.
 The first three volumes in the "Industrial and Social History Series." Each volume is very fully illustrated.
 HASTINGS, F. E.—Studies in German Words. 2s. 6d.
 MELTON, FRID E.—Dramatic History Readers. Vols. I and II. Illustrated. 6d. each.

[Wm.] Heinemann, Esq.

BURNET, DR. ETIENNE.—Microbes and Toxins in Nature. 6s. net.
 FENOLLOSA, PROFESSOR E. F. (THE LATE).—Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. 2 Vols. 36s. net.
 NOVIKOFF, J.—War and its Alleged Benefits. 2s. 6d. net.
 RUSSELL, EARL.—The Question of Divorce. 5s. net.
 SHARP, WILLIAM.—Poems. 5s. net.
 STEVENSON-HAMILTON, MAJOR J.—Animal Life in Africa. 20s. net.
 VIVIAN, E. C.—Passion Fruit. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

BEGGIE, HAROLD.—The Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—How to Live on Twenty-Four Hours a Day; Literary Taste and How to Form It; Mental Efficiency; The Human Machine. 1s. net. each.
 CRISPI, FRANCESCA.—Memoirs. 16s. net.
 FYFE, T. A.—Who's Who in Dickens. 6s. net.
 TURNER, ETHEL.—Poets and Happy Havens. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.
 WATSON, FREDERICK.—Little Incidents. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BURGIN, G. B.—Dickie Diner. 6s.
 CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—The Arrival of Anthony. 6s.
 COLE, E. W.—Cole's Treasury of Song. 2s. 6d.
 DANBY, FRANK.—Let the Roof Fall In. 1s. net.

GREEN, E. EVERETT.—The Silver Axe. 7d. net.
 JEPSON, EDGAR.—The House on the Mall. 6s.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—Seymour Charlton. 7d. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—In Cotton Wool. 6s.
 MELVILLE, LEWIS.—An Injured Queen. Caroline of Brunswick. In 2 Vols. 2 Photogravure Frontispieces and 14 full page plates. 24s. net.
 MOORE, F. FRANKFORT.—The Red Man's Secret. 6s.
 RIMINGTON, A. WALLACE.—Colony Mush. 6s. net.
 VON HUTTON, BARONESS.—Sparrow. 6s.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

DANDO, W. P., F.Z.S.—Wild Animals and the Camera. New Edition. 6s. net.
 ENTWISTLE, E. E., LL.A.—Steep Ascent: Missionary Talks for Children. 2s. 6d.
 GROOME, DORA.—Up-to-Date and Economical Cookery. New Revised Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 PLATTS, W. CARTER.—Angling Done Here. New Issue. 1s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

ADAM, H. L.—Women and Crime. 10s. 6d. net.
 BROWNE, COLONEL HAMILTON.—A Lost Legion in South Africa. 12s. 6d. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, EDMUND B.—Switzerland in Sun-lime and Snow. 12s. 6d. net.
 SHENKIEWICZ.—Through Wilderness and Desert. 6s.
 WHITE, CLAUDE GRAHAM and HARPER, HARRY.—The Aeroplane in War. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

DUCHENE, CAPTAIN.—The Mechanics of the Aeroplane: A Text-Book. Translated from the French by John H. Leidebeger, B.A. and T. O'B. Hubbard. With 68 Illustrations and Diagrams. 7s. 6d. net.
 FERGUSSON, JOHN C., M.Inst.C.E.—Fergusson's Percentage Unit of Angular Measurement with Logarithms. 64s. net.
 HALIFAX, VISCOUNT.—Leo VIII. and Angevin Orders. 12s. 6d. net.
 HUNTINGTON, HARWOOD.—Cui Bono? or, What shall it Profit? A Gentle Philosophy for Those Who Doubt.
 JAMES, WILLIAM.—Essays in Radical Empiricism.
 KERSHAW, J. W.—Elementary Internal Combustion Engines and Gas Producers. With Illustrations.
 LONGSTAFF, GEORGE B.—Butterfly-Hunting in Many Lands. Notes of a Field Naturalist. To which are added Translations of Papers by Fritz Muller on the Scent Organs of Butterflies and Moths. With 7 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations.
 LOW, DAVID ALLAN.—Practical Geometry and Graphics.
 MATURIN, B. W.—The Price of Unity.
 MOOKERJI, RADHAKUMUD, M.A.—Indian Shipping: A History of Indian Shipping and Maritime Activity from the Earliest Times. With an Introductory Note by Dr. Bhajendranath Seal, M.A., Ph.D., Principal, Maharaja of Cochin Behar's College, India. 7s. 6d. net.
 PIERCE, VEN. JAMES H. L., M.A.—Archdeacon of Warwick: The Sacrament of Repentance: A Devotional and Practical Commentary on the Fifty-First Psalm. 2s. 6d. net.
 RHODES, W. G., D.Sc.—A Primer on Alternating Currents.
 ROBINSON, REV. C. H., D.D.—A Devotional Library. 1s. and 2s. net.
 RUSK, ROBERT R.—Introduction to Experimental Education.
 SALMON, GEORGE, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S.—A Treatise on the Analytic Geometry of Three Dimensions. Revised by Reginald A. P. Rogers. Fifth Edition. 2 Vols. Vol. 1. 9s.
 SARSON, MAY, and PHILLIPS, MABEL ADDISON.—The History of the People of Enoch. With Preface by the Rev. A. A. David, D.D., Headmaster of Rugby.
 TARLETON, FRANCIS A., LL.D., Sc.D.—An Introduction to the Mathematical Theory of Attraction. Vol. II.
 THORNTON, PERCY MELVILLE.—Some Things we have Remembered (Samuel Thornton, Admiral, 1797-1850; Percy Melville Thornton, 1841-1911).
 THORNTON, PERCY MELVILLE.—The Life of the Plant. Translated from the Connected Seventh Russian Edition by Miss Anna Cherenkoff. With Illustrations.
 WATFELY, RICHARD, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.—Apostolical Succession Considered, or, the Constitution of a Christian Church, its Powers and Ministry. Abridged from the Author's "The Kingdom of Christ."

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

BARKAS, PAULIST.—Storm Song and other Poems. 2s. net.
 BAYLEY, STANHOPE.—The Campaign of Rome: A Symphony. 1s. net.
 EVANS, F. GWYNNE.—In Mantle Blue. 3s. 6d. net.
 FOX, AGNES.—Verses. 2s. 6d. net.
 HINE, REGINALD I.—Anna Celtica. 1s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, LIONEL.—Sonnets. With Introduction by L. J. Guiney. 1s. net.
 LUTZENS, W. E.—Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 OSWALTON, F. P.—The Future of Poetry. 2s. 6d. net.
 SCOLLARD, CLINTON.—Songs of a Syrian Lover. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ADAMS, JOSEPH.—Ten Thousand Miles through Canada. With 50 Illustrations and a Map showing the Author's route. 6s.
 ATKINSON, T. D.—The Cathedrals of England and Wales. With 20 Illustrations in Colour by WAITER DEXTER, R.B.A., and from photographs. 10s. 6d. net.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Matador of the Five Towns. 6s.
 CUST, ROBERT H. HOBART.—Celmin. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure, and 32 other Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
 DUMAS, ALEXANDRE.—Black: The Story of a Dog. 6d.
 HICFENS, ROBERT.—Felix. 2s. net.
 HUTTEN, BARONESS VON.—The Halo. 1s. net.
 INGE, W. R., M.A.—Christian Mysticism. Considered in Eight Lectures, delivered before the University of Oxford. (The Bampton Lectures for 1899.) New and Cheaper Edition. 5s. net.
 LYDEKKER, R. B.A., F.R.S., and others.—Reptiles, Amphibia, and Fishes. With many Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 SADLER, WILFRID.—With an Introduction by JOHN GOLDING, F.I.C. Bacteria as Friends and Foes of the Dairy Farmer. With 4 Plates. 1s. 6d.
 SQUIRE, JACK (COLLINGS).—William the Silent. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 The Pocket Edition of the Works of Charles and Mary Lamb.—Edited by E. V. Lucas. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. Six Volumes. 5s. each.
 Vol. I.—Miscellaneous Prose.
 The Progress of the Nation. First compiled by G. R. Porter. A completely New Edition. Edited by F. W. Hirst. 21s. net.
 TOWLE, ELEANOR A.—A Poet's Children: Hartley and Sara Coleridge. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 URWICK, PROFESSOR E. J.—A Philosophy of Social Progress. 6s.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A.M.—The Guests of Hercules. 6s.
 WOOD, SIR EVELYN, F.M., V.C.—From Midshipman to Field-Marshal.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

ANON (author of "Mastering Flame")—Ashes of Incense. 6s.
BUCKROSE, J. E.—Down our Street. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
LONDON, JACK.—When God Laughs. 6s.
METCALFE, THOS.—The Prince. 6s.
VERNON, M.—Aliens Near of Kin. 6s.
WALPOLE, HUGH.—The Prelude to Adventure. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

CROFT, H. PAGE, M.P.—The Path of Empire. With a Preface by the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P. 2s. 6d. net.
CUNNINGHAM, VEN. ARCHDEACON, D.D.—Efficiency in the Church of England.
DUCHESS, MONSIGNOR LOUIS.—The Early History of the Christian Church. Vol. II. 9s. net.
FRASER, MAJOR-GENERAL SIR T.—The Military Danger of Home Rule in Ireland.
GILES, LIONEL.—Taoist Teaching. Translated. 2s. net.
JOHNSON, W. H., F.L.S.—Cocoa: Its Cultivation and Preparation.
OWEN, SIDNEY J.—The Decline and Dissolution of the Moghul Empire. With Map.
PHILLIPPS, EDEN.—The Iscariot. A Poem. With Frontispiece by Frank Brangwyn, A.R.A.
TALMAGE, MRS. DE W.—Autobiography of Thomas de Witt Talmage, D.D., with Portraits.
VANSITTART, ROBERT (author of "The Gates")—John Stuart. 6s.
WILLMOTT, MISS ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part VIII. 21s. net.
WRIGHT-HENDERSON, R. W.—Annabel and Others. 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

COLLINGWOOD, W. C.—Life and Letters of Lewis Carroll. Nelson's 1s. Library.
DICKENS, CHARLES.—David Copperfield. Vol. 2. Nelson's 6d. Classics.
DICKENS, CHARLES.—Martin Chuzzlewit. Nelson's 2s. New Dickens.
HARLAND, HENRY.—The Cardinal's Snuff Box. Nelson's 7d. Library.
HUGO, VICTOR.—La Légende des Siècles. Vols. 1, 2, and 3. 1s. each net.
MACNAUGHTON, MISS S.—Four Chimneys. Nelson's 2s. novels.
TWIN, MARK.—Huckleberry Finn. Nelson's 7d. Library.
VANDAL.—L'Avenement de Bonaparte. Vols. 1 and 2. (French.) Collection. Nelson. 1s. each net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co.

RYAN, W. P.—The Pope's Green Island. 5s. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

GOMES, EDWIN H., M.A.—Children of Borneo. New Volume in the Children's Missionary Series. With 8 Coloured Illustrations. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net.
MOODY, CAMPBELL N., M.A.—The Saints of Fornosa: The Life and Worship in a Chinese Church. With 10 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

ATKEN, ALF. BRUNTON.—The Garden of Adam. 2s. net.
EVANS, W. H.A.—Christianity and Woman. 2s. net.
FRYERS, AUSTIN.—The Uncreated Man. 6s.
MACDONELL, ALICE C.—Songs of the Mountain and the Burn. Verse. 2s. net.
MANSEL, SIR CHARLES, BART.—The Masque of King Charles VI. Verse. 2s. 6d. net.
MUSGROVE, CHARLES.—The Glowing Fire. 6s.
"NOMAD."—The Woman Decades. 6s.
SADLER, S. H.—The Brother of Married Life. 2s. net.
STOCK, E. ELLIOT.—The Land of the Lord's Marchers. 5s. net.
WILSON, DOWER.—The Stage Door. Verse and Sketches. 1s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ALLINSON, A. R.—Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. 2 Vols. 24s. net, set.
BAKER, CAPTAIN GRANVILLE.—A Winter Holiday in Portugal. 12s. 6d. net.
BEDFORD, H. LOUISA.—Maid in Many Moods. 6s.
BROUGHTON, RHODA.—Between Two Stools. 6s.
CAMBRIDGE, ADA.—The Retrospect. 6s.
COTES, MRS. EVERARD.—The Consort. 6s.
D'ANETHAN, BARONESS ALBERT.—Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. 18s. net.
"DRAIG GLAS."—The Perfidious Welshman. 1s. net.
GALLON, TOM.—The Dream and the Woman. 6d.
HOLBACH, MAUD M.—In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. 16s. net.
HORN, KATE.—Edward III. and Mrs. Honeybun. 6d.
HORN, KATE.—The Bride of Love. 6s.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—Fatal Thirteen. 6d.
LEVY, M.—Paul's Popular Code. 1s. net.
LLOYD, J. A. T.—A Great Russian Realist. 10s. 6d. net.
LORIMER, NORMA.—The Second Woman. 6s.
STEVENSON, PHILIP L.—Love in Armour. 6s.
WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Riding Master. 2s. net.
WYLLARDE, DOLF.—Tropical Tales. 1s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

FEASEY, J. EATON.—Teaching Composition. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
HALL, FRED.—Handbook for Commercial Teachers. 2s. 6d. net.
HARHOUR, HENRY.—Rural England, or Farming, Farmers, and Farmers' Men. Illustrated. 1s. 6d.
HARGREAVES, A.—Examination Notes on German. 1s. net.
HUNTER, J. A.—Wool from the Raw Material to the Finished Product. Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net.
JOHNSON, GEORGE F.—Rural Handicrafts. 2s. 6d. net.
MASKELL, H. P., and GREGORY, E. U.—Old Country Inns. New and cheaper edition, with list of Inns, Glossary of Curious Signs, and list of Reformed Inns. 3s. 6d. net.
PARKER, JOHN.—Who's Who in the Theatre. Cloth, 6s. net; leather, 8s. 6d. net.
RANKIN, H. A.—Pastel Work, or colour with Crayons. 32 Coloured Plates. 4s. net.
TOLSON, MISS J. E.—Paper Modelling for Infants and Juniors. 250 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
WADE, C. E., M.A.—Life of John Pym. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BARCLAY, FLORENCE L.—Through the Postern Gate. 6s.
BOWEN, CLAYTON R.—The Resurrection in the New Testament. 6s. net.
CHARLESWORTH, MAUD E.—The Relentless Current. 6s.
COLMAN, SAMUEL.—Nature's Harmonic Unity.
CUMONT, FRANZ.—Astrology and Religion among the Greeks and Romans.
DRESSER, HORATIO W.—Human Efficiency. 5s. net.
GREGORY, LADY.—Irish Folk Historic Plays.
ISAACS, ABRAHAM S., Ph.D.—What is Judaism?

KIRKHAM, STANTON D.—Outdoor Philosophy. 5s. net.
LANGE, ALGOT.—In the Amazon Jungle.
LITCHFIELD, GRACE DENIO.—The Nun of Kent. 5s. net.
LIVERMORE, WILLIAM ROSCOE.—The Story of the Civil War.
LLOYD, CARO.—Henry Demarest Lloyd.
MILES, GRACE C.—The Hoosac Valley.
RAPER, CHARLES L.—Railway Transportation.
RAYMOND, GEORGE L., PROFESSOR.—Modern Fishers of Men. 5s.
SELIGMANN, E. R. C.—The Social Evil. Second Edition.
STERNE, SIMON.—Railways.
"THE PRINCESS."—Traveller's Tales.

The Fleming H. Revell Company.

BULL, GRIFFIN W., D.D.—Daily Reminders from John's Gospel. 3s. 6d. net.
DOUBS, JOHN F.—The Modern Man and the Church. 1s. 6d. net.
PETERS, G. M.—The Master. 6s. net.
VEACH, ROBERT WELLS.—The Friendship of Jesus. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

LEGGE, MARGARET.—A Semi-Detached Marriage. 6s.
MACKELLAR, DOROTHEA, and BEDFORD, RUTH.—The Little Blue Devil. 6s.
PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—A Faery Land Forlorn. 6s.
WESTRUP, WILLIAM.—The Impossible Ideal: A South African Novel. 6s.

Mr. Robert Scott.

ALLEN, REV. ROLAND, M.A.—Missionary Methods. 5s. net.
CHADWICK, REV. W. E., D.D.—Through Discipline to Victory. 2s. 6d. net.
ECKERLEY, REV. J. H.—A Three Hours' Service for Good Friday. 2d.
JOYNT, REV. CANON R. C., M.A.—Liturgy and Life. 3s. 6d. net.
LEES, REV. HARRINGTON C., M.A.—The Arithmetic of Heaven. 1d.
LITTON, LATE REV. E. A., M.A.—Introduction to Dogmatic Theology. 10s. 6d. net.
LYTTELTON, REV. THE HON. EDWARD. Character and Religion. 5s. net.
MYERS, FREDERIC W. H.—Saint Paul. 6d. net.
OTTLEY, REV. R. L., D.D.—The Rule of Faith and Hope. 5s. net.
PLUMMER, REV. ALFRED, D.D.—The Churches in Britain. Vol. 2. 5s. net.
REYNOLDS, REV. PREBENDARY B.—The History and Methods of Religious Education. 5s. net.
ROSTRON, REV. S. NOWELL, M.A.—The Christology of St. Paul. 5s. net.
SIMPSON, REV. J. G., D.D.—Consecration and the Cross. 6d. net.
WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S., D.D.—A Simple Guide to Holy Communion. 6d.
WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S., D.D.—Gains and Losses. 1s. 6d. net.
WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S., D.D.—Life's Chance. 4s. 6d. net.
WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S., D.D.—The People's Prayer Book. 2s. 6d. net.
WILBERFORCE, VEN. ARCHDEACON.—The Hope of Glory. 1s. net.

Martin Secker, Esq.

ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES.—Speculative Dialogues. 5s. net.
ALLSHORN, LIONEL.—Stupor Mundi. 16s. net.
CLAYTON, JOSEPH.—Robert Kett. 8s. 6d. net.
HOWE, P. P.—J. M. Synge. 7s. 6d. net.
MACHEN, ARTHUR.—Hieroglyphics. 2s. 6d. net.
ONIONS, OLIVER.—In Accordance with the Evidence. 6s.
ROBERTS, R. ELLIS.—Henrik Ibsen. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson, Ltd.

BOIER, IOHAN (Author of "The Power of a Lie")—Treachery Ground. 6s.
HASTINGS, BASIL MACDONALD.—The New Sun. A Play in Three Acts. Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. net.
HEMERY, WILFRED.—The Woman Wonderful. 6s.
KNIGHT, PROFESSOR WILLIAM.—An Easter Anthology. 2s. 6d. net.
SIDGWICK, ETHEL.—Herelf. 6s.
The Footpath Way (Second Edition)—An Anthology for Walkers. With an Introduction by Hilaire Belloc. 2s. 6d. net.

Stephen Swift & Co., Ltd.

BECKFORD, WM.—The Episodes of Vathek. Translated by Sir Frank T. Marzials, with an Introduction by Lewis Melville. Cloth, 21s. net.
BELLOC, HILAIRE.—Waterloo. With Coloured Maps. 1s. net.
CONNELL, NORREYS.—Shakespeare's End. 3s. 6d. net.
FENDALL, PERCY.—Lady Emyrtrude and the Plumber. 6s.
GOURMONT, REMY DE.—A Night in the Luxembourg. Translated, with Preface and Appendix by Arthur Ransome. Cloth, 5s. net.
HOBSON, S. G.—Irish Home Rule, The Last Phase. 3s. 6d. net.
LAPWORTH, CHAS. and ZIMMERN, HELEN.—Tripoli and Young Italy. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
LYNCH, ARTHUR.—A New Psychology. 21s. net.
MATHIESON, MISS ANNIE.—Leaves of Prose. 5s. net.
PHILLIPS, STEPHEN.—The King: A Play. 2s. 6d. net.
RUSSELL, COUNTESS.—An Excellent Mystery. 6s.
SENIOR, DOROTHY.—Old English Worthies. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
TALBOT, ETHEL.—London Windows. 2s. 6d. net.
VON TAUBE, BARON.—In Defence of America. 5s. net.
WOOD, LITCHFIELD.—A Superman in Being. 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BORE, HENRY.—The New China—A Traveller's Impressions. 10s. 6d. net.
D'OLLONE, VICOMTE.—In Forbidden China. 12s. 6d. net.
DUNLOP, O. J.—English Apprenticeship and Child Labour: A History. 10s. 6d. net.
KITCHING, A. L.—On the Backwaters of the Nile: Studies of some Child Races of Central Africa. 12s. 6d. net.
LOUGH, RT. HON. THOMAS, M.P.—Irish Finance. 6d. net.
THURSTON, EDGAR.—Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

APPLIN, ARTHUR.—Her Sacrifice. 6s.
BARR, ROBERT.—Young Lord Stranleigh. 7d. net.
FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—The Court of the Angels. 6s.
HOCKING, JOSEPH.—Is Home Rule Rome Rule? 1s. net.
LE QUEUX, WM.—As We Forgive Them. 2s. net.
LYNCH, LAWRENCE L.—A Blind Lead. 6s.
MITFORD, BERTRAM.—The River of Unrest. 6s.
MOBERLY, L. G.—Joy: A Happy Soul. 6d.
NORRIS, W. E.—Misadventure. 6d.
PEMBERTON, MAX.—The Gold Wolf. 1s. net.
PEMBERTON, MAX.—The L'Alestar. 7d. net.
"RITA."—Like Dian's Kiss. 6d.
WHITE, FRED. M.—The Four Fingers. 6d.

THE READER.

LADY THACKERAY RITCHIE.

BY LEWIS MELVILLE.

A PART from all other considerations, concerning which I shall presently have something to say, Lady Ritchie has, as a daughter of Thackeray, a boundless claim upon our regard, nay, upon our affection. Even when speaking of the novelist in connection with his family, it would be affectation to write Mr. Thackeray : as well talk of Mr. Henry Fielding, and say His Worship wrote a story called "Tom Jones." Thackeray has taken his place in our hearts, not only as a writer, but as a man. We love the man, and such is his fascination that we cannot but love, even though we may never have seen them, those whom he loved. One of those "little girls" of his, to whom he was so devoted, has gone from us, and so Lady Ritchie has the double portion of the world's regard as the sole surviving daughter of him who was so much honoured in his lifetime, and whose memory it is our privilege, as it is our pleasure and our duty, to admire and respect to-day. To those versed in his works and in the story of his life, so admirably narrated in a series of Biographical Introductions by Lady Ritchie, there is always a touch of pathos when, at the occasional dinners of the Titmarsh Club, founded in his honour, the company, members and guests alike, rise, at the bidding of the chairman of the evening, to drink in silence to "The Immortal Memory of William Makepeace Thackeray."

"My father lived in good company, so that even as children we must have seen a good many poets and remarkable people, though we were not always conscious of our privileges," Lady Ritchie has written in one of the three volumes from which we may glean some auto-biographical material.* One of her earliest memories was the second funeral of Napoleon, her vague recollection of which she recorded in her happiest vein :

"I began life at four or five years old as a fervent Napoleonist. The great Emperor had not been dead a quarter of a century when I was a little child. He was certainly alive in the hearts of the French people and of the children growing up among them. Influenced by the cook, we adored his memory, and the concerge had a clock with a laurel wreath which for some reason kindled all our enthusiasm.

"As a baby, holding my father's finger I had stared at the second funeral of Napoleon sweeping up the great roadway of the Champs Elysées. The ground was white with new fallen snow, and I had never seen snow before ; it seemed to me to be a part of the funeral ; a mighty pall indeed, spread for the obseques of so great a warrior. It was the snow I thought about, though I looked with awe at the black and glittering carriages which came up like ships sailing past us, noiselessly one by one. They frightened me, for I thought there was a dead emperor in each. This weird procession gave a strange importance to the memory of the great Emperor, and also to the little marble statuette of him on the nursery chimney-piece. It stood with folded arms contemplating the decadence of France, black and silent and reproachful."

Lady Ritchie remembers seeing the Iron Duke in the street, and being told a story by Lord Palmerston. At a very early age she was taken to Chopin's room and heard him play a piece he had just composed ;

* "Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning" (Macmillan), 1892. "Chapters from some Memoirs" (Macmillan), 1894. "Blackstick Papers" (Smith, Elder & Co.), 1908.

Lady Thackeray, Ritchie.

After the Painting by G. F. Watts in 1864-5.

Louis Philippe was pointed out to her at Paris, and with Leigh Hunt and Trelawny she could boast acquaintance, as well as with that inimitable Victorian buck D'Orsay. Rogers she found one day when she went with her father to Mrs Procter's—"he was like a Chinese mandarin with an ivory face. His expression never changed." As a child she was frequently at Dickens's house, and she has recorded a very pretty incident that occurred at one of the parties there at which she was present.

'Only this much I do remember very clearly, that we had danced and supped and danced again, and that we were all standing in a hall lighted and hung with bunches of Christmas green, and as I have said everything seemed altogether magnificent and important more magnificent

Lady Anne Thackeray Ritchie.
Age 6 months.

The drawing made by W. M. Thackeray at Great Corn Street and important every minute, as the evening went on, and more and more people kept arriving. The hall was crowded and the broad staircase was lined with little boys—thousands of little boys whose heads and legs and arms were waving about together. They were making a great noise and shouting and the eldest son of the house seemed to be marshalling them. Presently their noise became a cheer, and then another, and we looked up and saw that our own father had come to fetch us and that his white head was there above the others, then came a third final ringing cheer, and someone went up to him—it was Mr Dickens himself who laughed and said quietly 'That is for you!' and my father looked up surprised, pleased, touched, settled his spectacles and nodded gravely to the little boys."

Lady Ritchie, of course, knew all the members of her father's set, the Carlyles, Lord Houghton, the Theodore

"Father and Little Girl,"

Lady Ritchie and W. M. Thackeray.

A sketch made by Thackeray about 1840

From "The Centenary Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Works" With Prefaces by Lady Ritchie (Smith, Elder.)

Martins the Brookfields, Fanny Kemble, Mrs Sartons, Landseer, Watts, Millar, Cattermole, Leslie, Ruskin, the Tennysons, the Brownings, dear old Fitz' and how many more? She has given to the world some "Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning" and in this book there is an excellent picture of Mrs. Browning,

To the writer's own particular taste there will never be any more delightful person than the simple minded woman of the world who has seen enough to know what its price is, all worth who is sure enough of her position to take it for granted, who is interested in the person she is talking to, and unconscious of anything but a wish to give kindness and attention. This is the impression Mrs. Browning made on me from the first moment I ever saw her to the last. Alas! the moments were not so very many when we were together. Perhaps all the more vivid is the recollection of the peaceful home, of the fireside

Lady Ritchie and her younger sister.

A sketch by Thackeray for Punch "Horrid Tragedy in Private Life," Feb 6th, 1847

From "The Centenary Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Works" With Prefaces by Lady Ritchie (Smith, Elder.)

W. M. Thackeray.

From the painting by Samuel Laurence, in the National Portrait Gallery.

where the logs are burning, while the lady of that kind hearth is established in her safe corner, with her little boy curled up by her side, the door opening and shutting meanwhile to the quick step of the master of the house, to the life of the world without as it came to find her in her quiet nook. The house seemed to my sister and to me warmer, more full of interest and peace in her sitting room than elsewhere. Whether at Florence, at Rome, at Paris, or in

Lady Anne Thackeray Ritchie.

From a water-colour painted by W. M. Thackeray, at Young Street, Kensington.

London once more, she seemed to carry her own atmosphere always, something serious, motherly, absolutely artless, and yet impassioned, noble, and sincere. I can recall the slight figure in its thin black dress, the writing apparatus by the sofa, the tiny inkstand, the quill-nibbed pen—the unpretentious implements of her magic. 'She was a little woman; she liked little things,' Mr. Browning used to say. Her miniature editions of the classics are still carefully preserved with her name written in each in her delicate, sensitive handwriting, and always with her husband's name above her own, for she dedicated all her books to him; it was a fancy that she had. Nor must his presence in the home be forgotten any more than in the books—the spirited domination and inspired commonsense, which seemed to give a certain life to her vaguer visions. But of those visions Mrs. Browning rarely spoke, she was too simple and practical to indulge in many apostrophes."

Has anyone given a better insight into the poet's character in fewer words?

The Amanuensis.

Portrait of Lady Ritchie, aged about 18, at 36, Onslow Square. From the water-colour drawing by her father.

From "The Century Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Works." With Prefaces by Lady Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

Leech was a friend of the novelist, and Lady Ritchie remembers how one day she met her father in the Kensington Road, walking towards Palace Green, carrying two blue Dutch pots, which he had just surreptitiously taken from his own study. "I am going to see if they won't stand upon Leech's dining-room chimney-piece," he told her; and somewhat to the girl's disappointment, for Thackeray was always giving away his china, a satisfactory place was found for them in Leech's house. Most amusing of all Lady Ritchie's recollections is that concerned with the great occasion when Charlotte Brontë went to dine at Young Street. It was an interesting gathering Mrs. Brookfield, Mrs. Crowe, the Carlyles, Mrs. Elliott and Miss Perry, Mrs. Procter and her daughter. The dinner was very dull, the guests rarely spoke, the host became more and more depressed, until, when the ladies had gone to the drawing-room,

"Waiting for Papa."

Drawn by Fred Walker.

From "Five Old Friends," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

Thackeray slipped away to the club, leaving the party to disperse when and how it would.

At least as interesting as anything Lady Ritchie has given us, are her recollections of her father. Her introductions to the Centenary Biographical edition of Thackeray's Works are very valuable, and contain many of his hitherto unpublished letters and drawings, and no student of Thackeray can complete his education without these twenty-six volumes. But even more intimate are the few references to Thackeray in the "Chapters from Some Memoirs." Shall we ever have the complete memoirs? we feel impelled to ask, hoping that the question may some day not far off be answered in the affirmative. We like to read of the travels of Thackeray with his daughters; of their stay at Berne in the summer of 1853, when walking with them in some woods he strayed from Beamish and Catherine.

Drawn by Fred Walker.

From "The Village on the Cliff," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

them, and, returning, told them how the story of "The Newcomes" had been revealed to him; of the visit in their company to Weimar—the Pumpernickel of "Vanity Fair," where the great man had studied as a youth, had learnt German, had been received by "grand old Goethe" and had fallen in love with the beautiful Amalia von X—which last incident has duly been recorded by the Titmarshian autobiographer, George Savage Fitz-Boodle happy months before the shadows of the sadness of life had fallen on the novelist. On that later visit Thackeray was pleased to find that some of the sketches he had made for children so many years earlier had been preserved and treasured, and delighted to meet in the street his old tutor, Dr. Weissenborne and to find himself remembered by Madame von Goethe. He pointed out to his girls the house where Amalia had lived and at Venice, a year or so later, actually saw the lady again.

"We were breakfasting (Lady Ritchie has written) at a long table where a fat lady also sat a little way off, with a pale fat little boy beside her. She was stout, she was dressed in light green, she was silent, she was eating an egg. The sala of the great marble hall was shaded from the blaze of sunshine, but stray gleams shot across the dim hall, falling on the palms and the orange trees beyond the lady, who gravely shifted her place as the sunlight dazzled her. Our own meal was also spread and my sister and I were only waiting for my father to begin. He came in presently, saying he had been looking at the guest-book in the outer hall, and he had seen a name which interested him very much. 'Frau von Z. geboren von X. It must be Amalia! She must be here in the hotel,' he said, and as he spoke he asked a waiter whether Madame von Z. was still in the hotel. 'I believe that is Madame von Z.' said the waiter, pointing to the fat lady. The lady looked up and then went on with her egg and my poor father turned away, saying in a low, overwhelmed voice, 'That Amalia! That

By courtesy of the American Bookman

Lady Thackeray Ritchie in 1894.

the dimly lit bow window which amid branches of sweet smoke old Japanese opened to the long garden with the acacia tree & the old mulberry tree dropping its crimson fruit upon the gravel. Janie Warren who was a well loved her cockney home as girls do love their homes - She liked the sound of the rolling carts & carriages as some people love the sound of the sea, here each wave was a little effort she could almost recognise the voices in the street under her window & the the she knew the morning steps of the little school children. Running fast, the early noise of the workmen on their way. There was a creak which used to keep her early in the morning & which came at night from a school.

Facsimile page of Manuscript of a yet unpublished story by Lady Thackeray Ritchie.

cannot be Amalia. I could not understand his silence his discomposure. 'Aren't you going to speak to her? Oh please do go and speak to her!' we both cried. 'Do make sure if it is Amalia. But he shook his head. 'I can't,' he said, 'I had rather not.' Amalia meanwhile having finished her egg, rose deliberately, put down her napkin and walked away followed by her little boy."

We have graphic pictures of Thackeray driving with his mother and daughters to deliver his first lecture on "The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century," very nervous and making little jokes to reassure the dear ones accompanying him, of how he began in a voice that sounded strange to those who knew him, and how he soon got into his stride and spoke in the familiar tones; of how presently a "proud and happy look of light and relief" came into his mother's eyes, of how the people crowded round to congratulate him, and of the return home when the lecture delivered and the success assured the nervousness had given place to happiness—"Jackson made the horses gallop, and my father laughed and made real jokes, without any effort, and we laughed and enjoyed every jolt and turning, on the way home." We read of Thackeray's trips to America to read "The English Humourists" and "The Four Georges," and the sad hearts he left behind him. Perhaps the best passage in all Lady Ritchie's book is that in which she describes her father's return from his first visit to the United States.

Lady Ritchie and her Grandchildren,
(the children of Mrs. Denis Ritchie.)

(Specially taken for The Bookman.)

I can still remember sitting with my grandparents expecting his return. My sister and I sat on the red sofa in the little study and shortly before the time we had calculated that he might arrive came a little ring at the front-door, only we were so afraid that it might not be he that we did not dare to open it and there we stood until a second and much louder ringing brought us to our senses. 'Why didn't you open the door?' said my father stepping in looking well, broad and upright laughing. In a moment he had never been away at all."

Fashions in fiction change as in lace and lingerie. What is food for one generation is poison to another. An author admired in one decade, is unread in the next, and forgotten in the third—unless he is a supreme master of his craft when he will certainly be remembered and almost as certainly not read beyond the circle of the cultured. In an age when Lever is entirely neglected, Lytton pronounced 'fustian', Disraeli unopened, Trollope voted dull, and Thackeray himself more discussed than perused, it may be that Lady Ritchie's audience, though fit, is small in numbers. Yet as there are still some who turn with pleasure to the Victorian writers, finding in them a certain breadth not discernible in the work of most novelists of to-day, so many, no doubt, still take down from the shelf "Old Kensington" and its companion volumes,* and re-read the stories with appreciation. The Miss Thackeray of the novels, as she was known in the 'Seventies has many merits. She writes simply indeed, but well, and her style is worthy of high praise. Sometimes, indeed we come across a passage that suggests the influence of her father's writings.

'As I write out what my father's hand has written my gossip is hushed and seems to me like the lamp smoke in the old drawing room compared to the light of the summer's night in the street outside.

There we hear the cadences of the author of "Denis Duval" whose voice may also be distinguished in an occasional aside.

* "Miss Thackeray's Works." Uniform Edition. 10 Vols. 6s. each. (Smith Elder & Co.) (1) Old Kensington. (2) The Village on the Cliff. (3) Five Old Friends and a Young Prince. (4) To Esther and other sketches. (5) Bluebeard's Keys and other stories. (6) The Story of Elizabeth, Two Hours, From an Island. (7) Lovers and Spinners and other Essays. (8) Miss Angel, Fulham Lawn. (9) Miss Williamson's Divagations. (10) Mrs. Dymond.

Drawing room of No. 109 St. George's Square, S.W., showing Lady Ritchie's writing table before Laurence's portrait of her father.

(Specially taken for The Bookman.)

Drawn by Arthur Hughes.

"Come in, come in, Monsieur le Colonel!" says Madame hospitably. "Come and see my son's work."

From "Mrs Dymond," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie.
(Smith, Elder.)

"If George Vanborough were only more like his own brothers, there would be something to be done with him," thought honest John, as those young gentlemen's bullet-heads passed the window where the pupil and his preceptor were at work. If only—there would be a strange monotony, I fancy, if all the 'if onlys' could be realised, and we had the moulding of one another, and pastors and masters could turn assenting pupils out by the gross like the little chalk rabbits Italian boys carry about for sale."

Yet one more example of Lady Ritchie's style must be allowed—the description from "Old Kensington" of the parish church:

"Last year only, the old church was standing, in its iron cage at the junction of the thoroughfares. . . . There was the old painting of the lion and the unicorn hanging over the gallery; the light streaming through the brown saints over the communion-table. In after-life the children may have seen other saints more glorious in crimson and purple, nobler piles and arches, but none of them have ever seemed so near to heaven as the old Queen Anne building; and the wooden pew with its high stools, through which elbows of straw were protruding, where they used to kneel on either side of their aunt, watching with awe-stricken faces the tears as they came falling from the widow's sad eyes."

"Lady Sarah could scarcely have told you the meaning of the tears as they fell—old love and life partings, sorrows and past mercies, all came returning to her with the familiar words of the prayers. The tears fell bright and awe-stricken as she thought of the present—of distances immeasurable—of life and its inconceivable mystery; and then her heart would warm with hope perhaps of what might be to come, of the overwhelming possibilities—how many of them to her lay in the warm clasp of the child's hand that came pushing into hers! For her, as for the children, heaven's state was in the old wooden pew. Then the sing-song of the hymn would flood the old church with its homely cadence."

'Prepare your glad voices,
Let Hisrael rejoice,' sang the little charity children; poor little Israelites, with blue stockings, and funny woollen knots to their fustian caps rejoicing, though their pastures were not green as yet, nor was their land overflowing with milk and honey. However, they sang praises for others, as all people do at times, thanks be to the merciful dispensation that allows us to weep, to work, to be comforted, and to rejoice with one

Drawn by Arthur Hughes.

"Blanche springing free once more, shook all her beautiful sunshine of hair in a glistening mist over her shoulders."

From "Bluebeard's Keys," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie.
(Smith, Elder.)

another's hearts, consciously or unconsciously, as long as life exists."

Lady Ritchie, however, is no mere imitator of that gifted novelist, in spite of these accidental resemblances. With William Allingham, she has said to herself:

"Like myself, however small,
Like myself, or not at all,"

and she has retained through all her works the individuality that happily is hers. If she is not strikingly virile, at least her power of character-drawing is undeniable. She has the rare power of being able to create atmosphere; she has, in a marked degree, the great indefinable gift of a sweet, gentle, loving charm.

No. 109, St. George's Square, S.W., Lady Ritchie's residence.

(Specially taken for The Bookman.)

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MARCH, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

I.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

II.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original fable, in about a hundred and fifty words, after the manner of Æsop, dealing with any current topic of general interest.

III.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.

IV.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

I.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to J. RICHARD ELLAWAY, of Lynmoor, Basingstoke, for the following :

A LIKELY STORY. BY WILLIAM DE MORGAN.
(Heinemann.)

"It was the Cat!"
W. S. GILBERT, H.M.S. Pinafors.

We also select for printing :

MAIDS' MONEY. BY MRS. H. DUDENEY.
(Heinemann.)

"My face is my fortune, sir," she said."
Nursery Rhyme.

(Charles Powell, "Dovedale," Victoria Park, Manchester.)

THE IMPOSSIBLE IDEAL. BY WILL WESTRUP.
(Alston Rivers.)

"I only ask that Fortune send
A little more than I can spend."
O. WENDELL HOLMES.

(Miss E. D. Morton, "Hillside," Walmer.)

A MELODY IN SILVER. BY KEENE ABBOTT.
(Putnam.)

"Sing a song o' sixpence."
Nursery Rhyme.

(Miss M. R. Davies, 8, Duddingston Avenue, Sefton Park, Liverpool.)

Drawn by H. Allingham.

"He put his arm round her as he spoke and she let her hand fall into his."

From "Miss Angel," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

THE DEBTOR. MISS MARY ANGELA DICKENS.
"My apprehensions come in crowds."
WORDSWORTH, Affliction of Margaret.

(Daisy H. Badland, 385, Middlewood Road, Hillsboro', Sheffield.)

THE CHILDREN'S BREAD. BY MAUDE LITTLE.
(Chatto & Windus.)

"Man wants but little here below."

("Mary Macfadyen," c/o Sinclair, 396, Shields Road Pollokshields, Glasgow;
and A. S. Hearn, "Dubrae," Boveney Road, Honor Oak Park, S.E.).

MYTHS AND LEGENDS OF THE CELTIC
RACE. T. W. ROLLESTON. (Harrap.)

"Taffy was a Welshman, Taffy was a thief!"

Old Song.

(Miss Hilda Hurlbert, 4, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.).

THE OLD WIVES TALE. BY ARNOLD
BENNETT. (Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.)

"But I go on for ever."

TENNYSON, The Brook.

(Dora A. Bannister, 1, Irene Place, Blackburn.)

II.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best Alphabet concerning itself with the personality and work of any well-known living author is awarded to Miss A. ELEANOR PINNINGTON, of 25, Wellington
Road, Brighton, for the following:

A is an Author, and Kipling his name,
B is the Books that have brought him to fame;
C for the Critics who said many things,
D for the Ditties he skillfully sings,
E for the East with its smiles and its frowns;
F for the Faeries who people the Downs,
G, Gloriana who danced through her shoes,
H for the History which all schools should use,
I for India he has made known to the West,
J for the Jungle—the beasts know it best,
K for King-Emperor whom India has hailed,
L for the Light that so dismally failed,
M for the white Man whose burden is grave,
N for the Native who is not a slave,
O for the Oiler the liner's going still,
P is for Puck who inhabits Pook's Hill,
Q is for Quetta and what Jack Barrett met;
R the Recessional—"Lest we forget—"
S is for Stalky and also for Slang,
T for the Tommies who laughed and who sang,
U is for Ung and the story he told,
V for Victoria, Empress of Gold
W the Work that will meet us each day,
X for the hat-passers, ready to pay,
Y the Yabu and equestrian pride,
Z the Zenanas and all that they hide.

This competition was very popular, and we specially commend the ALPHABETS of Isabel Davies (Pembroke Dock), Dorothy Gull (Appledore), J. Richard Ellaway
(Basingstoke), Muriel D. Brooke (Sudbury, Suffolk),
Miss M. Hurlbert (Chester), Miss E. M. P. Daniell (Wandsworth), Olivia Connolly (Brockley), Geoffrey C.
Foster (Upper Norwood), S. A. Doody (Boscombe),
Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Albert Fuller (Cardiff),
S. Poultny (Ulverston), Miss Dease (Coole, Westmeath), Richard Goodfellow (Dublin), Nina Coppinger (Wimbledon), Florence Snelling (Sidcup), Miss E. T. Heimber (Worthing), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone, Dart-ford), Miss Vane-Thomas (Rotherfield), Mary G. Patterson (Upper Norwood), Hilda M. Dowden (Rathgar, Dublin), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Miss Watson (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Mrs. Ernest Jackson (Erdington,

Drawn by G. D. Leslie

Under the Rustic Porch.

From "Old Kensington," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

Birmingham), Gertrude Leslie (Jesmond, Newcastle-on-Tyne), Herbert H. Stansfield (Witnesham, Suffolk), Charles Adams (Devizes), Elsie Barnes (Sheffield),
Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Edith M. Walls (Batley), Mary Constance Fowler (Epsom), Emily Kingston (Mentone), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Frank Day (South Hackney), Hilda McKeague (Ballymoney, Co. Antrim), Bernard Poultny (Ulverston), Ruth Goodwin (Clapham), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), M. A. Newman (Badingham, Suffolk), L. Welby (Shanklin, I.W.), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Robert Sinclair (Glasgow), Samuel Henry
Bastard (Glasgow), Rev. T. Hern (Rowlands Castle),
Margery Wilkins (Uttoxeter), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow),
A. J. Briggs (Crown Hill, Devon), M. A. Mavor (Glasgow), Frank Rhodes (Scarborough), Florence E. Briggs (Crown Hill, Devon), Charles Webb (King's Lynn), Miss B. O.
Anderson (Scarborough), Marion M. Orr (Rutherglen, N.B.), Flora Bacot (Worthing), Miss E. C. Rhodes (Harrogate), W. M. Appleby (Southend-on-Sea), Dora A.
Bannister (Blackburn), Miss B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle).

III.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. J. B. FFOULKES, of Daisy Hill, Mill Brow, Mellor, Derbyshire, for the following :

THE DRUNKARD. BY GUY THORNE. (Greening & Co.)
The main interest of this grim story centres round the personality of the poet, Gilbert Lothian, and the struggle within him, between his better self and his hereditary craving for drink. Each successive step in his downward course is remorselessly related; his very soul seems to be laid bare before us, until he, slowly but surely, sinks into the abyss of despair, which inevitably leads on to the final tragedy. The book is hardly elevating, yet is strangely fascinating, giving us a powerful portrayal of one of the worst, and most pitiful, sides of human life.

Other good reviews received are :

ZULEIKA DOBSON. BY MAX BEERBOHM.
(William Heinemann.)

Zuleika is unique! We do not wonder that she enslaved, not only all the undergraduates, but even that superb person, the Duke of Dorset. It is in him, doomed to an early death by the appearance of the fatal and prophetic owls, that all our sympathy centres. In this story we meet many old friends. Do we not all know the person who says "I don't know about music really, but I know what I like," and who "is never tired of saying it." It is a splendid and classic skit, full of breathless melodrama and remorseless satire.

(Miss E. Moore, Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford.)

Drawn by Fred Walker.

"Horatia's First Visit."

From "To Esther" by Lady Thackeray Ritchie (Smith, Elder.)

CARNIVAL. BY COMPTON MACKENZIE.
(Martin Secker, 6s.)

Jennie is the daintiest "rogue in porcelain," and two-thirds of her story are so good and so true, that, when her creator marries her preposterously and slaughters her atrociously, we are compelled to believe him, however resentfully, yet he is forgiven through the reality of his characters, his humour, his Fragonard paintings—Jennie dancing under the plane-tree, Jennie in the studio, Jennie with her baby in the orchard, and a dozen besides; and the most faithful description of stage-life in fiction. Admirable restraint of the author, who makes his heroine a beautiful dancer, yet keeps her in the corps-de-ballet!

(Gertrude Pitt, 31, Rosslyn Hill, Hampstead, N.W.)

THE WOMEN OF SHAKESPEARE. BY FRANK HARRIS.
(Methuen.)

Many people would have turned this subject into a dead-weight, but Mr. Harris has decked it forth with infinite fascination. Doggedly determined, he rides into the field with the same clarion-call: that we owe Shakespeare's greatest to Mary Fitton. He may or may not be correct, for his contentions can have no fixed foundation-stone; it is all too remote. But, indirectly, Mr. Harris makes two facts surer: first, that brilliant arguments can render most things colourable; second, that he is endowed with a very fine discernment for style—which may at all events prove much to its possessor!

(Miss Beatrix Terry, 374, Brixton Road, London, S.W.)

A WILDERNESS OF MONKEYS. BY FREDERICK NIVEN.
(Martin Secker)

Bliss Henry is an author and a man of a delicate temperament—in fact, almost sexless in his idealism. He goes into the country to write a novel, and Mr. Niven's book is concerned with the impressions which the people of Solway make upon his sensitive nature, and the counter-effect of his idealism upon them. Personally, we think the irreclaimable coarseness of these country people a little overdrawn; nevertheless, the book is a faithful study of the temperamental shocks which an artist always experiences when brought in contact with vulgarity. We rank this with Mr. Niven's best work.

(Percy Huddy, "Thorncroft," Monk Road, Bishopston, Bristol.)

THE COURTIER STOOPS. J. H. YOXALL.
(Smith, Elder & Co.)

This story of Goethe and Christiane is told with distinction and charm, and has all the fascination of biography in the form of romance, the courtier of the title being Johann von Wolfgang easily recognisable as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. The personality of the great poet stands out very vividly and all the minor characters are well drawn. Forming a gloomy background we have the threatenings of the French Revolution, and all through the book sounds the horn of the mysterious stranger, who rides through Europe vainly trying to rouse the princes to a realisation of the approaching terror.

(G. M. Elwood, Abbey Park Road, Grimsby.)

STORIES IN GREY. BY BARRY PAIN.
(T. Werner Laurie.)

When an author who stands high in popular favour as humourist bids farewell to mirth and writes in different vein, he runs no little risk of tumbling, in familiar phrase, between two stools; admirers of comedy and tragedy alike neglecting him.

Mr. Barry Pain's "Stories in Grey" merit warm applause from all who enjoy a good short story thoroughly well told. Crisp and firm in style, vivid and picturesque in delineation of character, each of these stories grips the reader's attention from start to finish.

His latest book proves convincingly that Mr. Barry Pain is more than a humourist.

(R. B. Ince, 69, Belsize Park, London, N.W.)

We specially commend also the reviews sent in by Margery Wilkins (Uttoxeter), E. Percy Adam (Nottingham), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford, Kent), Elsie Boyd (Hatch End, Pinner), Edna Smallwood (Highbury, N.), H. Elrington (Monkstown, Co. Dublin), Rose B. Frone (Southsea), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), Emily Hunt (Llanfairtechan), M. A. Newman (Badingham, Suffolk), Thomas A. Walters (Ilkley), Irene Harrison (Bristol), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Richard Goodfellow (Dublin), H. M. Creswell Paine (St. Austell), William F. Robinson (Impington, Cambridge), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Miss M. V. Woodgate (London S.W.), Peter Macfadyen (Pollokshields, Glasgow), Mrs. Florence L. Payne (St. Austell), M. E. Heurtley (Oxford), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone, Durtford), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Dorothy R. Gull (Apple-dore), Florence Snelling (Sidcup), Josephine Gregory (Bradford), Mrs. Messenger (Coventry), H. K. Ormerod (Airdrie, N.B.), A. R. Williams (Worcester), L. Welby (Shanklin, I.W.), Mary Cleland (Paris), Mrs. John Gibbs (Shutford, Banbury), Lettie Cole (Pontrilas), Mrs. Mabel Knight (Bromley, Kent), Florence Karn (Gloucester), A. Miller (Leeds), Isabelle Swinscow (Tunbridge Wells), Hylda McKeague (Ballymoney, Co. Antrim), Kate E. Samuels (London, W.C.), Mrs. Butler (Westbury, Glos.), Edith Dolton (Newbury), S. A.

Drawn by Arthur Hughes.

"One, two, three, four, five little cook boys, in white jackets, and caps, appear in a line with trays upon their heads."

From "Toilers and Spinners," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

Doody (Boscombe), Irene Pollok Lalonde (Bath), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough), and Miss M. G. Stewart (Oxford).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. S. J. MORRISON, of 72, Holker Street, Barrow-in-Furness.

THE CATHOLIC REVIVAL.*

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

AS I transcribe these titles of new books concerning very old English Catholic names, I am reminded of Anthony Froude's chapter on "England's Forgotten Worthies," and considering what the public now feasts upon by preference, I feel tempted to quote Persius, "Quis leget hæc?—Vel duo vel nemo." Who will turn aside from our problem novels and Divorce Court chronicles, our more or less doubtful revelations by foreign princesses of high life abroad, our sporting and sentimental stories which sell by the hundred thousand, to obscure episodes in the story of a remnant like the Catholics in this country when the nineteenth century was beginning? "Two or three, perhaps none at all," answers the Roman poet. "Milner, Lingard—who were they?" says the general reader, looking up from his Nat Gould or William Le Queux. To which I reply: "O general reader, listen. I will tell you a little about them, and you shall judge for yourself whether in the neighbourhood of such men there might not be lurking the romance of strong character and curious adventures. You know that there was once a French Revolution. Well, these Catholics were wrapt in its smoke and flame; the passionate fury of it drove them forward on undreamt-of paths; and they broke a way, reluctantly, almost unwittingly, for the votaries of the old, old Church into our democratic era—Milner on the line of political freedom, Lingard on the line of historical research. Is not that interesting?"

To me certainly it is. It would be, were I nothing else than a student of the great world-forces which are engaged in shaping the future of mankind, and not otherwise troubled about religious disputes. Here is, in Thackeray's words, "the stately structure of eighteen centuries, the mighty and beautiful Roman Catholic faith, in whose bosom repose so many saints and sages"; but, apparently, it is falling with an irretrievable crash, all its props taken away, the order of things where it held its place swept into Limbo, while atheism stalks abroad conquering every foe. At such a time, say the year 1799, when Pope Pius VI. was dying of forced journeys at Valence, it seemed impossible that the Roman Church could ever again fascinate and subdue the nations, or any large part of them. In England, especially, where a few thousands only survived who still clung to the ancient faith, what hope was there? Dispirited, divided, their houses of refuge on the Continent no longer open, themselves without a philosophy which might explain this "twilight of the Gods," English Catholics were the feeblest folk in Europe. They had neither resources nor leaders. Their seventeen peers and five hundred families of a certain rank did but represent a squadron in the Tory host, its lagging rear-guard; they were, as the French picturesquely describe it, "the vanquished of yesterday." On statesmen like Pitt or even Burke they must have made a shadowy impression as of some once great power now in its dotage. I cannot call to mind a single writer, much less a man of action, who at this time in the British Islands foresaw that religion would revive and its most dogmatic form acquire new strength, by direct consequence of the revolutionary attack upon it. One præternatural genius, Napoleon, was indeed reckoning on the Papacy to "crown the edifice" which he meant to rebuild from the foundation. Joseph de Maistre was already seeing in vision the Pope of 1870. And Chateaubriand was making his own the enchantments of Rousseau's magic style, by which he might persuade youth and women that Christianity held the secret of romance. But on this side of Dover cliffs neither statesmanship, nor vision, nor romance, could be discerned among Catholics.

* (1) "The Eve of Catholic Emancipation (1803-1829)." Vols. I. and II. By Mgr. Bernard Ward, President of St. Edmund's College, Ware. 21s. net. (Longmans.)—(2) "Life and Letters of John Lingard." By Martin Haile and Edwin Bonney. 12s. net. (Herbert and Daniel.)

Yet the beginnings of a new world lay hidden somewhere amid these ashes. Thousands of the Gallican clergy, exiled and suffering for religion's sake, touched the heart of England. The enfranchised Irish Catholics clamoured for the Emancipation which had been pledged, but not given, to them. The Penal Laws, holding all who would not, at least "occasionally," conform to Anglican usages apart from the State, had long been teaching Christians how they might live independent of it. In a more distant background might be seen a fresh kind of scholar and writer, Gibbon the chief, whose liberal curiosity was inspecting original sources and dictating history from them, not moved, at all events, by old prejudices. The problem for what is now termed the Zeitgeist was really this, and I would call the reader's attention to it—whether Catholicism should or should not play a leading part in the English-speaking countries of the future, that is to say, in four Continents? The Zeitgeist determined that it should; Emancipation was to be granted, establishment by the State made once for all impossible, an element of romantic piety infused into the High and Dry formalism dear to the eighteenth century, the Middle Ages brought to light with all their glories of architecture, liturgy, crusades, legends, poems, folk-lore, with saints and heroes, popes and monks and philosophers, now covered beneath mountains of lying and sophistry. Instruments must be created by this new morning's breath, such as O'Connell and Bishop Doyle in Ireland, Milner, Lingard, Digby, Pugin, Newman and the Tractarians, Ruskin and the Pre-Raphaelites, even Carlyle and the rebels against Adam Smith's political economy, in England. "All these and more came flocking" to the reaction which none had foreseen—no, not Burke himself. How it has prospered we may judge on looking round at the British Empire and the United States. Under these two flags there are thirty-four millions of Catholics, with sacred hierarchies corresponding, monasticism triumphant, and the churches better filled than those of any other denomination, so far as we can tell by figures. And the Church of England is Catholicized; art has recovered its privileges.

In this most unexpected transformation-scene, the first English actors will not compare with De Maistre, Chateaubriand, or Lamennais (supreme artists, each and all); but they did their duty. Milner, whom De Quincey calls the "Papist of Winchester," and Newman styles the "chief luminary" of the period to Catholics, was a resolute fighter cast in the mould of Dr. Johnson. He wrote much and well; quarrelled on all sides, behaved with a truculence which got him the nickname of "The Mastiff," was utterly wanting in self-control, but did these three things which cannot be undone. He summed up the old standing quarrel between Rome and the Reformers in his "End of Controversy," a book well-named, for it is the last of its type on the Catholic side which covers the whole ground. He inaugurated by his "History of Winchester," and his chapel in that delightful city, the return to the Gothic or Pointed style, thus dominating the hundred years which followed of ecclesiastical building and restoration. I am not overlooking Goethe's enthusiasm for the Cathedral at Strassburg, or Scott's devotion to Melrose Abbey, or even Horace Walpole's dilettantism at Strawberry Hill. But I say that the truculent John Milner began the Gothic revival in this country, as a religious and practical enterprise. His last, which is also his greatest work, was blindly yet successfully to withstand the appointment of Catholic bishops by the Crown. For so doing he Drawn by Fred Walker.

From "The Story of Elizabeth," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie. (Smith, Elder.)

On the top of the hill.

Drawn by Frank Dicksee.

"Tell me, Pauline, is your mother right?"

From "Miss Williamson's Divagations," by Lady Thackeray Ritchie (Smith Elder)

was rightly hailed as the "English Athanasius." When, by Milner's violent policy, the attempt at "establishing" the Catholic Church in these Islands came to naught, freedom with its far-reaching consequences won the day. It was the overthrow of a scheme which would have divided the clergy from their flocks and made religion a spoil for politicians.

Lingard is ever so much more attractive than Milner, and it will be a pity if he does not become familiar to the multitude, who would be charmed with him if they knew this smiling, gracious figure. He was emphatically a scholar and a gentleman. Of Lincolnshire descent and humble birth, he had been sent as a lad to the English College at Douai, famed for its long and heroic services to the persecuted brethren in whose interest it was founded. Lingard saw the stormy scenes of the Revolution, and one day was pursued by a yelling mob, intent on taking his life. Among the pioneers who led to the setting up of the great institution near Durham, known as Ushaw College, he maintains a distinguished remembrance by his teaching and scholarship. Handsome, refined, witty and affectionate, he would have been a great man at Oxford or Cambridge. But his lot was cast in obscure positions, amid the quarrels loud and sharp which have always broken out between small companies living in a Ghetto. With serene good temper, a fine sense of the ridiculous, and his constant studies, Lingard came out unscathed even from the assaults of Milner, who could keep the peace with nobody. Lingard's volumes on the Anglo-Saxon Church, begun to please himself, and controlled by first-hand evidence, denote the coming change in historical methods applied to the "Dark Ages." They can still be read. His polemical Tracts are no less effective than amusing. He lived in a pleasant country house at Hornby in Lancashire, the delight of his friends, idolized by his neighbour the Anglican rector, writing prose and verse—Latin verse—and putting together his admirable, not to say epoch-making, "History of England." Deliberately, the author toned down the colour and warmth of his expression, as though he believed that the story of human events might be treated with the cold precision of science. Lingard is, on the whole, almost as accurate as Gibbon; the English, like the Roman "History," stands fire to this day. It demolished Hume's silken tapestry, in which the facts are woven to suit the weaver's idea of a picture. But, as in the not dissimilar example of Dr. Thirlwall's "Greece," a style so transparent and unimpassioned has hindered the popular success of a work which remains in its own department a standard. However, the old anti-Catholic legends, in presence of a witness who simply told the truth, could not any more claim assent. Had Lingard chosen with Macaulay, whose inaccuracies he lived to denounce, or with Froude, who was inaccuracy personified, to adopt the manner of an historical romance, he would be known to millions. Pope Leo XII., it is said with some show of reason, created him Cardinal in petto. He was offered various positions of trust, and might have been a bishop. But he was another kind of man, disliking to exercise rule. He lived to be eighty; and the gallery of British worthies that omits Lingard will be wanting in a charming portrait.

What shall I remark touching the authors of my three volumes? The "Life of Lingard" is copious and easy, without much effort to compass literary strokes. Monsignor Ward writes always with the utmost clearness; gives abundance of detail; is fair all round; no one who has not dealt with such thorny subjects can imagine to what a perfection of impartial judgment he attains. History at large requires to be composed from materials in this way brought together. And the Catholic Revival is a page that ought not to be passed over unread.

New Books.

LOGIC OLD AND NEW.*

There could hardly be a stronger contrast than that between the authors of two books on logic that have just appeared. Professor Adamson was steeped in the lore of logic and scholastic learning. At the time of his death, in fact, he was busy with a "History of Scholasticism." Dr. Mercier comes to his subject with no special training. In one of his footnotes he calls himself "a mere amateur," and on his penultimate page tells us "I pretend to no scholarship in Greek, to no scholastic learning." The qualifications that he claims "are ordinary common-sense, and a plentiful lack of reverence for authority in general, and for Greek philosophy in particular." Yet both books are excellent, each in its own way.

Professor Sorley has had the happy idea of republishing in book form the article on "Logic," contributed by Adamson to the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It does not appear in the eleventh edition, and would thus have been lost as a living force in the teaching of logic in this country. Since it consists of a critical survey of the history of logical theory, and since there is no other book that deals with the subject from this point of view, the volume will be welcomed by all those who are concerned with the teaching of the subject. The title selected by Professor Sorley, "A Short History of Logic," accurately enough describes the book, though it contains also four important review articles: "Category," "Lotze's Logic," "Lotze's Metaphysic," "Bradley's Logic." These occupy 92 out of the whole 262 pages, but cannot be regarded as outside the scope of the work. They are really essential to a proper understanding of the later developments of logic, and show their learned author at his best.

Passing from the sympathetic treatment of the old logic and its modern developments as found in Adamson, we experience all the shock of a cold douche in the pages of Dr. Mercier. His condemnation leaves nothing to the imagination. "From traditional logic I differ in every principle and in every detail." Modern logic he confesses he does not understand. "I was prepared to welcome modern logic with open arms; but I soon found reason to despise it; for its exponents are either incapable of expressing themselves intelligibly, or they deliberately seek to impart to their writings a spurious air of profundity by the constant use of expressions that are unintelligible." In dealing with the laws of thought he quotes a passage from Bosanquet that it must be confessed has formed a stumbling block to many a student. But though unintelligible to a student it is not beyond the range of a sympathetic reader endowed with Dr. Mercier's powers. But the trouble is that he is not sympathetic. His temperament and training appear to be quite opposed to all the metaphysical subtleties that are so attractive to minds like Adamson's. It is not that Dr. Mercier is afraid of analysis, even minute analysis. The scheme that he suggests as a substitute for the traditional logic is at least as complicated as that which it seeks to supplant. In fact he suggests that even in the matter of "flat-traps to catch the unwary," the new logic may be able to do as well as the old. In his attack Dr. Mercier says all the things that intelligent University students have been in the habit of saying in private about the traditional logic, only he says them better, and what is more he follows up his destructive criticism with constructive work. He maintains that where traditional logic goes wrong is in confounding the argumentum ex postulato with the argumentum in materia, and in failing to refer to the purpose of the argument. His scheme is to pass from the logic based on mere consistency to a logic based upon experience. He seeks to pass from the narrow round of deducing formal consequences from given premises, to the wider field of hunting for premises in order to reach empirical truth. So far from rejecting modal propositions as formal logic does, he regards them as the only kind worth considering. For mere inclusion or exclusion he substitutes relation, and thus replaces the copula by a ratio. His proposition is thus made up of the subject term, the object term and the ratio. A problem arises wherever any one of these three is lacking in a proposition. He has no place for the syllogism in his system, which is hardly surprising when he is able to adduce an example of sound reasoning that breaks every rule of the syllogism except one. Dr. Mercier's process of reaching truth he calls mediate induction. It consists in finding by an examination of our experience a general statement under which a given incomplete proposition may be legitimately placed, so that term for term the two may correspond. If the two agree in all the points material to the argument we are entitled to conclude that the missing term in the given incomplete proposition may be supplied from the homologous term in the general statement. In the process of mediate induction there are three elements: the general proposition under which the incomplete proposition is to be assimilated, this is the premiss; the incomplete proposition, this is the datum; the consequent inference, this is the conclusion. Dr. Mercier is very sensitive to any hint that this triple arrangement suggests the syllogism, and it must be admitted that he makes good the distinction on which he lays so much stress.

Justice cannot be done to such an important book in the space here available. The Canons of Inference, for example, would repay very careful analysis, especially in view of the author's claim that they cover all possible cases of fallacy. This and the other constructive sections of the book probably form the best of Dr. Mercier's contribution, though the general reader will probably find the destructive sections more entertaining, especially if he has ever been under examination in logic. A serious defect in the book is the lack of an index. This makes itself all the more felt since the author has a tendency to repetition that makes it difficult to refer back to a passage one has read. No complaint is made of the recurrent use of the same illustration in different connections; this is often really a merit. But some of the destructive parts recur more frequently than the needs of exposition justify. There is some confusion in the numbering of the Canons of Inference on page 263.

The book is thoroughly readable, eminently clear, and vigorously stimulating. The illustrations are specially worthy of praise, as they have the crowning merit of illustrations—they illustrate. The book leaves a curious impression on the mind, made up mainly of wonder whether we really have reached a turning point in the history of logic. We who have spent our lives under the thrall of the orthodox system are probably not the most impartial judges. It is to those who follow that Dr. Mercier's brilliant polemic will make its most hopeful appeal.

JOHN ADAMS.

JOHN OPIE.*

Spite of the fulness—the over-fulness perhaps—of the author's research, the text of this volume does not stir our imaginations respecting John Opie or even help us to accept him as a particularly remarkable personage. Happily, however, the book has fifty-one illustrations from photographs of Opie's works, and these are impressive enough.

John Opie was the son of a Cornish carpenter, and born in May, 1761. His early years were spent in his native village of Mithian, near Truro, where—so great was his

* "A Short History of Logic." By Robert Adamson. 5s. net. (William Blackwood & Sons.)—"A New Logic." By Charles Mercier. 10s. net. (William Heinemann.)

* "John Opie and His Circle." By Ada Earland. 21s. net. (Hutchinson.)

father's opposition to his passion for drawing—"the boy was good for naught, could never make a wheelbarrow, was always gazing upon cats and staring folks in the vace"—he might have remained for the rest of his days had it not been for the opportune appearance in his life of a certain Dr. John Wolcot of Truro who provided the boy with brushes and paints and gave him lessons in using them. With Wolcot's appearance, the reader first touches the value and interest of the book. It is not remarkable in imaginative or literary quality, but it provides us with fresh detail of that eighteenth-century life removed by so much more than mere time from our own—that life in which, because every aristocrat was surrounded by his bevy of protégés, lesser men such as Wolcot were always on the look out for talent, or even for oddity, by which to bring themselves on to the stage of Society. Later, when Opie was established in London, and fashionable ladies had begun to crowd to his studio, someone suggested to Wolcot that his protégé should pay more attention to his appearance—"No," replied Wolcot, "No, you may depend on it in this wonder-gaping town, that all curiosity would cease if his hair were dressed and he looked like any other man; I shall keep him in this state for the next two years at least."

Wolcot's methods secured the end he desired. Very soon after Opie's arrival in London his lodgings, in Orange Court, became one of the haunts of the fashionable world. Coaches and sedan chairs crowded the narrow street, bringing the young Cornishman such visitors as the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, Horace Walpole and his Misses Bery, Dr. Johnson's "little dunce" Miss Moncton, Mrs. Vesey, and Mrs. Montague "just removed to her fine new house at the corner of Portman Square built by Adams and decorated by Cipriani and Angelica Kauffmann." He was received by George III. and Queen Charlotte and commissioned to paint a portrait of Mrs. Delany for the King. This painting hangs now at Hampton Court, but Opie's more beautiful treatment of the same sitter, in the emblematic frame for it designed by Horace Walpole, was bequeathed to our National Portrait Gallery in 1896 and is among the most beautiful of all his works.

It was a London with small likeness to our own through which the fashionable throng made its way to Orange Court. The streets were deep in mud, the kerbless footways were only wide enough for one (if the present-day Londoner wishes to experience the discomfort of this—even robbed of all its eighteenth century dangers—he has only to try the pavement in Chancery Lane, alongside Lincoln's Inn), foot-passengers were liable to be splashed with filth from the open drain in the road, from the windows above, and with oil from lamps hung outside houses and shops. "Highwaymen and footpads abounded and had the audacity to appear in town—little wonder that they should when the citizens had to rely for protection on watchmen apparently chosen for their decrepitude and senility. Then Lamb's Conduit fields were really green, and Islington and Hampstead pleasant country villages; once beyond Hyde Park the traveller looked to his pistols, and on Sunday evenings a bell was tolled at Kensington in order that visitors who were returning to the city might assemble and travel in company for mutual protection. In the same year that Opie came to London, Horace Walpole and Lady Browne, going in company to a soirée given by the Duchess of Montrose, near Twickenham Park, were robbed by a single highwayman. Lady Browne's concern after the thief's departure throws a light on the frequency of these robberies; 'I am in terror lest he should return,' she said, 'for I have given him a purse with only bad money that I carry on purpose.'

National Gallery.

From "John Opie and his Circle," by Ada Eland. (Hutchinson.)

John Opie.

Opie was elected Professor of Painting, in succession to Fuseli, at the Royal Academy in 1805, and two years later he delivered those now forgotten Lectures on Painting (last reprinted by Bohn in 1848) that were among the most arduous labours of his life. The volume before us gives interesting quotations from these—notably one on the methods and genius of Rembrandt. Opie died just before completing his forty-sixth year. He was buried, possibly more by his wife's determination than by public arrangement, in St. Paul's. In his early days Opie had prophesied to his sister that he should be buried there, and the funeral Mrs. Opie carried out was a rival to Reynolds's. The twenty-seven mourning coaches were followed by thirty carriages of noblemen and gentlemen; Benjamin West, Fuseli and Soane, Northcote and Beechey and Bourgeois, Flaxman and Henry Bone, Nolckens, Hoppner and Louthembourg and J. M. W. Turner were all in attendance as Academicians.

M. STURGE GRETTON.

"THE ROWLEY POEMS."*

The poetical works of Chatterton have been frequently reprinted, and would be a very desirable addition to the deservedly popular series of poets published at the Clarendon Press, but instead of the complete poems a portion only of the Rowley Poems has now, for some inscrutable reason, been issued: the incomplete collection made by Tyrwhitt having been selected for reprinting. This appears scarcely fair to Chatterton, and somewhat misleading for the public. Tyrwhitt derived nearly all the pieces he was able to obtain from George Catcott, in whose handwriting they were, and these, it is well known, had been greatly revised and altered from the original MSS. received from Chatterton. Catcott evidently manipulated Chatterton's "Rowleys" with the idea of giving them what he deemed a more antique appearance; he doubled the "ms" and added a final "e" to the words, just as Scott and Percy did with their modern antiques. A fair example of the way Catcott's versions of the poems differed from other versions is shown by "The Execution of Sir Charles Bawdin," miscalled in the Tyrwhitt editions "Bristowe Tragedie," in the very first four-line stanza of which poem, as given by Tyrwhitt, there are ten discrepancies from the first edition published in 1772. Such differences invalidate the text of the whole volume. If the "Rowley" poems are not to be given in a modernised form, they should not be published until every available MS. and all authoritative sources of comparison have been collated, so as to furnish a faithful copy of what their author did write. The only possible reason, nowadays, for reprinting these compositions in their pseudo-antique orthography, is to show how differently Chatterton worked from the writers of the time he imputed them to, and, of course, this reason is nullified when they are issued with Catcott's and other persons' emendations. Naturally, to merely reprint from Tyrwhitt's, or any other obsolete edition, saves a great amount of labour, but it is not the right way to deal with these poems.

* "The Rowley Poems." By Thomas Chatterton. Edited by Maurice Hare. 5s. net. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

The chief features of the Rowley poems, features which not only conclusively prove their modernity, but display their author's genius, are the diversity and technical skill of their metrical forms. Warton, a poet and a capable critic of poetry, thoroughly demonstrated that Chatterton's artistic power, as displayed in his acknowledged poems, was equal to producing the Rowley works. Mr. Hare has little to say on the technique of these poems, beyond a quotation from Mr. Watts-Dunton's splendid essay on the subject, but goes out of his way to assert that in the modern or acknowledged poems by Chatterton "his imagination failed," and that "no one who has any appreciation of Rowley's poems will consider that the 'African Eclogues' are, for a moment, comparable with them." And yet these acknowledged pieces have received unstinted praise from poets, from Warton to Wordsworth, from Rossetti and from other authorities. Professor Skeat but voices the opinion of many predecessors by saying of the acknowledged poems: "We find in them many lines which are quite on a level with the Rowley standard. Malone was quite correct in saying that, had the African poems been written in the Rowleian dialect, and Rowley's 'Eclogues' in modern English, no critic could possibly have put a difference between Chatterton and Rowley."

In following his eighteenth-century predecessors by terming Chatterton a "forger," Mr. Hare does not manifest a just appreciation of the young poet. The real forgers were those men who manipulated and disfigured the Rowley poems. Chatterton's offence, if any, was passing his own works off under a pseudonym, as many an author has done. Who would think of accusing Mrs. Browning of forgery for publishing her own works as "Sonnets from the Portuguese"?

The biographical "Introduction" calls for little notice. It has been compiled from writers who have more or less unsuspectingly accepted as facts the fabrications ascribed to a "Mrs. Edkins" by "John Dix" in his book of 1837. It may be said of the poet, as presented to us by Mr. Hare, as Callet said of de Vigny's drama, he "a écrit un roman et non une biographie. Ce Chatterton n'a rien de commun, excepté le nom, avec le poète de Bristol."

JOHN H. INGRAM.

LATER LETTERS OF DR. MARCUS DODS.*

The first volume of Dr. Dods's correspondence covered the early period of his life, when he was still a probationer of the Church. The middle period of twenty-five years, spent in Renfield Church, Glasgow, has yielded no letters which have been judged worth preservation. What this volume contains is a selection from his correspondence from 1895 to 1909, when his health was failing. Perhaps it is owing to this physical weakness and to his sense of loss after his wife's death in 1901, that the lights are low in some of these letters. To one correspondent he writes: "Prayer in the sense of asking for things has not been in my case a proved force. The things I have chiefly prayed for all my life I have not got. Communion with the highest and consideration of Christ are, of course, efficacious to some extent; but I pray now not because my own experience gives me any encouragement, but only because of Christ's example and command." To another he confesses: "Across the whole of my life I see Failure written—failure in all the best things, failure especially in the one clear fight I have always recognised I had to gird myself to. My own failure I can explain; I have not striven hard enough or long enough. Resolute earnestness, that must conquer, has been spasmodic." The editor has naturally felt that such frank utterances may be misinterpreted, and this is a feeling which will be shared by some of those who knew Dr. Dods' candid simplicity and essential loyalty to the faith. There are, doubtless, other indications in the letters—indications of a more habitual and hopeful temper—but they are scarcely sufficient to alter the impression which such isolated expressions as those we have quoted may leave upon the minds of people who did not know the living context of the writer's character.

However, the letters show other elements of that large, generous character—his human delight in his dog, in football and cricket, in younger men, and in literature. Dr. Dods was a bookman. He could probably have read, or at any rate reviewed, Sir Theodore Martin's "Life of the Prince Consort." Nothing came amiss to him in the way of literature, and his letters show here and there what his judgments were. They were catholic enough. He could enjoy the stories of the Baroness Orczy, and he had the saving enthusiasm for Gibbon which is one article of the bookman's Nicene Creed. It is not so easy to understand his attitude to some other books. "Tolstoi's 'War and Peace,' for example, I have again and again tried to plough through, but have failed. It does not lay hold of me and carry me on." That is a hard saying. Thackeray's "English Humorists" he describes somewhere as "the most educating book I know, a book you can read 500 times in fair weather and foul, sickness and health, by day and by night, on Sundays and Saturdays." But one of the most interesting allusions is the incidental remark, made in a letter written from the house of an American professor: "When I was sitting a little ago in the drawing-room (40 feet by 25) the cook came in to change her volume of Sir Walter's novels."

We are sorry to learn that no biographical sketch of Dr. Dods is to appear. These two volumes of letters are all that we are to get. They will mean more to those who knew him than to outsiders, but even the former will probably feel that the impression they leave requires to be supplemented from their memories and his published writings.

JAMES MOFFATT.

A WOMAN WHO EXPECTED THE IMPOSSIBLE.†

Mrs. Arthur Henniker has probably more interesting and distinguished associations with literature than almost any other woman now writing. The daughter of

* "Later Letters of Marcus Dods, D.D." Selected and Edited by his son, Marcus Dods, M.A., London. Price 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

† "Second Fiddle." By the Hon. Mrs. Arthur Henniker. 6s. (Evelleigh Nash.)

Photo by J. & N. Australia. Portrait Studio, Westminster.

The Hon. Mrs. Arthur Henniker.

Richard Lord Houghton—a name which is inseparably connected with all that is memorable in Victorian literature, the sister of an accomplished poet (poetry and letters have lost if the nation at large has gained by the Marquis of Crewe's absorption in affairs of State), Mrs. Henniker is herself the author of seven volumes of imaginative literature as well as of a four act play.

But were she the most unknown and nameless of writers sending out from obscurity a novel to challenge the verdict of the critics, and were that novel Second Fiddle there could never be a moment's doubt about its reception at the hands of every one competent to judge.

There are several standpoints from which to view it. It is clearly the work of one who knows and loves nature, flowers, birds and animals but most of all as will be seen later who loves her fellow women and fellow men. There are several exquisite descriptions of scenery which I must resist the temptation to quote and there is a dog, whom (I refuse to write which) one parts from (so deftly and lovingly is he drawn) as from a trusted comrade and friend.

Or it can be viewed as a novel of brilliant epigrams ('It is so easy to forgive one's enemies—says one of the characters, 'the difficult thing is to forgive one's friends.') which, were there space to quote at length would make even a review—dullest and least original of all the many forms of human expression—not only endurable but wise and witty reading. As space forbids extensive quotation let me, at least, draw the attention of my own victims to what is said of Democracy on pages 250 and 251, of the Clergy, on page 101, and of Soldiering, throughout the book. As the widow of a distinguished soldier, mentioned three times in despatches for his gallantry in South Africa, who was looked upon, by the nation, as one of our finest fighting assets in the event of war, Mrs. Henniker has had special opportunities of seeing and studying military life at first hand. That she has made good use of her opportunities "Second Fiddle" shows. Here, for instance, in a few lines, she explains the dislike with which many great soldiers regard the lionising of themselves by the populace.

"To the General himself his fame counted for very little. Perhaps because there were so few people left now in the world to care about it. A lonely success is often the end of a strenuous life, and he who has won it, is surprised at least when he realises his indifference. Abingdon had been always glad to know that men in his own and loved profession held him in esteem but the applause of the man in the street when it rang at last in his ears counted for almost nothing."

Some years ago Mrs. Henniker collaborated with Mr. Thomas Hardy in a story entitled The Spectre of the Real. Of one of the characters Lord Parkhurst we were told that his chivalrous feelings towards women originated in the fact that he knew very little about them—and there was much speculation as to whether the passage were of Mrs. Henniker's or of Mr. Hardy's penning. I happen to know but keep my own counsel merely remarking that Mrs. Henniker's singular and fine loyalty to her own sex, and her admiration of noble womanhood are apparent in all she writes and never more so than in Second Fiddle.

God saw a woman in a sick room. He copied her, and made—an angel. Mrs. Henniker has seen a woman in a sick room in the presence of death and, incongruous as the contrast may seem in the whirl of fashionable life, and she has drawn for us a woman—a real woman, a live woman almost an ordinary woman—who is more lovable, more worshipful, and more wonderful, than any angel. Were it only for the relentless (I say relentless) for the reason that the woman is shown with all her defects, physical, intellectual, and temperamental) and loving insight with which the character of Elizabeth Grantham is drawn Second Fiddle would be a remarkable novel. But it is a remarkable and unusual novel for other reasons. It is for instance a story picturing, and picturing truthfully the fashionable life which has been written about, preached about, gossiped about, and gasped about in the books, sermons, and plays that profess to portray what are called 'The Sins of Society.'

Shall I be believed when I say that, truthful picture as it is of the follies and infidelities as well as of the faithful loves and fine loyalties of the so called "fashionable" world it is a book which every one will be the better for reading? It is a book moreover which makes one feel singularly drawn towards the author. She tells her story simply and directly with scarcely a digression or an aside made on her own part. So admirable is her art so exquisite her sense of reticence and restraint that a critic would find it difficult to point to a passage which seemed to indicate the author's standpoint on the questions with which the book deals. Yet by some innate purity of her own some quality of sterling sincerity in herself, she compels her readers into the high company of those who hold fast by honour, truth, loyalty, righteousness and, most of all by tender pitifulness and charity for human folly, human weakness and human frailty. That it is a sad book cannot be denied. 'Which of us has really won his heart's desire since those days?' asks one of her characters near the book's close and Heart's Desire might fitly have been its chosen title. Yet, sad as is her story for even those who attained their heart's desire realise at the last the vanity of all earthly things, at the close there is a noble note of hope. Mrs. Henniker is no pessimist. She realises to the full the greyness, the insignificance, and what Mr. Henry James calls "the long humiliation of life" but to her, even in their sinning and stumblings, there is some redeeming quality, if, indeed, not some actually lovable quality, in men and women, and in their efforts, even in their unsuccessful efforts towards better things, she finds something that is heroic, if not divine. Hence her optimism, hence her hope.

I have already suggested an alternative title for the novel. Two others, both from the author's text, occur to me, one which strikes a pathetic note, "The Woman who expected the Impossible", the other sounding a note of grim irony "The Man who had had a Good Time."

Yet another title might be "The Triumph of Failure." Her heroine, Elizabeth, fails to fill the place she had hoped in the life of the uncle she loved. Worse, chance makes her, almost in girlhood, aware that that place is partly filled by a woman, concerning whose relations with him the girl, dimly, but with staggering and poignant pain, realises that all is not right. Yet with her respect for her uncle thus assailed, her ideals shattered, and the shock to her innocence notwithstanding,—by the faithfulness, forbearance and forgiveness, which are, alas! so rare even in good women, she triumphs where most would have failed, and in the face of apparent defeat. Later on in womanhood these same capabilities for faithfulness, forbearance and forgiveness stand her and others equally in good stead. In an exquisite love-scene, we see her plight her troth to the man she loves, the man who loves her in return. He, too, though faithful in heart, and to the end, fails her, at least in bodily fidelity. Yet when the woman who has striven to win him from her, is face to face with terrible sorrow, it is the woman she has wronged who, forgetting everything except their common womanhood, hurries to sustain and to comfort the other in her despair.

"In some supreme moments of overmastering anguish," says Mrs. Henniker, "moments that purify desire and exalt earthly passion, there is no longer any divorce between the saint and the sinner. They draw near to one another with a wonder of recognition. . . . You? You feel this very same pain, this same ache of despair and loneliness? And then with bowed heads they remember that they are only children of one great human family that suffers and weeps."

There is a—shall we say violin obligato?—accompaniment of "the still, sad music of humanity," throughout the whole of the story. The noble vox humana note which Mrs. Henniker thus nobly touches, when describing the woman-heart of her heroine going out in Christlike sympathy and sorrow to a sinning but suffering sister, makes this portion of the book deepen into the very organ-music of life.

I have said nothing of the uncanny, and but for the breadth of her charity, the almost cruel insight and skill with which she lays bare the workings of the mind of George Grantham. I have not even spoken of her merciless yet pitiful miniature of the soul of Clare Cresswell. Nor have I introduced the reader to the many pleasant people (thank Heaven! her pleasant people far outnumber her unpleasant) who come and go in her pages—all, especially the lovable Irish priest, limned in to the life. A reviewer, this reviewer at least, is not a Master of the Ceremonies. He is but a humble Commissionaire, set at the door of the House of Literature, to point callers their way, and to indicate, briefly, what and whom they will find in any particular room. And so he stands very respectfully at salute to the author and to the reader, and, in reply to the latter's inquiries, he says: "Novels, Sir? Yes, you can't do better than knock at the door marked 'Mr. Eveleigh Nash,' and ask for 'Second Fiddle,' by Mrs. Arthur Henniker."

COULSON KERNAHAN.

WILLIAM MORRIS.*

This third instalment of the "Collected Works of William Morris" contains "Love is Enough" and "Poems by the Way," "Three Northern Love Stories" and "Beowulf," "The Æneids of Virgil" and "Sigurd the Volsung." The editorial and illustrative matter, as before, is of some length and interest. Miss May Morris writes very fully about her father's labours at each book and in other fields during the same period, and she prints a number of letters. The "elusive threads" of her notes will probably be read more than any other parts of the twenty-four volumes of this monument. They show very graphically the variety and the intermingling of Morris's occupations, his dyeing, his illuminating, his public meetings against the unspeakable Turk, his letters against the unspeakable Sir Gilbert Scott, and then in August a letter to his wife saying that he is coming down to Kelmscott:

"Please tell May to have as many worms ready for me: proper brandlings I must have; they are striped and don't smell nice—this is their sign. I have got everything you want, I think: I hope the bonnet will come to hand in moderate preservation."

* "The Collected Works of William Morris." Vols. 9-12. With Introductions by his daughter, May Morris. 24 Vols. £12 12s. Sold in sets only. (Longmans.)

And a reminder again:

"Don't forget the worms."

This was in 1877. Miss Morris adds that she also understood gentles, and remembers her pride in not refusing "to manipulate this interesting bait when desired by the fisherman," her father. The note comes from the editorial pages to "Sigurd," which was begun in 1875. "Students," says Miss Morris, "are fortunate that the British Museum has in safe keeping some important manuscripts of this epic . . . the central work of my father's life, his last long and important poem." She lets us "skim" with her through some of the MS. note books, quoting many lines from a cancelled passage of the scene between Brynhild and Sigurd after her discovery of the betrayal. But Morris's work is so long-drawn-out and subdued that a few score of lines more or less will not cause much beating of hearts.

Will there ever come a time when the language of "Sigurd" will not seem a dead one? Will men ever read, without translating, phrases like "the blossomed garth of rhyme," "the rippling harp-gold," "men trowed his every word"? Will they ever read straight on, with pleasure in the thought, the rhyme:

"There was a dwelling of Kings ere the world was waxen old;
Dukes were the doot-wards there, and the roofs were thatched with gold;

Earls were the wrights that wrought it, and silver nailed its doors;

Earls' wives were its weaving-women: queens' daughters
strewed its floors;

And the masters of its song-craft were the mightiest men that cast

The sails of the storm of battle adown the bickering blast.
There dwelt men merry-hearted, and in hope exceeding great
Met the good days and the evil as they went the way of fate
There the Gods were unforgotten; yea, whiles they walked with men,

Though e'en in that world's beginning rose a murmur now and again

Of the midward time and the fading and the last of the latter days,

And the entering in of the terror, and the death of the People's Praise."

In the whole poem much manly and delicate feeling is embedded and a conception which might have been that of a great modern poem as well as an ancient one, but it has to be disembedded. The writing is archaism and euphemism imperfectly vitalised, whether by the poet's easy rapid writing or not it is hard to say. Morris wrote his two or three hundred lines and thought nothing of it. But those long lines have the same effect on the mind as on the eye. They dangle and sprawl.

"The Æneids" and "Beowulf" provide still sadder tasks for a man who admires Morris and cares for poetry.

After his youth Morris never found any one occupation at which he fully expressed himself. He is to be found in the whole of his work, in the combination that is unique, but not in any one part of it. Here he is strong, there he is violent, here again he is loose-knit, or there he is delicate. He was always expressing some imitative aspiration. He liked old things, and he set about living or writing like men in the days that he admired. He was interested in what a thing had been, not in what it had become or in what it was to be. He translated "Beowulf." He wrote stories that are enough like old Northern stories to be intolerable by comparison. He translated what he called "The Æneids" like a man who had never learnt to speak, but only to write. He wrote an epic in a year or so as good as any man could write in the time, and that also is a translation out of English into an unknown tongue. Prose and verse, except in his letters, is too often diluted and derived, so that the life represented in them has lost savour and motion. Mr. Noyes meant the same thing when he spoke of Morris's poetry having the "low values" of tapestry. He seemed to think that there was need or precedent for such poetry: but there can be no room for work which does not find or create a world in which it and the reader can live. That Morris had the power to do work needing no translation he showed, even when his youth was well past, in some of the "Poems by the Way," "The Message of the March Wind" being the finest. Reading these again and looking at the man's portrait in 1880, reproduced here, makes it more than ever difficult to read what "dropped off the end of his pen" so easily. They are all here, naked to the world on a beautiful page, introduced as filially as possible, with reproductions of drawings, decorations, illuminations and manuscript by Morris, and details of composition and bibliography to satisfy students and any others needing them.

EDWARD THOMAS.

TENNYSON AND HIS FRIENDS.*

Students and lovers of Tennyson owe thanks to Lord Tennyson for this compilation. The quantity of literature that has grown up round and about the greatest of the Poets Laureate is vast already, and many people will share our opinion that better service, or service more in accordance with his wishes, could hardly have been done than has been done by Lord Tennyson in writing the definitive biography of his father, in publishing the annotated edition of his poems, and now in collecting such memories of his father, records of his friends, and criticisms of his work as serve to supplement the memoir and add useful touches to the portrait there contained. For the three together render superfluous the machine-made productions of all British Museum book-makers, and supplemented only, perhaps, by Stopford Brooke's critical analysis tell the world all it has any need to know about the paramount English poet of the Victorian age. It may be hoped reasonably that literary body-snatchers will respect this one spot in Westminster Abbey. Nothing remains to be discovered that any one has right to know, and of all men's, Alfred Tennyson's memory is most entitled to respect.

Partly, then, for the protective value it may be expected to have against the impertinences of literary ghouls, a compilation of this kind, made by a competent authority jealous of the reputation of him on whose character he is throwing fresh light, deserves a welcome. In still larger measure this one can be praised for the quality of the material of which it is composed. The notes and essays here contained are of unequal merit, but there are only one or two with which we think the editor might have dispensed. Of the others, there are several which we are glad to have reproduced from the periodicals in which they first appeared—notably, the late Sir Alfred Lyall's review of "Tennyson: a Memoir," originally contributed to The Edinburgh Review—and several written ad hoc which make substantial and valuable addition to our knowledge of their subjects. We may single out for special mention Dr. Warren's paper on FitzGerald and Carlyle, Mr. Aldis Wright's admirable article on James Spedding—an achievement in miniature biography—and the, unhappily, incomplete paper by Henry Graham Dakyns on Tennyson's appreciation of the great classical authors of the past. But the book, as a whole, serves to dispel something of the formidableness of the man as he presented himself to the world, and, in the words of Mr. Dakyns Δακυνδίων or "Little Dakyns," as he proudly records the poet called him once—brings out his humanity and his eternal youthfulness. "I can still feel his hand-grip, soft at once and large and strong, as he stood there peering down on the relatively small mortal before him—so sane, and warm, and trustful." Many people can understand that Tennyson inspired awe in those who came into his presence for the first time; fewer know how speedily he won their heart. It is only fair to him that this fact should become common knowledge.

His poetry is, of course, a very full expression of himself, and there is no necessity to speak here of his wide sympathy, the catholicity of his mind, or his width of view. But it is interesting to read that a man like Sir Charles

* "Tennyson and His Friends." Edited by Hallam, Lord Tennyson. 10s. net. (Macmillan.)

Stanford was astonished by Tennyson's rare faculty for recognising subtle musical characterisation and very nice appreciation of the fitness of music to its subject; that a scientist like Sir Oliver Lodge perceived how Tennyson moved in the atmosphere of science, not as an alien, but as an understanding and sympathetic friend; and that Sir Norman Lockyer finds the most accurate science blended with the truest poetry in all Tennyson's references to natural phenomena. Catholicity of mind is all very well, but without fullness of knowledge often results in mere versatility; the great interest of this volume is the testamur it furnishes from men eminent in almost every department of intellectual activity to Tennyson's amazing fullness of knowledge of their several subjects.

Of anecdotes and personalia, this volume has enough to ensure its acceptance by a large and general reading public. It is to be hoped that it will have the effect of correcting some of the common misapprehensions of both Tennyson and FitzGerald. But chiefly it is a book for the student and lover of Tennyson, and every one of these will desire to possess it. And one could wish that some of these would help to popularise the view of life which results in some of the things which Jowett notes as characteristics of Tennyson. It would do a good deal to mitigate the unpleasantness of general intercourse in the very mixed society of the present age. Friendship of the kind commemorated here must always be rare, because a group of men such as Tennyson and his friends cannot reasonably be looked for more than once in a century, perhaps not so often. The seventeenth century had its splendid company, and so had the eighteenth. If the twentieth is to add its "period" to the history of English literature, the men must be in the making now. If they are already old enough to read they might profitably assimilate the substance of this book and act upon the rules of life that are implicit in it. At least it will help them to appreciate the responsibility that is theirs for the splendid heritage of literature which these men so greatly enriched.

CRANSTOWN METCALFE.

BEAUMARCHAIS AND LAFAYETTE.*

The late Mr. James Perkins began the book that has now been issued under the care of his widow, by asking whether the American colonies would have succeeded in their struggle for independence if they had not received aid in men and money from France. Towards the close of the volume he answers the question by stating that "apparently it would have been impossible to bring the war to a successful termination if France had not interfered," on behalf of the new republic. Had the colonists been left to their own resources, it is possible that the central government would have been supported with greater loyalty and firmness; but it is certain that America owes France a heavy debt of gratitude for help given in the hour of need, and that no American can look back on the way in which men like Beaumarchais were treated without some feeling of regret and even shame.

Throughout the war and in the negotiations at its close, France gave an example of disinterestedness rare in the history of nations. The treaty of alliance and commerce, signed at Paris on February 6th, 1778, was, in M. Jusserand's words, "a treaty for which there had been no precedent in history, and of which there has been no imitation since." The "United States of North America," was a Government independent only in its own estimation. France pledged herself not to lay down her arms until American independence was achieved; to claim nothing for her help; to reserve nothing for herself on a continent two-thirds of which she had formerly owned; and to ask no commercial advantages which were not open to any other nation, even England, when it chose. It is small wonder that Europe was surprised at such a convention. The Spanish Prime Minister said that France was acting like Don Quixote. Americans like Adams and Jay were sceptical. That there were some secret clauses in the understanding was a common belief, and even Washington suspected that there was in the agreement something "more than the disinterested zeal of allies." Yet all these forebodings were groundless. There were no secret clauses, and France honourably kept her word.

* "France in the American Revolution." By James Breck Perkins. 8s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

But years before the treaty, the United States had reason to be grateful to France. Inspired by the philosophers who were busy predicting a new era of happiness, and urged also by a love of adventure, Frenchmen of all classes offered their services to the rebels. Deane, one of the American representatives in Paris, wrote that he was "well-nigh harassed to death with applications of officers to go out to America." It is true that all these volunteers were not in every way desirable—some, such as de Broglie and du Coudray, were a source of weakness rather than strength—but many of them served the republic with zeal and devotion, and at least two can claim a place little inferior to that of the Americans themselves—Lafayette and Beaumarchais.

Lafayette's interest in the American colonies was first aroused by the Duke of Gloucester, who, being in disgrace with his brother, George III., entertained the guests of the Marshal de Broglie by a humorous account of the scene with the tea-chests in Boston Harbour. Lafayette, then a lad of nineteen, listened to the Duke's conversation, heard that the rebels were in need of recruits, and after dinner, crossed the room to the Duke, and said: "I will join the Americans—I will help them fight for freedom! Tell me how to set about it." This youthful enthusiasm was combined with a coldness of manner that made people think him dull, and a steadfastness of purpose that sometimes degenerated into obstinacy. But his resolution to help the Americans never wavered. He resisted the efforts of his relatives and of the Government to divert his purpose, and after surmounting many obstacles—among them a lettre de cachet forbidding his departure—landed in South Carolina and offered his services to the cause of freedom. He made the journey through Charleston to Philadelphia, was coldly received by Congress, but stated that he only asked two favours, to serve at his own expense and to begin his service as a volunteer. He succeeded in convincing Congress that he was no mere adventurer, and was soon given the rank of Major-General. His services, says Mr. Perkins, were "of inestimable value to the American cause; not only did he prove himself a good officer and an exceedingly discreet adviser, but he was a connecting link between the Americans and the French Government; the influence of his counsels, the enthusiasm enacted by his conduct, were of considerable weight in bringing the French authorities to espouse openly the American cause." Nor was the prestige of his name without its effect. The American as well as the French Revolution suffered nothing by the fact that it found adherents among the aristocracy, and that one of its most zealous supporters happened to be a marquis.

While Lafayette's name is more familiar to the American people than that of any other foreign actor in the Revolution, the services rendered by Beaumarchais were scarcely less valuable. The creator of "Figaro," while on a mission to London, heard from Wilkes and others of the American struggle, and at once took up the cause with his usual ardour and enthusiasm. He made representations to the French Government, strongly urging active participation, but Louis XVI. and his ministers did not care to risk a war with England. Beaumarchais got over the difficulty by establishing an imaginary Spanish firm called Roderigue Hortalez and Company, whose ostensible object was to trade with America, but who really formed the channel through which French aid was sent to the insurgents. By this means advances to the amount of three million livres were promptly sent across the Atlantic, Beaumarchais hoping that cargoes of tobacco would be returned in exchange, and that in this way the Americans might be provided with the warlike provisions they needed. Beaumarchais supplemented the grant of the French Government by most of his own fortune, and Mr. Perkins is convinced that, had it not been for his indefatigable zeal, the much-needed powder, guns, and clothing would never have reached the American army. But though the Americans were willing to accept these provisions, they showed little disposition to pay, and though Hortalez and Company kept on despatching ships, little was returned in exchange. As a consequence Beaumarchais soon found himself in financial difficulties. In vain he wrote that he had exhausted his money and credit. The ships laden with tobacco never appeared, and though a formal contract was drawn up by Congress, the accounts remained unliquidated. In 1779 Hay communicated to Beaumarchais the formal thanks of Congress for his efforts on behalf of the Colonies, but still no remittances were sent. For years Beaumarchais asked for justice, and for years his demands were answered by silence or flimsy excuses. It was not until 1835 that the heirs of Beaumarchais were told that in exchange for a receipt in full they would be given one-fourth of the sum which Alexander Hamilton had decided should be paid. "It was," says Mr. Perkins, "a settlement of twenty-five cents on the dollar, after a delay of half a century, made by a rich and prosperous nation, with the heirs of a man who had furnished our ancestors with assistance when our national existence was in doubt, who had lost much by the perils of war, and had risked losing all if we had failed to achieve our independence."

A. W. EVANS.

MISS MEYNELL'S NOVEL.*

When Miss Meynell's first and anonymous novel, "Martha Vine," was published, critics were at pains to discover influences. Whence had she derived her inspiration, style, force? She was seen, by this person or by that, to share qualities with Jane Austen, Charlotte Yonge, George Eliot, Meredith, Mr. Hardy—a heavy enough benediction for any newcomer to the cockpit of novelists. With "Cross-in-Hand Farm" before us we need have no concern about origins. Here is an individual effort of work which proves that however much she may have studied in the past—and evidently that has been thoroughly, wisely and well—Miss Meynell has a style and inspiration of her own, with a method of careful work which to some extent meets the definition of genius—as an infinite capacity for taking pains.

While "Cross-in-Hand Farm" is not entirely a character novel, it belongs unquestionably to the leisurely school of fiction. It tells a pretty story with sufficient effect; but the charm of the book rests chiefly in the atmosphere and in the characters. It has—we cannot help saying it—something of the delicate truthfulness, charm of detail, and capable simplicity, of Jane Austen's work. Miss Meynell talks of a table, a chair, a mark on the wall, inessentials though they be, in a way which makes them not so inessential after all, for as used by her they complete the reality, add to the atmosphere, of the picture. The manner in which she touches in these necessary inessentials shows how well she has trained her imagination and her pen. It is, indeed, a joy to read a book like this, if only as antidote to the rush of crude romances—composed of people who at best are merely stock types, and written in a style it is a compliment to call a style—that choke the libraries, and cause invisible crowsfeet to mark the minds of the reviewers. Miss Meynell has managed to be painstaking without becoming dull. Every thing and every person she comes to in the course of her narrative is described, with an artistic loving care, such as that wherewith Isaak Walton, in his compleat angling, impaled his frog. As to the characters, possibly the most difficult of them proves the most successful. Dorcas Liliot was, mentally, a proper wanton. That is really the word for it; though, owing to its general application, it is too harsh and cruel in this particular case. She was beautiful, clever enough, sufficiently well-off; very vain, and for ever longing to see herself in some picturesque emotional circumstance. She had a lover, Evan Davidstow, with whom she experimented. She could not let well alone. She must test and try him, test and try herself, for the sake of the emotions realised. What was it to be like when the loved one was away; and what, when she was far from the loved one? She played the chord of jealousy, of indifference, of mimic passion. No girl with a deep heart would make these experiments, of course; and Miss Meynell shows us plainly enough that Dorcas's nature was shallow as a tambourine. Of the world worldly, she could not be true mate to true man. That is plain. Contrasted with her moral wantonness was Jane Haffenden, a conventional figure, charming enough, and in real life lovable; but rather good girl than heroine. The weakness of the book is in the drawing of Davidstow. He is rather a lay-figure of a man; due, no doubt, to the part he was made to play. It was necessary to the tale that Dorcas should complete her series of experiments in emotion; therefore, he must be patient with her. Miss Meynell makes him so. His very patience, however, renders him somewhat lifeless and unmanly; for he soon found out the sort of girl Dorcas was; and realised that, intellectually, she was not merely no mate for him but actually untrue, while Jane loved him and he her with similar fervour. In those circumstances, it was his duty to cut the engagement, to be off with the old love and on with the true. He did not do so; and, even when the right ending came, was in half-a-mind not to meet the opportunity. In spite of Evan's mere plaster manliness—not on this occasion a great defect when the quality of the whole book is measured—"Cross-in-Hand Farm" is particularly strong in the skill and subtlety of the character-drawing. Even the folk of slight concern to the plot are easily visualised; and we would gladly have seen more of some of them, especially of Mrs. Tonkin and the Fewsters, village worthies, who even within their present limits are amusing.

* "Cross-in-Hand Farm." By Viola Meynell. With two illustrations by Charles Stabb. 6s. (Herbert & Daniel.)

Miss Meynell has now written two notable books. The future is at her feet. She will travel far. It needs no mantle of Elijah to justify that confident prophecy.

C. E. LAWRENCE.

Barbara Villiers, Countess of Castlemaine and Duchess of Cleveland.

From an engraving by W. Sherwin.
From "My Lady Castlemaine," by Philip W. Sergeant. (Hutchinson.)

LADY CASTLEMAINE.*

There is a wall in the National Portrait Gallery from the centre of which that famous king, Charles II., looks down with saturnine inscrutability. Near him shines the boozy countenance of Buckingham. All round crowd the beauties—Barbara Villiers, Madame Carwell (as John Bull called the French mistress), Nelly Gwyn, Buckingham's superb Shrewsbury, and the rest. Anthony Hamilton, seeking copy, watches the throng, while at the side, aloof, the delicate, intense face of another Anthony—the Earl of Shaftesbury—a face as inscrutable as the King's and as fair as his is ugly, watches also but with a different purpose. Those who would write of the history of the reign must catch the spirit of that wall. Otherwise, all their pains are of no avail. With the Castlemaine for the centre of the picture, to miss that spirit would be doubly to fail, for the Castlemaine was the age incarnate. A skilled hand in the portrayal of frail ladies, Mr. Sergeant, aided by Pepys and Hamilton and such graver recorders as Clarendon and Burnet and Sir John Reresby, has been by no means unsuccessful in his task.

It is rather curious that among the countless biographies of her kind which have been produced during the last few years, Barbara Villiers should have remained so long unrepresented. Materials are abundant. Her career was far from dull. Without having the significance of a Diane de Poitiers or a Madame de Pompadour, she made her mark on public affairs. Her inexhaustible voracity did not help Charles in his dealings with an economical House of Commons; and her hostility to France was a factor in the international situation. According to our present standards, therefore, she was well worth a biography. Short sketches (in volumes of Mixed Mistresses) there have been; and some forty years ago Mr. G. S. Steinman treated the matter with most scrupulous fulness. But since his book was issued privately, Mr. Sergeant may claim to be treading paths not unduly worn.

Nevertheless, the chapters dealing with Barbara's supremacy will bear the face of old friends to all who remember their Pepys and their "Gramont." Everyone knows the stories of her admission to the Queen's bed-chamber and of her rivalry with Frances Stewart, Duchess of Richmond. In this latter connection it may interest Mr. Sergeant to know that on St. Valentine's Day, 1662, the King "drew the Duchess of Richmond and my Lady Castle Maine drew him;" the Duchess being Miss Stewart's predecessor among Richmond's wives, and at that date a bride. But her early intrigue with the Earl of Chesterfield and her later adventures in England and France—not to mention the undercurrent which never ceased to flow even during the years of royal favour—are less familiar. They make amusing, if not particularly edifying reading. Like the joy of life itself, Barbara Villiers was "common and divine." Divine, Lely's loving brush has insisted a hundred times. Common, the record of her hundred loves proclaims her.

THE GRAND STYLE, A TROUBADOUR AND PROSPERO.†

A new edition has been called for of Mr. Holroyd's version of the "Life of Michael Angelo" by Condivi. The value of Mr. Holroyd's book is indeed unquestionable; but it is something more than a book merely for the student. It makes an appeal as literature; for Condivi's "Life of Michael Angelo" is not only true to life and human nature, as Mr. Holroyd claims, but is delightful in the charm and simplicity of its

* "My Lady Castlemaine." By Philip W. Sergeant, B.A. 16s. net. (Hutchinson.)

† 1—"Michael Angelo." By Charles Holroyd, Director of the National Gallery, with Translations of the Life of the Master by Condivi, and Dialogues from the Portuguese by Francisco D'Ollanda. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

narrative, and as full of interest as any story book. Condivi, who published his life of the master in 1553, lives still, as he said he wished to live, "as a faithful servant and disciple of Michael Angelo." His words seem to be echoed by Sir Joshua Reynolds in the famous "Last Discourse." "I feel a self-congratulation," said Sir Joshua, "in knowing myself capable of such sensations as Michael Angelo intended to excite. To kiss the hem of his garment, to catch the slightest of his perfections, would be glory and distinction enough for an ambitious man." In truth, when we come into the presence of the great master we must speak low. This is the creator of the Sistine Chapel. This is the poet of San Lorenzo whose sleeping statue dreams on for ever since those dark days when it was better to be but stone in Florence, best not to feel nor hear when dishonour and despair were there enthroned. So Michael Angelo interpreted the meaning of his statue of "Night" himself in his sonnet, "Wake me not. Speak in an undertone."

It is a far cry from the Tiber and the Arno to Glasgow to find an allegory on the banks of the Clyde. Yet when we consider what the "Grand Style" became to belated followers of Michael Angelo we shall find something we could aptly transpose to describe this tyranny, from among the good things Mr. Shaw Sparrow says in his book upon the art of John Lavery.²

He describes the decorative work painted by Mr. Lavery for the Banqueting Hall in the Municipal Buildings at Glasgow, where you see almost in a bird's eye view in perspective a great dockyard with a huge red funnelled steel-clad ship, and a grim squad of workmen in the foreground. As we look upon the ship and the human figures busy all around her in this picture, "Shipbuilding on the Clyde," we realise how big the "steel-clad" is, and how puny men seem in comparison with her enormous bulk; and the author says: "Man is becoming a new Gulliver in a new Brobdingnag, for he builds colossal mechanisms by which he is dwarfed and enslaved."

It seems we become subservient nowadays to some "metal despot driven by steam or electricity." But we have been always subservient to some kind of despotism, and Michael Angelo painting the Sistine Chapel created a Brobdingnagian kingdom wherein many a shipwrecked Gulliver found himself enslaved and dwarfed.

Let us quote from Mr. Holmes' new book which he modestly entitles "Notes on the Art of Rembrandt"³ It is a book to quote from, to read and to think about as a significant achievement in art criticism. A gigantic programme in art, says Mr. Holmes, was actually carried out by Michael Angelo, Raphael, and a few other very great artists of the Renaissance; and their successors were fired with ambition to follow in the same path:

"Art academies sprang up to carry students through an impossible curriculum, and generation after generation of painters attempted to absorb the vast mass of learning for which the Grand Style of painting called.

"Not one student in a thousand was made of strong enough stuff to endure so terrific an ordeal. A few, like Sir Joshua Reynolds, slipped aside into the simpler walks of portraiture, or landscape, or genre. The rest lost all such talent as they originally possessed, and became dull eclectic pedants, driving the next unlucky generation into the same interminable educational morass in which their own originality had sunk.

"The record of art history proves that almost every artist of the highest eminence has been in some sense a rebel against systems accepted in his time."

To return to the work of Mr. Lavery. It is to be regretted that Mr. Shaw Sparrow does not say something more about the Glasgow School, about George Henry, Mr. Hornel, and other masters of the modern day. Mr. Lavery has been so far a rebel that he has been rejected by the Royal Academy, and the whirligig of time has brought in this pleasant revenge that he is now an Associate of the august body. He is, of course, above all things, a portrait painter, and a painter of women's portraits who never allows grace and refinement to dwindle into what Mr. Shaw Sparrow terms "namby pamby."

"The Tate Gallery is profuse with sentimentalities," says Mr. Shaw Sparrow, and this is indeed a true saying. "The necessary thing is to combine sweetness with light and vigour," and in accomplishing this the artist has arrived at the happy ending his biographer tells of. Although the artist's personal career has been a gallant victory over conditions few men would care to encounter, his art has picked its way through all difficulties, happy and serene, and we are reminded of the old song, says Mr. Shaw Sparrow:

"Gaily the troubadour touched his guitar
As he came carolling home from the war."

We know we shall not read of any happy ending to the story of that great magician who is the hero in Mr. Holmes' book. I have called him Prospero; but this Prospero never found his Dukedom in his poor isle. Rembrandt was too great a rebel to be forgiven in his own day. His pictures would not sell then at any price, and ruin and bankruptcy came upon him before his troubles ended in a pauper's grave; and he is the greatest of modern painters. "It has taken something like two and a half centuries for Europe to find out—." But why conclude with what we have found out about Rembrandt? One thinks of Lowell's lines:

"Thoughts that great hearts once broke for, we Breathe cheaply in the common air."

F. EMILY PHILLIPS.

THE THEATRE.*

Despite a momentary withdrawal from attention the theatre (or, as one would have said only a year or so ago, the drama) has raised its head imperiously within the last decade to claim a renewed place for itself in the ranks and ritual of Art. And within the next decade that claim must be answered one way or another. What that answer will be remains, not with argument and precept, but with genius and its inclination: nevertheless the argument is important, and when that argument is raised by men who bear on them the mark of genius, then that argument becomes three-important, even though it still remains only in the way of precept.

For example, here are books by two men of genius. Gordon Craig is a man of the theatre; W. B. Yeats is a man of poetry, part of that poetry being displayed in forms that are dramatic. One perceives no antithesis with centuries of European dramatic practice behind one, one perceives no antithesis in two such men. It is natural to assume that Mr. Gordon Craig exists for the purpose of displaying Mr. Yeats's drama to the best advantage, and the designs to the book of Mr. Yeats's collected drama seem to support that assumption. But one rises from a careful reading of "On the Art of the Theatre" with the perception of quite a sharp antithesis. The Man of the Theatre has claimed an Art for himself. He has claimed the right to be no more a servant; to be, indeed, independent of the Man of Drama. Dating from pre-European and ultra-European sources, he has even claimed the right to turn the Man of Drama, and his Drama, out of the Theatre, to erect there his own independent edifice.

It is an interesting situation. And we have the faith to believe that it is an altogether admirable situation. The bad Man of the Theatre, in his cridity and vulgarity and hideous ostentation, has ruined Drama; and we have often thought the good Man of the Theatre would do no less. Looking at Mr. Gordon Craig's sketches and models the other day, at the Leicester Galleries we were stirred by them, but oppressed also, for we felt that it would be impossible for strong Drama to master such auxiliary grandeur, and take its proper place. The two things, we felt, could not thrive together. Imagine then with what a gleaming eye we read in his book that it was his desire to abolish the Playwright

* "On the Art of the Theatre." By Edward Gordon Craig. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

"Plays for an Irish Theatre." By W. B. Yeats. With Designs by Gordon Craig. 8s. 6d. net. (Shakespeare Head Press.)

2—"John Lavery and his Work." By Walter Shaw Sparrow. 10s. 6d. net. (Megan Paul.)

3—"Notes on the Art of Rembrandt." By C. J. Holmes. Director of the National Portrait Gallery. 7s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

and his play, the Actor and his acting, for the enthronement of the More-than-Marionette (why Ueber-Marionette, Mr. Craig?). His designs, even when conceived for particular plays, are not designs for the interpretation of Drama, but are rather a portion of a new Art of dumb ritual. We think at once of Sumurun; and seem to see a coming development that shall not lack interest.

But Mr. Yeats is a Man of Drama, and not a Man, truly, of the Theatre. He is a Magician of words, to whom a dumb ritual must remain as far removed as the arts of the chisel and pigment. In his new, penetrating preface to this collection of his plays he investigates the difference between Tragedy and Comedy. One is, says he, the dissolution of individuality, the other the erection and maintenance of it; and we disagree with him because, we think, he has not divined the true meaning and nature of personality. But all he says depends on words, words, words; whereas Mr. Gordon Craig would abolish words. It is an interesting situation; and there is an interesting answer to it that the editorial limitation of space compels to remain "the baseless fabric of a vision." There is only space to say that both these books are very choice and exquisite examples of binding and printing craft.

DARRILL FIGGIS.

THE LIFE OF SIR GEORGE NEWNES.*

There are many persons who will welcome this thoughtful and carefully-written life of Sir George Newnes. They may not be necessarily connected with political life or with journalism, but they will certainly belong to that large and influential class of thoughtful men and women who have watched with some anxiety the extraordinarily rapid growth of the popular periodical press, and have grown sensitive about the ultimate end of this ever increasing demand for cheap and easy entertainment. Of course, Miss Friederichs does not attempt to prove that the success which Sir George Newnes won in the course of a strenuous and, in some respects, dramatic career, had anything to do with a new or a golden age in English literature. Her biography does take us aside, however, from the mere jargon of millions of figures as circulations, and all the old unconvincing chatter about fortunes won in a fortnight, and shows us the man who made this revolution in popular literature possible and effective as he really was—warm, lovable and human. As a consequence, her record constitutes not only an admirable tribute to the gifts and the labours of the real pioneer of our modern popular literature, but it serves as a very inspiring record of what can be done by others by a first-hand study of what the public really if unconsciously seek.

Miss Friederichs, on the strength of the opinion of "a distinguished man of letters," tries to institute a parallel between the place won by Sir George Newnes and the position gained by those dauntless, splendid pioneers, Robert and William Chambers, but, personally, we doubt whether this parallel can be adequately sustained. The strength of the success won by Sir George Newnes was hidden in the fact that he regarded himself as the average man, that he put himself in the average man's place, and that by sheer force of sympathy and induction, he learned, more or less, exactly what the average man wanted to read. Now the Chambers brothers had a different purpose. They set out "to instruct and elevate independently of mere passing amusement;" whereas, in Miss Friederichs' own words, "Sir George Newnes catered for a public who asked for something that would rest and amuse the tired brain rather than for information and instruction." In other words, Miss Friederichs would practically contend that the work done by Sir Herbert Tree in his Shakespearean revivals, and by Mr. George Edwardes in his close attention to "the Sacred Lamp of Burlesque," is practically equal—and that, of course, is not the fact.

Every one who has known Fleet Street for the past fifteen years, however, will agree with the emphasis which

* "The Life of Sir George Newnes." By Hulda Friederichs. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Miss Friederichs places upon the integrity and the soundness of Sir George Newnes's business aims. While other proprietors sought to make fortunes by constant change and a succession of editors and methods, Sir George Newnes held tightly to what his own gifts told him the public demanded, and to the men who practically from the outset helped him to make his own dim desires articulate. As a consequence, the Newnes publications that came from Southampton Street always possessed a definite dignity and standpoint and a character that made it possible for anybody engaged in the craft to detect at a glance their place of origin. Almost inevitably Sir George Newnes gathered round him a crowd of friends and helpers, beginning in the early days of his struggles as a commercial traveller in Manchester, and passing on to those eager, competitive times in which he invaded London, and waged those stout contests in elections in the Newmarket division and in Swansea; and it is good to recall how that none of these friends was ever deserted. This fidelity, it must be remarked, was an uncommon quality in the world of periodical publication, and uncommon even amongst the men who imitated, more or less, the dead man's standpoint, success, and business organization. But it lends a very genuine fragrance to this record of his career, and it helps us to understand the large heart of the man who could, under the pressure of grave annoyance, turn with a whimsical smile lighting up his grave face, and say to a colleague, "If I were you, I should alter that. But, of course, do as you like."

After all, Sir George Newnes was, in honest truth, one of those vivid and powerful personalities that, from time to time, have swept across the literary profession and have changed its face, and in the volume before us, Miss Friederichs certainly makes good Sir George's own promise about the story of his life: "I do not say, like the Irishman, if you follow me you shall see some of the queerest things you have ever heard in your life, but I can certainly promise you that you shall not be dull."

SEANHOPE W. SPRIGG

PLOTS—ANCIENT AND MODERN.*

The ancient classification of Shakespeare's plays into histories, comedies and tragedies no longer appeals to us with the sanction of logic; similar reasons forbid the use of that simple method for the eight volumes here under review. But to the terms Ancient and Modern no objection can be taken in the case of plots ranging from the Wars of the Roses to the life-history of a modern board-schoolboy.

Chronologically, then, the list opens with Miss Schuster's valiant and far from unsuccessful attempt to portray perhaps the saddest and gloomiest page in the records of the English monarchy. 1. For her hero is the ill-fated Henry VI, a prince physically and mentally unable to cope with the disorders of his time, not the least of whose misfortunes it was to provide the inevitable foil for the glories of his father's achievements. Much hard work and ability of undoubted promise have gone to the framing of this story, and it may be said at once that there is no break in the interest of the novel, right up to its tragic epilogue. The immaturity of the book is chiefly seen in the attempts at reflective generalisations; and the naïve and frequent references to what may be found in "history-books" seem to indicate a youthful writer. But if that surmise is correct it enhances the many excellencies of the story.

"The Devil's Wind" 2. wafts us over four centuries to Cawnpore on the eve of the Mutiny. The author has here two obvious difficulties to contend with; namely, that it is an oft-told tale, but more especially that no Indian Mutiny novel can hope to thrill us as do the unvarnished records of the historians. Miss Wentworth has chosen for her central theme one of the most painful traditions of that time of horror, the capture and rediscovery of English women. Apart from the tragedy in which she is involved, there is little in Adela Morton to engage our sympathies, for she is an extreme example of the butterfly type of matron that we have come to expect to find in most plain tales from the hills. The pleasantly told love-story of Captain Morton and Adela's cousin is brought to a melodramatic point by the latter's discovery of her husband's first wife in the native bazaar. On the dangers of Anglo-Indian marriages Miss Wentworth writes with force and conviction, for the beginnings of Adela's sorrows were laid in her flirtations in a London ball-room with the half-caste nephew of Nana Sahib. In the matter of dialogue the author, in attempting to be realistic and humorous, is too often merely banal.

* "The Triple Crown." By Rose Schuster. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)—"The Devil's Wind." By Patricia Wentworth. 6s. (Melrose.)

In the most literal sense we travel in Mr. Bryce's company⁸ to fresh woods and pastures new. At least it is doubtful if there is any study to match this except the brilliant and too little known north-country classic, "Johnny Gibb of Gushetneuk," a work which may well have inspired Mr. Bryce's unrelenting picture of the conditions of farm service in the North. The earlier portion of the story describes, in a dialect as aggressive as the theme, the horrible bullying to which the little ploughboy is subjected by his brutal companions of the bothy. If Mr. Bryce is to be taken as historian, and not merely as novelist (and the entire book by its white-hot passion as well as by its artistic formlessness seems to proclaim its autobiographic truth), it is a disquieting surprise to think that such bestial conditions still obtain. In due time, but none too soon, the ploughboy gets a helping hand into a new life. He is on the high-road to becoming a prosperous steward, but his early sufferings drive him back to share and to try to ameliorate the life and hardships of the labouring class. To such a book as this there can be no neat ending, for it is not a plot, but a section of a life, closing not with treasure found, but with "serenity of soul." No recent book has better claim to the much-abused title of "human document."

In lighter vein, Mr. Neuman has given us a fascinating study of the evolution of the board-schoolboy. The book is well entitled "Roddles,"⁴ for the father and two sons of that surname are all equally in the limelight. But if a hero must be selected, it is neither of the clever boys, one of whom becomes a distinguished member of the Royal Society, and the other a judge of the Court of Appeal, but the witty, shrewd, drunken little tailor who planned greatly for his children, and pursued his scheme almost at the cost of sobriety. The characterization of the book is striking, and Roddles Senior may well aspire to the honour of being recognised as a type. Mr. Neuman is no worshipper of success, and the two brilliant sons are like clever automata compared with their very human and disreputable parent. The book as a whole is excellent comedy, shot through and through with pathos, and even gleams of tragedy. Had we to attempt to define the moral of the story, we should say it is that character stands for more than success. Mr. Neuman has certainly worked coincidence hard, but it would be as churlish to carp at that as to deny the humour of the closing scene, in which Roddles Senior (accompanied by his once very thirsty friend, Fitcher) marches at the head of a Salvation Army procession and preaches an eloquent, if "h"-less, sermon before the house in Cromwell Road occupied by Dr. Richard Roddles, F.R.S.

"It is not gay to live with two people who make the whole duty of man a sort of rolling-pin, flattening out the joy of life to its thinnest inconsistency." This was the description by poor Mrs. Thriepland of her dour husband and her ascetic step-daughter. Of the girl, Verona,⁵ Mrs. Thriepland tells the story that when asked at the age of ten what she most wished to do, she replied:

"My sole concern, my constant care,
To watch and tremble and prepare
Against the judgment day."

A mystery surrounds Verona's birth; and this is a well-guarded secret in the plot, which we may not disclose. To her father's horror, Verona develops a strange passion for the ritual and ceremony of Rome, which is fostered by her slavish devotion to Miss Camilla Palmer, of the ancient Catholic house of Craigie. Into the drab story of Verona's life, love makes one feeble effort to enter, but is easily worsted by the girl's ruling passion for renunciation. The discovery of her mother's secret adds fire to her resolve, but at the last moment death snatches from her the crown of her virginal ambition. This is a sombre but well-written story, somewhat insubstantial and lacking in variety.

⁸ "The Story of a Ploughboy." By James Bryce. 6s. (John Lane.)—⁴ "Roddles." By E. Paul Neuman. 6s. (John Murray.)—⁵ "Dame Verona of the Angels." By Annie E. Holdsworth. 6s. (Methuen.)

Miss Little helps the readers of her romance, "The Children's Bread,"⁶ with some devices borrowed from the drama. Thus each chapter is furnished with scene and date; while a Prologue of twenty-six years earlier date than the opening of the story proper records the tragedy that preceded the romance. The scene is laid in a Scottish village, where for quarter of a century Julius Heyman has his studio. Into his solitary life Trudy Courtland brings her agreeable Irish vivacity and fun. Trudy is by way of writing a great book, but Julius himself is the lodestone that keeps her in Argyllshire. The even tenor of the artist's days is violently broken by the advent of Tony Legrand, who has come from Brussels in hope to find his mother's betrayer. The little drama describes the great affection that springs up between the two men, clouded on Tony's part by the growing conviction that Heyman is the father he is in quest of. The Prologue to the novel renders the solution of this tangle pretty easy to divine, but Miss Little has made a slight plot the framework for some admirable writing and diverting comedy.

In "The Lure"⁷ we are transported somewhat violently from London to the Sudan, and this division of scene is paralleled by the diverse styles of the two portions of the book. The first and better half gives us the diverting history of The Orb, a magnificent magazine written by duchesses for duchesses, and edited by a Greek god called Mr. Huntly Goss. Best of all the characters is Lady Helen Moorhouse, whose niece, Anne, is the heroine of the story, the sub-editor of The Orb, and almost the victim of Mr. Goss. In the second act Anne reappears in Egypt as the wife of Captain Host; while the magnificent Goss turns up in the strange rôle of agent for a company dealing in crocodile skins. His real motive, however, is to compass the murder of his idiot step-son. To this end he plots with the vilest of Greeks, only to find that he has underestimated the devoted vigilance of his down-trodden wife. We prefer the comedy of the first half to the melodrama of the second, but the interest is sustained in both.

A very pleasant story of a good old-fashioned kind seems an adequate description of Katharine Tynan's latest book "Princess Katharine."⁸ If the ingredients be old the handling is deft, with more than a flavouring of genuine Irish humour and tenderness. In the hands of some of our would-be realists, the story of the Princess might have been made almost insufferable. The child of a mésalliance, the girl returns from her long schooling on the Continent to find the widowed mother, whose beauty she remembers, a beer-sodden sloven. Katharine's fight to maintain her own dignity and shield her mother forms "the true pathos and sublime" of the book, and entitles the heroine to her patent of royalty. A delightful love-story and an exciting hunt for a lost will are other episodes in a charming fireside romance.

L. Q.-C.

PSYCHOLOGY OF THE RELIGIOUS LIFE.*

The widespread reaction against intellectualism in the treatment of religion has made that blessed word "psychology" sound familiar in circles beyond the pale of philosophy. Book after book appears with "psychology" in its title, or with a more or less scientific application of psychological methods in its pages, till every year sees fresh additions to the literature of the psychology of religion or Christianity as the case may be. Some of these volumes suffer from too little psychology, others from too little religion. Some use psychological processes to justify religious convictions which are presupposed; others have no definite conception of religion as a standard, and consequently tend to interpret it illogically in terms of the savage or the fanatic. The result in many cases is that such treatises yield very little more than partial inventories of the religious consciousness, instead of supplying analytic and synthetic surveys. Some years ago Dr. Hastings Rashdall entered a very necessary word of caution against the desire to base religious belief upon psychology, pointing out that "the business of psychology is to tell us what actually goes on in the human mind. It cannot possibly tell us whether the beliefs which are found there are true or false. An erroneous belief is just as much a psychological fact as a true one." It does not require a wide acquaintance with books on this subject, Gifford Lectures not excluded, to realise how timely such a protest is, and one opens Professor Stratton's volume with a hesitation born of suffering at the hands of his predecessors in this line of inquiry. The hesitation proves, upon the whole, to be unfounded. This book, at any rate, is both psychological and religious. The author has sought evidence not in individual confessions so much as in the more reliable and representative testimonies of vital religious societies, ancient and modern; furthermore, he has not only followed the right method of inquiry, but has kept steadily in view the war of motives in religion. The sense of conflict and struggle dominates his treatment. This emerges particularly in religions like Zoroastrianism, whereas "for the Greek we might say that faith was required to see that the universe had ever been troubled to its heart"; but, wherever religion has been vital, it has expressed the yearning for a God on the side of goodness, and effort striving to assert the worth of the moral personality in the universe and to overcome the contradiction of the real and the ideal. Professor Stratton's recognition of this adds distinction and reality to his discussions.

⁶ "The Children's Bread." By Maude Little. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)—⁷ "The Lure." By E. S. Stevens. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)—⁸ "Princess Katharine." By Katharine Tynan. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

* "Psychology of the Religious Life." By George Malcolm Stratton, sometime Professor of Experimental Psychology in the Johns Hopkins University; Professor of Psychology in the University of California. 10s. 6d. net. (Garner Allen & Co.)

The first three sections describe conflicts in regard to feeling and emotion, action, and religious thought. The last section, which is the shortest of the four, is devoted to the central forces of religion, that is, to the various factors of the idealising process which seeks to represent the Best, reverently and intelligently. Professor Stratton has done justice, throughout, to the truth that the contradictions and conflicts of the religious life are due to its inherent energy; they represent attempts from one side and another to respond to the rich variety of the Unity which reveals itself to human faith and need. As he remarks, "The very fealty to the Ideal—so intricate is the character, both of the Ideal and of our loyalty to it—stirs into life the most contrary emotions, until in their conflict they rest at fierce tension, or one subdues the other." This applies not only to the differences between one religion and another, but to various phases within the same religion, to the unfolding of the individual as well as of the social consciousness. What lends special value to the treatise is the adequacy with which the expressions and relations of these conflicts are discussed. Professor Stratton's essay makes no attempt to evaporate them into a higher unity, nor to treat them as if they were equivalent merely to the oscillations of the soul in different climates of civilisation. Especially in the third section of the book, where he is face to face with the problems of knowledge in relation to belief and of symbolism in religion, there is a blend of sympathy and penetration which is too rare in the treatment of such questions by philosophical persons. A good instance of this is afforded by the author's remark upon the early creeds and councils of the Christian Church. "Those who denied the real union of humanity and divinity in Christ were, consciously or unconsciously, fighting for the principle of separation between the two orders of life; they stood for the unchristian doctrine of a God afar off; their position was, therefore, pronounced to be heresy, and the Church maintained the doctrine that in Christ Jesus there was a mysterious conjunction of very man and very God. It was a battle not of mere logic and metaphysics, for behind the subtle disputes were two very real and practical alternatives of religious life between which it was well that a choice should be made."

The volume is a timely and satisfactory contribution to the "Library of Philosophy," edited by Dr. J. H. Muirhead. Its style is on the whole clear and unambiguous; Americanisms like "downed" are not frequent, and the occasional touches of local colour are usually vivid and relevant. But a remark on p. 76 puzzles us: "Nature-lovers, like Muir or Wordsworth, are often mild secular anchorites preaching the rewards of turning from convention." Wordsworth we know, but who is Muir? Who is Muir, what has he done or written, to be bracketed with Wordsworth?

JAMES MOFFATT.

A STRANGE HOLIDAY.*

A holiday? Yes, for we take it that both Mr. Prichard and Mr. Gathorne-Hardy went to the Labrador, just as persons of a less toughened physique and of other tastes go to the Riviera, up the Rhine, to Killarney or to Scotland in summer. And with a certain class of persons, all men and women of means, this double-barrelled purpose of holiday-making and book-making is becoming far too common. They go here, there, and everywhere, or pretty nearly so; then come home and fire their volumes at us poor bookmen, much as they fire at anything in the shape of game in the wilderness through which they take their often devastating holidays. What is more we have to sit and take the firing much the same as the usually unsuspecting game; except that we can fire back in a way, when we find—as we do all too often—that the holidaying book-maker has made his enjoyable pilgrimage too obviously with a rifle in one hand, so to write, and a notebook in the other, yet has missed some of the most important things that a traveller should see.

* "Through Trackless Labrador." By H. Hesketh Prichard, F.R.G.S.; with a chapter on Fishing by G. M. Gathorne-Hardy, F.R.G.S. Illustrated with a Frontispiece by Lady Helen Graham, a Map of the Route, and from Photographs. 15s. net. (Heinemann.)

Tired and Irritable.

From "Trackless Labrador," by H. Hesketh Prichard. (Heinemann.)

This, however, is not the case with Mr. Prichard. It was not so in his trip to Patagonia, nor in his "Hunting Camps in Wood and Wilderness," and it is not so here. In going to the Labrador (that part of the American continent which the early Norsemen must have been the first Europeans to visit) he went to what is practically virgin country to the writing explorer. Up to his visit we had but, as fellow-workers, Dr. Grenfell—than whom no one knows more of the coast—the unfortunate Leonidas Hubbard, Mrs. Hubbard—who so courageously finished her dead husband's work of exploration—Mr. Dillon Wallace, Mr. and Mrs. Tasker and Mr. Cabot, a descendant of those Bristol Cabots who, in the fifteenth century, did so much towards the discovery of parts of North America and to foster trade between the natives there and the English.

But it is hardly fair to write of Mr. Prichard in the singular here; for his comrade appears to have played a most excellent second part in the journey. Indeed, Mr. Prichard pays Mr. Gathorne-Hardy some highly deserved compliments in this respect. So let us say that their explorations were not over the same ground as their forerunners had covered. In fact, they went much further to the north than the tracks followed by the Hubbards and Wallace. Starting from Nain, in 50° 45' N., on the Atlantic seaboard, they worked almost due west to Indian House Lake, and back to Nain. The mass of things which they tell us, all exceedingly well, could not, obviously, be even hinted at here. Their journey was across a bleak, unexplored plateau of 100 to 200 miles in extent, therefore the hardships were many and numerous. True, game and fish were to be had, but only at times; so that caches were really necessary, or starvation would probably have come to them, as it came to Hubbard. Indeed, little short of real heroism was needed to carry the thing through to a success, and the record makes spirited reading, for there were many narrow escapes in the coming and going. As to Mr. Prichard's additions to our knowledge of the country, the Nascaupce and the Montagnais Indians, the Eskimo, the settlers and a hundred and one other things, we can but be grateful, as we are to Mr. Gathorne-Hardy for his fishery contribution, and for the many fine illustrations which really enhance the value of the book.

J. E. PATTERSON

THE TREND OF MODERN MUSIC*

There is, nowadays, no lack of theorists who can argue with equal appearance of conviction that the English as a nation are not and never will be "musical," or alternatively that they have an ample claim to that designation. To meet with a writer who assumes the more probable case, namely, that in their sympathy for, and response to, the appeal of music they are neither more nor less endowed than any other great modern nation is rare enough to be refreshing. This is what Mr. Cecil Forsyth does in his "Study of English Opera" entitled "Music and Nationalism."

The fact that Germany, for instance, has produced a long line of illustrious composers, whereas England has not done so, does not necessarily imply that the English are less "musical" than the Germans. It is from some such starting-point as this that the author proceeds to elaborate the theory that it is largely the position of any nation in world-politics which gives to it or withholds from it the opportunity of developing a national school of composers.

Mr. Forsyth considers in detail the history of music in the civilized world during the Christian era and shows that when any nation was intent on what he terms "exteriorization"—the enlargement of its borders or its mental outlook—such conditions were unfavourable to its musical productivity, but that when, through force of circumstances, its energies were, so to speak, turned inwards, such conditions were favourable thereto. He is thus able to offer an explanation of our national sterility in the matter of composers since Henry Purcell, which will square with comparable lapses in other countries.

At the beginning of the eleventh century the whole of Europe was emerging from the melting-pot, and, owing to her insular position, conditions of security and stability grew up soonest in this Island. "We may put it broadly that, from 1154 until 1337 England enjoyed a period of mixed strength, isolation and tranquillity which were the most favourable conditions . . . for the development of music." And we know as a fact that it was at this time that music began to develop in this country.

It was in 1492 that America was discovered. This event changed the whole course of European history, substituting as it did sea-power for land-power as a national ideal, and very shortly the adventurous English had so fixed their attentions on its attainment that they became too restless to continue in any practical manner the development of national music. "It may almost be said that national musical productivity is in inverse ratio to sea-power." And in this condition we have been ever since, more's the pity for our music! But the musical sympathies of the race remained (and remain) and it is doubtless this important consideration which may be held responsible for the long-continued vogue of foreign music in England. The people had to have music of some sort, and since no English composer gave it them they fell back on the foreigner.

Having striven thus to account for conditions of to-day, Mr. Forsyth proceeds to describe them in exhaustive detail with special reference to the question of English opera. He writes with the pen of an optimist and a patriot. He is convinced that "Deep silent spaces of the national consciousness exist (still unvisited) . . . and . . . their very silence and depth should fascinate the explorer." He is convinced that "the English composer has a language which both in the variety of its vowel-sounds and in the dramatic groupings of its rhythms is a far more tractable instrument of musical thought than either French or Italian." He vigorously opposes the idea of fostering a public for opera by performing foreign works translated into English. "Every man . . . if he fully realises his nationality, should find—must find—in every foreign art-work something in some part repellent to his own individuality."

Mr. Forsyth is doubtful whether endowment of opera by the State would lead to the founding of a National School of Opera in England. Composers he thinks would not be far to seek if money and good opera "books" were more easily come by. Certainly we may admit that any system which would give the English composer a better chance of a hearing in his own country than he has at present would be a step in advance. He considers that the music-drama of the future will be in the hands of the man who is himself the maker of the whole artistic structure—drama, words and music, but has to admit that "the accidental conjunction of so many abilities in one mind can occur but rarely." Altogether he has so many rational ideas as to the probable success of English opera if conceived in close relation to our actual life instead of the life-that-never-was with which too many operas have been concerned, that one wishes he would himself set to work and supply us with an opera or operas embodying his ideals.

There is no excuse for any of our rising generation of composers failing through mere technical inability—and this surely is where so many of them have failed and are failing—when they have such books as that on "Musical Composition" by Sir Charles Villiers Stanford from which to glean hints. The highest ideals are here placed before the young composer, and the reasons for the academic rules which he is bidden to observe in order that he may walk before flying are explained, with a literary charm and a

* "Music and Nationalism." By Cecil Forsyth. 3s. net. (Macmillan.)

"Musical Composition." By Charles Villiers Stanford. 3s. 6d. net. (The Musician's Library. Macmillan.)

"Post-Victorian Music." By Charles L. Graves. 6s. net. (Macmillan.)

steadfast enthusiasm which should preserve to him his natural freshness and spontaneity throughout the drudgery of his training. The author deplores the common custom of studying harmony first and counterpoint afterwards as being inimical to the growth of a sense of melody. "Study counterpoint first," he says, "and through counterpoint master harmony." He also makes a point of the absolute necessity for the composer to study the pure scale—not that compromise of tones embodied in the "equal temperament," of the pianoforte. These are only two of the excellent maxims laid down in the first section on Technique. Rhythm, Melodies and Their Treatment, Form, Colour, the Treatment of Voices—every department of the composer's armoury is provided with its own special grinding and polishing devices, and the final chapter on Danger Signals should awaken a fitting sense of humility in the young musician by contemplation of his responsibilities as an artist.

Mr. Charles L. Graves's "Post-Victorian Music" consists of a reprint of some forty-four articles from The Spectator, most of which were suggested by some event topical at the time they were written. As reprinted they are a useful record of our musical activities for the last six or seven years. There is no interdependence between them, and their perusal gives but few clues to any definite constructive policy on the part of the writer. He is rarely found to express himself with much enthusiasm. If he disapproves in a lukewarm manner of Richard Strauss and his Symphonia Domestica he also disapproves in a lukewarm manner of Sir Edward Elgar and his First Symphony. Here and there one scents the boredom which is unfortunately so likely to infect the critic, whose business it is, year in, year out, to listen to concerts and recitals, good, bad and indifferent. The appreciations of musical personages (of which there are many) are alive and interesting, and of course all these studies show the fluent pen-work of the practised journalist.

H. FITCHEW.

WHEELS WITHIN WHEELS.*

Those novel readers who like a story brim full of incident and social adventure will find something very much to their taste in Mr. Stacpoole's new tale. Regarded from a purely literary standpoint it is not, indeed, up to the level of some others of his earlier works. A plot which finds its setting in the intrigues of the Court of King Louis XV. of France can hardly be expected to call forth the same qualities which were so eminently displayed in "The Blue Lagoon" and "The Ship of Coral." But if Mr. Stacpoole has deliberately elected to descend to a less ambitious level he has produced a most ingenious trifle, and one's principal fear is that his very success may induce him to rest content with work of this nature instead of soaring again to higher flights.

Of the complicated tale which he has now written it is impossible to give any very detailed summary. Almost every character is an experienced plotter, and these plotters are occupied with so many machinations against one another, that one grows almost as bewildered as a child gazing upon a kaleidoscope. The principal character is a Baroness Linden who is sent on a mission to the Dauphiness from the Court of Vienna. This lady wins and returns the love of a young nobleman, the Comte de Lussac, who has become a convert to the teachings of Jean Jacques Rousseau, and who is deeply implicated in the revolutionary Société du Midi. To suppress the society and its members is the great object of M. de Sartines, Minister of Police, and when the story opens he is, as he hopes, upon the eve of accomplishing his object. But M. de Sartines, being himself also a piece on the chess-board, is, naturally, in his turn also threatened by other pieces. The great danger to him lies in the fact that he and the King have combined to make a "corner" in wheat at a time when famine is raging throughout France, and that a document embodying this scandalous transaction and signed by de Sartines is in existence. The position, as may readily be understood, is one of infinite possibilities. De Lussac incriminates himself by carelessly confusing two letters, and is sent to the Bastille. Simultaneously the Baroness Linden burgles the bureau of the aged Duc de Richelieu in which the document incriminating de Sartines is kept, and thereby becomes mistress of the situation. We appear to have reached a deadlock as complete as that which Sheridan contrived between the uncles, nieces, and Don Whiskerandos.

* "The Order of Release." By H. de Vere Stacpoole. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

But Mr. Stacpoole is equal to all emergencies, and if no Beefeater appears to charge them drop their daggers he finds an equally dramatic solution of the difficulty. De Lussac not only regains his liberty and the papers which prove him to have been concerned with the Société du Midi, but M. de Sartines gets back, through a faithful agent who had disguised himself and taken service with the Baroness, the document which would have ruined his career and, perhaps, have brought disrepute upon the King himself.

The ingenuity with which this story is worked out is quite admirable. Up to the last we are in doubt as to what the final outcome will be, and the very tameness, as it were, of the conclusion is in itself a master stroke. A drawn battle was the last thing in the world which one would have expected to find. Nor is the plot the only excellence. The dialogue is crisp and amusing, and we are not unduly plagued with the insertion of French words and phrases which might with advantage to the reader's patience have been turned into English. The characters, again, though slight, are clearly drawn, and the story as a whole is distinctly superior to most of those of the same type which have appeared since the days of Mr. Stanley Weyman's activity.

M. H. H. MACARTNEY.

THE AUSTERE ART.*

The distinguishing quality—the "virtue" as he himself would say—of Sir Frederick Wedmore's prose (knightly from the very first) is a kind of full-sailed serenity, an accomplished but industrious calm; it moves, with its spreading periods, for all the world like a full-rigged ship on a windless sea—very royal, very splendid, very lustrous, and, if somewhat slowly, why, still, with a slowness that seems, and that genuinely is, a part of its own intrinsic stateliness. Hard-working enough in its detail, it is always invincibly bland; and it is just that fundamental contrast which makes it seem so much at its best in a book like this one—a book wholly concerned, that is to say, with the efforts of an art that is itself both majestic and minute, that owes its own charm to a similar blend of calmness and intricate detail. He has often written about it before, of course, obedient to this temperamental affinity; it must be now quite a quarter of a century since he wrote his book on "The Etchings of Whistler";—and probably no one now living has done more (confound him!) to make certain desirable prints for ever unprocurable by the poor penny-a-liner. But of all the long series—the "Whistler," the "Meissonier," the "Cameron," the "Helleu"—the latest, which cruises the old seas afresh, is in many ways the richest, roundest, and best. Its task is, once more, frankly the epicure's. Himself no technician—obliged to turn, even now, with a sort of dignified helplessness, to an expert like Sir Frank Short for enlightenment and instruction concerning the simplest details of the craft—he is occupied purely with the cool accomplishment,—only faintly, perfunctorily, and perhaps a trifle disdainfully, with the delicious dirty drudgery that produced it, the anxious and enchanting inky processes. His attitude is the white-fingered Paternal one. "What," he asks himself aloud, in a phrase that recalls a certain more famous one "What is the contribution of the particular etcher's personality to the common stock?" and the task he sets his learned senses is that of devising elegant answers to that question, of divining and defining the unique personal quality that lurks behind the medium, the "virtue" that is so often overlaid or altered or magnified hypocritically by the accidents and lucky equivokes of the acid or the press. But although the attitude is Pater's,—and often the very accent too,—there is absolutely nothing here of the petulance or freakishness which so many of Pater's spiritual children, young people suffering from temperaments, have felt forced, since the nineties, to display. To the work of each of a hundred-odd masters, from Rembrandt down (very far down, Sir Frederick thinks) down to the infelicitous Felicien Rops, and then up again to Mr. Muirhead Bone, he brings a beautiful steadfastness of vision and a scrupulous care for relative proportions: "C'est n'estimer personne, qu'estimer tout le monde" his excellent motto. And when, writing of Meryon's work, he speaks of each of its "lines being well and truly laid—as the stones, themselves, of his buildings" the phrase, like so many of its companions, has some of the firm clarity and temperance of the art which it describes. And so, too, in such an estimate as this, of Appian—done, if one may say so, in the Appian way—

* "Etchings." By Frederick Wedmore. 25s. net. (Methuen.)

"Appian etched Landscape—Landscape, Light and Distance. People—except as landscape figures excellently stationed—fill no important function in his work. Sometimes they may be absent from his plates altogether. What is seldom absent is Architecture—and that reminds us of Humanity: assures us we are in an inhabited and civilised world. Sometimes the building, in an etching of Appian's, is a fort; a gleaming sunlit tower. Sometimes it may be a Riviera villa: sometimes a villa wall—is it Roman, or French with the stability of Rome—a construction of the department of the 'Ponts de Chaussées'? That does not much matter. It gives, as in 'Le Village de Chanoz' a great line: it binds the landscape together: it helps to compose it. And 'Un Kocher dans les Communaux de Rix' shows, not man's building, but something of the structure and building of the world."

Or in this, from the appreciation of the landscapes of Mr. E. V. Burridge—another lately honoured artist:

"They are the aspect of the moment, clearly and delicately apprehended, finely and firmly rendered. In the first, over a still illuminated river in mid-distance, there is the ominous roll of brooding skies. In the second, we have a receding coastline, on which is thrown a long cloud-shadow—the sky to the right now luminous again: hopeful: radiant almost—the storm has left it. With light and steady touch—with nothing superfluous permitted, and nothing essential withheld—the hand of Mr. Burridge registers, like a dial, these changing hours."

Criticism like that, itself so "well and truly laid," itself "a fine, firm rendering," as clear and candid as any "dial," of aspects "clearly and delicately apprehended," rebukes, by its measured and seigniorial air, any desire a reviewer might feel, now and then, to make his own criticism captious. To try to pick holes in such smooth work seems a loutish thing, like scratching a marble wall. And only the miserably self-righteous, or the boorish, will feel compelled to call attention to weak points, places where a breach might be effected. Such fellows, no doubt, would fix, first of all, on the little flaw,—though perhaps a typical flaw,—which may be seen at the foot of page 183: the passage where the whole of the curious and important case of Mr. Augustus John is considered, dealt with, and comfortably dismissed in exactly three lines and a half—twenty-four indifferent words! That Mr. John is often maddeningly wilful one admits—with joy; and one realises, too, though perhaps with a sigh, that the often quite deceptive air of merely insolent laxity which his work sometimes has, would be bound, in the nature of things, gravely to offend a mind like Sir Frederick's. But John has done work, some of it his most characteristic, as immaculate, choice, and exquisite as anything by Ingres. And in any case it is surely pretty plain that a book which gives a whole chapter to the pretty needle-work of M. Paul Helleu cannot fob off our modern Goya in a sentence without offending exactly the fine spirit of reverence for proportion and balance which the dismissal pretends it is honouring.

But even that faint murmur of remonstrance is enough to make the spirit of reviewry feel ashamed. And, by way of requital, let it insist, as it slinks back, that the other main quality which is absent from these pages, and which some readers will enquire for complainingly (indeed, one hears them doing so already) is an element that had to be sacrificed, is really the price we all pay for the book's other charms. "Here is a great deal of talk" (it will be said) "about the capacities and personalities of Whistler and Rembrandt and Anders Zorn and the rest of them, but what about the special capacities of the biggest personality of all—the figure of Etching herself? What about her contribution?" Why is her function not defined? Well, the answer, of course, is that Sir Frederick's way of approach strictly forbids any such enquiry;—that it is one which could only be conducted by working up from the brute basis of the craft, the physical weaknesses and powers of burnishers and burrs and all the glorious gamble of printing;—and that the man who once immerses himself in these elements will never again be able to approach the finished work with that eager innocence of attention which forms the sensitive face of Sir Frederick's dial, the virgin wax to receive the impression. And (as the impatient craftsman ought to realise more often) work done in this unpractical spirit is of far greater practical importance to him than the pedantic writing of the text-book makers, smelling so mightily of "shop." For it offers him a beautiful registration of the final effect produced by his work—a delicate chart from whose readings he may reckon exactly what impression his needle has produced on the ultimate plate of man's mind. The writing, we have said, has some of the quality of a fine print. Not more fantastically it may be said that every page of the letterpress is just the last pull, the final "state," of the master-etchings to which it alludes.

One word as to the other pulls—the real ones,—the forty-four reproductions of the prints themselves. Like all the illustrations in this series ("The Connoisseur's Library" which Mr. Cyril Davenport edits so admirably for Methuen's) they have been very tactfully done. The choice too, is good—though not quite the best: it sometimes seeming clear that the attempt to keep the general proportions right has met more difficulties here than in the text. The solitary Legros, for instance,—a resigned and shrunken landscape—is not one of that great Master's finer things. And the entire absence of Strang, again, produces a real distortion in a selection that includes examples of Mr. Affleck's work and Mr. Watson's and Mr. Burridge's.

DIXON SCOTT.

THE COMPLETE NIETZSCHE.*

One cannot contemplate the completion of the English translation of the works of Friedrich Nietzsche without feelings of gratitude towards the practical enthusiasm of Dr. Oscar Levy who has guided so remarkable an enterprise to success. At the outset the production of a complete set of Nietzsche's works in English was not without commercial hazard, but the results must indeed be gratifying to all concerned for (and it will come as a surprise to many people) no less than seven of the eighteen volumes comprising the edition are in a second, and three are in a third edition. That would indicate the existence of a public seriously interested in Friedrich Nietzsche, for it may be surmised with some certainty that the light interest aroused by journalistic exploitation of the challenge of his thought, and the tragedy of his life, has long since been surfeited, and those who skim over the surface of philosophic fashions are engaged elsewhere. There are, as a matter of fact, a great many people who feel, rightly or wrongly, that Nietzsche has a message for them; and their number is still respectable after it has been written down by the subtraction of those (and they are still many) who misuse or misunderstand him, drawn as they have been to his work by his apparent, but apparent only to the dull-witted, advocacy of moral license, and his childish and often irritating insistence on a desire to write only for the elect. To say you write for the elect is the surest way of attracting the mediocre. But, whatever, the status of Nietzsche's public there is little doubt that his thought and ideas are at length receiving something like acceptance in this country, or rather, we are at length in the heyday of surprise at the daring of the great German psychologist, although long after he has ceased to startle our continental neighbours. But up to the present his direct influence has been small, what real influence he has had on English writers has been indirect, coming through French, German and Italian authors who have written under his spell. It may be indeed that Nietzsche will not affect us as he has affected others, for we have become inured to the flaming aphorism of revolt in this country by the genius of Mr. Bernard Shaw, a thinker bearing many superficial resemblances to Nietzsche, though fundamentally opposed to him. So similar at times have these two thinkers been that shallow critics have hinted rather broadly as to Mr. Shaw's continental inspirers. The author of "Man and Superman" is strong enough to be his own first line of defence, but it is interesting to note, in the light of past criticisms of his originality, that the publication of Nietzsche's autobiography, "Ecce Homo," actually lays the German open to the charge of having plagiarised the Irishman! In this autobiography, which is, by the way, one of the most remarkable and inspiring books ever written, Nietzsche repeatedly uses the egotistical gags which have been the stock properties of Bernard Shaw's drum and trumpeting for something like a quarter of a century. Before G.B.S. an autobiography like "Ecce Homo," with such chapter headings as "Why I am so wise," "Why I am so clever," and "Why I write such excellent books," might have evoked an admonitory leader in The Times, and scare headlines in the Daily Mail; but familiarity with that method of self-expression has, as usual, produced indifference.

* "The Works of Friedrich Nietzsche." (First complete and Authorised Translation in 18 volumes). Edited by Dr. Oscar Levy. (T. N. Foulis.)

This is not the place or the time to interpret the Nietzschean idea, even if one could grant that place or time were ever proper to such an endeavour, which is doubtful. No interpretation of Nietzsche can have anything but a purely subjective value. Nietzsche has ever been his own best interpreter, but he becomes doubly so by the publication of "Ecce Homo," which, with a stroke of the pen as it were, robs all his friendly commentators of their validity. All that need be said in a general way about Nietzsche, either in elucidation, in extenuation or even in praise, is said in this wonderful book, and it is said on the authority of the only final authority, Friedrich Nietzsche himself, that is why Dr. Oscar Levy might have stayed the energy of his translators at the translation, and added himself the few necessary bibliographical and biographical details which are really all the preface each volume requires; not that the existing prefaces are incapable, they are unnecessary. Beyond a natural feeling against being talked to by what might be called conscientious Nietzscheans, before beginning one of the Master's books, I have none but feelings of gratitude for this splendid monument to the genius of the deepest and the highest thinker of our time. The volumes themselves are convenient and quietly dignified both as to type and binding.

The completion of the English translation of his works gives us in this country the first chance of drawing for ourselves a full length portrait of Friedrich Nietzsche, and we are helped very considerably in this task by "Ecce Homo," which is at least a three-quarter portrait of the artist by himself. In this book he not only reveals his own ideas, one by one in a sort of organic relationship with each other, he reveals himself also in relation to them, and here they do not always square well together; particularly in the philosopher's aspiration to be a satyr rather than a saint, for Nietzsche was by constitution the latter. He admits to never having had a desire, and from what we know of his life we can believe him: perhaps even Nietzsche was sentimentalizing when he patronized the satyr. His love of health also is unrelated to his condition, or rather related contrariwise, for, of course, it is not the first time an invalid has written vehemently of health. Such inconsistencies are forced upon readers of Nietzsche, not because they affect his philosophy, but because in so intensely personal a thinker they affect your view of him. The fact that his sanity gave way just after he had written "Ecce Homo," in 1889, has been used by many writers as an argument against his ideas, but the relationship in this case is very remote. Nietzsche was undoubtedly sane when he wrote his books, he wrote nothing after his mind gave way. It is conceivable that even the strongest of minds might break beneath such pressure as Nietzsche could bring to bear upon himself, for he was no formal thinker; he did not codify and co-ordinate the already thought-out, he constantly made tracks into the unknown, and it is inconceivable that his ideas should be finally condemned and repudiated because of that. It may be unusual to say instinct is superior to reason; it may be illogical to stigmatize morality as decadent; it may have been wrong of him to prefer Dionysus to Christ or satyr to saint; his objection to ideals may have been inconvenient; his deep sense of the formative value of tragedy may have been unpleasant, and his dream of superman, absurd. But neither the charges of being unusual, illogical, wrong, inconvenient, unpleasant or even absurd, are sufficient, severally or collectively, to convict a man of insanity—or there are very few of us sane. One idea, and one only, in the whole of Nietzsche's works touches the borderland, that is his conception of "eternal recurrence," but that idea, upon which one might brood oneself into Bedlam, is by no means peculiar to him, it exists in all its appalling emptiness in several writers and in many forms. Friedrich Nietzsche is really much saner than most men, or perhaps than any man—he is as sane as the animals. It is his extreme naturalism, in an age conventional and artificial in idea and habit, that arouses doubts as to his sanity. Nietzsche is the naturalist of psychology—a sufficiently new thing to attract and repel. Like life, he is paradoxical, a yea-saying and a destruction. To accept life as a battle and take the consequences without revenge or resentment—and what does not destroy you creates you—that is the essence of Nietzsche. And after breathing the rare air of his thoughts one feels that the unwritten law is no longer unwritten, the contentiousness of life no longer a contention. He calls one of his books, "a book for all and none,"—Nietzsche may be described as a philosopher for all and none.

HOLBROOK JACKSON.

Novel Notes.

THE CURE. By Desmond Coke. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Coke tells us that "The Cure" is not recommended to—among others—"such rude optimists as expect a laugh on every page," and, in a way, he is right. There may not be an inordinate number of laughs in his "psychologic farce," but there are of similes. In fact, the book is a lengthy and satisfying grin, from the moment when Lady Medwin decides to leave her husband—because he tells her that her new hat makes her look like "nothing upon earth"—to the last page. The heroine takes refuge at the Selton Hostel—"Therap. baths. Res. phys. Beautiful surr. Mar. view. Congenial Soc." and all the rest of it—and there makes acquaintance with a variety of delightfully assorted cranks. What happens the reader must discover for himself, and we can assure him that he will find no lack of amusement, more especially in the sentimental adventure of Professor Ingleby (of Wigan) and the meeting of the New Truth League, the members of which hold as their principal tenet that they will accept nothing from Man—not even a vote. The whole book is as ridiculously charming as anything we have ever come across.

FIRE & THE FLINT. By Mrs. J. O. Arnold. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

Mrs. Arnold is to be congratulated in turning to excellent purpose a subject that is at once new to fiction and of conspicuous momentary interest. The plot of her story moves far from its first moorings, but there can be little doubt that the recollection of her readers will return chiefly to old Ezra Smith, the founder and inspirer of a devoted band of village Morris dancers. The chapters dealing with this are fraught with a fine enthusiasm that would alone give distinction to the story. Cecil Raine and Lawrence Wynward, in the course of a walking-tour, fall easily under the glamour of this enthusiasm, and the interesting story records the fortunes of Ezra's daughter who, leaving her native village, achieves renown as an artiste in London and Paris. From the outset it is made apparent that the volatile Cecil is no mate for this finely-drawn type of sane and brilliant English womanhood, who is the queen of the company in Paris and in London, as she was in her native village; and yet there is nothing better or stronger in the book than the drawing of the morally weak Cecil, who lives on his reputation for a few juvenile epigrams, and stoops to enjoy a momentary fame as the supposed author of Wynward's anonymous successes in fiction and drama. It is a pleasant story, which is made to end happily without doing violence to probability or poetic justice.

THE BARON OF ILL-FAME. By Hester Barton. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

The title of this book seems to us a little unfortunate and misleading. It plainly gave the promise of modern melodrama in its most lurid form, while in reality it is an ambitious historical novel, dealing with Florence in the time of Dante. In one respect, however, the title is certainly justified, for the hero-villain, despite his antiquity, is worthy to be the founder of all the long family of evil barons and baronets of fiction. In short, as Mr. Jingle said, Corso Donati is a really terrible fellow, whose career includes the forcible seizure of his daughter from a convent to compel her to a marriage, from which she is speedily released by death; and his connivance in the poisoning of his wife, to pave the way for his own marriage with his evil genius, Donna Lucia. The story contains some powerfully-drawn scenes, notably the poisoning incident, in the chapter of "The Interrupted Banquet"; and in the death-scene of the miscreant himself. Miss Barton has not overcome all the difficulties of this kind of narrative, the style of her story recalls the once-famous spasmodic school, and in such words as "'Leonora!' cried Filippo hoarsely, letting the dagger fall from his nerveless hand," we seem to detect the ancient hall-mark of Wardour Street English.

PENNY MONYPENNY. By Mary and Jane Findlater. 6s. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

When you suspect a young man, whose health is consistently wretched and whose chief asset appears to be a rather impish intellect, to be on the point of asking your daughter to marry him, you will surely do well to make him promise to do nothing of the kind. So thought Penelope's mother, as sweet and gentle and tactful a mother as one could wish for; but Lorin Weir, the slovenly, facetious, lovable young man in question, who adds to his disadvantages that of being Penny's first cousin, firmly declines to make any such promise. "You might as well ask a man stifling to death to promise not to gasp for air. . . . Of course, you'll all oppose it. I know you will. Oppose away; if she cares enough, I'll say like Luther, though every tile on the house roofs were a devil it won't stop me; though you, and the uncles, and Aunt Deborah, and Booley and the dogs, were all devils you won't stop me, if Pen cares." And the pity of it all is that Pen does care; cares indeed even more passionately than Lorin. The unpleasant, unconvincing development which follows comes as a shock to the reader, and might have been avoided with advantage. Badly trained, unloved, and misunderstood by his crotchety uncles and aunt, Lorin allows himself to drift into a sordid entanglement with—of all people in the world—a vulgar Creole woman, the wife of a friend of the Monypennys. Her eyes thus rudely opened, Pen must needs construct her world afresh, and in this new world a different Pen meets a very different husband. The authors write with rare insight and sympathy; their women are always interesting and cleverly portrayed; and in Penny Monypenny, or Twopenny, as Lorin delights to call her, they have drawn a character as fresh and charming as a spring morning.

THE BREATH OF THE DESERT. By H. Clayton East. 6s. net. (Duckworth)

Mr. Hichens has many devoted followers, and the present author would seem to be one of them. If to that attractive style there be added an infusion of Pierre Loti's poetic mysticism, together with not a little of Mr. Douglas Sladen's eloquence and descriptive power, it is obvious that the mixture should be effective. What detracts from the promised effect is that there is little or no plot, and that the characters are ordinary. We know of old the matter-of-fact, uninspiring husband, the dreamy, large-souled, passionate wife longing for a personification of strength she can worship, and the strong, quiet man, making such a perfect lover with his dramatic appearances and disappearances, and his deep-toned voice, and his equally large and deep-toned soul. What novelists refuse to see, but what the ordinary reader of the male persuasion sees clearly enough, is that such a man would soon bore a wife to extinction. It is a relief to turn from this pair with their dreams and visions, their trances and ecstasies, and their unblushing casuistry, to the honest, straight, and thoroughly English Major. What though his stories of stirring life—he does not deal in dreams and trances—are rather dragged in by the scruff of the neck, much as the stories are dragged into "Pickwick," still, come as they may, they bring with them a real breath, not of the hot-house, but of the open air. They ring true and give a very good idea of modern Egypt, except when they momentarily branch off into mysticism and gambling. The Major is the backbone of the book, which else would be rather invertebrate.

LOVE ON THE HAPPY HILL. By Violet Pearn. 6s. (Melrose.)

Marriage, Birth and Death, "the splendour—the rightness that lie behind the great facts of life," these are the terms in which Gerald Dymock, an author afire with the fresh enthusiasm of youth, defines his conception of the beauty of life. Then comes that great teacher Experience, and one by one his ideals are trampled in the mire. He marries a selfish, shallow woman, and "love" becomes loathsome; the birth of his twin children is attended by no uplifting emotions; the deathbed of his wife serves only to emphasise the petty, empty nature of the woman. "Now I've learnt, seen life. And I loathe it. It sickens me—being in love—marriage—motherhood. The things people sentimentalise about. Instincts dressed up in fine clothes. . . ." Thus an older Gerald. The years roll by, and Gerald's daughter, Isolde, in her turn experiences the "great facts of life." The contrast is complete. The solemn beauty attending Isolde's marriage, her child's birth, and her heroic death is the means of restoring to Gerald the lost faith of his youth. The author is to be congratulated on a noteworthy novel; despite the difficult and extensive scope of the story, her treatment of the subject is always masterful, and the forces of realism and idealism are wielded with equal efficiency. In particular the tale is sweetened and enriched by the idyllic love story of Isolde and the sympathetic picture of the Devonshire folk among whom she lived.

DAUGHTERS OF ISHMAEL. By Reginald Wright Kauffman. 6s. (Stephen Swift.)

Mr. Kauffman's book is more of a sociological treatise than a novel, but it possesses several very remarkable features. He tells the story of the abduction of an American girl and of the unavailing efforts which she makes to escape from her surroundings. The book is intended, we are told, for "three classes of readers, and no more. It is intended for those who have to bring up children, for those who have to bring up themselves, and for those who, in order that they may think of bettering the weaker, are, on their own part, strong enough to begin that task by bearing a knowledge of the truth." It is terribly vivid and lifelike, and it gains much from the dispassionate and unsensational methods of the author, who has on the whole handled his theme with much delicacy, though we confess that there are a few details which impressed us as unnecessarily revolting. Never for a moment, however, can Mr. Kauffman's sincerity be called into question, and the effect of his book must, we think, be for good. Mr. John Masfield contributes an outspoken preface.

AN IRREGULAR MARRIAGE. By Sidney Warwick. 6s. (Greening.)

Adrian Cleve's second marriage certainly was irregular to a degree, but Mr. Sidney Warwick's treatment of a theme which is not, in fact, nearly so delicate as it sounds in the title of his book, is entirely unobjectionable. It is also a good deal more than that, for "An Irregular Marriage" is the best novel of pure sensation that we have come across for some time. It is almost impossible for us even to hint at the plot, which is complicated to a degree—though the author himself never seems troubled. Adrian Cleve in the first instance married an actress. She ran away from him, and he heard that she had met her death in the San Francisco earthquake. Cleve then married again, for the sake of a promising Parliamentary career. At the opening of the book he is not in love with his second wife, but his feelings change as soon as he discovers that she cares for him. But it is now almost too late, for the first wife has reappeared safe and sound. To crown everything comes the mysterious murder—of which Cleve is suspected—of the man whom he believes to be at the back of his first wife's desertion of him. Having got his hero into a highly uncomfortable position, Mr. Warwick sets to work to extricate him, and a very difficult business it is. He may be warmly congratulated on the ingenuity he displays, and the clever manner in which he contrives to keep the reader's sympathies on the side of the hero. "An Irregular Marriage" is a very readable book.

CHRISTOPHER. By Richard Pryce. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

The story is aptly named "Christopher." We begin with Christopher's first breath, and we are soon busy storing impressions and memories with the aid of Christopher's baby eyes and ears and nose. Delightful peeps and flashes they are, too, and wonderfully impressive. We grow up with Christopher, first at fierce-eyed Granny Oxeter's in Cheltenham, where people visit us in Bath chairs, and then in picturesque Boulogne—shall we ever forget its sights, its sounds, its smells? And here at Boulogne we are tremendously interested in "the beautiful lady who could not be called upon by grown-up people nor talked about before little boys," because, as dear, proper, good-natured nurse Trimmer informs us, she has run away from her husband in company with a young Englishman. Christopher, however, strikes up a friendship with the young Englishman, who is kind to him and calls him "little chap," and does not rest until he has married Christopher's widowed mother, the sweetest and most tender-hearted of women. Christopher's own love story is very different—hope, despair, hope again, and then, in the hour of joy, the shattering of the idol, the agony of disillusion. But the best part of the novel is the first part, dealing with Christopher's childhood, and we grudge the space devoted to Christopher's fruitless love quest. The love story of his mother is admirably told; the secret processes of the heart, the qualms of conscience, the self-searchings of a woman contemplating a second marriage, are depicted with great delicacy and sympathetic skill. The novel as a whole will certainly rank with Mr. Pryce's best work.

MAID'S MONEY. By Mrs. Henry Dudeney. 6s. (Heinemann.)

One of these days Mrs. Henry Dudeney will write a story about men and women who shall be real, faultily human creatures without being unpleasant; for there positively are such people in the world, whose stories are well worth telling, and we are convinced that Mrs. Dudeney can tell them, and will go so far as to forecast that when she does she will not only be recognised as one of the ablest of living women novelists, but will become one of the most popular. She writes admirably, with what for want of a more expressive word one may call a masculine strength of style; moreover, she has a true and sympathetic knowledge of humanity, cunning descriptive powers, and a blessed gift of humour. The characters in "Maid's Money," as in all her books, are wonderfully lifelike, but they are for the most part as unlikeable as they are unlovely. The only one who gets a hold upon you is Laban, the poor, struggling inventor, with the hands that are too elegant—"Horace Walpole might have had them; they are made to hold a sweetmeat-box; nothing stronger." His love for the somewhat coarse-minded, coarse-spoken, middle-aged Sarah is the one idyllic light that breaks through the rather sordid drabness of the story. "'Oh, but I love you,' he says to her, 'and I seem only to have just found it out, although I have known it all along. How do I know when it first started—love! You don't look on the weaving of the ranlow; the magic arch is there.' 'But that is beautiful, beautiful—and you say it to me,' returned Sarah, in a broken voice, and an awed voice. There were tears in her eyes, and they did not improve her. Suddenly, through the soft mist of this occasion, the sharp truth pierced him—it was a sword glittering in mid-air, supported by nothing. Sarah was old; she was even older than he was himself. He was already assaulted by a wistful sense of the too-late." Sarah and her cousin Rebecca had been the one a nursemaid, the other a private governess; and an old aunt dying left all her fortune between them on condition that they remained single and lived in the house she bequeathed to them in Cornwall. They were only too thankful to escape from the drudgery of servitude, and retired willingly to that haven. Then, for the first time, love came into the life of each of them; but Bosanquet, a disreputable medical practitioner, merely wanted Rebecca for her money; and even Laban's strange love for Sarah was involved with thoughts of her wealth, and she knew that he looked to a marriage with her to give him the means to complete his great invention and place it on the market. How could such a story end with happiness for anybody? It is brilliantly written, with shrewd touches of sarcasm and grim humour, and it ends as it was bound to, with happiness for no one, except perhaps Laban, who would certainly have been even more unhappy if he had obtained his desire. The realistic art with which the characters are drawn and the narrative unfolded cannot but win your admiration, and make you the more anxious that Mrs. Dudeney should exercise it in some book in more than one colour that shall handle life's nobler tragedies and finer issues.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mrs. Henry Dudeney.

THE PRINCIPAL GIRL. By J. C. Snaith. 6s. net. (Methuen.)

Mr. Snaith gives too easy a rein, in "The Principal Girl," to certain sometimes rather irritating eccentricities of style that we think he should curb. A lady of our acquaintance who is a great reader of novels gave this as the reason why she could not get on with it—much to our disappointment, for, despite these flies in the amber, we have rarely enjoyed a new novel so greatly as we have enjoyed this. The humour of character and incident in it is a sheer delight; there are sly little satirical touches on the foibles and small snobberies of modern society and of certain types of twentieth century literary and political character which so tickle you that you must needs laugh within you as you read them. The tale is of the ariest, gayest possible kind. It tells how a young man of good birth and no particular intellect falls desperately in love with the principal girl in a Drury Lane pantomime, and in defiance of the wishes of his parents, who have risen in the world, and are desirous of holding their own among the aristocracy, and in face of discouragement from the girl's grandmother, a charmingly stately old dame with a healthy pride in her great theatrical pedigree, gets his own way, marries his pretty and eminently sensible enchantress, and so far from having to repent comes to realize that he never did anything wiser. Once you grow reconciled to those snags in Mr. Snaith's style you will find this so fresh, bright, pleasant and amusing a novel that in your enthusiasm you won't want to say a word that is not warmly in praise of it. Its dialogue sparkles; it is alive with shrewd and witty comment on the life we are living to-day; and the plot is fashioned and unfolded with such an easy, careless-seeming narrative skill that but for those occasional mannerisms we should scarcely suspect the art of it. In this day of stories that are burdened with heavy problems and abnormal miseries so brilliant a novelist as Mr. Snaith, who knows how to be a true artist in something else than gloom, is a possession we cannot too fully appreciate.

The Bookman's Table.

THE ROLL OF THE SEASONS. By G. G. Desmond. 5s. net. (Stephen Swift.)

We know that it is one of the tritest of platitudes to say that we never count our blessings till we are robbed of them. In childhood, the perambulator is an affliction; in manhood a joy which we cannot possess. We cannot be driven about gratis now, and once we were coaxed and scolded into it. Further, who has not met the yokel who yearns for the city, and we, how often are we sighing for the country! Among our city acquaintances, however, we have discovered the individual who "Likes the country, but in truth must own

Most likes it best, when he studies it in town."

Mr. Desmond's book will delight the town-dweller who enjoys studying Nature most at home, but far more will it delight the many thousands who, being in "the fell clutch of circumstance," are forced to spend their lives in cities while their souls thirst for the simple joys of the country. "The Roll of the Seasons" is a collection of Nature articles reprinted from "The Nation." A happy gift of expression belongs to Mr. Desmond, and, most important of all, he writes with authority and kindly enthusiasm. We place his book on an accessible shelf, knowing full well that many will be the times when from it we shall seek and find solace for our city-stained soul.

THE WORKS OF MAN. By Lisle March Phillipps. 7s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

Mr. L. March Phillipps has written a very distinguished, book which it is probably a test of real culture to appreciate. "My desire has been," he says, "to confine myself to the consideration of art as an expression of human life and character. Selecting some of the great periods, or creative epochs, in the art of the world, I have endeavoured to deduce from them the distinguishing qualities, limitations, and point of view of the races which produced them." Above all he deals with architecture—Egyptian, Greek, Roman, Gothic, Arab, and Italian—as "the most broadly human of all the arts . . . the richest in human character." He has already given us more than a hint of his methods in his second book, "In the Desert"; his first being a record of the Boer War, "With Rimington's." One chapter of this new book, in fact, repeats portions of "In the Desert," in a reduced and more abstract form. It deals with "The Arab in Architecture," and shows how "the whimsical civilization which accompanied the Arab dominion and broke into so wild a frenzy of necromantic and astrological speculations is paralleled with curious felicity in the odd and freakish shapes, the flame-like mounting spirals and fantastically curved and twisted arches, into which the new architecture instantly developed." The sobriety and lucidity of the writing are beautiful and it must be pointed out that they make reading so easy as perhaps to blind the careless reader to the underlying learning and even to the importance of the result. Yet there is an excuse for the reader who is blind in this way. For Mr. March Phillipps has attempted to do a very great deal in a small space. His method has been to take away the flesh and blood and leave the graceful articulated bones—admirable, but a skeleton nevertheless. The obvious alternative was the impressionistic method. Had he used this he might have given some examples to help the reader who cannot instantly take up every hint from geography and history as it is made. He has left hardly anything to catch the eye. And Mr. March Phillipps takes other things for granted in a manner which has challenged our attention. He calls the Arabs fiery and unstable: their civilization and their arches crumbled. But he explains nothing when he compares their mental activity unfavourably with the rational culture of the European, and says "it was not indeed activity of the intellect so much as activity of the fancy and imagination." This strikes us as a very casual use of words: "fancy" and "imagination" do no more than cover up a difficulty which he elsewhere indicates as "the element, strongly mixed with the Arab civilization, which differentiates it from that of the Western races." The probability is that he has not gone far enough back. He has touched brilliantly on the swift Arab warfare and the swift Arab style of building as they appear to a Western mind, but he has hardly done more to show why they failed than to give that apparent weakness a depreciatory familiar name. He is inclined to say that the Arabs were passionate, and that passion fails before reason, and to say also that they failed and therefore must have been lacking in reason.

AN ACTOR'S NOTEBOOKS. By Frank Archer. 7s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul.)

It is curious how many men who have lived a full and interesting life have little of interest to tell you about it when they come to sit down towards the end of their careers and talk about the past. They have taken part in great events, but have no special or vivid remembrance of them; they have been comparatively intimate with famous men, but recall little of what they said and can tell you nothing much about them. We have been delighted to find that Mr. Frank Archer is not one of this unobservant majority. He has had a full and interesting life, he has met many famous and interesting men, and has observed and heard and remembered so much that he has been able to write one of the most attractive and most useful books of theatrical memoirs we have read for many years. He acted in the plays of Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade, came into close personal relations with these two men and adds something to our knowledge of both of them. Some of the Wilkie Collins letters that he prints are a distinct and important gain. He knew Westland Marston, Joseph Knight, Irving, Toole, all the leading actors of the later nineteenth century years; he counted Tom Taylor among his best friends, and gives an excellent descriptive account of a visit he paid to Tennyson at Farringford. He repeats the shrewd advice that Wilkie Collins gave him on the art of story writing, and sets down his conversation with Collins and others with an almost Boswellian cunning and minuteness. There are a good many references to Dickens, too; once Mr. Arnold heard him read at St. James's Hall, and "he left on me the impression that his powers of impersonation were greater than his ability in sustained, even reading. For instance, in level passages such a reader as Bellow was his superior, though when it came to realizing any of the characters of his own creation, dramatically, he reigned supreme." Not the least entertaining parts of the volume are those which touch on Mr. Arnold's personal experiences as an actor; but indeed the whole book makes capital reading, and is one that is sure of a permanent place among the records of the English stage.

Mr. Frank Archer.

From "An Actor's Note Books," by Frank Archer. (Stanley Paul.)

MASTERS OF ENGLISH JOURNALISM: A STUDY OF PERSONAL FORCES. By T. H. S. Escott. 12s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

In journalism the rule is that the unexpected happens. Changes in "the street of adventure" are as frequent as they are kaleidoscopic. To write more than a newspaper sketch about our newspapers is to risk a fall. Even Mr. Escott, with his wide, varied, almost unique experiences, and the special sources of much of his information, has been unable to avoid mistakes. Some of these mistakes are personal; some, such as the allusion to Grove's "History of Europe," (p. 225), are obviously the result of ineffective proof-reading. Perhaps the author has attempted too much. Certainly, though Mr. Escott's excursions into antiquity are in their way delightful, as coming from one who has never forgotten his scholarship in his journalism; and the pages devoted to the writers of news-letters and such "fathers of journalism" as Defoe, Steele, Addison, Cobbett, and the two Hunts make capital reading, one would have preferred the story proper to begin with the Walters in chapter One or Two rather than in chapter Seven. And it would have been an advantage from the reader's point of view if the art of the paragraph had been cultivated more assiduously. As it is the attention is frequently switched off from one topic to another without any preliminary note being sounded. An example of this is to be found on page 280, where, following on a reference to a veteran journalist, in which the personal pronoun is used, we have a sentence beginning "On his death," which came as a considerable shock to the present writer till he grasped the fact that the "death" referred to was that of the proprietor with whom the journalist in question had been associated. However, these matters are as the straws that on the surface float. The pearls, if submerged, exist; and those who take the necessary plunge will find them in fair quantity and lustre. Mr. Escott's book will serve as an authority for many years to come; no journalist will read it without interest and refreshment. And its tone is so kindly throughout that it seems ungracious to draw attention to its imperfections. The author, whilst fully alive to the advantages of the old school, takes to the new as a duck takes to water. He is not out to flatter the newspaper man. His view is that we are newspaper-ridden rather than newspaper driven. To him the journalist is "a stormy petrel," a "fisher in troubled waters." But "he has, in twentieth-century journalism, a dozen chances of making his personal mark where, under the old régime, he would not have had one." As to the future, where London is concerned, Mr. Escott's verdict is that "the point has been reached when experience seems likely to place its veto upon the repetition of undertakings already proved to be impracticable." In fine, journalism has sounded its last note and left no stratum of the reading public untapped. The Tribune tailed "because the public that commended and might have bought it was sufficiently supplied already." Like the stores, the great newspapers have become all-embracing. So far as we ourselves can foretell, the fat kine will swallow up the lean kine; or, to vary the metaphor, the comparatively small "shops," will combine and form a counterpart themselves to the stores.

CASANOVA AND HIS TIME. By E. Maynial. Translated by E. C. Mayne. 10s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

Most people are far better acquainted with the charlatan of fiction than the charlatan of fact, with the inimitable Dousterswivel of the "Antiquary" than the Italian swindler who adorned the eighteenth century. Once more ignorance is bliss; but if they would have thrust upon their vision a yet more satisfying picture of Sir Walter Scott's genius than they behold already, let them read this version of the Italian rogue's memoirs, and realise how "the Wizard of the North" in consulting old records utilised the materials at his disposal, how he placed a mass of nauseating rascality in his alembic and distilled from it a companionable and humorous character. "Den comes one herald, as we call Ernhold, winding his horn; and den come de great Peolphon, called the Mighty Hunter of de North, mounted on hims black stead." This is better than persuading a poor feeble-witted old dame that she is going to be reincarnated in a young boy. In his "Memoirs," which for cynical delight in wickedness rival those of Benvenuto Cellini, Casanova frankly ascribes some of his prestige to good luck. It was a stroke of luck that enabled him to make a hit with his oracular answers to M.d'O's questions as to the whereabouts of his lost portfolio. He was lucky too to live in an age when in France at all events "ennui had reduced everybody" (i.e., the upper ten thousand) "to lunacy." But he fortified his good fortune with much hard study. "He was crammed with Paracelsus, and was a great reader of Nostradamus." And so when, after serving his apprenticeship in deluding the treasure hunting farmer by the Rubicon, and a Venice nobleman, and the superstitious M.d'O, he came to Paris, he speedily scaled the heights of success: "All the women wore his portrait; he pretended to cure nearly every known ailment, sold a liquid which had the virtue of keeping those who drank it for ever at the same age; evoked the dead, and gave interviews to the highest personages in the State in the posture of an inspired Sibyl." Luck came again to his aid when the old Marquise d'Urfé, "the doyenne of the French Medæas," failed to attain the promised reincarnation. He had carried on the farce as far as he dared, had made the poor old lady stand in the water at Marseilles while the moon wrote comforting messages on the rippling waves, and then when the crisis was upon him, she most opportunely died. His prestige was saved so far as the Marquise was concerned, but Paris was beginning to see through him, and he retired to "embattail and to wall about" his fading reputation by taking up with what he cynically termed "the sublime trifling of freemasonry." His subsequent career was only remarkable for a visit to England in which he was routed by a young woman a trifle more knavish than himself, and by a friendship with that gambler and libertine Lorenzo da Ponte, whom an unkind fate inflicted on the world as the worthless librettist of two immortal tone poems, the "Nozze di Figaro" and "Don Giovanni."

FLOREAT ETONA. By Ralph Nevill 10s. net. (Macmillan.)

There are many books about Eton, and the appearance of a new volume on the most famous, if not perhaps the best, of all our public schools should boast some special feature to justify its existence. It is likely that Mr. Nevill can substantiate such a claim by reason of his remarkably well informed chapters on the ancient fabric, associations, and general history of his old school and on the really excellent series of illustrations that he has chosen to adorn his lively and engaging text. For Mr. Nevill, who is not faultless either as a writer or a critic of life, has a backing of sound intelligence behind many of his strongly expressed opinions. It is equally surprising and pleasing to find so ardent a Tory denouncing the horrors of Long Chamber and criticising the abuses that were put an end to with the divorce of Eton from Kings. He has little to tell us that is new, and a good deal that is not new, concerning Dr. Keate, Montem, and a dozen other figures and facts of traditional Etonian lore, but he loves a good story almost as much as he hates a good Socialist. Witness his legend of the Founder's statue, which remains at the present well-nigh as grimy as it was when the small child of a college official was led to understand that Henry VI. had been a black man. As a loyal son of Eton, the infant in question learnt to salute the statue whenever he passed it in the school-yard. On visiting Windsor with his nurse, and perceiving a private of one of the West India regiments, the child believed itself confronted by Henry VI. in the flesh. Solemnly rising in its perambulator and exclaiming "Founder," the infant accorded the astounded soldier a reverent salute. The "restoration" of the College Chapel in 1847, thanks to the well-intentioned but ill-advised munificence of Wilder, is discussed by Mr. Nevill with the outspoken censure that it richly deserves. It is interesting, too, to know the genesis of the popular "Eton Boating Song," the words of which were written by the eccentric assistant master "Billy" Johnson, whose epigram, by the way, about a colleague who wore a long beard, is hardly worthy of being put on record. Mr. Nevill grieves for the discontinuance of "Montem," though the ceremony seems to have been rowdy and unedifying enough, and the extortion of money from wayfarers by boys armed with swords seems to have little to recommend it on the score of good manners or taste. But well-a-day, these "old festivals" must be "defended against the attacks of those hawk-eyed commercial gamblers who, calling themselves 'business men,' dominate the modern world." And of Herbert Stockhose, the Montem Poet, we learn that though of lowly birth his qualities secured him a unique place of many far above him in rank. "The Board School," adds Mr. Nevill, "has now rendered all such humble types extinct." For which Mr. Nevill is partly consoled in that the college drag-hunt still continues, despite "the absurd agitation of so-called humanitarians," to whose voices of "hysterical sentimentalism" the authorities very properly refused to listen.

IN A GERMAN PENSION. By Katherine Mansfield. 6s. (Stephen Swift)

These are not kind sketches of what the publishers call "the heart, and mind, and soul of the quaint Bavarian people." They are, on the contrary, wild, and free and untrammelled, almost to a painful degree of candour—so untrammelled, indeed, as to make one wonder, whether after all, the author has not spoilt her own effects by the emphasis she places upon the beast hidden in some men. Some critics may contend that this is the sort of sketch we shall get almost inevitably when the modern woman becomes really articulate, but, for our own part, we prefer to think that Katherine Mansfield has been led away by the intensity of her vision, and by what she imagines wrongly are the ultimate requirements of art and of truth. There was really no sound necessity for writing such morbid sketches as "The Swing of the Pendulum," or "The Child Who-Was-Tired," and the treatment of the young man and the servant, Sabina, in the chapter entitled "At Lehmann's" only leaves one with a sense of infinite repulsion. In the other sketches where she observes the peculiarities of Bavarian manners at table, in conversation, on the domestic horizon, and in dress, Miss Mansfield is undeniably penetrating, clever, and effective. In her first sketch, "Germans at Meat," there is also an exceedingly amusing comparison between the appetites of the English and the Germans. Thus the German Herr Rat explains how "at nine o'clock I make myself an English breakfast, but not much. Four slices of bread, two eggs, two slices of cold ham, one plate of soup, two cups of tea—that is nothing to the English." Whereupon one Fraulein Stiegelauer answers: "Do they really eat so much soup, and baker's bread, and pig's flesh, and tea and coffee, and stewed fruit, and ham and eggs, and cold fish, and kidneys, and hot fish, and liver? And do the ladies eat that too, especially the ladies?" "Certainly," quoth the Herr Rat magnificently, "I, myself, have noticed it when I was living in an hotel in Leicester Square." Later, in the conversation, a speaker says blandly to an English visitor when the question of invasion is discussed: "You English have got no army at all; only a few little boys with their veins full of nicotine poisoning." And a more generous German added: "Don't be afraid. We don't want England. If we did, we would have had her long ago."

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. SEELEY, SERVICE & CO.

As Government Agent for the Queensland Labour Trade in the South Sea Islands, Mr. Douglas Rannie has had many queer experiences and several narrow escapes from death. Of these he tells in a very brisk and interesting fashion in My Adventures among South Sea Cannibals (16s. net), a record of travel and human experience as exciting as any we have ever come across. Not the least interesting portions of the volume are those descriptive of the abuses practised by unscrupulous agents in the search for "material." There are many fine illustrations from photographs.

THE HOUSE OF CASSELL

THE THREAD OF LIFE

By the Infanta Eulalia of Spain.

This is the book which was forbidden by the King of Spain. It contains the Infanta's outspoken opinion on subjects such as Divorce, The Family, Socialism, Morality, The Working Classes, The War against Feminism, The Press, &c.

READY MARCH 14th.

With Rembrandt Photogravure Frontispiece.

Demy 8vo.

Price 10s. 6d. net.

A TEMPTING AND VARIED FICTION LIST.

MARIE

By H. RIDER HAGGARD

6s.

"Something more than mere excitement make the interest of the story. 'Time' 'From the quiet life of the story, the reader with a grip which cannot be shaken off. 'The Daily Chronicle' 'If the above point were equal the quality there is a more interesting work.' - Daily Chronicle

THE OPEN VALLEY

By HELEN H. WATSON

6s.

A study in the life of a type - told with literary truth in mind of the North of England.

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY

6s.

By a Canadian author who has a reputation on the other side for the delightful humor and pathos. Her price

THE HEART OF LIFE

By PIERRE DE COULEVAIN

6s.

By the Author of 'The Unknown Life' - An exquisite idyll dealing with the quest for knowledge of what is at the heart of life.

THE BODY OF HIS DESIRE

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED

6s.

The theme is the psychic conflict in the soul of a preacher and the pitfall of the occult.

A LONG SHADOW

By GWENDOLEN PRYCE

6s.

A really fine genre picture of Welsh people and Wales by a brilliant writer who has been called 'The Welsh Crockett'.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., La Belle Sauvage, LONDON, E.C.

LYNWOOD & Co., Ltd.,

PUBLISHERS,

12, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Telephone - - 8331 Central.

AUTHORS are invited to send their Manuscripts for consideration, and where possible an offer will be made. Catalogue of publications forwarded post free on application.

Literary Work placed to the best advantage. Write for free prospectus of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. We placed a full-length novel, within a week of receipt, with a leading London Publisher at excellent terms! "Locksley," Presburg Rd., New Malden, Surrey.

Young Writers learn Style and Technique! Write for free particulars of the Literary Instruction Correspondence Courses of the Surrey Literary Agency. Prepared by a Practical Author. Success Guaranteed. Address as above.

ALSTON RIVERS'S NOVELS.

THE CLOAK OF CONVENTION

By Leslie Moore. 6s. 'Sunday Mail' says: "A hopeful first novel." 'The Morning Leader' says: "A striking novel shows high promise."

THE LITTLE BLUE DEVIL

By Dorothea Mackellar and Ruth Bedford. Just published. 6s.

A FAERY LAND FORLORN

By Mrs. H. H. Penrose, author of "Denis Trench," "A Sheltered Woman" etc. 6s.

THE UNBALANCED SCALE

By A. S. M. Hutchinson, author of "Once Aboard the Lugger" 6s.

A SEMI-DETACHED MARRIAGE

By Margaret Legge, a new and clever novelist. Ready shortly. 6s.

THE IMPOSSIBLE IDEAL

By William Westrup, author of "A Sentimental Cynic." Ready almost immediately. 6s.

1912—A PROPOSAL

to those readers of the "Bookman" who are buyers or borrowers of high-grade novels.

You naturally desire the latest works of fiction, and also to have some idea of a book's contents before ordering it from your library or bookshop. We would suggest, therefore, that you send us a post card with your name and address, and we will undertake to advise you in advance of the date of publication of each of our new novels, together with a brief synopsis of the story. You will thus ensure securing an early copy, and at the same time avoid asking for a novel which is not likely to suit your taste, for tastes vary in fiction as in other directions.

Please send post card to-day

LONDON: ALSTON RIVERS, LIMITED,
BROOKE STREET, HOLBORN BARS.

MESSRS. MILLS & BOON.

In her latest story, The Cost (6s.), Miss L. G. Moberly cannot be said to have found a subject equal to the ability frequently displayed in her writing. There are many pages of excellent and sharply-defined description, but the whole is made to turn round a somewhat commonplace and not very convincing story of seduction. At the turning-point of her fate, Joyce Meredith has not the courage to confess her fall, but returns to her father's house to experience to the full the nemesis of duplicity. It is doubtless a striking situation, but no less certainly an inartistic improbability, that brings into her happy married life her abandoned daughter as her children's governess. At this, and at many points in the story we catch ourselves thinking of "East Lynne," and never more so than before the fall of the curtain, when husband and wife are reconciled at the death-bed of their child. "'Little son,' he heard her whisper, 'Little son—I am going to try—and learn my lesson.'" We are bound to confess that we have grown too cynical to shed a single tear more over such indecent assaults on our emotions.

MR. EVELEIGH NASH.

The title-page and Table of Contents, and a not easily-missed prefatory note, should, we think, be the medium of informing the reader that a book is a collection of sketches and not a continuous novel. Because the opposite method is still a not infrequent practice, we take leave to raise the protest in connection with Love and Laughter, by John Savile Judd (3s 6d. net), a collection of forty very skilful and dainty sketches. Mr Judd's work is often reminiscent, but usually very happily so, as in his delightful sketch "An Old Retainer," in which Mrs. Wheeler pretty plainly betrays her Elian descent. "She adores Royalty. She rejoices when Royalty rejoices, and mourns when Royalty mourns. She thought that she was doing rather a presumptuous thing in living after Queen Victoria. . . . Current events affect Mrs. Wheeler in an uncommon way. There is no such thing as a nine days' wonder with her. She wonders for years about things. She is still worrying about the Druce case."

MESSRS SIDGWICK & JACKSON.

In Phyllis and Felicity, Diana Meyrick (6s.), James Diggory Marveigne, son of Sir Diggory Marveigne, had married Felicity Clun, the daughter of his mother's French maid, and the village Whiteley. Felicity had died after giving birth to a daughter—another Felicity. James Diggory Marveigne had incurred the displeasure of his aristocratic relations when he married Felicity Clun, but on her death they welcomed him back into the family fold. Felicity, junior, however, was sent into exile at a seaside resort under the care of an aunt. She would never have returned home had it not been for the death of Lady Alicia, Marveigne's second wife, who had borne him a daughter, Phyllis. Phyllis and Felicity, therefore, had never met until the story opens. Phyllis being the daughter of Lady Alicia was, of course, genteel and full of good works, but rather shy. Felicity, being the daughter of Felicity Clun, was rather common and selfish and cocksure. Their good looks, however, amply atoned for their shortcomings. The story, as would naturally be expected, describes the adventures of two young ladies in a great hurry to get married. Felicity had given her hand to a poet at Southsea, but when she came home she forgot Southsea and robbed Phyllis of her Prince Charming, the Radical M.P., and popular young squire. The poet pursued Felicity, however, and Felicity was only playing with the Radical M.P., and everything ends as it should end. Miss Meyrick has not written a great book, but we predict a success for it at the circulating libraries.

MESSRS. JOHN LONG, LTD

In Chicane (6s.), the assistant of a sort of feminine Raffles tells of the adventures of herself and her companion in the search for money. The two ladies are not particular about their (usually burglarious) methods, but they are likeable enough to read about, though we confess that we should not like to meet quite such desperate persons in real life. In fact, Mr. Oliver Sandys's new book is entirely non-moral, but it is also vivacious and readable—a sure amusement for an idle hour.

MESSRS. JOHN OUSELEY, LTD.

In Darwin and the Bible (6s. net) Mr. H. Armytage has compiled a lengthy and elaborate counterblast to certain Darwinian theories. Although the author shows but slight acquaintance with recent developments of the doctrine of evolution, his book contains much sound work, and it should be particularly useful to speakers at meetings of working men. Full references are given and a large variety of subjects covered, but the volume would have benefited by the inclusion of an index. It cannot be denied, however, that its subject-matter is at once interesting and effective.

MESSRS. GREENING & CO.

Mr. Guy Thorne takes up an essentially sombre and painful theme in The Drunkard (6s.), and tells the story of a brilliant young man of letters, Gilbert Lothian, who had inherited dipsomaniac tendencies from his father. In his normal condition, Gilbert is a charming, right-minded man of fine ideals and honourable thoughts, but under the influence of drink he degenerates into a base and contemptible creature without scruples or any sort of self-control. He is married and loves his wife, a quiet, trustful, patient little woman; but when he is in the grip of the drunk habit he loathes her, and is false to her. The story ends, as it was bound to, in tragedy. The regeneration that follows the tragedy is effectively managed, but not quite convincing. It was, perhaps, a mistake to make both Gilbert and his illegitimate brother warped by this same dipsomania, and to make each of them murder his wife; and such phrases as "the Fiend Alcohol" have a cheap air that jars a little; but there are strong passages in the story which is full of interest and suggestion, especially for those who are concerned with the problems of temperance reform.

Photo by Lanyon, Cornwall.

Mr. Guy Thorne.

MESSRS. ALSTON RIVERS.

We believe The Cloak of Convention, by Leslie Moore (6s.) is a first novel, and if it has here and there some flaw of immaturity, more of thought perhaps than of expression, it is on the whole well written, and has in it much of promise. But the author does not win our sympathy for Zoe; she and Dick Vincent live together as man and wife, and we are expected to regard her as a fine, high-souled, noble girl, yet this is all her explanation of her conduct when, after Dick's unexpected inheritance of a peerage has separated them, she has learned to love someone else, and her past comes to light: "He was poor as I was then. I had not begun to make money by my writing. I barely earned enough to keep myself. And it was the same with him." This poverty is also at the outset pleaded as the sufficient reason, but how two people can afford to live together without being married, yet cannot afford to marry and live together, needs more explaining. If Miss Moore will leave that weary old theme alone and tell us a story of people who are big enough and brave enough to be conventional, we predict that her next novel will be something well worth reading. This is good; but we are sure she has it in her to do better.

MESSRS. CASSELL & CO.

Mr. S. Leonard Bastin's book, Wonders of Plant Life (3s. 6d. net) is popular in the best sense, being at once thought-provoking, readable, and accurate. In the course of eight chapters the author covers the whole story of plant life from seed to maturity, and he makes frequent diversions to cover the particular aspects of various special cases. Much attention is devoted to the perpetuation of species, and an especially interesting chapter deals with the feelings of plants. A striking feature of the volume is the large number and general excellence of the illustrations, eight of which are very beautiful specimens of colour printing.

Let YOUR next Bookcase be a Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcase

If you are thinking of buying a new Bookcase, don't buy one of the fixed size kind. A fixed-size Bookcase is seldom the right size. It may suffice for a time, but, sooner or later, it will prove too small for the books you possess. Again, you may be moving into a new house where a different size or shape of Bookcase may be necessary. It matters not—if you own a Globe Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase.

The G. W. "Elastic" Bookcase is built up of Units. You can buy just the number of Units you need, and build them up just in the way you please—vertically or horizontally. If in a year's time you want more book accommodation you simply add one or more Units, and if at any time you move into a new house, you can take the Units apart and re arrange them to suit the space available. The Units interlock, and at every stage you have a complete Bookcase.

The advantages of such a Bookcase are obvious. There are other advantages too, for which see our special booklet—sent to any address on request. Ask for Booklet No. 18 B.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London.

82, Victoria Street, S.W.

98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

LITERARY AGENCY.

The Wiener Agency, Ltd., 64, Strand, London, W.C.

Every facility for placing work of all descriptions.

Apply for prospectus free, from

MANAGER, LITERARY DEPARTMENT.

BOOKS.

Send a card for GLAISHER'S FEBRUARY CATALOGUE of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

MANY EXCELLENT BARGAINS

— CATALOGUE GRATIS AND POST FREE. —

WM. GLAISHER, Ltd.,

Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

FOR SALE, 11th EDITION ENCYCLOPAEDIA
BRITANNICA, issued by Cambridge University Press at $42 10s., absolutely new (unused).
Write offers to: A. McIntosh, 34, Dean St., Newcastle.

WANTED.—December, 1911, Number of
"BOOKMAN."—A.J.H., Box 719, HODDER
& STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London,
E.C.

LIBRARIES CATALOGUED by a gentleman
Graduate at Oxford, with Literary experience.
Particulars, "G.V." Manor House, Dunkineely, Ireland.

TO meet the requirements of a World of Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen users, our Factories produce over a million and a half Gold nibs every year. The variety is bewildering—every degree of fine, medium, and broad pointed pens being manufactured. All pens are 14ct. Gold and tipped with iridium. Nib willingly changed if it does not exactly suit your hand.

Made in four styles and in numerous chased patterns in Silver and Gold for presentation. Prices of Regular and Self-filling Styles, 10/6, 15/-, and upwards. Of Safety and Pump-filling Styles, 12/6 and upwards. (With Clip cap 1/- extra.)

Of Stationers, Jewellers, etc. Booklet free from L. and C. HARTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingway, London. New York 173, Broadway. Paris 6, Rue de Hanovre. Brussels 14, Rue de Pont Neuf. Vienna, Milan, Dresden, Zurich.)

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS

BOOKS BOUGHT.

ON SALE AT
EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP,
14-16, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

BOOKS
EXCHANGED.

- Whyte-Melville's Society and Sporting Novels, handsome set, half-calf gilt, illus. 25 vols., £8 15s.
- Hood (Tom), Works, 10 vols. new, half-calf gilt, 1869, £3 3s.
- Dickens (Chas.), Works, The famous "Chas. Dickens Edition," now scarce, 21 vols. new, half-calf, gilt, £4 4s., 1867, etc.
- Carroll (Lewis), The Hunting of the Snark, 1st ed., cloth, 21s. 1876
- Sylvie and Bruno, 1889, 1st ed., 25s.
- Alice in Wonderland, 1878 ; Through the Looking-Glass, 1872 ; 2 vols., cloth, 21s.
- Cranmer Bible, 1553, thick folio, calf, fine copy, £12 12s.
- Lydekker's Royal Natural History, 6 vols. half-morocco, £2 10s.
- Greenaway (Kate), first eds.—Language of Flowers, 18s. ; A Day in a Child's Life, 16s. ; The Royal Progress of King Pepito, 7s. 6d. ; The English Spelling-Book, 7s. 6d. ; Girls' Own Paper, 1892, 12s. 6d. ; Under the Window, 21s. ; Heartsease, 1880, 12s. 6d. ; Routledge Christmas No. 1881, 16s.
- Crane (Walter), first eds.—The First of May, a Fairy Masque, in Portfolio, 30s. ; Wise's New Forest, Artist's edition, presentation copy, 25s. (only 50 pub.), 1883 ; The Work of Walter Crane with Notes by the Artist, "Art Journal," 1899, 10s. 6d. ; Illus. to Shakespeare's Tempest, in portfolio, 1893, 15s. ; Pan Pipes 21s. ; A Masque of Days, 7s. 6d. ; Queen Summer, 7s. 6d. ; Procession of the Months, 21s. ; Renaissance, 1891, 15s.
- Walter Crane's Picture Books in 1 vol., 1900, 15s.
- Lawrence (Sir Thos.), by Lord Ronald Gower, with 4 coloured plates and 48 other large illus., with 13 small plates and a catalogue of the Works by A. Graves, a fine book, pub. £8 net, price £5 5s.
- Portraits, Burlington Fine Arts Club Mezzotint Portraits, folio, fine book, 1902, scarce, £7 7s.
- Dugdale's Visitation of Yorkshire, with additions, edited by J. W. Clay, 2 vols., 1899, £2 2s.
- Eliot (Geo.), Romola, with illus. by Sir F. Leighton, ed.-de-luxe, scarce, 1880, 2 vols., £3 3s.
- Scott (Wm. Bell), Poems, Ballads, etc., with 17 etchings by the author and Alma Tadema, 1875, 25s.
- Hunting (Haddon Hall Library), only 150 copies on hand-made paper pub., full vellum, 1900, 21s.
- Caradoc Press Vicar of Wakefield, and Walton's Angler, full-calf, fine books, 15s. each.
- Ramsay (Dean), Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character, 2 vols., 1861, Presentation copy, 10s. 6d.
- Baldwin Brown, The Glasgow School of Painters, with 74 reproductions and portraits by J. Craig Annan, folio, 1908, pub. £2 12s. 6d. ; £5 5s. net.
- Gilbert (William), King George's Middy, with 150 illus. by W. S. Gilbert, 1st ed. ; cloth, 1872, 15s.
- Dulac's Sleeping Beauty, 15s.
- Gilbert (W. S.), first eds.—Original Plays, 1878, 12s. 6d. ; Songs of a Savoyard, 1891, illus. by the author, 12s. 6d. ; The Pinatore Picture Book, illus. by Alice B. Woodward, 1908, 10s. 6d.
- Creney's Monumental Brasses of Europe, folio, 1884, 35s.
- Rackham's Grimm's Fairy Tales, 15s.
- Land of Enchantment, printed on vellum, 21s.
- Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d.
- Naval and Military Trophies, personal relics of British Heroes, a series of water-colour drawings, a very handsome book, pub. £7 7s. ; price 30s.
- Blackmore's Lorna Doone, beautifully illus., a fine presentation volume, pub. 35s. ; 12s. 6d.
- Sporting Books, Vyners's Notitia Venatica, Treatise on Fox-Hunting, Ackerman, 1847, cloth, £3 10s. ; Jorrock's Jaunts and Jollities, coloured plates, by Alken, cloth, 1869, £3 10s. ; Science of Foxhunting, by Scrutator, 1868, 25s. ; Noble Science of Foxhunting, by Radcliffe, illus., 1839, cloth, 35s. ; Taplin's Sporting Dictionary and Rural Repository, 2 vols., calf, 1803, 15s. ; Nimrod's Northern Tour, cloth, 1857, 21s. ; The Gentleman's Recreation, 1677, rare old book on Hunting, Hawking, Fishing, Fowling, etc., £2 2s.
- Scott, first eds.—Ballads and Lyrical Pieces, boards, uncut, 1806, £2 2s. ; Anne of Geierstein, 3 vols., boards, uncut, 1829, £1 10s. ; The Antiquary, old, half-calf, edges uncut, rare, 1816, 42s.
- Dickens, first eds.—Complete in parts, very rare, Bleak House, £2 2s. ; Our Mutual Friend, 35s. ; Little Dorrit, 42s.
- Famous Household ed., 21 vols., 4to, cloth, 45s.
- Austin Dobson, Vignettes in Rhyme, 1st ed. dedicated to Anthony Trollope, cloth, 1873, 35s.
- Elliott (Frances M.), Old Court Life in Spain, 2 vols., 1893, 35s.
- Merriman (H. Seton), From One Generation to Another, 2 vols., 1st ed., 30s.
- Bute's Roman Breviary, £2 10s. 1908
- Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, 1st ed., half-calf, 1839, 15s.
- Encyclopædic Dictionary, 8 vols., 30s., pub. £4 4s. Cassell, 1902 3
- Myers's Human Personality, 2 vols., very scarce, 38s.
- Donnelly's Atlantis, scarce, 10s. 6d.
- Bacon (Lord), Sylva Sylvarum, with portrait, folio, calf, £3 3s. 1635
- Donne (J. D.), Poems, original calf, rare, 1639, £6 6s.
- Haggard's Rural England, 2 vols., 1st ed., 25s. 1902
- Jack Harkaway Series of Boys' Books, 14 vols. bound in 9, profusely illus., now very scarce, £4 4s.
- FitzGerald (Edward), Letters and Literary Remains, edited by Wright, 3 vols. ; £2 2s. 1889
- Rawlinson's Sixth Great Oriental Monarchy, 1873, rare, £4 4s.
- Wordsworth's Poems, rare, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1807, £3 3s.
- Louis Morin, French Illustrators, folio, only 150 issued, 1893, 25s.
- Symonds (J. A.), Giovanni Boccaccio as Man and Author, rare, 1st ed. ; 1895, £2 2s.
- Walt Whitman, a Study, large paper, 1893, £2 2s.
- Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama, 1884, 1st ed. ; £2 10s.
- Free Review (The), edited by J. M. Robertson, 10 vols., 1893-8, £2 10s.
- Robinson's Eastern Carpets (second series), folio, fine work, 30s. 1898
- Wilmott's Warley Garden in Spring and Summer, fine plates, beautiful vol., folio, 21s.
- Sir Walter Scott's Halidon Hill, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 21s. 1882
- The Doom of Devorgoil, 1st ed., boards, uncut, 30s. 1830
- E. B. Browning, Casa Guidi Windows, 1st ed., 1851, 21s.
- E. B. Browning, Poems, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1845, 45s. ; The Seraphim, 1st ed., 1838, 42s. ; Last Poems, 1st ed., 1862, 10s. 6d.
- Robert Browning, Poems, 2 vols., 1849, 42s. ; Dramatis Personæ, 1st ed., 1864, 15s. ; Christmas Eve and Easter Day, 1st ed., 1859, 25s.
- Tennyson's Maud, 1st ed., 1855, 21s. ; Idylls of the King, 1859, 10s. 6d.
- Mather's Kabbalah Unveiled, 1st ed., cloth, 1887, £2 2s.
- Mead's Simon Magus, very rare, 1892, 4to, wrappers, £2 2s.
- Geographical Historie of Africa, by J. Leo, folio, calf, rare, £8 8s. 1600
- Hamerton's Paris in Old and Present Times, large paper copy, 1885, £4 4s. for £2 2s.
- Brontë's Poems, 1st ed., 1846, £2 2s.
- Hall Caine's Politics and Art, 1820, very rare, £3 3s.
- Two Autograph Letters from "Greeba Castle," 15s.
- Dublin University Magazine, vols. 1 to 53, £6 10s. 1832-59
- Bradley's Ethical Studies, 1876, £2 10s.
- Beardsley's First and Second Book of Drawings, 2 vols. with extra illus. from Juvenal and Lucian, "Studio" and other Sources, a unique lot, £6 6s.
- Meredith (George), One of Our Conquerors, 1st ed., 3 vols., 1891, 25s.
- Thackeray's Works, 13 vols., 1887, £2 5s.
- Dickens' Works, early reprints with all the original illus., 15 vols., half-calf gilt, £6 10s., 1871, etc.
- Halford's Dry Fly Entomology, 1897, rare, 30s.
- Fitzgerald (E.), The Complete Works of, 7 vols., handsome set, pub. £8 5s., price £3 3s.
- Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, Twelve Coloured Plates after drawings, by Abanindro Nath Tajore, to illus. the Rubaiyat, in portfolio, "Studio" Office, 15s. 1910
- Works of Robert Herrick, edited, with Biographical Notice, by T. Maitland, 2 vols., half-morocco, 1823, rare, £2 10s.
- Dulac's Illustrations : Shakespeare's The Tempest, ed.-de-luxe, signed by the artist, £3.
- Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, illus. by Heath Robinson, ed.-de-luxe, signed by artist, £2 15s.
- Benson (A. C.), Poems, 1st ed., 1893, 35s.
- The Professor, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1900, 21s.
- Henley's Song of the Sword, and Other Poems, 1st ed., 1892, 10s. 6d.
- Whistler, Illustrated Catalogue of the Whistler Memorial Exhibition, ed.-de-luxe, £2 2s.
- Rothenstein's English Portraits, folio, rare, 1898, 35s.
- Whymper's Travels Amongst the Great Andes of the Equator, 1892, fine presentation copy from the author with inscription, 21s.
- Whymper's Scrambles in the Alps, 1st ed., cloth, 1871, 28s. 6d.
- Old Time Punishments, by W. Andrews, F.R.H.S., L.P., only 100 printed, 4to, cloth, 1890, 25s.
- Lang (Andrew), The True Story Book, large paper, 1893, only 150 issued, 21s.
- The Green Fairy Book, large paper, 1892, only 150 issued, 21s.
- Fairy Books, 1st eds. of Blue, Brown, Crimson, Grey, Green, Violet, Yellow, the lot, 7 vols., £3 3s.
- Ruskin's Fors Clavigera, 9 vols., royal 8 vo. half calf, wide margins. A rare collection, £4 10s., 1871. With this is a set of Photos illustrating Fors Clavigera and referred to in the work.
- Praelerita, 3 vols., bound to match above, illustrated, 1866, 30s.
- Ruskin's Seven Lamps of Architecture, 1st edition, fine copy Presentation Copy to Digby Wyatt, Esq., with the Author's Sincere Regards, original cloth, £5 5s. 1849
- Stephen Phillips's Eremus, 1st edition, small 4to, original pink bds., rare, £3 10s., 1849.
- Lea's Sacerdotal Celibacy, 2 vols., 1907, 15s.
- Library of French Masterpieces, 12 vols., 8 vo., Heinemann, 1904, £3 12s. 6d.
- Contents : Madame Bovary ; Lady with Camellias, Chantreuse of Parma, Etc., Etc., Edited by Edmund Gosse.

FOOTPRINTS OF FAMOUS AMERICANS IN PARIS

By JOHN JOSEPH CONWAY

With an Introduction by MRS. JOHN LANE

Many Illustrations

12s. 6d. net. Immediately.

THE ANARCHISTS: THEIR FAITH & THEIR CREED

By ERNEST A. VIZETELLY

Many Illustrations

10s. 6d. net.

MARGARET OF FRANCE DUCHESS OF SAVOY

1523-1577

By WINIFRED STEPHENS

Seventeen Illustrations

12s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A COURT PAINTER

By H. JONES THADDEUS, R.H.A., F.R.G.S., etc

Handsomely Illustrated by the Author's Pictures

12s. 6d. net. Immediately.

NAPOLEON & KING MURAT

By ALBERT ESPITALIER

Translated by J. LEWIS MAY

Sixteen Illustrations

12s. 6d. net.

BEAUTY AND UGLINESS

By VERNON LEE & C. ANSTRUTHER THOMAS

Many Illustrations

10s. 6d. net.

THESE BOOKS ARE PUBLISHED BY JOHN LANE, LONDON AND NEW YORK

Ask everywhere for METHUEN'S SHILLING LIBRARY. The last two volumes are TALES OF MEAN STREETS, by Arthur Morrison, and LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME, by Oscar Wilde.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

Underneath is a remarkable list. The demand is great. Send your order to your library without delay.

Messrs. METHUEN have just published a new volume of stories by ARNOLD BENNETT, under the title THE MATADOR OF THE FIVE TOWNS.

They have also just published THE REVOLT, by PUINAM WEALE.

JOSEPH IN JEOPARDY, by FRANK DANBY, is the book of the day.

Two charming romances are THE GUESTS OF HERCULES, by C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, and THE QUEST OF GLORY, by MARJORIE BOWEN.

THE QUEST OF GLORY (2)	Marjorie Bowen
JOSEPH IN JEOPARDY (2)	Frank Danby
THE GUESTS OF HERCULES	C. N. & A. M. Williamson
A MAN FROM THE NORTH (2)	Arnold Bennett
FIRE IN STUBBLE (4)	Baroness Orczy
THE CHINK IN THE ARMOUR (3)	Mrs. Belloc Lowndes
THE CHIEF COMMISSIONER	Hilda M. Swabey
THE PRINCIPAL GIRL (2)	J. C. Snaith
A QUEEN OF CASTAWAYS	John Barnett
THE HUMAN CRY (2)	Mrs. David Ritchie
FELIX CHRISTIE (2)	Peggy Webling
FORGED IN STRONG FIRES (2)	John Ironside
THE SEATS OF THE MIGHTY (2s. net)	Arthur Morrison
FELIX (2s. net)	Robert Hichens
THE SECRET WOMAN (2s. net)	Eden Phillpotts

N.B. - The figure in brackets denotes the number of editions printed or in the press.

Methuen's New Books.

To be published during April.

THE POCKET EDITION OF THE WORKS OF CHARLES AND MARY LAMB. Edited by F. V. LUCAS. With frontispieces in Photo gravure. In Six Monthly Volumes. Vol. 1., Miscellaneous Prose. Vol. II., Elia and the Last Essays of Elia. Fcap. 8vo, Gilt top. 5s. each.

THE PROGRESS OF THE NATION. First compiled by G. R. PORRER. A completely New Edition. Edited by F. W. HIRSH. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

THE COMPLETE SWIMMER. By FRANK SACHS. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo 7s. 6d. net.

ON THE COURT AND OFF. By A. F. WHITING, Lawn Tennis Champion 1910, 1911. Specially Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

EDINBURGH AND THE LOTHIANS. By FRANCIS WALL. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, R.B.A. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

RAMBLES IN SOMERSET. By G. W. WADE, D.D., and J. H. WADE, M.A. With 20 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

LONDON. By GEORGE CLINCH, F.S.A. Scot., F.G.S. With 32 Illustrations and a Map. Small Pott 8vo, Gilt top. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, leather, 3s. 6d. net. (Little Guides)

PROGRESSIVE POULTRY CULTURE. By ARTHUR A. BRIGHAM. Revised by S. C. SHARPE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

METHUEN & Co., Ltd., 36, Essex Street, LONDON, W.C.

REMARKABLE REVIEWS.

Is this the Best Review of the Season? The "Daily Mail" and Mr. CHARLES GARVICE'S New Novel.

"We sat up half the night reading 'Love in a Snare,' and when we had finished read it again. Not since Besant wrote 'All Sorts and Conditions of Men,' and incidentally laid the foundations of the People's Palace, have we had a better story of East and West. . . . Love, hope, grief, and joy are not of this or any age, but of all time; they are like the simple notes of a scale which may be woven into anything mean or noble according to the skill of the composer. Mr. Garvice has woven them into an Arabian Nights tale of singular beauty, and we, for our part, are prepared to swear that it is all true, in the only sense in which the truth of a story really matters." Daily Mail.

LOVE IN A SNARE. By CHARLES GARVICE, Author of "The Other Girl." 6/-

"One of the books I really and truly love."

"'The Sick-a-Bed Lady' is as fascinating— even more so perhaps as 'Molly Make-Believe.' Mrs. Abbott has the supreme gift of charm and humour to an extraordinary degree, she can be sentimental without being silly, and so pathetic in a kind of half-smiling way— which, after all, is the true pathos of life— that everything I read of hers from now onwards shall have its niche on the shelves of my library belonging to the books I really and truly love. It is a treat to find a writer whose point of view is as fresh and unfettered, whose literary style has a quaintness all its own, and whose understanding of the real 'passions of life' is so human and so broad-minded." The Tatler.

"When you find that the enticing title 'The Sick-a-Bed Lady' belongs to a volume of short stories, please don't lay it down again, or you will be sorry for it ever afterwards. Not often do we meet a novelist with as happy and keen perceptions and such ability to convey those perceptions in brief word-pictures. The pages are full of them, and to quote would be useless. As to the stories themselves, they are— one might say— quite new in treatment and interest, and full of variety."—Daily Chronicle.

"Here are ten stories, tender, sentimental, tragical even. . . . All moving us to smiles and tears, but all leaving us with a sense of the sweetness of life. There is an almost indefinable charm about the successive stories. . . . The author has keenness of insight, and real sympathy, and a lively sense of humour."—Daily Telegraph.

"Uncommon and absolutely bubbling over with youth and life."—Church Family Newspaper.

THE SICK-A-BED LADY. By the Author of "Molly Make-Believe." 6/-

Does anyone wish to read a New Novel which will hold and absorb and enchain him till the very last sentence is reached?

"If so, let him order 'Havoc.' I took it up just as I had risen to turn down the lights, and glanced over the first two or three pages. I sat down and read it on and on till I had finished. Never was a narrative told in a more arresting way. There is no pause, no break, no turning aside, but the workmanship is skillful in the highest degree. The peace of Europe depends on the possession of a certain document, and the manner in which the document is safely secured for England, with the happiest results, though after dangers and adventures which take away the breath, will astound the most practised novel reader. . . . A book which, of its kind, is as good as it could be."—British Weekly.

HAVOC. By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM, Author of "The Illustrious Prince," etc. 6/-

"A Great Novel." A New Edition, with a New Preface, of "The Old Wives' Tale."

"There is no book in the fiction of recent years that I should rank as equal to it."—Sir William Robertson Nicoll in the British Weekly.

"A new edition of one of the very few modern novels which have survived their day, and seem likely to be permanently remembered in the future."—Athenaeum.

THE OLD WIVES' TALE. By ARNOLD BENNETT. New Edition with New Preface and Portrait. 6/-

An Ambitious Historical Novel. The best book L. T. MEADE has ever written.

"'Corporal Violet' is the best thing L. T. Meade has ever written. It combines a clever and powerful historical novel with a very tender and charming love-story. The plot, setting, and characters are all unusual and arresting. The scene is laid in Devonshire, between the eventful years 1809-1815, and against this great background are painted in the plots of Lady Jermyn to keep a fine property for her illegitimate daughter, and to defraud a beautiful French girl of her rights. The story eventually takes us to Brussels, and we have a vivid and powerful description of the 18th of June. The characters of Hortense and of Carey, with its great big, understanding heart, are beautifully drawn."—Evening Standard.

CORPORAL VIOLET. By L. T. MEADE. 6/-

Notable Reviews of M. E. FRANCIS'S 21st BOOK. "On such an occasion I venture to wish both her and 'Honesty' the best of good wishes." PUNCH.

"I, at any rate, can vouch for the fact that the atmosphere of this story banished the gloom of a most dreary day."—Punch.

"If anyone wants a tale dramatically and romantically written, 'Honesty' can be recommended."—Daily Mail.

"A picture of real life such as will cause her public real pleasure, and stir the hope of more such tales to follow."—Daily Telegraph.

"A charming book . . . The pictures of life on the open road are delightful."—Spectator.

"The heroine whose name gives the book its title is altogether delightful. . . . It is a genuine pleasure to discover a find like this."—Country Life.

"A beautiful story, perfect in its simplicity, and ringing true to life in every line."—Church Times.

HONESTY. By M. E. FRANCIS. Author of "The Tender Passion," etc. 6/-

What's in a Name? "The Gifted Name," by Mrs. FRED REYNOLDS, is a very clever and moving story of domestic relations.

"What's in a name? The possession of a great one may sometimes be an undesirable inheritance, the effort to live up to it producing a stultifying effect in the mental development of the inheritor. 'The Gifted Name' tells of something of the kind in the career of young Richard Farland, who would have followed in the footsteps of his forebears and become a gallant soldier, but, when that was denied him, found himself incapable of achieving greatness in any other way, and showed a tendency to drift. He became a slacker, quite content to live on the fame and income of his mother, who was herself a brilliant upholder of that gifted name. It is a clever study of a young man's egotism, of his shilly-shallying and selfishness, which, after all, were but a veneer to be shed when he discovered himself."—Daily Chronicle.

"Richard and his mother, Jim and the girl Reggie, are quite ordinary and lovable people, well knit together and making an harmonious whole. The disturbing element is Nora Kent, the happy-go-lucky woman who donned men's attire, used their swear words, and smoked their pipes. . . . Mrs. Reynolds has made a distinct hit in the art of revelation by making us understand, in spite of ourselves, that deep down Nora was a good woman. A little additional touch of humour and Nora would have been a creation. The two funny maiden aunts, Miss Anne and Miss Clarice, are dimly suggestive of 'Cranford.' . . . Cleverly drawn and deserve attention. We acknowledged the force and merit of 'The Gifted Name.'"—Morning Post.

THE GIFTED NAME. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. 6/-

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers. WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM

Messrs. HUTCHINSON & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

A Year with the Gaekwar

By E. ST. CLAIR WEEDEN, M.A. In cloth gilt and gilt top 16s. net. With 25 Illustrations (2nd Edition)

An Injured Queen: Caroline of Brunswick

By LEWIS MELVILLE. In 2 Vols. Cloth gilt and gilt top. 24s. net

Charlotte Sophie, Countess Bentinck

Her Life and Times, 1715-1800. By her descendant, Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. In 2 Vols. Cloth gilt and gilt top. 24s. net

The Childhood and Youth of CHARLES DICKENS

By ROBERT LANGTON, F.R.Hist.Soc. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 80 fine high-class Engravings from original drawings by William Bull, Edward Bull, and the Author. In handsome cloth gilt and gilt top. 5s

My Lady Castlemaine

By PHILIP W. SERGEANT. In cloth gilt. 16s. net. With Illustrations (2nd Edition)

COLOUR MUSIC The Art of Mobile Colour

By A. WALLACE RIMINGTON, A.R.E., R.B.A., Professor of Fine Arts, Queen's College, London. With 29 Illustrations in colour, black and white, and photography. In cloth gilt. 6s. net

The Story of Evolution

By JOSEPH McCABE. In cloth gilt. 7s 6d net. With Illustrations and Maps

A Year and a Day

By OLIVE CHRISTIAN MAIVERY (Mrs. ARCHIBALD MACKIRDY). In cloth gilt. 6s. With Illustrations

John Opie and His Circle

By ADA EARLAND. In one large handsome volume, with 31 Illustrations, printed on art paper, and beautifully reproduced by a new process. 21s. net

HUTCHINSON'S New 6s. Novels

In Cotton Wool

W. B. Maxwell

Sharrow

Baroness von Hutten

The Serpent's Tooth

B. M. Croker

The Outpost of Eternity

Cosmo Hamilton

Lady Q

Mrs. Baillie Saunders

The Queen's Peril

Mrs. Hugh Fraser and Hugh Fraser

Dickie Dilver

G. B. Burgin

The House on the Mall

Edgar Jepson

The Red Man's Secret

F. Frankfort Moore
(2nd Edition)

Stoneladies

E. M. Channon

The Arrival of Antony

Dorothea Conyers
(3rd Edition)

The Coward

Robert Hugh Benson
(3rd Edition)

The Satanist

Mrs. Hugh Fraser and J. I. Stahlmann
(1th Edition)

The Debtor

Mary Angela Dickens
(3rd Edition)

The Order of Release

H. de Vere Stacpoole
(4th Edition)

London: HUTCHINSON & CO.

Hurst & Blackett's Spring Books

To-Day in Egypt

By ALFRED CUNNINGHAM.
In cloth gilt and gilt top, 12s 6d. net.
With numerous Illustrations from photographs

Cities Seen in East and West

By Mrs. WALTER TIBBITS.
In cloth gilt, with numerous Illustrations, 16s. net

New 6s. Novels

2nd Large Edition

The Rhodesian

By GERTRUDE PAGE

A Health unto His Majesty

By JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY

The Dewpond

By CHARLES MARRIOTT

Luca: The Story of a Mother

By E. GALLIENNE ROBIN

Tarantella

By EDITH MACVANE

In Secret Places

By LLOYD WILLIAMS

Mated in Soul

By G. De VAURIARD

In the Vortex

A Latin Quarter Romance

By CLIVE HOLLAND

The Death Doctor

By WILLIAM Le QUEUX

Hester Trefusis

By EFFIE ADELAIDE ROWLANDS

A Novel in great demand

21st Thousand

By CYNTHIA STOCKLEY

THE CLAW

LONDON:

HURST & BLACKETT, LTD.

Paternoster House, E.C.

NOW READY. Price 2/6 net.

LITTLE INCIDENTS.

BY FREDERICK WATSON.

CONTENTS.

SOME MUTUAL FRIENDS.—Little Incidents. The Successful Man. A Malden Aunt. The Great Man. The Humbug. An Honoured Guest. The Popular Man.

BACKWATERS.—The Bearer of Burdens. The Laugh. The Handmaiden of Tragedy. The Lone Road.

CASUAL CHRONICLES.—A Sprig of Edelweiss. The Reward of Strategy. Breaking the News. A Master of Deception. An Element of Discord. The Imperialist. A Desperate Remedy. A Theory of Tails. The Publisher's Xmas Eve. The Egg.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers, London, E.C.

NOW READY Price 6/- net

WHO'S WHO IN DICKENS

A COMPLETE DICKENS REPERTORY IN DICKENS' OWN WORDS

COMPILED BY

THOMAS ALEXANDER FYFE

ONE OF H.M. JUDGES AT GLASGOW
AUTHOR OF "DICKENS AND THE LAW"

HODDER AND STOUGHTON
PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

THE MOST SENSATIONAL BOOK SINCE BUSCH'S "BISMARCK" THE MEMOIRS OF FRANCESCO CRISPI

In Three Vols. Vol. I.—EXILE—THE THOUSAND.
Vol. II.—THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE. Vols. I. and II.
Ready Shortly. Illustrated. Price 16s. net each.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

Literary Work placed to the best advantage. Write for free prospectus of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. We placed a full-length novel, within a week of receipt, with a leading London Publisher at excellent terms! "Locksley," Presburg Rd., New Malden, Surrey.

LITERARY AGENCY.

The W'ener Agency, Ltd., 64, Strand, London, W.C.

Every facility for placing work of all descriptions.

Apply for prospectus free, from—

MANAGER, LITERARY DEPARTMENT.

BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES.

Glaisher's March List of Selected Remainders
NOW READY. * GRATIS AND POST FREE.

WM. GLAISHER, LTD., Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, and at 14, GEORGE STREET, CROYDON.

AUTHORS wishing to make arrangements for publishing are invited to communicate with the Principal, The Empire Literary Agency, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, E.C. MSS. of all kinds, by known and unknown Authors, are read; if needed typed; and if approved, placed with Editors and Publishers. Special attention to first Novels.

FOR SALE.—The Saxon Chronicle with English Translation by Rev. J. Ingram, 1823. 4to, Boards. 31s. 8d. Jarvis Don Quixote, 3 Vols. 4to, Red Morocco. 1742. 31s. 8d. Gray's Works, 2 Vols. 4to., Calf gilt. 1814. 80s. Od. Bewick's Land Birds, 1797. 1st Edition. 88s. Od. Bewick's Quadrupeds, 1790. 1st Edition. 88s. Od. (The two volumes 8vo, Calf gilt, excellent condition, 3 guineas). Dickens' Little Dorrit in 30 original monthly parts, complete, 25s. Od. Dickens' Our Mutual Friend in 30 original monthly parts, complete 25s. Od.

Apply Rev. W. GOODLIFFE, 81, Cannon Street, E.C., where books may be seen.

THE WORKS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s. each.
Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net each; leather, 3s. net each.

AN INLAND VOYAGE
TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY
VIRGINIBUS PUERISQUE
NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS
FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS
THE SILVERADO SQUATTERS
MEMORIES AND PORTRAITS
THE MERRY MEN
ACROSS THE PLAINS
PRINCE OTTO
WEIR OF HERMISTON
IN THE SOUTH SEAS
ESSAYS OF TRAVEL
ESSAYS IN THE ART OF WRITING
TALES AND FANTASIES

Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s. each.
LAY MORALS AND OTHER PAPERS
RECORDS OF A FAMILY OF ENGINEERS
UNDERWOODS: POEMS
BALLADS

SONGS OF TRAVEL Crown 8vo, buckram, 5s.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net each. Pott 8vo, leather, 3s. net each.

COLLECTED POEMS
THE POCKET R. L. S.: FAVOURITE PASSAGES.

Florence Press Limited Edition. Printed on Aldwych Hand-made Paper. With 12 Illustrations in coloured collotype after water-colour drawings by Norman Wilkinson.

Cr. 4to boards, £2 12s. 6d. net; vellum, £3 3s. 6d. net

VIRGINIBUS PUERISQUE

Large crown 8vo, with special end papers, cloth, 5s. net.
Large paper parchment, 7s. 6d. net.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES

With 12 plates in colours and numerous illustrations in line by Millicent Sowerby.

Foolscap 4to, jap. vel., 6s. net.
Parchm. nt, with silk ties, 8s. 6d. net.
Illuminated by Alberto Sangorski.

PRAYERS WRITTEN AT VAILIMA

With an Introduction by Mrs. Stevenson.

Illustrated in colour and in line by Noel Rooke.
Large type. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net, each.
Parchment, 10s. 6d. net each.
Large paper vellum, 21s. net each.

AN INLAND VOYAGE
TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY

Miniature Editions. Yapp., 1s. 6d. net each.
Also foolscap 8vo, cloth, 1s. net each.

PRAYERS. A CHRISTMAS SERMON

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 1s. net each.

FATHER DAMIEN. TALK AND TALKERS

With Coloured Frontispiece and other illustrations, by A. S. Boyd. Cr. 8vo, buckram, 6s.

A LOWDEN SABBATH MORN

THE STEVENSON READER

Edited by Lloyd Osborne. 2s. 6d. cloth. 3s. 6d. buckram.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. A Life Study in Criticism
By H. BELLISE BAILDON. With 2 Portraits. Cr 8vo, 6s.

RECOLLECTIONS OF R. L. STEVENSON IN THE PACIFIC. By ARTHUR JOHNSTONE. 6s. net.
With Portrait and Facsimile Letter. Crown 8vo, buckram.

CHATTO & WINDUS

PUBLISHERS,

III, St. Martin's Lane, LONDON, W.C.

JOHN LONG'S NOTABLE NOVELS

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

Now Ready at all Libraries and Booksellers

Memory Corner TOM GALLON
Clouds CHARLES IGGLESDEN
The Eternal Struggle NEWMAN HARDING
The Fen Dogs STEPHEN FOREMAN
A Transplanted American ELISE LATHROP
Austin's Career VIOLET TWERDALE
Anna Strelitz LOW LATHEN
The Compromising of Jane ANNE WEAVER

JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. JOHN LONG draw particular attention to the following deeply interesting Works of Biography, History and Travel, large supplies of which are now with the Libraries:—

The Fair Ladies of Hampton Court

By CLARE JERROLD. Illustrated with Photogravure and other Reproductions from Paintings of the Beauties of the Period. 12s. 6d. net.

Pilgrims to the Isles of Penance:

Orchid Gathering in the East. By Mrs. TALBOT CLIFTON. With 54 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map. 12s. 6d. net.

Prince Talleyrand and His Times:

From the Reign of Louis XV. to the Second Empire. By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE. English Version by BRYAN O'DONNELL, M.A. This work contains material from recently-discovered documents now made public for the first time. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.

The House of Teck: A Romance of a Thousand Years. By LOUIS FELBERMAN Author of "Hungary and its People," etc. With Photogravure of Her Majesty, over 100 other interesting Portraits, Reproductions of Pictures and Illustrations depicting Family Relics, included in the volume by Special Permission of Her Majesty the Queen. 12s. 6d. net.

The Fair Land of Central America

By MAURICE DE WALEFFE. Preface by SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

Many Coloured Mountains and Some

Seas Between. A Book of Travel. By EMMA S. BOYD. With coloured frontispiece and several other Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

My Recollections of the Sepoy Revolt

By Mrs. MUTER. With Portraits, Illustrations, and a Plan. 7s. 6d. net.

Big Game Hunting in North-Eastern

Rhodesia. By OWEN LETCHER, F.R.G.S. With Photogravure Portrait of Author, 52 Illustrations from Photographs, and a Map. 12s. 6d. net.

The Seven Richest Heiresses of France. By the COUNT DE SOISSONS. With Photogravure and other Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.

Catalogue & Supplementary Lists, post free on receipt of post card.

LONDON:

JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

Macmillan's New Books

"The Travel Book of the Season."

Ruins of Desert Cathay. Personal Narrative of Explorations in Central Asia and Westernmost China. By M. AUREL STEIN. With Numerous Illustrations, Colour Plates, Panoramas, and Maps from Original Surveys. Two Vols., Royal 8vo, 42s. net.

The Field.—"The book will take its place, not merely as the leading work of travel published this season, but as one of the finest and best works of travel ever published."

The Mafulu Mountain People of British New Guinea. By ROBERT W. WILLIAMSON. With an Introduction by A. C. HADDON, Sc D, F.R.S. Illustrated. 8vo [Shortly].

An Outline of the Russo-Japanese War, 1904, 1905. By LIEUT.-COLONEL CHARLES ROSS, D.S.O. Vol. I. Up to, and including, the Battle of Tiao-Yang. 8vo. With Maps. [Military Text Books. Shortly]

The Political Economy of Art: Unto This Last—Sesame and Lilies—The Crown of Wild Olive. By JOHN RUSKIN. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

[Library of English Classics.]

* * Other volumes of the Series can be had in uniform binding with this Volume.

Select Letters of William Cowper. With Introduction and Notes by J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 8s. net [Eversley Series. Shortly]

The Character and Call of the Church of England. A Charge Delivered at his Second Visitation of the Diocese of Canterbury, in February, 1912. By RANDALL THOMAS DAVISON, Archbishop of Canterbury. 8vo, sewed, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

The Passing of War: A Study in Things that Make for Peace. By the Rev. Canon W. I. GRANE, Author of "The Word and the Way," &c. 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

Athenaeum—"A valuable addition to the literature of Peace."

NEW NOVELS.

The Man Whom the Trees Loved, and other Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. Illustrated by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly].

The Victories of Olivia and other Stories. By EVELYN SHARP. Author of "The Youngest Girl in the School," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

T. P.'s Weekly—"The whole book is worth reading, as is nearly every word written by Miss Sharp, and her tales are not scrappy, being like some of Kipling's, quite little books of their own."

The Charwoman's Daughter. By JAMES STEPHENS. Extra crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

The Times—"One of those intimate studies which rely only on their power to extract what is poignant from the commonplace. It is an art mastered by many Frenchmen, and Mr. Stephens has grasped much of its essence."

NEW TWO SHILLING EDITION OF

The Novels of Maurice Hewlett.

With Frontispieces. In cloth binding. Crown 8vo. 2s. net each. Two volumes issued monthly.

3. Little Novels of Italy.
4. Richard Yea-and-Nay.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's Spring Books

ANIMAL LIFE IN AFRICA.

By Major I. STEVENSON HAMILTON. Foreword by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Illustrated, Maps, Plans, &c. Royal 8vo. 18s. net.

THE MANSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE OLDEN TIMES.

By JOSEPH NASH. Introduction by REGINALD BLOMFIELD, A.R.A. Large 4to. With 104 Full-page Plates (3 in colour). 30s. net.

MICROBES AND TOXINS IN NATURE.

By Dr. ETIENNE BURNET. Preface by Prof. E. METCHNIKOFF. Crown 8vo. Illustrated, 5s. net.

THE SELECTED WRITINGS OF WILLIAM SHARP. VOL. I. Poems.

VOL. II. Studies and Appreciations.

Edited by ELIZABETH A. SHARP. Uniform with the "Works of Fiona Macleod." To be completed in Five Volumes. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net each.

WAR AND ITS ALLEGED BENEFITS.

By I. NOVIKOW. Preface by NORMAN ANGELL (Author of "The Great Illusion"). Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

A NEW LOGIC.

By CHARLES MERCIER, M.D. Demy 8vo, 10s. net. "It would be safe to prophesy a great and lasting success for 'A New Logic' . . . There is no gainsaying its claim to freshness, and its originality might challenge comparison with that of John Stuart Mill himself."—Sunday Times.

THE MODERN PARISIENNE.

By OCTAVE UZANNE. Introduction by Baroness VON HUTTEN. Demy 8vo, 6s. net. "The work is certainly one of the most notable that have appeared during recent years. The work is one of great ability, rare insight, and infinite pathos."—Liverpool Courier.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN. His Life Story.

By CARL HOVEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

MOVING PICTURES.

By E. A. TALBOT. With 66 pp. of Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

ON THE ART OF THE THEATRE.

By E. GORDON CRAIG. Illustrated. 6s. net.

THE PLAYS OF W. S. MAUGHAM.

Cloth, 2s. 6d.; Paper, 1s. 6d. (1) Lady Frederick, (2) Jack Straw, (3) A Man of Honour.

THE PROHIBITED PLAY

THE NEXT RELIGION.

By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. 2s. 6d. net. "Written in the author's most subtle and trenchant style with unrelenting directness. The work will repay reading and compel study."—Daily News.

NEW AND RECENT NOVELS.

Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

THE COST OF IT ELEANOR MORDAUNT

PASSION FRUIT E. C. VIVIAN

HE WHO PASSED (To M.L.G.) ANON

"If authentic, poignant to tears, if not, marvellously well invented."—Daily Mail.

LITTLE BROTHER GILBERT CANNAN

"Once taken in hand extremely difficult to lay down."—Daily Telegraph.

ESTHER AGNES E. JACOMB

"A striking novel, full of quiet strength."—Morning Leader.

THE ADJUSTMENT MARGUERITE BRYANT

"Throughout fresh, sincere, and well written and full of good studies."—Times.

MARJORIE STEVENS V. TAUBMAN-GOLDIE

"This well-written novel mirrors nature with humorous tenderness and honesty, much charm and philosophy."—Sunday Times.

THE PRISON WITHOUT A WALL

RALPH STRAUS
"Will remain long in our memory. A very sound and able piece of work."—Westminster Gazette.

MAIDS' MONEY MRS. H. DUDENEY

"Brilliant character sketches, sufficient to make 'Maids' Money' one of the most interesting novels we have read lately."—Saturday Review.

JUGGERNAUT F. F. BENSON

THE REWARD OF VIRTUE (2nd Imp.) AMBER REEVES

A LIKELY STORY WM. DE MORGAN

THE DOP DOCTOR (12th Imp.) RICHARD DEHAN

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 247. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

APRIL, 1912.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 1	The Spirit of Poetry. By WILFRID WILSON GIBSON .. 33	David Garrick and his French Friends. By W. H. HELM 43
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 6	A Prison Without a Wall .. 34	The Home University Library. By T. E. PAGE 44
THE READER—	Lafcadio Hearn. By FRANCIS BICKLEY 34
Robert Louis Stevenson. By NEIL MUNRO 9	Boswell v. Johnson. By RALPH STRAUS 35	NOVEL NOTES -
To Count Girolamo Nerli. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON .. 16	The Art of the Short Story. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK .. 36	Hector Græme—The Coward—The Charwoman's Daughter—Beggars and Sorners—Yellow Men and Gold—The Healer—Marie—Fire in Stubble—Pomander Walk 45
Cardinal Newman's Life. By DR. WILLIAM BARRY .. 22	Irish Plays 38
Conrad. By PERCEVAL GIBSON 26	Mr. Eden Phillpotts' Novel. By KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN .. 38
Encore Borrow. By THOMAS SECCOMBE 27	A Friend of Lamb's 39	THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE
'THE BOOKMAN' PRIZE COMPETITIONS	The Biography of Bishop King By DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 40	Behind the Ranges—Judgments in Vacation—The Early Court of Queen Victoria—Oñed: A Play in Four Acts 46
NEW BOOKS -	Oxford 40
Mr. Fox. By LEWIS MUELVILLE 30	Hints from Japan. By HENRY BAERLEIN 41	NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 48
Modern Italian Literature. By H. HAY WILSON 31	A Cloistral Poet. By DARRELL FIGGIS 42
	The White Wallet 42

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration

News Notes.

The May BOOKMAN will be a Browning Centenary Number and will contain a special fully illustrated article on Browning by Professor Saintsbury.

The portrait of Stevenson that is reproduced on our cover is from the latest portrait taken of him, and is published by permission of Mr. J. Patrick, of Edinburgh.

Such an immense number of MSS. have been received in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's £1,000 Prize Novel Competition that the careful reading and judging of them all has proved a task of no ordinary trouble and difficulty. We understand, however, that the undertaking is now nearing its conclusion, and it is hoped that the decision of the adjudicators may be announced next month.

Surgeon-General Sir A. D. Home, V.C., K.C.B., whose "Service Memories in Four Continents," has just been published by Mr. Edward Arnold, has seen a good deal of active service in many parts of the world. After some years of work in the West Indies, he proceeded to the Crimea and remained there until peace was declared. Then he joined the expeditionary force that was intended for China, but was dispatched hurriedly to India on the outbreak of the Mutiny. He won his V.C. "for persevering bravery and admirable conduct" at the Relief of Lucknow. In 1860 he was out in the East again during the China War and accompanied the Allied Forces on their advance to Peking. He visited Baltimore and Washington during the American Civil War and gives in his book some interesting impressions of that great struggle, concluding it with an episode of the Maori War in New Zealand.

Mr. Fisher Unwin is publishing this month a new novel by Mr. Alphonse Courlander called "Mightier than the Sword." It is a story of modern journalistic life in London. ■

Mr. Harry De Windt, the famous explorer, has written a volume of short stories called "A Woman in Black" that Messrs. Jarrold & Sons are publishing.

"Herself," a new novel by Miss Ethel Sidgwick, has just been published by Messrs. Sidgwick &

Jackson. Miss Sidgwick has been writing fiction and essays for some years past, but as her life has been given to other, chiefly to educational, work, she has only recently thought of publishing what she wrote. Most of her two first novels were written in France and are largely concerned with the study and comparison of national character; her third, "Herself," deals especially with the Irish temperament as compared with the English and the French. Miss Sidgwick confesses to writing with no "purpose" beyond that of producing the kind of novel she likes to read herself. Various members of her family, by the way, are well-known writers of fiction—notably the Bensons, who are her cousins.

Mr. John Galsworthy's first book of poems, "Moods, Songs and Doggerels," is to be issued immediately by Mr. Heinemann. Mr. J. E. Patterson's collection of poems, the title of which has been changed from "Daughters of Nereus" to "The Lure of the Sea," will be published this month, uniform in appearance with Mr. Galsworthy's volume.

Messrs. Harper Brothers announce a new and popular edition of Mr. A. R. Colquhoun's "China in Transformation." The book has been revised and brought up to date, and Mr. Colquhoun has added several fresh chapters written in the light of recent developments.

The approaching struggle for Home Rule has already produced a fair share of literature, and two new books bearing upon this vexed question have now been added to the number. One is "The Nonconformist Treason, or the Sale of the Emerald Isle," by Mr. Michael J. F. McCarthy, which Messrs. Blackwood publish; the other is "The Pope's Green Island," by W. P. Ryan, which is issued by Messrs. Nisbet. Mr. McCarthy's work is a frank and vigorous condemnation of Home Rule; Mr. Ryan concerns himself mainly with the cross-currents that are agitating the Irish theological world, with modernism, mysticism, Irish literature, education, social life and labour, and touches on Home Rule more indirectly and by suggestion.

A quarto publication, in an orange and green cover, entitled "Romanitshels' Didikais and Folk Lore Gazette," has been started as a monthly for "gypsologists" and students of tinkers' lore and language. It has the imprint of the Gypsy and Folk Lore Club, Hand Court, Holborn, and is certainly one of the quaintest periodicals extant.

Photo by Arbus and Bernardi.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell, whose new novel "In Cotton Wool," was published last week by Messrs. Hutchinson.

Few novels of last autumn won higher praise than the critics gave to "A Ship of Solace," by Miss Eleanor Mordaunt, whose new story, "The Stain," Mr. Heinemann is publishing this month. Miss Mordaunt was born in Notts, and is the only literary member of her family, with the exception of her mother's brother, Captain the Hon. Denis Bingham, who was The Times correspondent in Paris during the Franco-German war and in addition to a record of the siege wrote several well-known books of French history. The greater part of Miss Mordaunt's girlhood was spent in a rambling old house near Cheltenham, where her tendency to fiction first revealed itself in a series of ghost stories chiefly concerned with a certain tapestried room in the house, and these were so vividly and forcefully told that they have been handed down to succeeding tenants as actual legends of the place. Here she ran practically wild with her six brothers and a much younger sister till she was thirteen, when the family removed to a lonely country district in Oxfordshire, where she met with many of the characters who afterwards appeared in "The Garden of Contentment."

In 1898 Miss Mordaunt went to Mauritius, whence she returned three years later with her health completely broken by malaria, and passed her time as an invalid by writing a series of "Letters to Mr. Nobody," some of which were ultimately included in "The Garden of Contentment." Making no progress towards recovery, and feeling that if she must die she would sooner die "in the open," she presently started on a voyage to Australia in a sailing ship—a rough experience, since the ship was not fitted for passengers, carried no doctor, no stewardess, and none of the comforts of life. However, she worried through and reached Melbourne with thirty pounds in her pocket and started to make a living. She tried her hand at many trades, succeeding best with decorative painting and metal work; she wrote occasional short stories for local papers, published a volume of essays through a local publisher, and for a short time edited a woman's magazine. Despite the eight years of hardships she had endured there, she came back to England less than two years ago, bringing with her the happiest memories of Australia and Australian journalism, and here set to work on a new line; she wrote several stories for boys, a serial of hers appearing under a man's name in "Young England"; she did a little purely mechanical work for Black and White, and finally, not knowing what to do for the best or where to turn for a living, she wrote, in circumstances of great stress and anxiety, "A Ship of Solace," and then, in more leisurely fashion, "On the Wallaby through Victoria." Few women writers have gone through rougher experiences or turned them to more excellent account.

Photo by Debenham & Smith.

Miss Eleanor Mordaunt.

Muriel Hine
(Mrs. Sidney Coxon).

whose successful novel "Earth," published by Mr. John Lane, has reached its sixth edition.

"Laurence North," whose new novel, "The Golightlys, Father and Son," has been published by Mr. Martin Secker, is Mr. J. D. Symon, who was for ten years editor of the Illustrated London News, and during part of the same time editor of The English Illustrated. Mr. Symon is an Aberdeen man, educated at Aberdeen University, and afterwards at Oriel College, Oxford. At Aberdeen he was a pupil of the late Professor Minto, and was first man of his year in English Literature, graduating with Honours in Classics, and the Seafield Gold Medal in English. Since his retirement from the editorial chair, Mr. Symon has been a miscellaneous writer and reviewer, contributing to the Graphic, Illustrated London News, Pall Mall Gazette, Athenaeum, and other papers. At present he is engaged on a short History of the Press, and, in collaboration with Mr. S. L. Bensusan, on a study of the Renaissance. These books will appear under his own name, and not under his pseudonym. He has also in hand a complete translation of Pindar into English verse—some of the Odes have already appeared in the English Review. Mr. Symon's other works have been the editing of "The Early Poems of Christina Rossetti"; the writing of a biography and critical estimate of "Ruskin," and three novels—"Syrinx," "Impatient Griselda," and his new book "The Golightlys," which, by the way, the George H. Doran Company is publishing in America.

Amber Reeves, whose clever novel "The Reward of Virtue" has been published by Mr. Heinemann, is the daughter of the Hon. W. P. Reeves, who was Minister for Labour, Justice and Education in New Zealand before he came to England as High Commissioner for that Colony. He is now Director of the London School of Economics. Her mother is a prominent member of the Fabian Society, and is well known as a public speaker. Born in New Zealand in 1887, Amber Reeves came to England when she was eight, was educated at Kensington High School, and when she was eighteen went to Newnham College, Cambridge. She took metaphysics at college and got firsts in both parts of the Mental and Moral Sciences Tripos; but found time to help largely in forming and establishing the Cambridge University Fabian Society. On leaving she gained a studentship and went to the London School of Economics to write a book on Sociology, but before she had time to finish it married Mr. Blanco White and wrote a novel instead.

Messrs. Stephen Swift & Co. are publishing immediately a new novel by Mr. H. A. Hinkson, called "The Considine Luck."

Messrs. Cassell's well-known monthly has undergone such radical alteration and been so entirely brought up to date that its April issue is to all intents

Amber Reeves
(Mrs. Blanco White).

From a drawing.

and purposes the first Number of a new magazine. Its title is enlarged to Cassell's Magazine of Fiction and Popular Literature; its size is enlarged to two hundred and sixty-four pages, but its price is reduced to fivepence net. Amongst other features this Number contains twenty-one short stories; an article by the Infanta Eulalia of Spain; "My Autobiography," by Marie Tempest; a long complete novel by T. W. Hanshew; and a special article on "Divorce," by H. G. Wells. The Magazine of Fiction is edited by Mr. Newman Flower, who has been associated with the House of Cassell for the past six years. Five years ago he founded The Storyteller, and he continues to edit that as well as The New Magazine, and several other Cassell publications. Mr. Flower, who is now thirty-two, has been a working London journalist since he was sixteen. He has always had strong military leanings and started his journalistic career on a military paper with which he was connected for six years, and for twelve years he has been writing a lively and popular causerie on military matters for The People over the signature of Tommy Atkins. A Dorsetshire man, and one of the Vice-Presidents of The Society of Dorset Men in London, Mr. Flower knows even better than the London in which he has done so much work the Thomas Hardy country in which he was born, and is an enthusiastic authority on all that concerns the writings of our greatest living novelist.

Photo by Lena Connell.

Mrs. Theodosia Lloyd whose new novel, "Innocence in the Wilderness," has just been published by Messrs. Chatto.

Mr. Hugh Walpole, whose new novel, "The Prelude to Adventure," is published by Messrs
Mills & Boon.

In her new novel, "A Lost Interest" (Constable), Mrs. George Wemyss leaves the quiet English village life she depicts in other of her stories and introduces us to higher society in a more fashionable world. Like her very successful books, "The Professional Aunt" and "People of Popham" it is a comedy, but in an entirely different setting. Mrs. Wemyss' first appearance in the literary world was as a writer for children. "All About All of Us," published in 1901, was a truthful record of her own childhood. She has, as she puts it, "the great good fortune" to belong to a large family. One of her brothers is Mr. E. L. Lutyens, the architect; another, Mr. W. E. Lutyens, was famous as the Cambridge miler. Mrs. Wemyss comes of a family of soldiers; her father and both her grandfathers were soldiers, and she married a soldier. Messrs. Constable have recently published cheap re-issues of those two books for children, "All About All of Us," and "Things we Thought Of." Though "The Professional Aunt" is about children, it is not for them. It was written in 1903 and lay in the bottom drawer of Mrs. Wemyss' writing-table till 1910, when Messrs. Constable published it. Both that book and "People of Popham" are issued in America by Houghton Mifflin & Co. At present Mrs. Wemyss is engaged on another novel, in which she returns again to the Popham path of life.

Photo by Lafayette.

Mrs. George Wemyss.

Mr. Newman Flower

The first ten volumes of the Swanston edition of the works of Stevenson were published towards the end of last year, and five more are to be ready this month. It is the most comprehensive edition of Stevenson's works that has yet been prepared, the "Vailima Letters" and "Letters to Stevenson's Family and Friends," with additional letters annotated and arranged by Sir Sidney Colvin being included by the courtesy of Messrs. Methuen. Mr. Andrew Lang contributes a characteristic preface to the first volume. The books are very handsomely produced, and are published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus in association with Messrs. Cassell, Mr. Heinemann, and Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. Some half-dozen of our Stevenson illustrations are reproduced from these volumes by kind permission of Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

Several other Stevenson illustrations in this number are reproduced from the beautiful Pentland Edition of his works by the courtesy of Messrs.

Ex-Police Constable
George R. Mitchell,

whose new volume of poems "More Ballads in Blue" (Jarrod) is reviewed in our Supplement.

Cassell, to whom we are also indebted for the loan of photographs of Mrs. Strong and of Stevenson in his study at Vailima. Mr. Walter H. Barnett very kindly lent us the original drawing of Stevenson by Nerli, and a portrait of Stevenson that R. L. S. presented to him in Australia. Most of our other Stevenson illustrations are from the collections of Mr. A. Rischgitz and the Art Illustration and Reproduction Company.

One of the handiest and most serviceable reference books on all that concerns Stevenson is Mr. J. A. Hammerton's "Stevensoniana," and we are indebted to its pages for eight of our illustrations.

THE HON. ROLLO RUSSELL and some Dickens memories.

Referring to the Dickens symposium in our February Number, the Hon. Rollo Russell has been kind enough to send us the following interesting note: "Dickens and my father, Lord John Russell, were friends; both had the greatest sympathy in all efforts for human welfare. I remember Dickens staying with my father at Pembroke Lodge, as related by Forster, and have a picture of him still in my mind as he sat at the breakfast table and talked of some of his experiences. He showed a kind thoughtfulness in bringing with him a 'David Copperfield' in two volumes which he gave me with his autograph inscribed. I remember, too, very vividly, one of his readings in St. James's Hall, in which his acting power was almost superhuman. The two pieces were 'Boots at the Holly Tree Inn,' which I did not care for, and a scene from 'Oliver Twist.' The shrinking, the contortions, and the ghastly pallor that came over his features wrought a change in him which was marvellous. The touching passages so moved an audience of the most distinguished people in London society that at the end many were in tears. One of his greatest books, 'A Tale of Two Cities,' he dedicated to Lord John Russell. Among the reforms which must have been closest to his heart was the remoulding of the Court of Chancery. But in education and in caring for the poor he was equally keen. And who like Dickens has given pure joy by his writings and inspired healing laws in all directions? His is a noble record."

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

April 1st to May 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Allen & Co. (Incorporating Swan, Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd.)

BINGHAM, DR.—Words to Wives. 3s. 6d. net.
BOUCHER-JAMES, S.—The Soul's Destiny: A volume of Verse. 5s. net.
GUILFORD, EVERARD L.—Memorials of Old Nottinghamshire. 15s. net.
MOLL, DR.—Sexual Life of the Child. Translated by Dr. Eden Paul. 15s. net.
NEMO, CAPTAIN.—The Boy-Scout Bubble. 6d. net.
RUSKIN, JOHN.—The last Two Volumes of the Library Edition of his Works, consisting of Bibliography and Index of over 210,000 references. 21s. net.
SHORTT, MISS L. M.—A Practical Italian Grammar. 5s. net.
SMITH, REV. E. STAFFORD.—Pastoralia: Prayers and Readings for the Sick and others. 2s. 6d. net.
WATERER, GLADYS.—The Third Chance. 6s.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith.

BELLOC, HILAIRE.—The Green Overcoat. With Illustrations by Gilbert K. Chesterton. 6s.
MARTIN, CLARA I.—A Little Aversion. 6s.
MYERS, A. WALLIS.—C. B. Fry: The Man and his Methods. 1s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

ADAMS, MRS. M. M. E., and BROWNE, MISS E. A.—The Social Guide for 1912. 2s. 6d. net.
FERGUSON, DANIEL.—Peeps at Nature: British Ferns, Club-Mosses, and Horse-Tails. 1s. 6d. net; Butterflies, 1s. 6d. net.
HALL, REV. CHARLES A.—How to Use the Microscope. 1s. 6d. net.
HALL, REV. CHARLES A.—Isle of Arran. (Beautiful Britain Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
STEWART, W.—Les Beaux Voyages: aux Indes, 1s. 6d. net; La Russie, 1s. 6d. net; Espagne, 1s. 6d. net.
STEWART, W.—Contes et Nouvelles: Un Tour en Mélanésie, 3s. 6d. net; Le Case de l'Oncle Tom, 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

BARNARD, AMY B.—The Girl's Own Book. 3s. 6d. net.
BROWNING, OSCAR.—History of the Modern World. 2 vols. 21s. net.
EVANS, FRANK HOWELL.—Five Years. 1s. net.
GARVICE, CHARLES.—Girl from the South. 1s. net.
GARVICE, CHARLES.—Healthy Brain and Healthy Body. 1s. net.
HARDY, EDWARD.—Revels and Cuts. 2s. net.
MURPHY, MRS.—Open Trails. 6s.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

ANONYMOUS.—The Love Letters of an Actor. 5s. net.
ARCHER, WILLIAM.—Playmaking: A Manual of Dramatic Craftsmanship. 7s. 6d. net.
BROWN, VINCENT.—The Chief Constable. 6s.
CRUTCHLEY, COMMANDER.—My Life at Sea. 7s. 6d. net.
JEANS, W.—Parliamentary Reminiscences. 10s. 6d. net.
KIDSON, ETHEL.—Herring Fleet. 6s.
REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—The Grey Terrace. 6s.
STRYIENSKI, M.—The Daughters of Louis XV. 10s. 6d. net.
THOMAS, EDWARD.—George Borrow. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

CRUIKSHANK, GEORGE, AND OTHERS.—The Comic Almanack, 1835-1853. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols. 5s. net each.
HUNT, MR. ALFRED AND MISS VIOLET.—The Governess: A Novel. 6s.
JOSEPHUS, Translated by WHISTON.—A New Edition. With Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 5s. net, each.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

ADAMS, REV. JOHN, B.D., INVERKEILOR.—The Lenten Psalms.
 COATS, R. H., M.A., B.D.—Types of English Piety.
 GEM, R. S. HARVEY.—An Anglo-Saxon Abbot.
 GRAY, PROFESSOR G. BUCHANAN, D.D., D.Litt.—A Commentary on the Book of Isaiah (Ch. i. xxvii.). (International Critical Commentary.) 12s.
 MCFADYEN, PROFESSOR J. E., D.D.—The Historical Narrative of the Old Testament. (Primers for Teachers and Senior Bible Class Students)

Messrs. James Clarke & Co.

JAMES, J. G., M.A., D.Litt.—The Coming Age of Faith. With an Introduction by A. E. Garvie, D.D. 2s. 6d. net.
 STONE, REV. E. C.—Some Aspects of Life, and other Sermons. 2s. 6d. net.
 TYMMS, T. VINCENT, D.D.—The Evolution of Infant Baptism and Related Ideas. 6s. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

FLECKER, REV. W. H., M.A., D.C.L.—Acts of the Apostles Part I. 1s. 6d.
 FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—The Geography of Europe 2s. 6d.
 GOGGIN, S. E., M.A.—Shakespeare: "Macbeth" 2s.
 MARICHAL, J. P. R., Lès-L., and GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—New Junior French Reader. 2s.
 RENNIE, JOHN, D.Sc., F.R.S.E.—School Lessons in Plant and Animal Life. A Guide to Teachers with Instructions for 80 Typical Lessons. 4s. 6d.
 SHUKER, J. W., M.A., and WALKER, REV. T., M.A.—Gospel of St. Mark. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Constable & Co., Ltd.

DIBBLES, GEORGE BINNEY.—Laws of Supply and Demand. 7s. 6d. net.
 FUNSTON, BRIGADIER-GENERAL.—Memories of Two Wars. 12s. 6d. net.
 GEORGE, W. L.—City of Light. 6s.
 LEGOUIS, EMILE.—Défense de la Poésie Française. 5s. net.
 LUCY, F. PERKINS.—The Dutch Twins. 3s. 6d. net.
 SHENNAN, T., F.R.C.S.E.—Postmortems and Morbid Anatomy. 18s. net.
 SHUTE, HENRY A.—A Country Lawyer 6s.
 WRIGHT, SIR ALMROTH E., M.D.—Technique of the Teat and Capillary Glass Tube. 10s. 6d. net.
 WYATT, TILBY.—English People over Seas. Vol. IV. 6s. net.

Messrs. Digby Long & Co.

ALLAN, C. W.—The White Lion. 6s.
 ALLEN, GRANT.—The Desire of the Eyes. 6d.
 BEARDSLEY, G. M.—Napoleon 3s. 6d. net.
 IVON, MRS. CHAN.—Helen Wytham's Marriage. 6s.
 KENNY, LOUISE M. STACPOOLE.—The King's Kiss. 6s.
 RAE-BROWN, CAMPBELL.—The Avenging Kiss. 6s.
 RAYTHORNE, U.—The Mystery of Rushbrook. 6s.

Messrs. A. C. Fifield.

BRIEUX.—Three Plays by. New Edition 5s. net.
 FARR, FLORENCE.—The Solemnization of Jackin. A Novel 6s.
 FROGLEY, CHARLES HERBERT.—The Morning's Cup and other Poems. 1s. net.
 HALL, DR. WINSLOW.—Metred Playlets. 1s. net.
 INKSTER, LEONARD.—Vale—A Book of Verse 1s. net.
 JACKSON, EVELINE.—Ballads, Songs and Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
 PICKERING, J. E.—The Cap of Care: A Story in Song 1s. net.
 SCHEFFAUER, HERMAN.—Drake in California, and other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 STIRNER, MAX.—The Ego and his Own 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

ANON.—Isaiah's Bitter Love 2s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 GRAHAM, JOHN WILLIAM, M.A.—Evolution and Empire 2s. 6d. net.
 NESTELL, PERCIVAL W., F.L.S.—A Year in the Country. Illustrated with nature pictures. 2s. 6d. net.
 SPARKES, L. J.—Civics. 1s. net.
 WILSON, THEODORA WILSON.—The Search of the Child for the Sorrows of God. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.

Messrs. Herbert & Daniel.

BLUNDELL, AGNES.—Pension Kraus 6s.
 EVANS, GEORGE.—The Child of His Adoption. 6s.
 FIELD, CLAUD.—Persian Literature. 3s. 6d. net.
 GIBBS, PHILIP.—Helen of Lancaster Gate. 6s.
 HELM, W. H.—Charles Dickens. (The Regent Library.) 2s. 6d. net.
 INGPEN, ROGER.—Shelley. (The Regent Library.) 2s. 6d. net.
 LERMONTOV, M. Y.—The Heart of a Russian. Translated by J. H. Wisdom and Mon. Murray. 6s.
 MEYNELL, VIOLA.—George Eliot. (The Regent Library.) 2s. 6d. net.
 SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET.—Jane Austen. (Regent Library.) 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BARNES-GRUNDY, MAHEL.—Hilary on Her Own. 7d. net.
 HYNÉ, C. J. CUTCLIFFE.—A Lost Continent 7d. net.
 JEPSON, EDGAR.—The House on the Mall. 6s.
 LE BLOND, MRS. AUBREY.—Charlotte Sophie: Countess Bentinck: Her Life and Times, 1715-1800. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 MELVILLE, LEWIS.—An Injured Queen: Caroline of Brunswick. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—A True Woman. 1s. net.
 THURSTON, KATHERINE CECIL.—Max. 1s. net.
 VON HUTTON, BARONESS.—Sharrow 6s.
 VON HUTTON, BARONESS.—The Lordship of Love. 1s. net.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

COLVIN, IAN D.—The Cape of Adventure. 10s. 6d. net.
 JACK, FLORENCE H.—Cooking for Invalids. New and Enlarged Edition. 2s. net.
 MARSHALL, H. E.—Canada's Story—India's Story—South Africa's Story—Australasia's Story. 1s. 6d. net each.
 The Great English Portrait Painters of the Eighteenth Century (Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney).—(Masterpieces in Colour.)
 The Leaders of the English Pre-Raphaelites (Rossetti, Holman Hunt, and Millais).—(Masterpieces in Colour.)
 Three Great Florentine Painters (Fra Angelico, Botticelli, and Leonardo da Vinci).—Yapp. 7s. 6d. net.
 The Three Great Portrait Painters of the Seventeenth Century (Rembrandt, Hals, and Velasquez).
 Three Great Modern Painters (Leighton, Burne-Jones, and Whistler).
 Three French Painters of the Eighteenth Century (Vigée Le Brun, Fragonard, and Chardin).
 TURBAYNE, A. A.—Monograms and Ciphers. Cheap Re-Issue. 2s. 6d. net.
 WARWICK, THE COUNTESS OF.—William Morris. 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

BY A WOMAN OF FORTY.—Letters to Myself 5s. net.
 GIBSON, HERBERT.—Ironbark Splinters. Poems 5s. net.
 HARGRAVE, BASIL.—A Year's Gardening 6s. net.
 HARGRAVE, MARY.—Some German Women and Their Salons 7s. 6d. net.
 HOLME, DOROTHY.—A Little England Beyond Wales. 1s. net.
 WESTELL, W. PERCIVAL, F.L.S.—Wild Flowers in Their Homes Series 1s. net.
 WHITE, CLAUDE GRAHAME, and HENRY HARPER.—The Aeroplane in War. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

ALLHUSEN, BEATRICE, and FOX REFVE, IRIS (Collected by)—Fragments. 3s. 6d. net.
 ALLINGHAM, WILLIAM. Arranged by HELEN ALLINGHAM—By the Way: A Collection of Short Poems, Fragments and Notes.
 BICKERSTETH, CYRIL, M.A.—The Ministry of Absolution: A Plea for its more General Use, with a due Regard to the Liberty of the Individual.
 CATHCART, E. P., M.D.—The Physiology of Protein Metabolism.
 ELLIOTT, HUGH, S. R. With Preface by Sir L. RAY LANKESTER, K.C.B., F.R.S.—Modern Science and the Illusions of Professor Bergson.
 GIBSON, W. J., M.A.—Education in Scotland: A Sketch of the Past and the Present.
 GOLLOCK, G. A. With Simplified Arrangements by CATHERINE B. FIRTH, M.A.—Bible Studies in Outline. 1s. net, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.
 GRÜNBAUM, ALBERT S.—The Essentials of Morbid Histology for the Use of Students. With Illustrations.
 JAMES, WILLIAM.—Essays in Radical Empiricism.
 MENEILE, A. H., D.D.—Deuteronomy. Its Place in Revelation.
 SARSON, MAY, and PHILLIPS, MABEL ADDISON. With Preface by the REV. A. A. DAVID, D.D., Headmaster of Rugby.—The History of the People of Israel.
 TIMIRIAEFF, G. A.—Translated from the corrected Seventh Russian Edition by MISS ANNA CHEREMETEFF.—The Life of the Plant. Illustrations.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co., Ltd.

BARCLAY, MRS. HUBERT.—The Giant Fisher 7d. net.
 BLACKWOOD, ALGERNON.—John Silence 7d. net.
 BLACKWOOD, ALGERNON.—The Man Whom the Trees Loved, and Other Stories. Illustrated by Graham Robertson 6s.
 CHREE, DR. C., F.R.S.—Researches in Terrestrial Magnetism.
 CLARKE, MARCUS.—For the Term of His Natural Life.
 EARLE, MRS. C. W., and CASE, MISS ETHEL.—Gardening for the Ignorant.
 FARRAR, DEAN.—Eternal Hope 1s. net.
 FURST, HERBERT E. A.—Individuality and Art. Illustrated.
 HARDY, THOMAS.—Tess of the D'Urbervilles. With Photogravure Frontispiece and a Map of the Wessex of the Novels and Poems. 7s. 6d. net.
 HARDY, THOMAS.—Far from the Madding Crowd. With Photogravure Frontispiece and a Map of the Wessex of the Novels and Poems. 7s. 6d. net.
 HEWLETT, MAURICE.—The Stopping Lady. In Cloth Binding. 2s. net.
 HEWLETT, MAURICE.—Fond Adventures. In Cloth Binding 2s. net.
 HORNE, REV. C. SILVESTER.—The Life of David Livingstone. Illustrated.
 HYATT, STANLEY PORTAL.—The Law of the Bolo 7d. net.
 KELTIP, J. SCOTT, LL.D. (Edited by).—The Statesman's Year Book for the Year 1912. 10s. 6d. net.
 PATER, WALTER.—The Renaissance. 1s. net.
 PHILLIPS, EVELYN MARCH.—The Venetian School of Painting. Illustrated.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Three Knaves. 7d. net.
 ROSS, COLONEL CHARLES, D.S.O.—An Outline of the Russo-Japanese War, 1904, 1905. Vol. I. Up to, and including, the Battle of Liao-Yang.
 Select Letters of WILLIAM COWPER. With Introduction and Notes by J. G. FRASER, D.C.L. 2 vols. 8s. net.
 SHAKESPEARE, LT.-COL. J. C. I.E., D.S.O.—The Lushet Clans.
 TEMPLE, REV. WILLIAM, Headmaster of Repton.—The Kingdom of God: A Course of Four Lectures.
 WELLS, H. G.—The Stolen Bacillus and Other Incidents. 7d. net.
 WILLIAMSON, ROBERT W.—With an Introduction by A. C. HADDON, Sc.D., F.R.S.—The Mafuku Mountain People of British New Guinea. Illustrated.
 YOUNGHUSBAND, COL. G. J.—The Story of the Guides. 1s. net.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co., Ltd., and Philip Lee Warner.

DAVIES, RANDALL.—A Lyttel Booke of Nonsense. Illustrated with old woodcuts.
 The Revival of Printing: A Catalogue and Bibliography of the Works issued by the Chert Modern English Presses. With Introduction by Robert Steele. Limited to 450 copies. Boards, 16s. net, limp vellum, 25s. net. On vellum limited to 12 copies, £15 15s. net.

Mr. Andrew Melrose.

ANONYMOUS.—Daphne in the Fatherland 6s.
 HILLANS, A. DUNDAS.—The Crime of 1812 10s. 6d. net.
 HRYCE, DR. ALEXANDER.—The Laws of Life and Health. 2s. 6d. net.
 TURNBULL, CLARA.—The Damsel Dark. 6s.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

BRIGHAM, ARTHUR A., B.S., Ph.D.—Progressive Poultry Culture. Revised by S. C. Sharpe. With 16 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLINCH, GEORGE.—London. With 32 Illustrations and a Map. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, leather, 3s. 6d. net.
 HIRST, F. W. (Edited by).—The Progress of the Nation. First compiled by G. R. Porter. A completely new Edition. 1s. net.
 LUCAS, E. V. (Edited by).—The Pocket Edition of the Works of Charles and Mary Lamb. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. 6 Vols. Vol. II. 5s.
 MORRISON, ARTHUR.—Tales of Mean Streets. 1s. net.
 PARKER, SIR GILBERT.—The Seats of the Mighty 2s. net.
 SACHS, FRANK.—The Complete Swimmer. With Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 WADE, G. W., D.D., and J. H. WADE, M.A.—Rambles in Somerset. With 20 Illustrations and a Map. 6s.
 WATT, FRANCIS.—Edinburgh and the Lothians. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by Walter Dexter, R.B.A. 10s. 6d. net.
 WILDE, OSCAR.—Lord Arthur Savile's Crime. 1s. net.
 WILDING, ANTHONY F. (Champion 1910-1911).—My Lawn Tennis Book. Specially Illustrated. 5s. net.
 WOODCOCK, DR. H. DE CARLE.—The Doctor and the People. 6s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

BAGOT, RICHARD.—The Italians of To-Day. 2s. 6d. net.
 BREBNER, PERCY J.—The Silver Medallion. 6s.
 BUCKROSE, J. E.—A Bachelor's Comedy. 6s.
 COLUM, PADRAIC.—My Irish Year. 10s. 6d. net.
 NEWTE, H. W. C.—Lena Swallow: A Sister to Sparrows. 1s. net.
 SIMPSON, HAROLD.—Rambles in Norway. 6s.
 STEVENS, E. S.—The Mountain of God. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 STODDARD, F. W.—Tramps Through Tyrol. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. John Murray.

- ANON.—An Englishwoman's Love Letters. 1s. net.
 ANON.—The Setting Sun: Poem.
 BURGHCLERE, LADY.—Life of the First Duke of Ormonde.
 DUCHESNE, MONSIGNOR L.—The Early History of the Christian Church. Vol. II. 9s. net.
 DUNRAVEN, THE EARL OF.—The Finances of Ireland.
 DUNRAVEN, THE EARL OF.—The Outlook in Ireland. Cheap Edition. 6d. net.
 EDGUMBE, RICHARD.—Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley.
 FAIRLESS, MICHAEL.—The Gathering of Brother Hilarius. 1s. net.
 FRASER, MAJOR-GENERAL, SIR J.—Military Danger of Home Rule in Ireland.
 HOWORTH, SIR HENRY.—St. Gregory the Great.
 JACKSON, F. HAMILTON.—Rambles in the Pyrenees. Illustrations.
 LIVINGSTONE, THE LATE DAVID.—The First Expedition to Africa. 1s. net.
 MACALISTER, PROFESSOR R. A. SIFWART.—The Excavation of Gezer, 1902-1903 and 1907-1909. 2 vols. of Letterpress and 1 vol. of Illustrations. Published for the Palestine Exploration Fund. 71 4s. net.
 OGLE, THE REV. A.—The Canon Law in Medieval England.
 PAYNE, C. H. (translated by).—An Account of My Life (Gohur-I-Ikbal), by Her Highness Nawab Sultan Jahan Begum, Ruler of Bhopal. With Map and Illustrations.
 POLLEN, MADAME A.—Life of John Hungerford Pollen.
 STANLEY, THE LATE DEAN.—Historical Memorials of Canterbury. With Illustrations. 1s. net.
 TALMAGE, MRS.—Autobiography of T. De Witt Talmage, D.D. Portraits.
 TAYLOR, T. F.—Running the Blockade. 1s. net.
 WILLMOTT, MISS ELLEN.—Genus Rosa. Part XX. 21s. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

- BIRMINGHAM, GEORGE.—The Inevitable Sanctuary. 2s. net.
 DOYLE, CONAN.—The Great Shadow. 7d. net.
 KINGSLEY, CHARLES.—Here and the Wake. 6d. net.
 MASON, A. E. W.—The Four Feathers. 7d. net.
 TWAINE, MARK.—A Trump Abroad. 1s. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co.

- GREENFELD, DR. WILFRED T.—The Adventure of Life. 3s. 6d. net.
 WALSH, WALLER.—England's Fight with the Papacy. 15s. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

- CUTHBERTSON, DAVID.—The Tragedy of the Reformation. 5s. net.
 DAWSON, W. J., D.D.—The Book of Courage. 3s. 6d. net.
 LITTLE, REV. JAMES A. M.—Glorious in the Lord. 3s. 6d. net.
 LITTLE, REV. JAMES A. M.—Bibliography for Missionary Students. Published in connection with the Board of Study for Preparation of Missionaries. Containing Lists of Books suitable for Missionary Students. 1s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

- ALLINSON, A. R.—Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. 24s. net.
 ANDOM, R.—Neighbours of Mine. 6s.
 ANDOM, R.—In Jeer of a Throne. 2s. net.
 ARMSTRONG, JOHN.—The Motor Book. 10s. 6d. net.
 CAMBRIDGE, ADA.—The Retrospect. 6s.
 DANFORTH, BARONESS ALFRED.—Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. 18s. net.
 DUNCAN, SARA JEANETTE.—The Consort. 6s.
 EVERETT-GREEN, E.—Co-Heiresses. 6d.
 HOLBACH, MAUD M.—In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. 16s. net.
 MAGNAY, SIR WM.—Paul Burden. 6s.
 McEVoy, CHARLES.—Brass Faces. 6s.
 PEARCE, CHARLES E.—Love Besieged. 6d.
 SABATINI, RAFAEL.—The Lion's Skin. 2s. net.
 STANDING, PERCY CROSS.—Guerrilla Leaders of the World. 6s. net.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HEATH HOSKIN.—Swelling of Jordan. 6s.
 SYMONS, BERYL.—Prince and Priest. 6s.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Riding Master. 2s. net.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—Tropical Tales. 1s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

- BOX, G. H.—The Ezra-Apocalypse, with Prefatory Note by Dr. Sanday. 10s. 6d. net.
 CALVERT, ALFRED.—Examination Notes on Spanish. 1s. net.
 DAY, J. E.—Stockbroker's Office Organisation, Management and Accounts. 7s. 6d. net.
 DE HIRSCH DAVIES, THE REV. J. E.—A Popular History of the Church in Wales. 4s. net.
 FFASEY, J. EATON.—Teaching Composition. 2s. 6d. net.
 FLETCHER, R. A.—Guide to the Mercantile Marine. 1s. 6d. net.
 HALL, FRID.—Handbook for Commercial Teachers. 2s. 6d. net.
 HARGREAVES, A.—Examination Notes on German. 1s. net.
 HELLS, F.—The Theory and Practice of Commerce. Vol. II. 2s. 6d. net.
 HELLS, F.—The Theory and Practice of Commerce. 4s. 6d. net.
 HOBBS, J. B.—Recovering the "Ashes." Illustrated. 1s. net.
 HUNTER, J. A.—Wool: From the Raw Material to the Finished Product. Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net.
 REINHIERZ, HELEN.—Business Methods and Secretarial Work for Girls and Women. 1s. net.
 TANNFR, A. E.—Tobacco: From Grower to Consumer. Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net.
 WADF, C. E.—John Pym. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

- ANDERSON, CAPTAIN.—An Artillery Officer in the Mexican War.
 BLAKEMAN, A. NOEL.—Personal Recollections of the War of the Rebellion.
 BLOK, PETRUS JOHANNES.—History of the People of the Netherlands. 12s. 6d. net.
 COLMAN, SAMUEL.—Nature's Harmonic Unity: A Treatise on its Relation to Proportional Form.
 CRUMPTON, M. NATALINE.—Leaflets from Italy.
 FAIRCHILD, ARTHUR H. R.—A View of Poetry: A Critical Study of its Nature and Value.
 GREGORY, LADY.—Irish Folk Historic Plays. 2 Vols.
 HOLMES, JOHN HAYNES, D.D.—The Revolutionary Function of the Modern Church.
 ISAACS, ABRAHAM S., Ph.D.—What is Judaism?
 JACKSON, SAMUEL MACAULAY.—Selections from the Works of Huldreich Zwinger: The Reformer of German Switzerland. Vol. I.
 KEY, ELLEN.—The Woman's Movement.
 LANGE, ALGOT.—In the Amazon Jungle.
 LIVERMORE, COLONEL W. R.—The Story of the Civil War. Part III.
 LITCHFIELD, GRACE DENIO.—The Nun of Kent: A Drama. 3s. 6d. net.
 LLOYD, CARO.—Henry Demarest Lloyd: A Biography. 2 vols.
 MACNUTT, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS.—De Orbe Novo. The Eight Decades of Peter Martyr of Anghera.
 NILES, GRACE G.—The Hoosac Valley: Its Legends, and its History.
 PAGE, CURTIS HIDDEN.—Plays of Moliere. 4 vols.
 RAPER, CHARLES L.—Railway Transportation.
 SELIGMAN, E. R. A.—The Social Evil.
 STERNE, SIMON.—Railways.
 "THE PRINCESS."—Traveller's Tales.

The Fleming H. Revell Company.

- CHAPMAN, J. WILBUR, D.D.—Power: "Received Ye the Holy Ghost." 1s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, REV. WM., WALTER, A.B.A.N., M.D.—The Sunday School of To-day: A Compendium of Hints for Superintendents and Pastors. 5s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

- LEGGE, MARGARET.—A Semi-Detached Marriage. 6s.
 MACKELLA, DOROTHEA, and BEDFORD, RUTH.—The Little Blue Devil. 6s.
 PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—A Faery Land Forlorn. 6s.
 WESTRUP, WILLIAM.—The Land of To-Morrow. 6s.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

- "A WATCHER." Rays of the Dawn: or, Fresh Light on New Testament Problems. 3s. 6d. net.
 BRADLEY, CUTHBERT ("Whisper" of The Field).—Fox-Hunting from Shire to Shire. With Introduction by note by Captain Pennell Elmhurst ("Brooksbey" of The Field). With six coloured plates and over 100 illustrations in the text. 12s. 6d. net.
 ELLIS, MRS. HAVELOCK (Edited by).—The Lover's Calendar. 4s. net.
 PATTERSON, J. G.—A Zola Dictionary: The Characters and Scenes of Les Rougon-Macquart. With a Genealogical Table and a Map. 8s. 6d. net.
 RAWNSLEY, F. W.—Introduction to the Poets. 2s. 6d.
 SIEVEKING, I. GIBBERNE.—Memor of Sir Horace Mann. With 8 Plates. About 10s. net.
 ZIMMER, GEORGE FREDERICK, F.R.Hort S., F.L.S., A.M.Inst.C.E.—A Popular Dictionary of Botanical Names and Terms, with their English Equivalents. In Two Parts. I. Specific Names. II. Family Names.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

- DAWSON, CHARLES B.—The Mirror of Oxford: A Catholic History of Oxford. With 41 Half-Tone Illustrations and Map. 8s. net.
 FIELD, MICHAEL.—Poems of Adoration. Cover Design by C. Ricketts. 3s. net.
 GASQUET, ALBERT (O.S.B.).—Abbot Waulingford: Dealing with the Relations of Abbot Waulingford with Cardinal Morton. 2s. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

- ALLEN, REV. ROLAND.—Missionary Methods. St. Paul's or Ours. 4s. net.
 CHADWICK, REV. W. E., D.D.—Through Discipline to Victory. 2s. 6d. net.
 DAWSON-WALKER, REV. D.D.—The First Epistle to the Corinthians. 3s. 6d. net.
 ELDER, REV. S. M.A.—Children's Service Hymns. 1d.
 EMMET, REV. CYRIL M.A.—The Epistle to the Galatians. 3s. 6d. net.
 GUY WARMAN, REV. F. S., D.D.—The Second Epistle to the Corinthians. 3s. 6d. net.
 HANCOCK, REV. BERNARD M.—The Prayer Book in the Parish. 2s. net.
 JOYNT, REV. CANON R. C., M.A.—Liturgy and Life. 1s. 6d. net.
 KARNFY, EVELYN S.—The Path of Desire; or, In the Days of Buddha. 3s. 6d. net.
 LAURIE-WALKER, AGNESE.—Hudaysh, Queen of Persia. 2s. 6d. net.
 LEE, REV. HARRINGTON C., M.A.—The Arithmetic of Heaven. 3d.
 LITTLE, REV. JAMES, B.A.—The Cross in Holy Scripture. 2s. net.
 LITTON, LAURENCE, M.A., M.A.—Introduction to Dogmatic Theology. New Revised Edition. 10s. 6d. net.
 LYTTLETON, REV. THE HON. EDWARD, M.A.—Character and Religion. 5s. net.
 MOULI, REV. VEN. ARTHUR E., B.D.—The Splendour of a Great Hope. 3s. 6d. net.
 MYERS, FREDERIC W. H.—Saint Paul. 6d. net.
 OTTLEY, REV. R. L., D.D.—The Rule of Faith and Hope. 4s. net.
 PLUMMER, REV. ALFRED, D.D.—The Churches in Britain. Vol. II. 5s. net.
 REYNOLDS, REV. FRED B.—The History and Methods of Religion. 4s. net.
 ROSTRON, REV. S. NOWELL, M.A.—The Christology of St. Paul. 5s. net.
 SMITH, REV. HAROLD, M.A.—The Gospels. 4s. net.
 WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S.—Life's Chance. 4s. 6d. net.
 WALPOLE, REV. G. H. S., D.D.—People's Prayer Book. 2s. 6d. net.
 WATTS-DITCHFIELD, REV. J. F., M.A.—Jehovah's Men, or, How to Win the Mon. Revised and Enlarged Edition. 2s. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson, Ltd.

- BRIDGES, J. D.—A Candidate for Truth. 4s.
 CARR, R. B. A.—The Ready Guide to British Birds. With Colour Plate and other Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
 CHATTERTON, L. KEBLE.—Down Channel in the "Vivette," a Yachting Log. Re Issue. 5s. net.
 DEWAR, G. A. B.—Miniatures. 2s. 6d. net.
 MEHLER, NOEL J., F.R.G.S.—The Larch and its Story. With over 70 Half-Tone Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Elliot Stock.

- CALLAN, REV. HUGH.—Heart Cures. 2s. 6d. net.
 "E.V.E."—A Book of Heavenly Birthdays. 4s. 6d. net.
 FORSHAW, C. E.—Pearls of Poetry. 10s. 6d. net.
 GORDON, ELLA MARY.—Fishes and Reverses. 2s. net.
 GORDON, ELLA MARY.—Enchanted Fancies. 2s. net.
 HARWOOD, REV. T. E.—The Teaching of the Fathers "I.B."—Lord of All. 2s. 6d. net.
 ROMILLY, ALICE J.—Thackeray Studies. 2s. 6d. net.
 SAUNDERS, W. J.—Kalamera. 6s.
 SMITH, ROSE F. CARR.—A Garland of Shakespeare's Flowers. 3s. net.
 STEAD, W. FORCE.—Windflowers. 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- D'OLLENE, VICOMTE.—In Forbidden China. 12s. 6d. net.
 DUNLOP, O. JOCELYN.—English Apprenticeship and Child Labour. 10s. 6d. net.
 ENOCK, C. REGINALD.—The Secret of the Pacific. 12s. 6d. net.
 HALL, EDGAR VINCE.—The Romance of Wills and Testaments. 5s. net.
 KITCHING, A. T.—On the Backwaters of the Nile. Studies of some Child Races of Central Africa. 12s. 6d. net.
 LEISZY, LEONARD.—Cracow: Its History and Antiquities. 10s. 6d. net.
 PERCIVAL, MACIVER.—Chats on Old Jewellery and Trinkets. 4s. net.
 THURSTON, EDGAR.—Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

- ASKEW, A. and C.—Scarlet Town. 6d.
 BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—The Impostor. 7d. net.
 BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—Hawley's Deputy. 2s. net.
 MAGNAY, SIR WM.—Rogues in Arrady. 6s.
 NORRIS, W. E.—Misadventure. 6d.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—The Governors. 1s. net.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Mother. 7d. net.
 "RITA."—Miss Kate. 6d.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE A.—They Laugh that Win. 6d.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—A Son of the Immortals. 6s.
 RUSKIN, JOHN.—Crown of Wild Olive. 1s.
 WARDEN, GERTRUDE.—The Woman Who Tempted. 6s.
 WILSON-BARRETT, A.—Tower Hill Mystery. 6s.
 WOOD, J. HICKORY.—Merry Thoughts: Recitations. 2s. net.

Messrs. Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co.

- CHAMBERS, I. C.—The Boy Scouts' Book of Plays. (The Little Treasure Series.) 4d. paper; 6d. cloth.

THE READER.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

BY NEIL MUNRO.

HOWEVER barren of good literature the latter part of the Victorian era might appear to those worthy people whose interest in fiction terminated with Thackeray and Dickens, it has already in retrospect for a younger age the bounty and the glow of unrecoverable autumn days. "Other gifts have followed, for such loss I would believe, abundant recompense," even though the weather is never likely to be quite so splendid, the morns so magic as when enamoured youth attended at the harvest homes of Hardy, Meredith, and Stevenson. Fervour is an affair of the arteries, like youth itself, and if there be less elation for us in the work of our most gifted young contemporaries, it boots not to boast of what is doubtless due to some calcareous infiltration. They, too, may take some place in the remembrance and affection of an era. All good things are passed on.

Bleak and barren though the autumn of the nineteenth century seemed to so many of our elders, because the blood was thin and cold, and the wits were perhaps less nimble, we know now that the weather and the crops were a decent average. It was our privilege to follow home with cheers the maiden-sheaves of three good husbandmen. Possibly not the greatest of them, as time may show, but personally the most beloved, Robert Louis Stevenson has, the soonest of the three, indubitably become a classic, the culminating figure in one epoch of the romance now temporarily somewhat in eclipse, his name alone enough to rouse the mood of gladness and affection, his work a national possession because acceptable and dear in more or less degree, like ancient songs, alike to finely cultivated and to simple people. In the years which have elapsed since his death in Samoa in 1894, his place with readers, however it be with men who write—a matter of secondary importance—has been each year more durably established. The young have not grown weary of his stories, though, significantly, alone among the tales of his contemporaries they have become the vehicle of the teacher. His philosophy, which emanates from every line he wrote, and on reflection jumps to the mind in concrete form, has not, for the elderly, grown stale, démodé, nor disreputable, for faith, hope, charity, courage, and human goodwill are abiding elements in the philosophies of all ages, things tangible to take hold of in this unintelligible world, and welcome to every wholesome appetite, like bread and water.

Save in the great gift of health, the stars that shone on Stevenson's nativity were all propitious. He had genius, sanity, gaiety, and an abiding charm of humanity which ensured him many ardent friendships. He was happy in his parentage, his opportunities, and the circumstances of his folk, which were such that at no time, save very briefly in California, and then only for the sake of pride, had he any serious cause to apprehend the calls of Byles, the butcher. Fate never drove him to the necessity of banking down his fires periodically to boil a domestic pot; he could afford to be deliberate and fastidious in the selection and in the execution of his tasks. No other writer in our time had his artistic reputation so carefully fostered and guarded by friends, themselves accomplished and discerning. They nursed it like a flower. They would have nothing from him but his best, even if he were prepared to give them otherwise, which consciously, he never was. Knowing that good work was expected from him, he came always "nobly to the grapple." In his prolonged valetudinarian absences, those friends at home, in closest touch with English sentiment, appraising tendencies, certain of his power and jealous for his fame, saw to it that no inferior performance should be permitted to discount his merits. This high estimate of what he was destined to achieve was manifest very early when his father withdrew "The Pentland Rising" from circulation. It seems, further, to have led to the suppression in permanent form in England, till after his death, of several works regarded as inferior in quality, like "The Amateur Emigrant," "In the South Seas" and "The Misadventures of John Nicholson."

This zealous solicitude for the prestige of a young artist who seemed ready to accept its implication of a rare and precious genius which must never be allowed, as it were, to wet its feet, undoubtedly gave the cynics some excuse to scoff. England, hitherto, had never been a country to handle its artistic prodigies like fragile porcelain; its glory had been men robust and prodigal, who spent themselves with royal generosity, with recklessness

Photo by Falk, Sydney.

Robert Louis Stevenson.

Autographed and presented by Stevenson to Mr. H. Walter Barnett, with whose permission it is here reproduced.

The Rev. Lewis Balfour, Stevenson's Grandfather.

indeed, as kings with boundless stores of life and inspiration, too eager to worry about an occasional copper coin in the bulk of their golden largesse. In that early Stevensonian cult there was something, as it seemed, of what with insular complacency we are apt to regard as the Continental: he was applauded as a petit maitre, and all the trappings—the velvet jacket, the black flannel shirt, the great preoccupation with Style, and the tendency to triolets, were “in a concatenation according.” “You should do everything in minuet time” was Lord Chesterfield’s advice; good enough counsel for a petit maitre, but not the deportment expected from a successor to Walter Scott, whose limp had never spoiled his stride across the mountains.

Yet Stevenson and his friends were right, with shadowy premonitions. He was not of triple brass, to embark on a Comédie Humaine with superb indifference to mortal limitation or the hope of making up in bulk what he might sacrifice in finish. That “something not ourselves”

Robert Stevenson, Stevenson's Grandfather.

knows what a man is fit for, and dictates what he shall attempt, with a finger ever on the pulse, withdrawing nervous granules from the brain and so creating weariness when weariness is best. Under that dictation Stevenson confined himself, in the main, to enterprises which could be accomplished in the impetus of a single mood of inspiration, whose entire features, from start to finish, could be compassed in a moment’s thought, as lyrics are, or ought to be, conceived: his peculiar strength and pleasure were in fastidious revision more than in creation. In five-and-twenty volumes of his works, there are only six or seven wherein unaided by collaboration he embarked on epic voyages (if novels like

Photo by John Moffatt, Edinburgh.

Thomas Stevenson,
the Father of R.L.S.

From Stevenson’s Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)
“His entire life was devoted to the unremitting pursuit of a scientific profession . . . yet it was from him that Louis derived all the romantic and artistic elements that drew him away from engineering.”
—“Life of Stevenson,” by Graham Balfour. (Methuen.)

Mrs. Stevenson,
the Mother of R.L.S.

From Stevenson’s Works. Pentland edition. (Cassell.)
“When he was small she read to him a great deal and to her he owed his first acquaintance with much that is best in literature.” “Life of Stevenson,” by Graham Balfour. (Methuen.)

"Kidnapped" and "Treasure Island" may be so regarded), the bulk of his work and possibly what shall last the longest is brief and altogether lyrical. For Stevenson to plunge, like Scott or Dickens into great uncharted seas with no land visible on the other side or toil with the imperative printer at his heels was a physical impossibility. He was essentially an inland voyager, leisurely sailing single handed pulling up to the bank at nightfall each day by itself a trip completed. It was well then that the sense in himself and in his friends of things impending made them scrupulous about the nature of the freightage.

For one who only carried picked cargoes during fifteen or sixteen years and only for nine of them with the stimulus of public appreciation the quantity alone in addition like the Swinston whose issue is the occasion of this review is amazing.* There are five and twenty volumes of essays, poems, travels, biography, tales and letters wherein is seldom the slightest indication of the invader. On the contrary the spirit which is disengaged from this mass of a physical weakness, work is like that which emanates from beings hardly self-assured and joyful. Only his language sometime nuances his nature steep but heasted like a stag regardless of the weather. Doubles in tender human life where the ebbs are exceeding low, full tides come higher than elsewhere on the beaches for sore days and meet are compensating hours when pain dispelled and the banner of Bloody Jack hauled down the world is clothed in grandeur—to breathe is bliss, and the voices of one's fellow-men are sweetest music. From these hours of communion from his misadventures Stevenson conceived the world and life as things more infinitely grand than they are to such as have perpetual vigour. It is too often the hale well-nourished safe and comfortable who cloy of common pleasures like the light of sun and grow critical and contemptuous of the very gestures of their fellow beings.

* The Swinston Edition of the Works of Stevenson, 25 volumes. With an introduction by Andrew Lang. 6s. net each. In sets only. (Chatto & Windus in association with Cassell & Co., W. Heinemann and Longmans, Green & Co.)

1111 / 1a 1111 /

R. L. S. and his father.

Stevenson never aged nor lost his illusions because to find himself awake at any time to the full and serene possession of untroubled faculties was in a sense a recreation, a fresh beginning in a world of brave sublimity things. If he looked at the drab of life he saw it as a thing exceptional, a social discomfiture no more general than his own poor lungs to be regarded like his hæmorrhages, or the monsters of "The Dynamiter," with that ironic humour which is the gentlemanly antagonist of terror. Fashions in fiction chop and change as in gowns and millinery, the waist line has come down of late, and novels for this spring season are didactic, sociological, political, and all that to the time of Stevenson a novel, any more than poetry or painting should not be, but idealism, romance, and even sentiment—that horrid thing we condemn so loudly when the sense of it is atrophied in ourselves—have only to be expressed with the authority of genius to be assured at any time of welcome and applause. The world which cherishes the work of Robert Louis Stevenson which buys more of his books than it bought when each one, freshly published, had a rubric in the calendar, and

Photo by J. Patrick. No. 8, Howard Place, Edinburgh. Where Stevenson was born on November 13th 1850.

Robert Louis Stevenson 1871 (Age 21.)

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh.

R.L.S.'s school, Henderson Road, Edinburgh.

which in eighteen years has put three costly complete editions to a premium, has not yet banished fancy.

To impress by power alone is feasible in art; it was done by Balzac and Dumas, but more to personality than to power does human affection for any length of time give its allegiance, and the combination, in the right degree, is irresistible. More potent than the conscious art of Stevenson to retain the place he holds is his individuality as revealed in his career and obvious in his work. His key to our hearts is a fine Horatian urbanity, a grace for the moment lost among practitioners of letters, who, perched on a pedestal of self-approval, preach at us fanatically and rudely criticise the things we love. With his urbanity commingled another element sometimes regarded as antagonistic to it, namely, irony. It is often the resort of the embittered and the harsh, but likewise it has always been the weapon of men with an inability to shout across the table against the cock-sure. In its amiable form it does not lapse to cynicism, being sensitive and gentle, having no source in a flattering self-esteem. This spirit of kindly mockery pervades the work of Stevenson. It animates much of his verse, even, and, there perceived so often as an undertone of modest and amused self-criticism, has doubtless contributed to the hesitation with which some of his heartiest admirers accept him as a poet. Very few of his poems, his widow tells us, were conceived with any other purpose than the entertainment of the moment. The metrical inspiration of some of them is easily to be discovered, for, like Burns and Kipling, he was ever best at a song when he had an air to fit it to. When we cut the numbers of "Underwoods" or "Songs of Travel" from day to day out of the Pall Mall Gazette, they seemed perfect little gems of unpretentious thicket song, which may be sometimes sweeter, even to fastidious ears, than the uproar of the nightingale. To me, at all events, they still have a charm, perhaps not wholly in their essence but maintained by memory and association. There cried, and still cries in them, the soul of exile and of "old unable years." His Scottish verse is in a different category; the gentle ironist is there too obvious. Stevenson's accurate and forceful use of the vernacular is not

R.L.S. in his barrister's robes, Age 25.

I think now, this 5th or 6th of April 1873, that I can see my future life. I think it will run stiller and stiller year by year; a very quiet, deasil-twillly studious existence. If God only gives me tolerable health, I think now I shall be very happy; work and science calm the mind and sloth growing in the brain; and as I am glad to say that I do now recognise that I shall hence be a great man, I may set myself peacefully on a smaller journey; not without hope of coming to the inn before nightfall.
Gelassenen Leben nach diesem Ziel ein ewig wandeln Res!

Desiderata.

*I Good-Health
 II 2 to 3 hundred a year.
 III O du lieber Gott, friends!*

A M E N

Robert Louis Stevenson

Facsimile of note by Stevenson.
 From Stevenson's Works. Swanston Edition. (Chatto and Windus, Cassell, Heinemann and Longmans)

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh

No. 17, Heriot Row, Edinburgh, where Stevenson's Parents Lived from 1857 to 1867.

"In Heriot Row he had now for his use the two rooms on the top floor of his father's house, which had been his nurseries."—Life of Stevenson, by Graham Balfour. (Methuen) to be denied, but he used it in his verse in a manner not wholly unsophisticated, in hours when the artistic possibilities of the thing were the inspiration and not the heart's emotions.

Urbanity and irony, though not the stuff of immortal poetry, are nowhere more effective than in the essay, whose best exponents have taught us to regard these qualities as virtually indispensable. It is therefore more in the essay than in verse or novel that Stevenson's individuality and charm as man and writer are best revealed, and it is impossible to quarrel with the conclusion of Mr. Andrew Lang in his introduction to the Swanston Edition that we have in Stevenson "the master British essayist of the later nineteenth century," by reason of his vivacity, vitality, his original reflections on life, and his personal and

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh

Robert Louis Stevenson.

Swanston Cottage, the early home of R.L.S.
His father took a lease of the house in 1867.

fascinating style, regarding which it is perhaps unfortunate that he took the world too much into his confidence, since "sedulous ape" is the readiest criticism to come to the lips of the Philistine. Poets first make poetry, and only afterwards learn about anapasts and amphibrachys that they may understand their critics. Some such post-liminius after-application of old canons to acts already done intuitively is as common with artists as with politicians, and Stevenson's paper on "The Technical Elements of Style," like Poe's account of "The Raven," is more or less an artists' game, an ebullition of energetic gaiety: his own style had been directed by eye and ear, associative idea, and a natural taste for the verbally unexpected, the surprise. "My style is from the Covenanting writers" he said. Let those who are impressed by such an airy statement, read Patrick Walker and be disillusioned. In truth, any derivation of Stevenson's style from any particular predecessor is tenuous, though his philosophy and his tingling sense of out-door things, his tolerance towards the "friendly and flowing savage" in mankind may have been got directly from America. There are thousands of indications that for his thinking he owed as much to Whitman and Thoreau as to any of the gentlemen prescribed at the best academies. His style, in fine, is an incarnation of his thought and character, and the urbanity and fastidiousness of his nature pervade his rhythm and cadence, the choice and order of his words as much as the selection of his themes. His language could never have been the ready-made stuff of literary slop-shops, and the distaste for platitude, which with most people is confined to platitude of phrase or idea, extended, in him, to the adjective. No man was ever less constituted to feel happy in a second-hand pair of trousers, and the search through life and words for what was most in harmony with himself was unsatisfied by anything short of his private ideal.

Where Stevenson thought himself beholden to anyone he was prompt and frank enough to mention it, and generally, as in the case of the Covenanters, gave more credit than was due. His acknowledgments of indebtedness to Defoe, Poe, Kingsley, and Marryat for

Stevenson.

After the painting by A. C. Michu. (Reproduced from "Robert Louis Stevenson," Days with Great Writers, See (Hodder & Stoughton))

Frontispiece to "An Inland Voyage."

From Stevenson's Works. Swanston Edition. (Chatto & Windus.)

conceptions in his first book, "Treasure Island," are equivalent to an admission that islands, parrots, skeletons, and dead men's chests are the monopoly of who first makes use of them in fiction. "Treasure Island" none the less, in every particular was from his private mint. But another tale of his, "St. Ives," had—as I may be alone in fancying—its inception in a narrative which he probably had read in youth in the pages of Chambers' Miscellany. In a volume of that promiscuous and delightful periodical, once dear to Scottish households, there is given a translation from the French of a "Story of a French Prisoner of War in England," which supplies almost all the essential mechanism of "St. Ives," including the duel in the citadel. Champdivers and Goguelat each fought with half of a pair of scissors attached to a wand; in the French narrative the encounter was with blades of knives so utilised. There is another duel scene of Stevenson's—that by candle-light in the garden in "The Master of Ballantrae,"—which seems like a transfigured memory of a similar episode between the Duc de Champdoce and George de Croisenois in a story of Gaboriau's. Of the myriad of such dramatic hints conveyed in the works of the superficial and uninspired who knew not into what recesses of pure gold their picks had reached, I wish he had lived to avail himself still more, for from literature as from life he took no hints but to adorn and elevate.

In two of his stories—"Kidnapped" and "Catriona,"—the influence of Walter Scott, I think, is obvious. He had read "Rob Roy" at the age of ten, and stumbled half-asleep into the region of Highland romance as Scott invented it, with the result that save for some actual glimpses he got himself of the Highlands, he saw them ever after in a measure through the Wizard's eyes. "When I think of that novel," he wrote in after years, "I am impatient with all others; they seem but shadows and impostors." Yet there are few Highlanders, I think, who would not, so far as purely Highland features are concerned, prefer the adventures of David Ballour to those of "Waverley" or "Rob Roy." No nice considerations about even an approximate realism governed Scott's treatment of Gaelic life and character: he looked at them as Professor Reinhardt looks at Sophocles, with a single eye to their effect as pageantry, and saw them in a light that never was on land or sea. He never reported the speech of the natives either in Erse or English but with magnificent insouciance, and a grotesque improbity which has unhappily become stereotyped in most of his successors, and his Gaelic characters are equally remote from actual type. I hesitate to cavil about novels which at times have been my own delight, but the truth is imperative, that Allan Macaulay is the ill-begotten offspring of that gigantic humbug,

R.L.S., taken in California.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

Photo by Holinge

Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

"Of the marriage it need only be said that from the beginning to the end her husband and wife were all one." Life of Stevenson, by Graham Ballour. (Methuen.)

Macpherson's "Ossian," and Rob Roy, in almost every manifestation, is a Borderer without one drop of mountain blood.

Stevenson was undoubtedly inspired by "Rob Roy," but though he might vow "death to the optic nerve," he used his eyes in this particular territory of Scotland more conscientiously than Scott. He saw the masses of his picture with the eyes of Scott; the details were his own perception. It is the veritable Highland wind that blows across his pages; his glens and coasts have the impressiveness of things emotionally remembered.

He had, too, a quicker ear than Scott for alien idioms and turns of utterance, and had evidently read Campbell's "Tales of the West Highlands" with profit to his manipulation of the thought and speech of persons like Alan Breck and Catriona. Further, he had grasped some salient features of the Gaelic character, and though he suggested in a letter to Mr. Barrie that Alan Breck was a Highlander only in his name and otherwise a Sassenach, he did himself there a vast injustice. It was a writer with a marvellous power to reconstruct the pterodactyl from a single tooth who, from one or two letters in the Introduction to "Rob Roy," was able to create the spy James Mor Drummond, as deadly true to one type of Celtic character as it was to the actual history of James Mor, though Stevenson did not know it. Oddly enough, as it may seem to such as do not realise the irony of art, the only blundering chapter in "Kidnapped" has been among the most admired—the piping contest in Balquidder, and that pipers improvise, and ornament their improvisations with "warblers" is an error as persistent now as cairngorms or the toast "with Highland honours."

Monterey, California.

The house in which Stevenson lived from September to December, 1879.

It seems almost a disloyalty to comment upon an inappreciable lapse like this in one who, to the compatriot heart at all events, endears himself by countless virtues of which not least was an almost pious tendency to confine his criticism to himself and his achievements. We rejoice in him, not only as in him range the perfect artist who has given glad hours and the example of intrepidity to a host of people widely set apart in islands of the sea, and in the depths of continents, and in their circumstances, but also as another vindication of a racial spirit capable of flowering into beauty even where "the bells clash of a Sunday, and the wind squalls, and the salt showers fly and beat." From the loins of those Cyclopean men who fought on coast and skerry with the monstrous obstacles of nature—this gentle being with a tender hand to fashion gems! From a long heredity of Puritan austerity the elegant and debonair!

Frontispiece to "The Silverdor Squatters."

From Stevenson's Works. Swanston Edition, 8 (Chapman and Windus.)

TO COUNT GIROLAMO NERLI.

(We are indebted to Mrs. Joanne Butler, of Westbury-on-Trym, for a copy of the following verses written by Stevenson while sitting to Count Nerli for his portrait—"Count Nerli was a friend of my husband's," writes Mrs. Butler, "and gave him the verses on his return from the island.")

Did ever mortal man hear tell of sae singular a lerie
As the coming to Apia here of the painter, Mr. Nerli
He cam, and O for a human friend, of a' he was the perli;
The pearl of a' the painter folk was surely Mr. Nerli
He took a thrav to paint mysel', he painted late and early,
O, wow, the mony a yawn I've vawned in the beard of Mr.
Nerli.

Whiles I would sleep, and whiles would wake, and whiles was mair than surly,

I wondered sair, as I sat there, fornenst the eyes of Nerli
Oh will he paint me away I want, as bonny as a girle?
Or will he paint me a ugly tyke, and be damned to Mr. Nerli!
But still, and on, and whichever it is, he is a canty kerli
The Lord protect the back and neck of honest Mr. Nerli.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

VAILIMA,
SAMOA.

Stevenson.

From a portrait painted at Samoa by Count Girolamo Nerli.
From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

APRIL, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original lyric. Choice of theme is left entirely to the Competitor, but the lyric should not run to more than forty lines.
- II. A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III. A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the most appropriate motto from Browning's poems applicable to either the Coal Strike or the Suffrage Movement.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.

Title page of a burlesque romance written by Stevenson and his stepson, Lloyd Osbourne.

In 1880-1882, when staying at Davos, Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne (then thirteen), set up a toy printing press; they wrote nonsense stories between them, R.L.S. made engravings to illustrate them, which Lloyd Osbourne printed.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

Chalet la Solitude, Hyeres, where Stevenson resided in 1883.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

"Happy (said I), I was only happy once, that was at Hyeres"—
Valima Letters. Edited by Sir Sidney Colvin. (Methuen.)

- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR APRIL.

- I. THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Miss EDITH MAUD EDWARDS, of 20, Adrian Square, Westgate-on-Sea, for the following:

A GLORIOUS LIE. BY DOROTHEA GERARD.
(John Long)

TO A SKYLARK.

"Hail to thee, blithe Spirit!
Bird thou never wert."

SHELLEY.

We also select for printing :

LETTERS OF A SPINSTER. BY WINIFRED JAMES.
(Chapman & Hall.)

"O let us get married ;
Too long we have tarried."

EDWARD LEAR, Nonsense Songs and Stories
—(The Owl and the Pussy Cat).

(Miss Kathleen Graham, c/o Mrs. Ralph Falkiner, "Ventnor," Walsh Street, South Garra, Melbourne, Australia.)

THE SICK-A-BED LADY. BY E. H. ABBOTT.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"How many apples have you had ?
She answered : Only seven !"

HENRY S. LEIGH, Only Seven—Carols of Cockayne

(H. Stewart Bond, Roche, R.S.O., Cornwall.)

THE ETERNAL STRUGGLE BY NEWMAN HARDING.
(Long.)

"Gold ! Gold ! Gold ! Gold !"

MISS KILMANSEGG, Hood.

(Beatrice Craig, Craigdanagh, Straidarran, Co. Derry.)

Stevenson.

A photograph taken at Bournemouth by Mr. W. T. Hawker.
From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

THE LIFE OF CESARE BORGIA. BY RAFAEL SABATINI.
(Stanley Paul.)

"I never knew a family so criminal as yours !"

W. S. GILBERT, Gentle Alice Brown.

(Hester Fairgrieve, 316, West 20th Street,
New York, U.S.A.)

LONDON WINDOWS. BY ETHEL TALBOT.
(Stephen Swift & Co.)

"Then Christabel stretched forth her hand."

S. T. COLFRIDGE, Christabel.

(Miss A. Eleanor Pinnington, 25, Wellington Road, Brighton.)

A THREE HOURS' SERVICE FOR GOOD FRIDAY.

By REV. J. H. ECKERSLEY. (Robert Scott.)

"'It will be hard,' they say, 'to find Another service such as this.'"

TENNYSON, In Memoriam.

(J. W. Aspinall, 105, Salisbury Road, Everton, Liverpool.)

SOCIAL LIFE IN THE INSECT WORLD. BY J. H. FABRE.
(T. Fisher Unwin.)

"Will you walk into my parlour ? said the Spider to the Fly."

M. HOWITT.

(Miss E. Lewis, High Oakham Road, Mansfield, and Maud I. Findlay, 37, Queen's Road, Brighton.)

AN ENEMY TO SOCIETY. BY G. BRONSON HOWARD.
(T. Werner Laurie.)

"He crucified noble, he sacrificed mean,
He filled old ladies with kerosene."

KIPLING, Ballad of Boh Da Thone.

(Mrs. Alice Morton-Smith, Chinwangtao, North China.)

Photo by Clive Holland.

Tablets on the wall of R.L.S.'s Bournemouth house, "Skerry-vore," to the memories of two of his favourite dogs.

II.—THE PRIZE for the best topical Fable is divided, and we award Two NEW BOOKS to Miss MARIE R. BROWN, of 233, West Regent Street, Glasgow, and Two NEW BOOKS to Mrs. MABEL KNIGHT, of Hillside, Avondale Road, Bromley, Kent, for the following :

THE CENSORSHIP

In the markets of a far off country quantities of fruit were exposed for sale, much of it bad. The people, being wise, bought the good fruit, and left the bad rotting on the market stalls. Then arose a councillor who conferred with his brethren thus, saying, "Why should our people be tempted with so much bad fruit? Let us appoint one who shall decide what fruit is fit for consumption."

Thereupon an high official was appointed, and all the fruit was brought unto him that he might decide between the good and the bad. But presently the people, finding that only good fruit lay upon the market stalls, demanded the bad, and paid

Stevenson.

From an etching by William Strang.

high prices for it, while the proprietors of orchards used means to destroy their fruit that the high official might condemn it, and the people therefore be induced to buy.

"Forbidden fruit is always the sweetest."

MARIE R. BROWN.

THE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

There was once a sower who had a happy home and family until his wife said to him one day, "Husband, I am as clever as you. Why should I sit at home while you go out and sow?" and she talked so much about it, that finally she had her way. The woman found she could sow as well as her husband, and when the harvest was over she looked at the full granary with pride. But the husband said: "Who is going to eat it? Whilst you have been so busy the children have died."

MABEL KNIGHT.

This Competition has produced several very good Fables, and many bad ones. The best among the numerous others that have been sent in are those by Mrs. H. H. Penrose (Frimley

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh.

R. L. S.'s Aunt. The "Chief of our Aunts" of "A Child's Garden of Verses."

Green), Mildred Gurney (Brimscombe), A. J. Dick (High Wycombe), Muriel Monks (Lincoln), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), Elizabeth K. Packard (West Ealing), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Joyce Bradwell (Nottingham), Alfred Waller (Sunderland), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), G. Wilson Drysdale (Cricklewood), Evelyne Close (Hove), Miss A. M. McNeill (Sidmouth), Elsie Underwood (Sevenoaks), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Miss E. Lewis (Mansheld), Ethel

House at Lake Saranac, in the Adirondacks, where Stevenson lived from October, 1887, to April, 1888.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

Goodwin (Clapham), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Arthur Blundell (Southport), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), Robert Sinclair (Glasgow), Daisy H. Badland (Sheffield), Mabel Davies (Pembroke Dock), H. Elrington (Monks-town), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Ethel Cooke (Norwich), Miss F. Cumins (Blackheath), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Scarborough), A. Scotte (Bayswater), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Amy Thomas (Truro), Robert Morrison (Glasgow.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. W. G. ALEXANDER, of 10, Fulham Place, Paddington, W., for the following :

R. L. Stevenson.

After the painting by John S. Sargent, R.A., in the possession of Mrs. Stevenson.

From Stevenson's Works, Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

Stevenson's residence at Vallima, Samoa.

From Stevenson's Works, Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

Robert Louis Stevenson.

One of the best portraits taken of him.

MANALIVE. BY G. K. CHESTERTON. (Nelson)

In this, as in most of his books, we have all Chesterton. There is the paradoxical wit, that bewilders by its intellectual somersaults ; there is that power of giving swift pictures now and then, as of Moore, the buried mystic, or Diana, slender, fierce and virginal as the goddess ; there is fancy that sees blue railings as spear-heads, and imagination, splashing poetry across certain pages, as when the gold of sunset is spilt over the wind-swept garden. And underneath lies Chesterton's Everlasting Gospel, that the commonplaces are the astounding things in life, and the best lies undiscovered at our feet

Other good reviews received are :

THE MONEYMOON. BY JEFFERY FARNOL.
(Sampson Low.)

The reader who is weary of the problem novel of to-day should find refreshment for his soul in this Kentish idyll. It is full of sunshine and the sweetness of the country. The boy, Small Porges, who sets out to find gold to save his aunt's ancestral farm, the aunt herself who is the heroine, and the millionaire hero whose "almighty dollars" save each situation as it arises, are delightful people, and with the help of two or three supplementary characters make up a tale which one finishes with a pleasant sense of having been for a moment in Arcady.

(Miss Lottie Hoskins, 119, Trafalgar Road, Moseley, Birmingham.)

THIRTEEN. BY E. TEMPLE THURSTON.
(Chapman & Hall.)

Everyone should read these whimsical stories by Temple Thurston. Each one is a gem that will sparkle in the memory long after more serious works are forgotten. Mr. Thurston has a wonderful way of disarming you. He makes you smile so broadly at the comic side of life that the unutterable pathos underlying it only comes home to you--afterwards. Almost all the "Thirteen" stories are like that. They make you chuckle as you read them, and "give you furiously to think" when you have read them. This is a book to buy—not borrow from the local circulating library.

(C. G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire.)

ACROSS THE BRIDGES. BY ALEXANDER PATTERSON. (Edward Arnold.)

"Across the bridges there is a great need." This Mr. Patterson certainly makes us realise in his book. It is written, not by an idle spectator, but by a friend and comrade of the unfortunate, who has lived among them, and feels with, as well as for, them. It is a cheering book, as well as a sad one, for it shows us the kindness and sympathy which is inherent in the human heart, even under the most unfavourable circumstances. Hearts are warm by the river-side, and those who go there to teach, may also learn much (Miss E. Moore, Greenbank Cottage, Liverpool.)

THE PLOUGHBOY. BY JAMES BRYCE
(John Lane.)

James Bryce, as a ploughboy, in a farm bothy, in Midland Scotland, gives a vivid picture of the iniquities of the system. He then passes, by a strange rise in his fortunes, into a factor's office on the estate where he was originally a hind. From his observations on the territorial system, as well as from his former experiences amid sordid surroundings, he comes to the conclusion that Socialism is the only remedy for the present condition of land tenure. There are some startling transformations in the circumstances of the hero, but the book is racy of the soil, and decidedly convincing.

(J. A. Erskine Stuart, Undercliffe, Batley, Yorks.)

THE COWARD. BY ROBERT HUGH BENSON.
(Hutchinson.)

Psychological novels are numerous, but seldom do we get one as brilliant as "The Coward." Mr. Benson has taken for his hero a boy who is brave up to a point, yet who always "funks" a perilous action at the end. From the very first our sympathies are with Val, and though he fails in climbing mountains, fails to fight his duel—fails in all that he should have done, we never once blame him. His death is inevitable; and though his parents maintain he was a coward, surely all of us will feel that Val was indeed a hero.

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath.)

We highly commend also the reviews sent in by Irene Harrison (Bristol), Nelly Burdett (Norwich), Alexander Fowler (Epsom), Sidney E. Bell (Wandsworth Common), G. M. Elwood (Grimsby), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), A. Eleanor Punnington (Brighton), Margery Wilkins (Utttoxeter), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old

Kalakana, late King of the Hawaiian Islands, on the verandah of the Royal Boat House at Honolulu, with Stevenson.

Malton), James A. Richards (Tenby), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough), Elsie Bond (Pinner), Mrs. E. J. MacO. Smith (Edinburgh), Mary S. Crawford (Galway), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Miss D. A. Hudson (Hull), James Brenton (Tottenham), Mrs. Mabel Knight (Bromley), Miss Deare (Westmeath), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), George Stanton (Leicester), Miss E. Rippon (Hull), Isabelle Swinscow (Tunbridge Wells), Miss M. V. Woodgate (London, S.W.), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), H. K. Omerod (Airdrie), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), Mrs. S. Stirling (Glenfarg), Ellis M. Brown (Glasgow).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Miss EVELYN M. ABBOTT, of The Croft, Old Malton, Yorkshire.

The Staircase, Vailima.

From "Stevenson's Shrine," by Laura Stubbs. (De La More Press.)

CARDINAL NEWMAN'S LIFE.*

BY DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

YOUTH has perhaps the best of life, but one fine ingredient in the cup it cannot enjoy, which is reminiscence. To men who have arrived where I pause for a while, reminiscence becomes romance, and the former days are beautiful with colours of the morning or even with a noontide sun that has lost its fierceness but gained in depth of light. These volumes spread out before me throw up many names well known, people more or less famous that I have brushed against, scenes and incidents of which I heard from those who took part in them, stories that used to be told in confidence—all in illustration of the unique central figure, whose gracious lineaments and still piercing accents made an impression quite unequalled on our younger imaginations. To us who were his neighbours in the Midlands, almost his friends in the large and generous meaning of the word, Newman was the visible prophet, the St. John of these latter times, and his death would close a great religious period, as in truth it did. I remember seeing him mount the stairs at Oscott, that day when he came over to call on Bishop Ullathorne in consequence of the message from Rome that he was to be a Cardinal. How old and broken he looked, a very ghost from a far-off world! We learned his books by heart, disputed with one another about their meaning or their drift, already spoke of him and treated him as among the immortals, the Fathers, Doctors, Saints of Christendom, who were his peers.

In ten or eleven years he was gone, leaving a memory which sets him apart for ever. To reckon him by categories or schools of opinion would be to misconstrue him; therefore he made enemies no less vehement than friends; he divided factions, stirred men's thoughts and drove them out of their bearings, was a portent while he stayed in the Church of England, an enigma when he left it. He joined the mighty Roman Communion, which absorbed him silently, and where was he? In Rome, at Santa Croce, in a back street of Birmingham, in St. Stephen's Green, Dublin; but his Oxford, the city of Laud and King Charles over which he cast a glamour, knew him no more. The English public suspected, admired, disowned, forgot the renegade. The Tractarian became a Ritualist. Pattison, who might have caught in its falling Elijah's mantle, abandoned Catholic dogma for German thought. Keble and Pusey went their way sadly. Newman, between the exodus of '45 and the publication of his Apologia, lived through one disappointment after another until he was tempted to ask himself, "Why live at all?"

Mr. Wilfrid Ward has had the rare courage to tell the story without reticence which makes of Newman's biography a thing as poignant as it is real. He sums up in a couple of chapters the earlier half in which, to its hero's fancy, there was little suffering compared with the long and dreary episode which soon followed of genius undervalued, talents forcibly kept idle, motives maligned, health broken, solitude deepened by the loss of old companions. This was to be set down faithfully; and we have the record in Newman's own words, in his letters, diaries, prayers, but not so much as we could have desired in his conversations. There is no violation of privacy, though we are admitted to the very tribunal of conscience where he, who could search into the human heart so skilfully, laid bare his own. He used often to exclaim, "Secretum meum mihi!" for he was no stage player, feeding on self-revelation to the crowd; but he must leave an Apologia which would protect his name and fame against accusers more formidable than poor impetuous Kingsley, friends—yes, to their apprehension most attached, but for that reason to be dreaded as foes in his household, which was now the Catholic Church. Newman wrote with his life-blood pages of extraordinary truth about himself, printed here beyond recall. They are human with an intense agony, a subtle wisdom, a play of complex feelings, a humility and a lofty spirit, such as perhaps no other biography in the language can rival. Many have called him sensitive; and that keen English epithet, a trouble to French translators, no doubt describes the man. But sensitive until he was near eighty, quivering with a sick heart whether praise or criticism were offered, tremblingly awake in watches of the night to every sound, yet on principle, from mere self-respect, forbidden to write one syllable which aimed only at effect—what a lonely soul is here, and what a Promethean tragedy!

By courtesy of Messrs. Cassell & Co.

Stevenson in his study at Vallima, dictating to his step-daughter, Mrs. Strong.

* "The Life of John Henry Cardinal Newman." By Wilfrid Ward. 2 Vols. 36s. net. (Longmans)

These things make great literature. They bring the Catholic, the intense and sincere believer, into strange company. Was not Amiel another of this brooding kind? And Senancour? And surely Pascal, the one modern with whom it is safe to compare him as a leader of Christian philosophy? Newman's Oxford sermons were soliloquies; but his life was also a meditation, of which fragments escaped from his pen into his books, and in a true sense he writes to himself rather than to the world. With an attitude more modest but not less determined than Goethe's, he too asks, after the wise and the foolish have said their say, "But how does it appear to me? What do I think of it?" And by thought he means no formal argument, scholastic or legal, but the response of his whole nature in its most exalted mood—the seer's vision, lighted up as in moments of crisis, but confirmed by cool experience; for faith itself, which he calls a venture, is Newman grasping out, not after abstract ideas, but after living and divine realities. The dogmas of his creed are concerned with personalities from first to last. That is, in fact, the significance of dogma to him; it sets up between the Object and the Subject of religion a supernatural friendship too sacred, too intimate, for the logic of notions and algebraic symbols. We may describe Newman as a poet or a mystic, and we shall do him no wrong; but he never was, he never could be, a Rationalist.

Photo by J. Davis, Apia, Samoa

Stevenson at Vailima.

And yet on the vague suspicion of rationalising, or of giving countenance to such as did, this man lay for years under a cloud. Not immediately at Rome, where his writings had not been examined, but among a group of English converts, to whom Mr. W. G. Ward furnished

A Group at Samoa.
Lloyd Osbourne, Captain Wurmbrand, Henry Simele, and Stevenson.

From Stevenson's Works. Pentland Edition. (Cassell.)

grounds they would scarcely have discovered for themselves. Dr. Ward, acting in perfect good faith, was from his peculiar temperament incapable of entering into Newman's policy on these delicate matters. Ward had confidence only in avoidance and repression of problems

By courtesy of Messrs. Cassell & Co.

Mrs. Isobel Strong,
Stevenson's step-daughter.

Stevenson playing on his flageolet.

Leo XIII but not until thirty years had been lost to the generation guided by Ward and Manning. The question is settled, with happy consequences, and Newman's practical good sense has received a striking vindication.

How the recluse of Edgbaston behaved towards problems of a larger scope—the Temporal Power, the Vatican Council—we may read at full length in Mr. Ward's luminous pages. But we shall be drawing our picture out of proportion if we fancy that Newman felt a personal interest where these controversies went on. They lay outside his particular sphere.

All he did was to judge of them which affected the beliefs of Christians, though he was himself a most admirable defender of Theism and completely routed the association philosophy maintained by J. S. Mill. Nevertheless he viewed with alarm the somewhat undisciplined attempts of writers like Sir John Acton to argue the old questions on a modern field, and he considered that Newman was responsible for their imprudences. When he had convinced Manning in London and Monsignore Talbot, who resided in the Vatican, that so it was a period set in during which the great Oratorian's books declined in their circulation, his plans about Oxford were foiled, and his career seemed to be at an end. Though his victory in the Apologia won England over, it did not reconcile Ward or Manning, neither of whom until they passed from the scene could be persuaded that their old Oxford chieftain had taken the right course with regard to 'Liberalism.' But his conscience did not reproach him. As the world went, Newman held that free discussion was inevitable, that among Catholics it could be so managed as to respect authority whilst allowing to men of science and men of letters a certain "elbow-room," and that, in the absence of a Catholic University—the enterprise in Dublin having failed—it would be a lesser evil to send our young men to Oxford and Cambridge than to let them enter life without mental training and college discipline. His view was acted upon by Pope as they influenced men and women who sought his advice—for he would have smiled at the thought of playing the politician, or of pretending to be an expert in the School philosophy. His greatness requires us to measure it on a different scale. I have heard that he was repelled from the Divina Commedia by its intermingling of Italian politics with heavenly themes. His devotion to the Holy See led him on one occasion to walk with unshod feet over the Roman pavements, as a pilgrim to St. Peter's.

Stevenson.

Bronze medallion by St. Gaudens in Luxembourg.

From a bas-relief made during Stevenson's illness in New York in 1887.

shrine. Reviewers have noted in his letters from Italy observations touching the relics and stories of the Saints which, as Protestant Englishmen, they cannot away with. One who had this deep-seated feeling for the special features of Catholicism and its popular forms was not likely to rebel against the judgments of a Council at which the Pope presided and to which he had been himself invited as a learned theologian. His last considerable work, the Letter on Mr. Gladstone's "Vaticanism" was received by all its readers, including Dr. Ward, as an instance of absolute good faith, and as a proof, were any needed, that his anxieties all along had been for others, not at all for himself.

It was no part of Mr. Ward's design to summarise Newman's writings, or to judge of them as a literary critic. He is concerned with a life, not with a bibliography. The general public has been taught by competent authorities from every side that this secluded and meditative genius, employing no violent or strange devices, but keeping to his mother tongue with an almost superstitious reverence, has bequeathed to literature a series of prose compositions never excelled in the purity of their language, in their musical rhythm, their penetrating quality, their eloquence, depth, and tenderness. It is likewise held that "The Dream of Gerontius" deals with supernatural themes and the corresponding imagery in a manner not approached by any poet since Dante. But even that is not the whole. In his work on the "Development of Christian Doctrine" Newman went before Darwin, anticipated the struggle for life while applying it to ideas, and perceived in history a principle

National Portrait Gallery

R. L. Stevenson.

Portrait taken by Elliott & Fry, at Sydney, N.S.W., in 1893. By permission of the National Portrait Gallery, London.

From a drawing by A. S. Boyd
Kindly lent by Messrs. Chatto & Windus

R.L.S.

of selection. At the same period he sketched in his Oxford University sermons a theory of concrete, or as we may say, of vital assent, which twenty-six years later was elaborated with a remarkable wealth of instances, and with equal subtlety, into a volume, the main lines of which have been stringently illustrated by what is known as psychical research. To be versatile and original is given to few, and among the few we must reckon John Henry Newman.

What! some German professor of Berlin or Giessen may exclaim, if he should see these words "versatile and original—a Cardinal of the Roman Church?" Even so, I reply, Herr Professor. To this I was coming, for it deserves recognition as an encouraging sign, at Berlin no less than elsewhere. None of us that are students desire the world to be overrun by ignorance and left in primeval darkness. We all say Vivat Lux! Now the entrance of this poet, historian, and philosopher into the Sacred College did not, indeed, raise to dogmatic definitions his views on development or his theory of assent, but it surely proved that genius need not exclude a man from the honours of the purple. Leo XIII., who was an accomplished scholar and well read in metaphysics, delighted to call into his illustrious Senatus a thinker on modern lines such as Newman, while he was distinguishing an Aristotelian commentator, Joseph Prisco (whose works I studied in Rome) by making him Cardinal Archbishop of Naples. The English Oratorian has powerfully contributed to a reconciliation without compromise of elements both abstract and concrete, in a more perfect scheme of philosophy than North or South has formulated at the present time ; and the Neapolitan will be found to have kept the ancient light burning.

But there is something more. In a Life so adequately told, with distinction and with even judgment, with documents at first hand carefully chosen, yet nothing essential omitted, every reader will perceive a moral to suit his own cast of mind. The book is not a pleading one way or another. I may suggest, perhaps, how it will strike a well-wisher to religion who is not very intolerant of Rome, though he should happen to differ from its creed. Newman's second period, for at least twenty-five years, was outwardly a time of defeat and could not fail to seem "bare of joy," when viewed by those who imagine such a life in their own light, which is that of comfortable citizens. But the hidden springs of quite another kind of joy did not fail Newman ; and when he was challenged he replied, in language breathing conviction, that he found supreme content in the beliefs and the practices of his faith. All that makes so great a dust and heat in the biography was like English weather—a thing to be endured, but which must not interfere with our serious concerns. The true life went on, tranquil and sheltered, in a sanctuary where none of these things might enter. The poet, preacher, mystic, saint, was there alone with the Alone. It is this which compels a critic who has thought over the limits of his art, to keep a certain distance from the innermost shrine of Newman's thoughts, clearly as they are set before us. They belong to the sacred mystery of a great and solitary soul.

CONRAD.*

BY PERCEVAL GIBBON.

FEW books of autobiographic flavour and intention have so good a reason for their appearance as "Some Reminiscences," by Joseph Conrad. The "fifteen years of unbroken silence before praise or blame," to which the author lays claim in his "familiar preface," have also been years of an increasing curiosity concerning the strange and diverse personality which glimmered, like a veiled lantern, behind the narratives of "Lord Jim," "Heart of Darkness," "The Nigger of the Narcissus," and the other novels and tales which make up the body of Mr. Conrad's achievement as a writer. It is a curiosity which Mr. Conrad has done nothing either to slake or inflame ; no writer has taken the paragraphist less into his confidence, or served so little the purpose of the interviewer and the press photographer. The works by which alone he has personified himself have issued from a tranquil seclusion ; and there is, therefore, a kind of graciousness, a manner of relenting to friendly importunities, in the publication of a book which so handsomely makes a guest of the reader who has hitherto been no more than an acquaintance.

For Mr. Conrad, in his reminiscent mood, two memories are associated and intertwined : that of his first contact with the sea, which was to have so large a part in his life, and that of the writing of his first book. He reveals himself, in his opening chapter, in his berth on board the steamer Adowa, with the growing manuscript of "Almayer's Folly" lying on the blanket in his bunk, and

* "Some Reminiscences." By Joseph Conrad. 5s. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

National Portrait Gallery.

R. L. Stevenson.

Sketch painted in one sitting by Sir William Blake Richmond, R.A.

Stevenson.

From a photograph by Sir Percy Shelley.

the brass rim of the porthole framing a vignette of the quays of Rouen, at the moment when the tale is interrupted by the entrance of the banjo-playing third officer. Never was a book, destined ultimately to be completed and published, the subject of so many interruptions. Already at Rouen it was four years old ; it had yet to accompany its author to his childhood's home in Poland, to share with him many long sea passages, to go in peril up the Congo.

It is Walter Bagelhot who says that for a great experience there is essential "an experiencing nature." Mr. Conrad's experiences have been manifold ; they range from Russian exile as a child to oppression at the hands of an examiner in seamanship ; and in his recital of them it is immediately clear that he is one of those rare and fortunate men who are endowed at their birth with the experiencing nature. There is the incident of the first Englishman on whom he set eyes—in Switzerland, at the top of the Furka Pass, which he was traversing on foot with a tutor. "My unforgettable Englishman," he calls him ; and he is unforgettable. He wore knickerbockers, and with them short socks, and "his calves, exposed to the public gaze and the tonic air of high altitudes, dazzled the beholder by the splendour of their marble-like condition and their rich tone of young ivory."

"The light of a headlong, exalted satisfaction with the world of men and the scenery of mountains illumined his clear-cut, very red face, his short, silver-white whiskers, his innocently eager and triumphant eyes. In passing he cast a glance of kindly curiosity and a friendly gleam of big, sound, shiny teeth towards the man and the boy sitting like dusty tramps by the roadside, with a modest knapsack lying at their feet. . . . One does not meet such an Englishman twice in a lifetime."

The language is the language of Joseph Conrad, but the impression, the experience, is that of the boy who travelled with his tutor. Already one sees how his imagination enriched for him the world in which he moved.

The original of Almayer came into his view many years later, as a feature in another phase of his life, but the faculty of imaginative vision which presents him "in the round," as a man against his own background but detached from it and individual, is the same.

"He came quite close to the ship's side and raised a harassed countenance, round and flat, with that curl of black hair over the forehead, and a heavy pained glance."

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh.

Stevenson's family and household at Samoa, including his wife, his mother and Lloyd Osbourne.

He was a grieved man ; everything grieved him. The pony which Mr. Conrad had to sling and put ashore for him knocked him down and ran away ; he could not even derive a spark of hope, faith or pride from the ownership of "the only geese on the East Coast" ; and when his mail was handed to him, it was apparent that he was afraid of his letters. Such was the man whose effect, as he moved in his patterned pyjamas about the Bornean riverside, was to haunt and preoccupy Mr. Conrad through years of wandering and establish him at last upon the threshold of a new and undreamed-of career.

It is a good fortune which has bestowed Mr. Conrad upon us as an English writer ; it was a boy's preference which made him an English sailor. He recalls the first English ship which he touched with his hands, the steamer James Westoll, as she came into Marseilles. He had put out to meet her in the boat of his friends the pilots, and pulled bow in the dinghy which put the pilot on board, and so caught the line which was thrown from her rail. He was bidden to shove off, "and when I bore against the smooth flank of the first English ship I ever touched in my life, I felt it already throbbing under my open palm."

There is a sense in which every work of art is an autobiography, and in that sense the warm personality, the radiant and humane intelligence of Joseph Conrad were already mirrored in the novels he has written. But he was there seen as in a glass, darkly ; here he is face to face with his reader. In "Some Reminiscences" we have, not a supplement and accessory to his other books, but a fresh work of the first importance, a vital and individual book, a true Conrad.

ENCORE BORROW.*

By THOMAS SECCOMBE.

THERE are, of course, a great many devotees of George Borrow about. They read him in cheap prints or purchase him in first editions, according to "The Life of George Borrow." Compiled from unpublished official documents, etc., with 13 illustrations. By Herbert Jenkins. 10s. 6d. net. (Murray.)

the weight of their purses. The love of Borrow makes a kind of bond between them, and some day they will probably succeed in canonizing their hero. A hundred years hence he may be well-nigh forgotten, but it would not be surprising if by 2100 A.D. he had become a star

From an original drawing by Count Giuliano Neri, given by Stevenson to Mr. H. Walter Barnett, and now first reproduced by Mr. Barnett's permission of the first magnitude. Should that day ever arrive, Mr. Herbert Jenkins may rest assured of a niche in the Borrowian observatory as an annotator of industry and ability, who has left no stone unturned in his timely endeavour to elucidate the sibylline leaves of that ever-memorable and worshipful, but portentous and often obscure, commentator, Dr. W. J. Knapp. To fuse the old and new material into a consistent portrait of Don George has not appeared feasible to Mr. Jenkins, or, at any rate, he has not seriously attempted it. He has left that to other hands, and has been, in his criticism, content to fulfil Borrow's own idea of the functions of a critic, which was that he should enact the part of a leech. His powers of suction have proved fully equal to the task, and he has given us a thoroughly well-organized repertory of biographical fact and Borrowian legend.

R.L.S.

To those who are familiar with the rambling autobiography committed to the pages of "Lavengro," the "Romany Rye," and "The Bible in Spain," not to mention the recently published "Letters to the Bible Society," there is not very much that is wholly new in the first sections of the present work. In the part that follows his subject's first successful appearance as an author, however, Mr. Jenkins gleans much that is unfamiliar, and presents it with befitting vivacity. Borrow's relations with women are significant and throw light, I think, upon his personality. He generally struck them unfavourably, and he certainly had by no means "doubled Cape Turk." He had semi-Oriental, or Byronic, ideas about the seclusion of women. He could not fathom, and had little toleration for condescending grandes dames, but above all, he detested quibbling blue-stockings, such as Frances Power Cobbe. The development of his coolness with Ford, his frequent brushes with his publisher, John Murray, the causes of his dissension with Bowring, are all carefully detailed here. In the last explosive appendix to the "Romany Rye," Borrow wrote: "The writer is aware of more than one instance in which he (Bowring) has passed off the literature of friendless young men, after making them a slight pecuniary compensation, and deforming what was originally excellent by interpolations of his own." This Radical literato, he went on, esteems himself a king of translators. His translations are

Photo by J. Patuck, Edinburgh.

Stevenson's tomb on Mount Vaea, Samoa.

Photo by H. Walter Barnett.

Robert Louis Stevenson.

One of the latest portraits taken of him.

made either from a prose rendering done for him from one of the easier dialects of Europe, or were made direct from the originals into English by friendless young men, and then delormented by his alterations. This was by no means a true bill according to Mr. Jenkins. The real grievance was that after promising to use all his influence to get Borrow appointed consul at Canton, Bowring obtained the post for himself, largely by passing off as his own the Manchu Testament which Borrow edited in St. Petersburg. There is very little doubt that Bowring was a man who had no hesitation in seizing everything that presented itself and turning it, as far as possible, to his own uses. In this he was doing what most successful men have done and will continue to do. Yet he had been kind to Borrow, and had helped him as far as lay in his power. He no doubt obtained all the information he could from Borrow, as he would have done from anyone else. Yet, when there was nothing to be lost by so doing, he did extend to Borrow at times a considerable amount of help. Francis Parkman, a man and a writer, who had some striking affinities with Borrow, remarked once that in order to succeed in America one had to be either a Harvard man or a humbug. Borrow was the equivalent of neither of these things in England. He had made no friends among the great ladies who make, or rather more often mar, so many hopeful schemes and meritorious appointments in this country. Hence the pathetic restlessness and vain eagerness to be up and doing without being able to get anything to do, which made the end of his life so pointless and embittered. Yet the "Celtic" holidays, so happily touched in description here in Chapters XXV. and XXVI., were not altogether unproductive. It was destined apparently that nothing George Borrow could ever write should quite come up to the promise of "The Bible in Spain." Yet how many guide-books are there to compare in any respect with "Wild Wales?" No book on the subject, at least in English, will probably ever do as much to render the tantalizing charm of the beautiful "Land of our Fathers," where half is so familiar, and the other half so impenetrably strange. Apart from their ale, in commendation of which words almost failed him, he took less kindly to the Scotch. He was at home in Man, and still more in Cornwall, where, East Anglian though he was, he felt himself understood in the homes of his ancestors. These walking tours served as a kind of safety valve to Borrow. The exercise and open air enabled him to drink the ale with plenty of malt in it that his soul loved. He had constant change of scene, and his thoughts were diverted by encounters with odd people, and by the hundred and one adventures of the roadside. His face, figure and aggressive virility made him a conspicuous object wherever he went. Unemployment at home gave rise to the malaise from which his intolerance in religious matters and monomania about "gentility-nonsense" mainly sprang. Mr. Jenkins quotes very aptly Voltaire's lines :

" Qui n'a pas l'esprit de son âge
De son âge a tout le malheur."

Borrow had in fact, a double portion of the blind conservatism of his favourite races, the Gypsies, the Basques, the Welsh. He was profoundly sceptical about modern improvements and other such machines, for he did not see where the human betterment came in. Mechanical power might well be a gain in itself, but it was more than counterbalanced by the increase of human inequality, which was certain to follow in its train. Such are the ideas, at any rate, which we read into Borrow after the event. Though he prided himself above everything on his anti-mediævalism and anti-papism, he was really a blind obscurantist himself. Alone almost among his contemporaries he appreciated primitive nature and distrusted civilization as the malady which Edward Carpenter has since demonstrated it to be. We know something about the dim, retreating Arcady from such writers as Bourne and Jessopp, we know much of the old tranters and woodlanders from Hardy, and of the old race of shepherds from Hudson; but it fell to Borrow to hold up the mirror to wild nature on roadside and heath. The characters that he flashes before us in his sunprints are true living pictures, characters that have since been improved off the face of the earth, and now we regret, with all our forces, that the rogues will never come back. And we know that it cannot be, and that the "Romany Rye" is a being who lived in a different age from ours, as different as the age of Hector and Achilles, when warriors fought in their chariots round the walls of Troy, and the long-haired Achæans hurled their spears and stole one another's horses in the darkness, and kings made long speeches armed to the teeth, and ran away with other kings' wives or multiplied their own. In short, it was Borrow's aim in an emasculate age of ready-made boots and shoes to leave a naked footprint on the sand. This he achieved.

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh.

Bust of Stevenson.

by G. W. Stevenson, R.S.A., in the Scottish Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh.

New Books.

MR. FOX.*

"The Early History of Charles James Fox" was published thirty-one years ago, in October, 1880. In the following December I accepted office as Secretary of the Admiralty, and perforce abandoned literature for an indefinite period to come." Thus Sir George Otto Trevelyan begins his preface to the first volume of "George the Third and Charles Fox." "At the beginning of the

* "George the Third and Charles Fox: The Concluding Part of 'The American Revolution.'" By the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Bart., O.M. In 2 vols. Vol. I. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

Photo by J. Patrick, Edinburgh.

In Swanston Rock Garden (August, 1907).

Lord Guthrie. Miss Alison Cunningham, Stevenson's nurse. He dedicated "A Child's Garden of Verses" to her—"From her Boy." "Indeed, Cummy, I wish I might become a man worth talking of, if it were only that you should not have thrown away your pains."—Letter from Stevenson to Alison Cunningham (1871) in "The Letters of R. L. Stevenson." Edited by Sir Sidney Colvin. (Methuen.)

next session, in the lobby of the House of Commons, Mr. Justin McCarthy did me the honour to express a wish that there existed a statutory power for obtaining an Order of Court to compel me 'to finish Fox.'" Mr. McCarthy's wish has been echoed by many thousands all the world over. A biography of Fox by a competent writer was badly wanted, and Sir George Trevelyan had proved himself the man for the work. It was to many a great disappointment that when Sir George Trevelyan, released from the labours of office, again took up his pen, it was to write "The American Revolution," and not a further instalment of the life of Fox. "The American Revolution" is excellent, but it was the account of the middle life and later years of the great statesman that we particularly wanted from him. Now we have the first of two volumes of "George the Third and Charles Fox," in which work the history of the American Revolution is concluded; and the story of Fox will be carried up, to quote the author, "to the moment which, so far as personal success was concerned, proved to be the culminating point of his whole career." In the "Early Life," it will be remembered, the narrative stopped in 1774, when Fox, because of his independence, was, at the King's express desire, dismissed by Lord North; and George Selwyn, convinced that his friend has a great career in front of him, said: "Charles, for the future I will eat salt fish on the day you was turned out. You shall be my Charles the Martyr now; for I am tired of your great-grandfather, the old one. His head can never be sewed on again; but, as yours can be, I will stick to you."

If the book is something less than a biography of Fox, it is also something more, for it surveys English society in the later half of the eighteenth century, and presents also an intimate picture of the world of politics, and those who worked, as well as those who sauntered, in that world. But the main interest to readers will probably be Fox, for whom Sir George Trevelyan has an affection so wholehearted that sometimes, many will think, it leads him into excessive eulogy. It is true, of course, that Fox paid a heavy penalty for the follies of his youth.

"He is habitually cited as the instance of a statesman who was a confirmed gambler; and yet he ceased to be a gamster at an age when very few indeed, besides himself, have taken rank as statesmen. While still a stripling he was diced and wagered—and, as his elders believed, was glaringly and transparently cheated—out of an immense fortune. For some years afterwards he continued to play high; but in the spring of 1792, at the period of life when an aspiring member of Parliament begins to hope for an appointment as a Junior Lord of the Treasury, Fox became the leading Minister of the Crown's power and influence, although not in title. Thenceforth he gambled less and less frequently, until, after no very long while, he dropped the practice altogether."

Thus Sir George Trevelyan. The defence of Fox is not very strong; indeed, it is a piece of special pleading. In 1792, when Fox began to give up gambling, he was forty-three years of age, had squandered a vast fortune, his own, his father's, and his friends' money. What, Horace Walpole wondered, would Fox do when all his friends had sold their estates to pay his debts of honour? Let us take a contemporary opinion. "Fox," said his "candid friend," Boothby, "loved only three things—women, play and politics. Yet at no period of his life did he ever form a creditable connection with a woman. He lost his whole fortune at the gaming table; and, with the exception of about eleven months of his life, he has remained always in opposition." Sir George Trevelyan's enthusiasm for his hero is understandable enough, for Fox, with all his faults—and why minimise them?—was the most lovable creature in the world. No one ever had a bad word for him, save the most narrow-minded King that has ever sat on the English throne, George III., who hated him as heartily as he had hated Chatham. Fox's good nature, his good temper, won all hearts; and peculiarly characteristic of him is the following story, when the Prince of Wales and he heard of the death of the Duchess of Devonshire. "Then," said his Royal Highness, "we have lost the best-bred woman in England." "Then," said Fox, "we have lost the kindest heart in England."

Of the greatness of Fox there is no question, and in this matter Sir George Trevelyan goes not a whit too far. A superb orator, capable always of rising to the height of any question, and splendid in reply, he was possessed of the greatest gift with which the politician can be blessed, common sense. He could see clearly, and he could see far. In his youth he made mistakes. To give one instance. He opposed the liberty of the Press in his early years in the House of Commons; but in later days he made amends by securing the publicity of Parliamentary debates. His views on the American question, with which the volume under consideration is principally concerned, were essentially sound. He realized the futility of continuing the war, and was never tired of urging this view on the House. He insisted that America could not be conquered; and that, if the contest was carried on, lives and treasure would be squandered, but no material gain could be secured. We know now, as he knew then, that not even a great victory, save, perhaps, at the outset of the campaign, could have saved the colonies for us. Fox's speeches were convincing, his reasoning unassailable, and the war would, through his efforts, have been abandoned but for the votes of the place-men whose positions were dependent upon the favour of the monarch, who realized that success was impossible, but whose obstinacy was such that he would not give way, though his army was decimated and his country impoverished. Sir George Trevelyan's indictment of the King is magnificent; his vignette of old Chatham magnificent; the whole story unfolded with a directness and simplicity that he has taught us to expect from him. The second, and concluding, volume, we are told, is more than half finished, and soon, we hope, will be in our hands. And then, we trust, will come "The Last Years of Charles James Fox."

LEWIS MELVILLE.

MODERN ITALIAN LITERATURE.*

In the pages of history there is none more moving than that which tells of the making of United Italy. Italian literature to-day is the outcome of that history. The Foreword to this volume states that "this book traces the history of the literary revival which took place in Italy during the eighteenth century and which has not yet entirely spent itself; also (?) an account of the principal poets and novelists of to-day." The latter part of the author's object is carried out by a conscientious recapitulation of living Italian writers and their works. The former rests on a misconception. Far from being entirely spent, the literary revival of the eighteenth century is about to reach its blossoming period. Modern Italy's literature is in the making, for modern Italy has just been made and the making took over a century to accomplish.

From the treaty of Aix la Chapelle till the domination of Napoleon Italy was preparing for her struggle. From the Congress of Vienna to the proclamation of the Kingdom of Italy she was in the grip of an heroic conflict, pouring out her best blood and laying imperishable memories for succeeding generations. It is this story of the making of modern Italy of which modern Italian literature is the reflection. For those who want a superficial acquaintance with Italian authors and their works taken chronologically, this volume should be useful. But a book of this kind has an insuperable defect. Partly through want of space, partly through other and profounder limitations, modern Italian literature is not clearly enough shown in the light of modern Italian history.

There are three names in Italian literature during the time of preparation that stand out as landmarks in the story of Italy's freedom, Metastasio, Parini and Alfieri. Metastasio marks the close of the long period of Italy's subjection when literature had declined on operatic days. He was a type of his period. "The more prosaic the age, the more exaggerated the heroism," and it looked as if there could be no salvation for an age which demanded such melodramatic perfection for its heroes. The fact was, the age was not conscious of wanting salvation. Metastasio was the expression of a period whose ideal was the artificial pastoralism of a false Arcadia. In Venice, Goldoni, Metastasio's contemporary, was turning to life for the sources of his art, but it was Parini, born nearly thirty years later than Metastasio, who marked the rise and spread of the liberal influences which led to the Italian revival. Throughout Europe the ideas were stirring that were to bring about the French Revolution. In Metastasio's world a national conscience did not exist. Revolutions do not come about until things improve. Things were improving after 1748—after Aix-la-Chapelle there was no inconsiderable degree of enlightened benevolence amongst the despots of disunited Italy. Parini made current the new ideas which led to the French Revolution and Chartism on the one hand, to the Emancipation Act and Italian Independence on the other, which permeated European society and inspired such popular literature as "Sandford and Merton," the elevator of our fathers' youth.

Parini was the moralist of Italian freedom. Alfieri, born twenty years later, was its prophet. In his own headlong conversion from a life of idleness to a mission of fierce declamation against tyranny, he was a type of the evolution of a national conscience in the Italy of his day. The ferocity of thought that made his very style revolutionary, pensato, not cantato, at first repelled the men of his age; then he became immensely popular as they realised that his dramas reflected their own attitude to their foreign rulers. Alfieri is Italy's one great tragedian. He had no successor, he was succeeded by the Revolution.

With the Revolution cropped up the old quarrel between Romantic and Classic schools, the echoes of which are still muttering. It is possible to over-estimate their importance. The Romantic spirit belongs by inheritance to the Northern races. It had its obvious beginnings in England in the eighteenth century, but in fact it was at no time absent from English literature. The Romantic style is another thing. In the eighteenth century it became a vogue and a tiresome one, not only in English literature; it troubled Italian too. Mr. Collison-Morley has well pointed out the debt that Italian literature owed to English at this period. The Romantic style proper never became rooted in Italy, but later it became invested with a perfectly factitious political significance, and on these grounds the old quarrel still recurs. The great modern writers of Italy assimilated the best of the Romantic spirit of the North.

* "Modern Italian Literature." By Lacy Collison-Morley. 6s. net. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.)

But in the early nineteenth century the romantic novel filled the literary field largely because a mediæval environment of tyrants and feudal castles was found a convenient medium for anti-Austrian declamation. Italian literature in fact had become "a great arsenal for the expulsion of the foreigner." Literary form suffered in consequence. Manzoni and Leopardi are by themselves names great enough to fill a period. But when the majority of poets and authors were devoting their best energies to war instead of art it is not surprising that literary achievement at this period was second-rate; it is only surprising that the standard was so high. Through it all, good and bad, spoke the liberating spirit of the age. "Liberi non saremo se non siamo uni."

Contemporary verse was one of Italy's most powerful weapons in the struggle for liberty. Leopardi, dead before Novara, spoke from the grave to young patriots in pilgrimage at his tomb. "Nessun' pugna per te? Non ti difende Nessun de' tuoi?" Maneh's songs were the hymns of the revolutionists. Maneh himself, barely twenty-two, fell during the siege of Rome, fighting by Garibaldi. Berchet's songs moved the country like the sound of a trumpet. Carducci tells us how, the year before Novara, he then a boy, hearing his mother repeat Berchet's verses, "saw black" and wanted to go out and kill Austrians. "We owe," said Garibaldi, "a great part of this our Italy to the poets." The best work of the age was not put into literature. To the makers of Italy passion for their country was art and lifework, faith, honour, religion, wife and child. They gave their lives to free Italy—"e l'ossa Fremono amor di patria."

After the long tension of the struggle peace came and prosperity began, but the literary fortunes of the country seemed at a low ebb. The 'Seventies were swamped by bad translations of worse novels. Carducci did his magnificent best to revive literature from the formless welter into which it seemed to have fallen. United Italy presented another literary problem. Disunited Italy had as many tongues as she had rulers. The language difficulty is more serious than we are apt to think who settled our own over 400 years ago. Geographical differences, moreover, are still aggravated by remains of ancient jealousies and local academic supremacies. The settlement will be helped no doubt as was our own by the (still recent) settlement of the capital. It is a great hindrance to good novel writing when the written language lacks the vigour of the spoken, and an infusion of native dialects cannot fail to strengthen standard Italian. Moreover, when a novelist is good enough, he is his own apologist for his own style. There are good novelists in Italy, there will be more. Italian literature is much occupied with style, and this in part explains the cult of d'Annunzio—who is the subject of a rather unsympathetic criticism from Mr. Collison-Morley. "What a man has done matters more than what he said he was going to do, and d'Annunzio is not only a fine poet but he has evolved a nearly perfect prose. His ethics are startling, but he has created a style."

Modern Italy studies herself, her best work to-day reflects contemporary Italian life. This is why she is profoundly interested in historical research, anxious for the exact fact, and productive of what de Sanctis calls the "modest and patient monograph," stigmatised by Mr. Collison-Morley as the "terrible documentary" school. Carducci, who has done so much for Italian criticism to-day, himself ranks among the greatest poets of Europe. These are the men who work to-day to model the literature of Italy on the great lines of her history. Italy has passed through her heroic stage, her history to-day is being written in factory chimneys and in big ships—great assets in the growth of a national consciousness. That national consciousness grows as the sense of unity deepens, quickened by national prosperity, national enterprise, national disaster, national danger. The uniting of Italy was a great story, the literature of united Italy will not be less great.

H. HAY WILSON.

TALES OF THE FIVE TOWNS.*

So dependent on the minutiae of observation is Mr. Arnold Bennett's best art, so much is it a matter of detail piled upon detail, till the mass of relatively insignificant data acquires from mere weight and nicely-adjusted cohesion the significance of solid reality, that he needs a rather large canvas for its adequate display. "Clayhanger" and "The Old Wives' Tale," which are the twin masterpieces of his fiction, are both of them more than twice the length of the average novel and might indeed be called histories alike of the titular characters and of their social surroundings. If Mr. Bennett in his more conscientious work has one quality which arrests attention it is his command of an almost photographic realism, but in order to get this effect he has generally to range all round and behind as well as inside his subject—he must go back to the beginning of things, he must trace each stage of his hero's or heroine's career, he must enter into the everyday routine of their lives, he must build up, mood by mood, phase by phase, the structure of their emotional and intellectual being, he must elaborate with patient care the network of their friendships and their environment. Now all this takes up space and time and toil, besides involving a tremendous strain on the memorising faculty. But the novelist's recollections have borne the strain, and thanks to the store of youthful impressions on which he has been able to draw he has made us free of the Five Towns as they were in the Victorian age, and taught us to understand typical men and women of the district and the time, and to appreciate the cast of their minds and the setting of their struggles and ambitions. Mr. Bennett, however, is no less interested in the Potteries of to-day, so bustling and noisy and careless of the social amenities, than he is in the more quietly progressive communities as he remembers them thirty or so years ago, and he is equally desirous of giving artistic expression to the new as to the old local life. But here, since his footing is less sure, his method has to be changed. In one novel of modest proportions, "The Card," he has sought to show us the farcical side of the spirit of enterprise which actuates the more pushing Midlander of to-day, but for the most part he has been content to rely on a smaller vehicle for conveying his ideas of the modern aspect of the Five Towns. He has had recourse to the short story, and this is a form not too well suited to his leisurely mode of composition. Here he is too much cabined and confined, finds a difficulty in suggesting—what with more scope he suggests so admirably—atmosphere, and tends to be superficial when he aims at compression.

Yet though the short story hardly allows Mr. Bennett an opportunity of exhibiting the strength of his talent, there is one example of this kind included in his new volume of tales that can hold its own with anything to which he has put his name. I allude to the story which gives its title to the whole collection: "The Matador of the Five Towns." It describes all the hurly-burly and dirtiness of one of the Pottery towns; it gives us a wonderful picture of a football match as seen from the stand—the players so many dolls on the field, the crowd of spectators, as they roar under a common emotion, the real subjects of study; it tells with characteristic irony how after the match the hero of the day sits in his squalid bar-parlour waiting for the birth of twins, and how when he learns he is a widower he vows never to handle a football again; and it concludes with the following analysis of impressions which the narrator supplies after spending twenty-four hours in the district and having them crowded with experiences:

"I enjoyed all this. All this seemed to be fine, seemed to throw off the true, fine, romantic savour of life. I would have altered nothing in it. Mean, harsh, ugly, squalid, crude, barbaric—yes, but what an intoxicating sense in it of the organised vitality of a vast community unconscious of itself! . . . Not a house in the hundreds of houses past which we did but possessed rooms ennobled and made august by happenings exactly as impressive in their tremendous inexplicableness."

That passage is eloquent in what the words imply as well as what they actually indicate. It is just the abounding

* "The Matador of the Five Towns," and Other Stories. By Arnold Bennett. 6s. (Methuen.)

vitality of the towns that Mr. Bennett so successfully realises in his tale; it is just their unconsciousness that he seeks to interpret; it is just his readiness to "alter nothing," his attitude of the thrilled and yet disinterested observer, which explains the secret of his art when it is true to itself. As he is on his supposed visit, so we vicariously in the mirror of his tale are impressed with the tremendous inexplicableness of the phantasmagoria he details. Unfortunately not all his stories reach the high level to which this one attains, nor is he content always to stand aside from his material or to select what is really typical. Mr. Bennett divides his series under two heads, "tragic" and "frolic," and he is rarely satisfactory when he indulges his frolicsome moods. The gayer tales are sometimes no more than anecdotes, and the bulk of them are mere episodes or incidents unredeemed from triviality by any particular virtues of craftsmanship. Too often also the novelist shows himself anxious to give his readers their cue, to laugh himself in advance so as to provoke their laughter. But in "Jock-at-a-Venture" there is no such self-consciousness evident on the part of the author, and Arnold Bennett the artist reveals himself in four out of the five more serious tales. Of these "Mimi" shows him striking what for him is rather an uncommon vein, for the story contains a portrait of a little girl. It is done with consummate delicacy, and is none the worse for seeming to be done casually. The tragedy which may befall a child who tries to keep a secret is there for any reader who will look for it and can dispense with a prompter.

F. G. BETTANY.

THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

Porta nascitur non fit, like most tags of the kind, is only a half truth. Certainly, culture, of itself, cannot create a poet; nor can external tuition ever take the place of intuition; but even the born-poet must serve an arduous and rigorous apprenticeship to his art; or the chances are that he will spend his energies in vain, and let his powers run to waste, from a lack of artistic control. There is a popular notion that the poet is a sort of artless "natural"; yet the great poets have always been great artists; and the little poets fail more often through a lack of art than through a lack of inspiration. Given the inspiration, a poet cannot know too much about his craft. He must be so absolute an artist that he is able to dispense with artifice; so sure a master of form that he is quite independent of formalism. The poet is born, and made self-made, for the most part, it is true. He must live laborious days in the service of his art, if he would gain perfect control over his medium of expression; so that, however haphazard his inspiration, he may not waste a breath of it when it comes to him. The comparative ineffectualness of much of the verse that is being constantly produced is due, in a great measure, to the lack of self-discipline on the part of its authors. Uncontrolled emotion spills itself to little purpose; but who can withstand the onset of controlled emotion! The really artless poet is he who can only express himself through the medium of a conventionalised poetic jargon; and whose sense of form is so uncertain that he must perforce run his emotion into the ready-made moulds of traditional forms. He is an artificer rather than an artist.

Though these remarks apply in some degree to the four books under notice, yet in none of them does the lack of art so entirely stultify the poetry as it does in the six other books we have read through in making our selection. In Mr. Furst's work * there is hardly a touch of artifice. The pretty vellum cover, and the rather colourless title, belie the contents of this book; for Mr. Furst's poems are neither pretty nor precious. They may even strike a surprised reader as being a little queer and uncouth, a little ragged, a little staccato; for Mr. Furst has a way of his own, and is no mere producer of poetical exercises in approved modes. His work has something of the strangeness of all fresh manifestations of the spirit of art. His is not poetry distilled from poetry, but poetry distilled from life; and readers who prefer a literary flavour to the eager tang of life may not relish his vintage. There is nothing crusted or cobwebby about his work. He deals with life at first-hand. Perhaps he may have taken a hint from Henley; but the verse is never dully derivative; nor is Mr. Furst a purveyor of poetical confectionery. Realising that it is not the business of the poet to achieve an easy beauty by describing traditionally beautiful things in a traditionally beautiful vocabulary, he concerns himself with the direct expression of life as he sees it, and feels it. He has no use for other men's spectacles, rose coloured or blue. His verse may not always be poetry, but then, whose is! It is sound, sincere stuff, and it often has the seemingly unconscious, haphazard beauty of life itself; and, for all its apparent heedlessness of forms, it speaks with an ease and directness that is never attained by artlessness, nor is the poet narrow in his range. Mr. Furst writes convincingly of shepherds' crooks, fried-fish shops, fogs, and Florence, and though in his plucky way, he says:

" 'Tis but the coward who would fly
From obvious fact to devious fantasy "

his own work is not without a touch of freakishness, tender and humorous.

Miss Beatrice Irwin is not so independent of artistry as Mr. Furst. In "The Pagan Trinity," * she is frankly more concerned with the vision of life as it has been revealed to her by the arts, and by other artists, than with life for its own sake, and her own conception of it. Art describing art is always dull, unless the ciccone be a Keats or a Browning. Still, Miss Irwin's work has a sumptuous, exquisite, exotic beauty. She spoils the East in her search for coloured and curious conceits; and lays China, Japan, India, Persia, Arabia, Egypt and Greece under contribution; and we are sometimes even treated to a kind of sneezing refrain, like this:

" Zu-zu-zu ali, Atcha-Atcha-Atcha! "

which serves to make us feel conversant with Arabic at once! The book is divided into groups of "plastic poems," "tone poems," and "colour poems," and several of the pieces deal with the work of Rodin, to whom the volume is dedicated; but it always seems rather a waste of energy to attempt to express in one art what has already been perfectly expressed in another. Miss Irwin has considerable accomplishment, but she must discard "jasmine hands," "nephrite eyes," "bosom's alabaster bowl," "cornelian breasts," and such like luscious confectionery, if her work be intended for consumption by any but the very young, who still have a sweet tooth for lollipops. Yet, although usually too much concerned with artistry, and herself too little of an artist to make the best use of her powers, Miss Irwin is not of that puny race of little faith who cry incessantly that poetry must perish in the path of mechanical progress. She even has the pluck to hymn the advent of the aeroplane age!

Mr. Mackereth's verse is earnest and energetic in conception, but disappointingly slipshod and inconsequent in expression. The trite, poetical phrase has no terrors for the author of "In The Wake of the Phoenix"; † and he has little sense of the values of words, which he uses in an indiscriminating and incongruous fashion. His verse has all the facility of artlessness, rather than the ease which comes of the artist's control of his medium. When it attempts to be fine and forceful, it is too often merely fluent and flabby. Yet Mr. Mackereth has such high spirits, and such a gusto of enthusiasm, that he should only need to chasten his vocabulary, exercising a little discrimination and restraint, to produce notable work.

Miss Eleanor Fargeon's "Dream-Songs of the Beloved" ‡ is a book of mystical verse, which has a delicate, spiritual

* "The Pagan Trinity." By Beatrice Irwin. 5s. net. (John Lane.)

† "In the Wake of the Phoenix." By James A. Mackereth. 3s. 6d. net. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

‡ "Dream-Songs of the Beloved." By Eleanor Fargeon. (2s. 6d. net.) (The Orpheus Press.)

* "Songs of Town and Country." By Herbert E. A. Furst. (Gowans & Grey.)

beauty. The rhythm is always sensitive, and really expressive of the emotion; and Miss Fargeon says what she has to say straightforwardly, and with an austere clarity of utterance. Her simple eloquence never slips into rhetoric, and a sense of spiritual ecstasy breathes through her work.

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

"A PRISON WITHOUT A WALL."*

Since "The Scandalous Mr. Waldo" appeared, its author has seemed to us the most promising of our novelists of the youngest generation. Mr. Straus has freshness, ease, and charm, and a dramatic sense of life and character which is keen and yet kindly. His study of eighteenth century letters and society has quickened his feeling for quietly telling effects, and given him some middle-aged bookish tastes which form a delightful contrast to his lively interest in the comedies of modern life. When he deals with some old-fashioned type of character, he is a fascinating writer: a part of him sympathises with his hero, and a part makes fun of the poor dear loveable man. So we get a study from the life in which love and irony, humour and feeling are so mingled that the sunshine and tears of human existence are reflected in the rainbow of art.

When we saw the title of Mr. Straus's new novel, "The Prison without a Wall," we were somewhat alarmed. It had a very serious sound, and Mr. Straus has no right to be sombre and tragical. So many of our younger novelists resemble the politician of whom Sydney Smith said, "Lord John being little, thinks to make himself big by getting astride of big questions," that we have been wearied of problem novels by writers whose literary and dramatic talent has often been very problematic. Happily, Mr. Straus only means to indicate by the curious title to his new story a very rare and whimsical temperament which is a joy to find and a pleasure to read about. His hero is one of those born bookworms who are never happy outside a library. There is something of Edward Fitzgerald about him, and there is another character that reminds us of "Posh." The idea of the story, however, is strikingly novel. Leaving his large estate in the hands of an agent, Sylvester de Bohun lives a hermit life up at Cambridge, where, as a don, he quickly acquires notoriety for his little eccentricities and his extraordinary shyness. Everything that the head of a county family ought to do, he leaves undone; he runs away from his house; he angers his aunt by avoiding London society and matrimony; and he disappoints his uncle, the Prime Minister, by refusing to take even politics seriously. With an income of ten thousand a year, he lives at Cambridge on two or three hundred pounds, entirely absorbed in writing the social history of the Roman people. The first two volumes of the work make his name known and honoured in the world of scholarship, but the third volume is so bad that he is afraid to publish it. It deals with the part played by the Roman women in Roman politics, and Sylvester knows as much about women as a child of seven. He is, in fact, an extraordinary mixture of childlikeness and book-learning, and one of his Cambridge friends tells him that if he wants to complete his history he must fall in love.

All this early part of the book is finely and tenderly written. Every amateur of letters will love it, for it gives in a quiet, charming way, the quintessence of character of the man to whom the study of books is a consuming passion. Sylvester, however, is very human in spite of himself, and a kiss given to him in the dark by mistake makes a whole man of him. The affections of the lady are already engaged, but Sylvester wins her, and has a brief period of happiness. When the old lover returns and the lady runs off with him, Sylvester goes back to Cambridge, and the third volume of the social history of the Roman people appears. It has a great success. The tale is beautifully told, and enlivened by many clear and brilliant character studies.

E. W.

* "A Prison Without a Wall." By Ralph Straus. (G. Heinemann.)

LAFCADIO HEARN.*

Since Lafcadio Hearn died he has become the centre of something very like a cult. Letters and biographies have followed one another with such insistence that one is almost driven willy-nilly to acknowledge the man to be of first-rate importance. This is not written in a carping spirit; his achievement is not denied; but a native dislike of being bullied provokes one to cry halt and to examine the facts of the case before accepting the verdict of the eulogists.

The case of Stevenson, both by its similarities and differences, suggests itself for comparison. Stevenson also was the subject of much posthumous panegyric. Like Hearn, his reputation was enhanced by the publication of his letters. Less to the point, but none the less interesting to note, he was, like Hearn, both a stylist and a wanderer. There, however, the resemblance ends. The differences are innumerable; those are to the purpose here which concern not his art so much as its acceptance. Stevenson acquired fame during his life. His death was a national event. Remembering the unfinished "Weir of Hermiston," one boldly calls it a national calamity. Since that event, though, the first clouds of incense have happily dispersed, his popularity has not waned. His works are for ever being reprinted both in rich men's and in poor men's editions.

Hearn, on the other hand, to many who were well-read in modern literature, was but the vaguest of names, if so much, until the publication of Miss Bisland's "Life and Letters." Nor does it appear that those undoubtedly interesting volumes have created any enormous demand for his books. Immediate popularity is certainly no indication of greatness. But in all genuine cases of genius a reasonable popularity invariably follows, at some interval, the appreciation of the discerning few. The cases of Stevenson himself, of Meredith, and many another are our witnesses.

Hearn has been dead more than seven years, and the world has not hailed him of the elect, as it has hailed so essentially unpopular a writer as Pater. The voice of authoritative criticism has been omnisciently silent. It is fitting, one recognises, that friends should write the biography, that friends should edit the letters, but the appraising of the achievement should not be left to friends. We want an impersonal estimate.

Such, we believe, is soon to be given us by the delicate pen of Mr. Edward Thomas. Meanwhile comes Mrs. Kennard's "Life and Work" for consideration. New letters inaccessible to Miss Bisland, are the book's excuse for existence. These, addressed to Hearn's youngest half-sister, Mrs. Atkinson, are interesting for the light they throw on the writer's relations with his family. The arbitrary commencement and the arbitrary conclusion of the correspondence are characteristic of that curiously inhuman element in Hearn which will always bar his exquisite prose from a wide appeal. To compare him again with Stevenson, the former's attitude towards life was centrifugal, the latter's centripetal. R. L. S. had an enormous sympathy with all forms of life, which throbs through everything he wrote. Hearn's attraction by the strange was the reaction of his antipathy from the common. As the unfamiliar grew familiar it was apt to lose its charm for him. Hence his habit of discarding friends; and hence, possibly, the sudden, unexplained cessation of his letters to Mrs. Atkinson.

These letters, while they lasted, were full of pleasantness, and were well worth printing. There is, however, a discrepancy between their number and the bulk of the volume which contains them. Mrs. Kennard lacks the art of compression and her book is about twice the length it need have been.

It is not so much that there are things that she might have omitted as that she might have said them more tersely. Her matter, indeed, is extremely interesting. She has a good deal that is new to tell about Hearn's vagrant life, and she tells it with praiseworthy frankness and taste. Her intimacy with his family has given her facilities for observation, and she seems to have proved that much that was characteristic and extraordinary in him came from the gipsy blood of the Hearn rather than from the Greek or Maltese mother. Not the least valuable chapter in her book is the "Conclusion." Though not the last word on Hearn, it is a welcome connective to Miss Bisland's essentially uncritical estimate. It raises the hope that a writer of great ability will eventually find his proper position between adulation and neglect.

* "Lafcadio Hearn: His Life and Work." By Nina H. Kennard. 12s. 6d. net. (Evelyn Nash.)

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

BOSWELL v. JOHNSON.*

Boswell's amazing personality seems to have proved something of a stumbling-block to many Johnsonian critics. That he was absurdly, not to say outrageously, vain, can hardly be questioned. That Johnson owed a considerable portion of his fame to his biographer has been suggested, but may be disproved in many ways, chiefly by careful examination of pre-Boswellian writings and periodicals. That the "Life," however, is a masterpiece has never been denied by an Englishman. It is, indeed, a book by itself, a book so entirely English as never to have made even the smallest appeal outside the Anglo-Saxon race. And it has been very generally admitted, even by those whose opinion of Boswell as a man was as bad as it could be, that as an intimate history of English literature and social life of the mid-eighteenth century his book has never been, and never can be, surpassed. It might be well to leave the subject there, allowing the book to speak for itself, for even the most painstaking editor cannot altogether destroy its charm. But questions have been raised, something in the manner of the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy, by various critics who must not be altogether ignored. Of these questions, the most legitimate concerns itself with the essential difference between Boswell's "Life of Johnson" and all other biographies in the literature of this country. That there is this essential difference no one has ever sought to deny. Its method of narration, its style, or more correctly, its many styles, its astonishing outspokenness, the repeated and sometimes entirely inept interventions of Boswell's own personality and views, all mark it off. Another question, perhaps not so legitimate, though no less interesting, has hardly been touched upon by the critics—the question, that is to say, why James Boswell of Auchinleck, Esquire, elected to write the biography at all?

It is to answer this question that Mr. Percy Fitzgerald adds to his numerous writings upon the eighteenth century by publishing "Boswell's Autobiography," a book which, whatever its faults may be, is certain to interest Johnsonians and amuse the cynics. Here is no newly-discovered manuscript, dug out of some rubbish heap, but a sustained argument to prove that Boswell was actuated by purely selfish motives when he devised and wrote his great book. So far, that is to say, from proving his devotion to the Sage, the book was written in order to aggrandize Bozzy himself—to show to the world the exceedingly brilliant parts of the author. On this assumption, the "Life of Johnson" was merely a most ingenious device—some device being necessary—by which the world could be made to accept and appreciate James Boswell's autobiography.

Now, as Mr. Fitzgerald admits, he is not the first critic to put such a construction upon the making of the book. Sir Walter Scott and John Wilson Croker both hinted at something of the kind, and, indeed, the ordinary reader of the "Life" must always be astonished at the numerous passages which have nothing to do with Johnson, but which certainly have a great deal to do with Bozzy himself. It is from such passages as these that Mr. Fitzgerald builds up his case. It must be admitted, moreover, that he builds up a good case. Granted that Boswell was aiming primarily at self-expression, every one of his really surprising lapses of taste becomes intelligible. Boswell, as is well known, had no hesitation in including in the "Life" scenes which showed Johnson in anything but a favourable light. The older critics saw in this little more than the eccentric Bozzy's determination to have truth at all hazards, to show his hero as he really was, rather than as the world of polite readers would have him appear. Mr. Fitzgerald, on the other hand, sees in such passages mere outlets for the gratification of an abnormal vanity. He is at some pains to show that in these scenes it is invariably Boswell himself who plays protagonist. Bozzy, it is, who shows his own superiority, even over the Sage himself. "Johnson was wrong on this occasion," you are to imagine him thinking, "but it was I, the celebrated Mr. Boswell, who set him right." Following out such a line of argument, it is hardly surprising that Johnson, instead of any other eminent man of letters, was chosen for Boswell's purpose. And for twenty years, according to Mr. Fitzgerald, the fat little Scotchman played lap-dog as a mere means to James Boswell.

The statue by Percy Fitzgerald in Lichfield Market-Place.
From "Boswell's Autobiography," by Percy Fitzgerald.

(Chatto & Windus.)

* "Boswell's Autobiography." By Percy Fitzgerald. 12s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

an end. It is even suggested, if only indirectly, that the final rupture which kept, or helped to keep, Boswell in his northern home while Johnson lay dying in London, was in some measure due to the fact that by that time the biographer had obtained all the first-hand material he required, and had, in consequence, no further use for the Sage. That, however, is surely the action of a devil, which Boswell was certainly not. In twenty years he may reasonably have become tired of Johnson's uncouth ways, or he may have considered that the Doctor's veiled accusations against his own manner of living were uncalled for; but in spite of Mr. Fitzgerald's copious quotations, it seems almost impossible to reconcile twenty years' acting, for that is what it must have been, with all the delightful and unaffected qualities for which the "Life" is justly beloved. On the other hand, it is easy to agree with Mr. Fitzgerald in supposing that Boswell was guilty of Johnsonizing those note-books of his in which he had taken down scraps of the Doctor's conversations. The temptation to add a suitable retort, which, as a matter of fact, was not actually spoken at the time, might well be too much for a man far less vain and self-confident than was Boswell, but a fault such as this may be forgiven. In any case, it can hardly be taken as direct evidence that Boswell's whole work was nothing but an autobiography.

The penultimate chapter adds little to the worthiness of the volume, and might well have been omitted, and in general the book might have been shortened considerably; time after time we are told the same things in almost identical words, and occasionally Mr. Fitzgerald's style is careless. But on the whole, his theory is well worth considering it only for the reason that it must inevitably lead to a re-perusal of Boswell's own masterpiece.

RALPH STRAUS

THE ART OF THE SHORT STORY.

It is never wise to dogmatize about any art, partly because it is never necessary, chiefly because even the truest dogma is only temporarily true; in the ordinary course of healthy development the world is sure to outgrow it. Every artist who matters is a natural law to himself, so far as his art is concerned, and will no more trouble to observe the nice little laws and rules of technique that uncreative, academic critics have evolved for him than our shipbuilders are deterred from building ironclads by the fact that sages of the past laid it down that iron could not swim.

There is only one sound, fundamental law in the writing of short stories that no artist can or would wish to ignore, and that is that a short story should be as short as possible. I have seen it often insisted upon that the artistic short story must embody no more than a single incident; that a novel may contain the whole of life, but a short story can show no more than a fragment of it; and so forth. I confess I used to say the same things myself before I knew better. The simple truth is that a short story may hold just as much as you have the talent or the genius to put into it. Each man has his limitations, but it would be absurd to say nobody can fly because most of us don't know how to. The range of the short story is bounded by nothing but the capacity of the artist, and the only law he cannot get away from is, as I say, that his short story must be as short as he can make it. If he runs to words, explains in detail where he might and ought to have achieved his end by a passing suggestion, introduces unnecessary comments or descriptions, allows his characters to indulge in rambling dialogue that neither help to unfold themselves nor the incident or idea that he is shaping, then however well and attractively he may write he is an indifferent artist.

Who is greatest among modern short story writers is a question we may profitably leave to posterity. I have my opinion, and probably you have yours, but they are only opinions, and very likely we are both wrong. At the time of his death last year O. Henry (otherwise Sidney Porter) was the most successful short story writer in America; in popularity he outrivalled Kipling there, and there were not wanting critics who said he outrivalled Kipling in other respects; but this, I think, was merely an enthusiastic exaggeration, and Mr. Taber's admirable chapter on O. Henry in his "Some American Story Tellers,"¹ is a sane, balanced, frankly critical estimate that goes as near to the truth about him as any of us need to arrive. He sketches O. Henry's career briefly, and touching on the general characteristics of his work says he was "wisely comprehensive of human foibles, indulgently ironic, yet with an underlying touch of sympathy that illumines and softens much that is sordid and commonplace. That he was a genuine artist cannot be questioned; that he was overrated by his own people and generation is more than possible." Mr. Eveleigh Nash has issued a new edition of O. Henry's first, which some consider his best, book of stories, "Cabbages and Kings,"² but here no story is quite complete in itself; each is one in a series, and underlying them all is a plot, a mystery that is only untangled and cleared up in a conversation between two derelicts in the chapter before the last. The mechanism of the book is very ingenious; the stories have humour both of character and incident, and occasional touches of tragedy, and the art with which each significant episode is narrated and compressed into a concise chapter is the authentic art of the born teller of short stories.

Two other new books of American stories are "The Man who Could not Lose,"³ by Richard Harding Davis, and "The Sick-a-Bed Lady,"⁴ by Eleanor Hallowell Abbott. Mr. Davis has a lighter touch than O. Henry, but less humour, he has as cunning a narrative gift and a prettier sentiment. The five tales in his volume are deftly fashioned and make thoroughly entertaining reading. There is a pretty sentiment, too, in "The Sick-a-Bed Lady," but it passes more easily into pathos and is coloured and deepened always with a quaint and delightful humour. Miss Abbott's stories are of everyday people and everyday incidents, and the laughter in them is warmly and tenderly human. Her pathos and humour are so finely intermingled that as often as not the one is both, much as it is in the work of her compatriots Kate Douglas Wiggin and Alice Hegan Rice.

Withal, no living American author has done anything that excels the work of our English masters of the short story, such as Kipling, Barrie, Wells, Jacobs, John Galsworthy, or Barry Pain. A common fault with even some of the most accomplished of the American school is that they are too slow about making a start, they are preluding, explaining too much before they can get the story really on the move, and they have not the subtle power of suggestion, the close economy of words that you find in the books of Barry Pain, for example. Read almost any of his "Stories in Grey,"⁵ and notice how all superfluities are whittled away, how every sentence adds something vital to the story. He is the most subtle of our humorists, and like all humorists he has a morbid, grimly imaginative vein, and it is in that vein that

¹ "Some American Story Tellers." By F. Taber Cooper. 5s. net. (Grant Richards.)

² "Cabbages and Kings." By O. Henry. 3s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

³ "The Man Who Could not Lose" By Richard Harding Davis. 6s. (Duckworth.)

⁴ "The Sick-a-Bed Lady." By Eleanor H. Abbott. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁵ "Stories in Grey." By Barry Pain. 6s. (Werner Laurie.)

⁶ "Exit Eliza." By Barry Pain. 1s. (Cassell.)

⁷ "The Room in the Tower." By E. F. Benson. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

⁸ "Thirteen." By E. Temple Thurston. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

⁹ "The Victories of Olivia." By Evelyn Sharp. 6s. (Macmillan.)

¹⁰ "The Endless Journey." By Netta Syrett. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)

¹¹ "Dunleary." By Edmund Downey. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

¹² "Sam Briggs: His Book." By Richard Marsh. 6s. (John Long.)

¹³ "The Man Who Stroked Cats." By Morley Roberts. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

¹⁴ "The Singing Bone." By Austin Freeman. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

¹⁵ "Hadjj Murad, etc.; "Father Sergius, etc." By Leo Tolstoy. 2s. net each. (Nelson.)

¹⁶ "The Indian Lily." By Hermann Sudermann. 6s. (John Lane.)

these stories have been written. "Burdon's Tomb," is a brilliantly clever satire; there is an almost cruel irony in the way in which certain men and women are made to reveal their pasts to each other frankly, under the conviction that they are all doomed to inevitable death, and then, when they have shamelessly revealed themselves, the sound of picks digging down to them tells them that they will be rescued. Irony again is the keynote of "The Unknown God," of "Miniatures," and other of the stories, but "Rose Rose," takes you into an eerie and supernatural atmosphere, and as a powerful essay in the weird and grotesquely horrible it would be hard to beat "Smeath." For the purely farcical Barry Pain you may turn to "Exit Eliza,"⁶ the third, and presumably last, of the delightfully funny "Eliza" series; they are just shrewd, whimsical sketches of domestic life in the suburbs, and the picture of the fussy, vain, meddling, fatuous, well-meaning, blundering husband of Eliza is a little masterpiece of humorous characterization.

Mr. E. F. Benson is not altogether at home in "The Room in the Tower."⁷ We prefer his stories of normal men and women and the loves and hates and tangible business of the visible world. In "The Room in the Tower," and the sixteen stories that follow it, he traffics with mystery and the unknown forces of the spirit world; but though he is always interesting, always ingenious, and his terrors by night come clothed in darkness and the grisly habits of the dead to exercise uncannily elusive and strange, nightmare influences over the minds of the living, they do not quite convince you; you feel that the author does not believe in them himself, that he is sometimes laughing in his sleeve whilst he is piling up the agony, and so, though they hold your interest, they do not thrill and unsettle your nerves with that dark and dreadful sense of the reality of the unreal, which Poe knew how to impose upon you. Mr. Temple Thurston seems to promise something of occult significance by his title of "Thirteen,"⁸ but his are a baker's dozen of stories that are a blend of quiet realism and dainty mundane fantasy. They are written with that charm of style and wry humour that are Mr. Thurston's peculiar gifts. The strongest but least pleasant of them is "The Salvation of Albert Tarcy," a clever, cynical study of temperament. I do not for a moment believe that the small urchin of "A Pair of Braces," though he might have tramped from the East to the West End to stop and ask rich-looking men in the street to give him fifty pounds, would buy those braces with a coupon insuring him for fifty pounds and then go off to drown himself in order that his father might collect the insurance money, and it is in this sentimental direction that the book now and then lapses into weakness. "A Comedy of Class" and "Keats and Orange" are not very novel in idea, but all the stories are written with such an easy grace and airy humour that there is not one of them you will not read with enjoyment.

There is little of fantasy and less of dainty and romantic sentiment about the stories of Miss Evelyn Sharp and Miss Netta Syrett in "The Victories of Olivia"⁹ and "The Endless Journey."¹⁰ Both these writers are prominently identified with the suffrage movement and have the essentially modern woman's outlook on life. There is something of mediæval witchery and unholy magic with a present-day setting in Miss Syrett's "The Impossible Portrait," but in the main her stories, and Miss Sharp's, deal with the twentieth century girl's striving after independence, after emancipation from the fond tyranny of men, after the earning of her own livelihood and the living of her own life entirely in her own way. And the curious thing is that in each book there are girls or women who weary of the strife, and end by more or less wistfully falling back on the old domestic, comfortable idea that marriage is the woman's only way of happiness. Miss Sharp's "Olivia" does not degenerate so far as that; she maintains her freedom to the last, though she plays the good angel in arranging the marriage of a less capable girl; but the rebellious Diana of another story returns home and relapses into orthodox love and marriage, and Peggy in another goes quite tamely into the arms of her "engineer man." Miss Syrett's heroines are, in spite of themselves, drawn into the same old-fashioned tendency.

Ruth, who has been reared in a narrow religious faith, refuses to marry David because he is an unbeliever; she leaves England and goes out with a friend to a missionary station, and there, the combined influences of a hypocritical missionary and his wife and of a large-minded neighbour and his sister, so broaden her understanding that she comes to see she had misjudged David, and her heart aches to go back to him, but she is never to see him again. There is a grim undercurrent of bitterness running through "One Solution," and yet it strikes one as perhaps the most mercilessly true story in the volume. Jean Sinclair at thirty-five is an unsuccessful artist in Paris, living solitary, on the verge of starvation. Six years ago she had rejected Stephen Knowles, partly because she still clung to her ideals of independence and possible fame, partly because she did not love him. Yet she advises the charming little art student, her neighbour, Sallie, not to follow in the steps of so many other girl students. "I wonder," she says, "how many of them have arrived at cursing the little aptitude for drawing that they call art?" And when the girl angrily protests that all Jean thinks her fit for is marriage, Jean assures her, "It's not what you and hundreds of other women are fit for that's not the point. It's what you can get." When her friend Mary Hamilton calls to visit her, after Mary's husband, the stodgy, good-natured, unintellectual George, has left them, she tells Jean that Stephen is coming again to ask her to marry him, and urges her to do so. She confesses that she had married George without loving him, and she does not regret it.

"I know I have ten times more brain than George, but I try to forget it. The thing I find hardest in my married life is to refrain from laughing at him. Oh, I know he's dull, ridiculous, pompous, what you like, but he's kindness itself. And some day I shall bring myself to listen to his absurd platitudes, as I ought, without even an inward smile."

"As you ought?" asked Jean, raising her head.

"Yes," said Mrs. Hamilton firmly. "Because he's done everything for me. He's saved me from heartbreaking loneliness. He's given me my home—and my children. And he loves me."

And it is to be rescued from that loneliness and the hard struggle for existence that, when Stephen comes, Jean, after a despairing hesitation, gives way and is glad to let him make her happy.

Everybody who has laughed over "Through Green Glasses," and "From the Green Bag" will welcome Mr. Edmund Downey's "Dunleary,"¹¹ a series of breezy and spirited sketches of the humours of life in a small Munster town. The stories are full of the oddity and drollery that made the earlier books so popular, and whilst you are in the mood to be frivolous you cannot do better than read also "Sam Briggs: His Book,"¹² by Richard Marsh. Though he is more widely known as a sensational novelist, Mr. Marsh has done notable work as a humorist, and if Sam Briggs is by nature a little garrulous he is nevertheless a lively and amusing companion. Mr. Morley Roberts gives you, in "The Man who Stroked Cats,"¹³ four admirable love stories, and one of the freshest and most entertaining detective tales I have read for some time; and there are five strikingly original detective stories in "The Singing Bone,"¹⁴ by Mr. Austin Freeman. In four of them Mr. Freeman reverses the method usually followed in detective fiction and unfolds his narrative from the standpoint of the criminal; he keeps no secret from his reader, but shows how the hunter picks up clues that bring him on the track of the hunted and to the knowledge of facts that are in the reader's possession from the outset. If "The Case of Oscar Brodski" displays the greatest ingenuity, the light-house story, "The Echo of a Mutiny," is the most haunting and intensely dramatic of the five. All the stories are cleverly constructed, closely and cunningly woven, and make uncommonly good reading.

Messrs. Nelson have added to their popular two-shilling series two volumes of Tolstoi's hitherto unpublished stories and dramas.¹⁵ Some of them are sketchy and fragmentary, but most of them are full and finished and strongly characteristic, and will bear comparison with the great things that have made him famous. It is odd to compare Sudermann's stories in "The Indian Lily" with this work of Tolstoi's. In their different ways, Tolstoi and Sudermann are uncompromising realists, but beside the stern, sombre, fiercely moral realism of Tolstoi that of Sudermann seems but the frank, unrestrained anecdotal talk of the young man about town. Tolstoi tells of the ugly animal under-side of life with a grim Biblical air of being determined to shirk nothing of the truth; Sudermann tells of it lightly, cynically, neatly, as a man might do over the wine and cigars after dinner.

Here in these sixteen volumes, then, you have stories that touch on almost every aspect of modern life, its humours, ironies, tragedies, farces, business, crimes, sins, follies, heroisms, social and moral problems and everyday romance. I do not say that in all of them the stories are written with finished or conspicuous art, but I do say that in at least seven of them they are, and that all of them are interesting and there is an art in being that, and no inconsiderable art either.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

IRISH PLAYS.*

Mr. Rutherford Mayne is a writer for the Ulster Literary Theatre, which would be quite willing to be named a child of The Abbey Theatre, Dublin; this Dublin theatre has become famous throughout England and America, and for some years has been watched with keen interest by all who care for the modern drama. We cannot say that we find in this volume anything which is markedly different from that of the better-known Irish playwrights, and yet it would be quite unfair to call Mr. Mayne a mere imitator, for he, too, like them, has gone to actual life.

All these Irish playwrights, like Bernard Shaw (in fact like most modern artists) endeavour to punt the exact truth, thinking to find therein a truer romance than can be drawn only from the imagination of the artist. Mr. Mayne is not a poet like W. B. Yeats, nor a man of genius like J. M. Synge, but he writes with intimate knowledge and real sympathy, and has a practical knowledge of the conditions of the theatre, which make these plays really dramatic; they are not quite literary enough for the study, but on the stage they would all be effective. The most characteristic feature of the modern Irish drama is the sordid always close to the surface, and giving a colour to the whole, with this is a hard literalness and a marked absence of gaiety that almost hide the glamour and mystery which nevertheless can always be found.

This particular volume contains four plays, none of them very long or sufficient to fill the whole of an evening bill. The first, "The Drone," may be considered a complete play, while the others should more properly be described as dramatic episodes. "The Drone" is however the least interesting, because poetry and romance are almost absent, though a sort of impish imagination can be found; the end, too, is rather original and quite unexpected.

The Drone himself pretends to be an inventor, but is really living in idleness on the bounty of a stupid and admiring brother. The heroine of the piece, Mary, is particularly unattractive. Finally, the Drone gets nearly shown up, but by his talk and ingenuity he extricates his brother from an awkward scrape, and everything will go on as before. There is an ironic humour and go about the piece which carries one along.

The three dramatic episodes all include one character who is something akin to the chorus in Greek drama, who gives the atmosphere, and sets the action going. "The Turn of the Road" is a real poem whose imaginative sadness is genuinely pathetic, because it belongs to the nature of things and does not arise from accident. Robbie John, the hero, is a fiddler, the son of a small farmer, whom poverty has made hard and sceptical, though he is neither quite blind nor deaf to higher things. Indeed, here all the characters

* "The Drone" and other Plays." By Rutherford Mayne. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsel.)

Rutherford Mayne.

From "The Drone" and Other Plays," by Rutherford Mayne (Maunsel)

have some consciousness of a "living poetry" except the mother, for whom the hard struggle has been too much, and the crafty, evil elder brother who cares for nought but money. Robbie John, for the sake of winning the girl he loves, has promised to give up his fiddle, when there enters a beggar with a fiddle, who plays beautiful tunes and tells them of his past greatness. This beggar is driven out into the cold by the whole household. Robbie John goes out with him, speaks words of kindness and gives him some money; the beggar dies by the wayside, leaving the fiddle (an instrument of great value) to Robbie John. This fiddle proves too much, and at the instigation of his wicked elder brother, and still more induced by the great faith of his beloved, Robbie John decides to give up all for his art. We hope that he will grow famous and that he and Jane will come together. But the author does not encourage our hope, and the play ends with the old grandfather's cry of despair.

"It's only us—it's only us, I say, as knows the long wild nights, and the wet and the rain and the mist of night in the boglands,—it's only us, I say, could listen him in the right way. (Sobbing.) And ye knowed, right well ye knowed, that every string of his fiddle was keyed to the crying of your own heart."

The two other pieces are Irish agrarian tragedies, both told in a way that would grip an audience.

A. H. J.

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS' NOVEL.*

If one were asked, as a craftsman, to name the salient characteristic of Mr. Eden Phillpotts' work, I do not think the answer could be given hesitatingly. His passion for detail is like that which appears in Eastern architecture. In "The Forest on the Hill," it lends extraordinary value to many descriptions of landscape, and in particular to four pictures of a Dartmoor scene at chosen seasons of the year. These four pictures make four chapters, written without direct reference to the story Mr. Phillpotts tells. I do not know any writing of the kind that exhibits such powers of minute and faithful observation; and the secret of it is a scientific curiosity, directing the artist's eye upon Nature's secret—a sincere and habitual search after the meaning of phenomena. Yet this meaning is not to be found in the detail, and he knows it is not. On the last page of the book one reads :

* "The Forest on the Hill." By Eden Phillpotts. 6s. (John Murray.)

" Reality can only be felt, not seen, not heard, not verified ; she roams far from the substantial, the sure-founded, the proven ; she dwells rather with motion and emotion, with anticipation and suspension, with the rising and setting stars, with that purple glory of the distant hills all men have seen, none trodden. She harbours not with darkness, but light ; a frozen soul is no habitation for her ; she wings with the day-spring and the rainbow ; she shares the substance of human dreams and aspirations ; she is one with the ideals and beacons and golden hopes that reign for ever in mankind's unconquerable heart."

In plainer words, the ideal and the beautiful are real things, and the only things that matter to humanity. I make this point because Mr. Phillpotts has, by some people, been mistaken for a pessimist, and because he might again be mistaken by a careless reader. Nothing easier. He takes the scientific standpoint to say, continually, that it is unhelpful ; the tale ends unhappily for its three chief characters ; and he rarely indicates the positive meaning of it. From first to last one feels that, for Mr. Phillpotts, " the very concept of Nature, in its vagueness, casts down more than it heartens, and stands for a narcotic rather than a tonic force." He says so—and yet he does not contradict the conclusion. All he means is that Nature has this effect if approached without feeling, in a cold and reasoning endeavour to understand, a merely scientific spirit. The strange thing is that, holding this opinion, he makes his appeal to reason more than to feeling ; argues, with a poet's endowment of vision and delight ; pushes the reader instead of dancing on before him. But so it happens with a conscientious man, our cursed spite being that the world is out of joint.

I am, unhappily, not clear that this appeal to reason against reason is in all ways conducted soundly. The story seems at two points itself unreasonable. Drusilla Whyddon, a girl with rare intelligence, and deep in love, is persuaded to renounce her lover by an old uncle of his, Lot Snow, who will disinherit him if he marries her. She consents to do it and to give no explanation. I feel that, for what one knows of her at this point, she consents too easily. There is a crash that seems unreal. The lover, Timothy Snow, being a shrewd, strong, resolute man as ever defied the fates, and perfectly informed of his uncle's character and purpose, is astounded. He uses every eloquent plea but one ; he never suspects his uncle's hand in the mystery. This I think incredible. At last he leaves the country, but before he goes Lot Snow is killed by John Redstone, a tenant of his and a rejected suitor of Drusilla's, whom he has driven to desperation by tyrannous and mean oppression. Redstone afterwards marries Drusilla. He is the hero of the book. When Timothy returns, and is put on trial and condemned for the murder, it is Redstone's rôle to confess and to shoot himself. Every one who knows Mr. Phillpotts' power in passionate scenes will see that there is material here for the play of an intensely sympathetic and sure imagination at home with emotional detail. I could hardly say too much of the skill with which Drusilla's moods are handled, for there is, at any rate, nothing unconvincing in the singular turn of events by which she accepts and loves her old suitor, while knowing him guilty of the murder. Nor could the comparison between two men have been more thoroughly made than it is made between Redstone and the younger Snow. Also, there are searching and fine studies of temperament in a rebellious coquette, Audrey Leaman ; a village constable, Fred Moyle ; and some of the minor characters. The flaws I find are such as a true psychologist may have to gloss when he lets a plot guide him, but does not let it fully determine his puppets' natures ; or when, being clear about these in his own mind, he mis-estimates their effect at this or that juncture.

In spite of them, " The Forest on the Hill " is a big story, full of noble work. It can only strengthen the Devonshire author's high repute ; the true theme, the relation between Nature and human consciousness, is enriched so amply and so variously. What is more, I think it indicates the potentiality of inner work still. If a time should come when Mr. Phillpotts, tired of reasoning, felt the impulse to ride his invention light in hand upon those Dartmoor heights of his, I, for one, should watch and cheer him with a rare exultation.

KEIGHTLY SNOWDEN.

A FRIEND OF LAMB'S*.

Every reader of Lamb, and we are all readers of Lamb nowadays, will remember his friend, John Rickman, the census-taker. Writing to Manning in November, 1800, Lamb says :

" I have made an acquisition lately of a pleasant hand, one Rickman, to whom I was introduced by George Dyer, not the most flattering auspices under which one man can be introduced to another. George brings all sorts of people together, setting up a sort of agrarian law, or common property, in matter of society ; but for once he has done me a great pleasure, while he was only pursuing a principle, as ignis fatuus may light you home. This Rickman lives in our buildings, immediately opposite our house ; the finest fellow to drop in at nights, about nine or ten o'clock—cold bread-and-cheese time—just in the wishing time of the night, when you wish for somebody to come in, without a distinct idea of a probable anybody. Just in the nick, neither too early to be tedious, nor too late to sit a reasonable time. He is a most pleasant hand ; a fine, rattling fellow, has gone through life laughing at solemn apes ; himself hugely literate, oppressively full of information in all stuff of conversation, from matter of fact to Xenophon or Plato—can talk Greek with Porson, politics with Thelwall, conjecture with George Dyer, nonsense with me, and anything with anybody ; a great farmer, somewhat concerned in an agricultural magazine ; reads no poetry but Shakespeare ; very intimate with Southey, but never reads his poetry ; relishes George Dyer ; thoroughly penetrates into the ridiculous wherever found ; understands the first time (a great desideratum in common minds)—you need never twice speak to him ; does not want explanations, translations, limitations, as Professor Godwin does when you make

* " Life and Letters of John Rickman." By Orlo Williams. Illustrated. 20s. 6d. net (Constable) ; " Letters of Robert Southey." A Selection. Edited with Introduction and Notes by Maurice H. Fitzgerald. 1s. net. (Frowde.)

John Rickman

From " Life and Letters of John Rickman," by Orlo Williams. (Constable.)

an assertion; up to anything; down to anything; whatever sapit hominem. A perfect man. . . . You must see Rickman to know him, for he is a species in one; a new class; an exotic; any slip of which I am proud to put in my garden-pot; the clearest-headed fellow; fullest of matter, with least verbosity. . . ."

Clearly a man it were worth knowing more about. Ever since I first read that passage and the other references to Rickman that are scattered through Lamb's letters, I confess I have had a curiosity to make ampler acquaintance with that notable census-taker, and in this "Life and Letters of John Rickman" Mr. Orlo Williams offers all I had wanted. He gives a vivid full-length presentment of Rickman that is curiously interesting both in its likeness to that description of Lamb's and in certain points of difference from it. Astute, well-informed, tactful, sociable, fond of literature and literary talk—Rickman was all that, but he would seem to have been too oracular, withal, too heavily dogmatic, too cold-natured and unemotional and portentously solemn to answer to Lamb's labelling of him as a "pleasant hand" and one who could talk nonsense with him. He did, as a fact, read Southey's poetry and irritated Southey very much by writing to him unfavourably about it. Lamb makes him out a lovable man, but this "Life and Letters" of him, obviously the truer portrait, shows him as only a likeable man, level-headed, self-centred, self-opinionated, a strong and overbearing personality certainly a remarkable man, one you are bound to respect, when you know him, and one of official importance in parliamentary circles of his own day, but only memorable now because of his association with Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, Hazlitt, Southey, and other such of his contemporaries. His biography is thoroughly interesting, but never so much so as when it takes him among these friends of his; it affords many fresh glimpses of them, and his letters to them and theirs to him are full of good things.

Southey he knew, perhaps, better than any of the others, and though his literary criticisms when he is writing to him are not distinguished by any particular fineness of thought or grace of utterance, their downright frankness and common-sense make them valuable if merely as revelations of himself. No lover of Lamb will need urging to get this book; well worth having purely for its own sake, it is doubly worth having for Lamb's, and deserves, and is sure of a permanent place in the growing library of Elian literature.

A selection of Southey's letters has, by the way, just been added to Mr. Frowde's "World's Classics," and among the best of them are some of those he wrote to and about Rickman. As a poet, Southey is dead; his fame rests on one or two of his biographies, and on his letters, and as a letter-writer he is one of the most charmingly urbane and attractive of the immortals. Mr. Maurice Fitzgerald has made an admirable selection here from his voluminous correspondence, and completes it with a concise and entirely adequate introduction. S.J.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF BISHOP KING.*

"One of the deplorable consequences of Bishop Wilberforce's death was that it let loose the persecuting zeal of Archbishop Tait, which the Bishop had consistently endeavoured to restrain; and when, in the following February, Mr. Gladstone ceased to be Prime Minister, the Archbishop thought that the moment had arrived for a final attack on such of the clergy as were labouring to restore the dignity of Eucharistic worship." This will show the standpoint from which Mr. Russell has written the life of Bishop King. If sympathy could make a successful biographer, Mr. Russell would be in the front rank. Even Bishop King latterly did not rise to sufficient firmness in the Ritualistic cause, according to his biographer's standard, but apart from these slight defects, and a tendency to leave letters unanswered, the sixtieth Bishop of Lincoln is a man after Mr. Russell's own ecclesiastical heart. The story of the Lincoln judgment is told again from the standpoint of the English Church Union, with a thinly veiled contempt for Archbishop Benson's "persecuting zeal," and Archbishop Temple's later efforts in the same direction are dismissed with equal curtness.

A deeper reason for the abeyance of the critical spirit in this biography is the author's evident admiration for Dr. King's spiritual quality. As Principal of Cuddesdon, as Professor of Pastoral Theology at Oxford, and in the see of Lincoln, Dr. King seems to have made the same rare impression of intense personal religion. This is the key-note of the biography. The finely chiselled face which looks out from the frontispiece helps one to understand the wide testimony borne to the Bishop's Christian spirit. He must have been a saintly, lovable soul, one of those beautiful characters whose appeal is infinitely broader than their sectarian environment. One of the services rendered by this book is that it enables outsiders to enter into something of the enthusiasm and reverence which Dr. King excited among his contemporaries.

But a good man does not mean necessarily a good biography. This one is extraordinarily dull. Episcopal biographies rarely lend themselves to a treatment which interests the general public, and Mr. Russell's present work is not an exception. There is a solitary flash of humour: the remark of a Lincolnshire cleric who declared "my clerical neighbours are exhaustively divisible into three classes—those who have gone out of their minds, those who are going out of them, and those who have none to go out of," otherwise, the air of the book is heavy with incense. The reader breathes a deferential reverence. Many letters of the Bishop's friends are quoted, and there is hardly a memorable or crisp sentence in any of them. The Bishop himself was not an intellectual force. He was neither a theologian nor an ecclesiologist. His mental interests do not lead one to expect good things from his pen. But the curious psychological fact is that he seems to have drawn from correspondents who were stronger than himself expressions and opinions which often smack of what those outside the hot-house would call femininity and mawkishness. The biography does credit to the pious feelings of Mr. Russell. So much can be said for it without reserve, but little more. JAMES MOFFATT.

OXFORD.*

An anthology in prose and verse of all that has been wisely said "In Praise of Oxford" is not a banquet for Gargantua. To get the full flavour of such a feast, you must taste it here and there, from this side and from that; for the glamour of Oxford is as varied as are its energies, and just as "if Judas goes forth to-night, it is towards Judas that his steps will tend," so every son of Alma Mater finds in her the particular charms he seeks for, and she, carefully noting by which of these he is attracted, is the more easily enabled to fashion him to her will. It is, indeed, the signal praise of Thomas Seacombe's and Spencer Scott's new florilegium—a volume which deals with Oxford life and manners—that, showing Oxford in every mood of play and work, and in all the cumulative influences she brings to bear upon her sons, it never loses sight of the fact that her activities are myriad, subtle and interlacing, tending to form a certain uniform type of character, at once suave, tolerant and self-sufficient, and that her influences, moulding, as they are meant to mould, the character of the complete man, the man teres atque rotundus, are deep-rooted and permanent, colouring more or less the whole of his subsequent life. The compilers of this delightful tribute to the honour and glory of Oxford have ransacked the centuries for quaint and telling matter; and so great has been their love and their diligence that sins of omission or of commission are hard to find. They deal with terms and vacations, Freshmen and their ways, beer and battels, proctors and penalties, Oxford clubs and libraries, mimes and pastimes, foreign impressions of

* "Edward King, Sixtieth Bishop of Lincoln." A Memoir, by G. W. E. Russell. 7s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

* "In Praise of Oxford." By Thomas Seacombe and H. Spencer Scott. Vol. II. 6s. net. (Constable.)

Oxford, the rivalry of Oxford and Cambridge, the life and customs of particular colleges; and going back to Oxford men of the past, such as Aubrey, Harrison, Camden, Hearne, Wood and Gibbon, they yet quote from such loyal moderns as Mr. Arnold, Mr. Lang, Mr. Quiller-Couch, Mr. Hilare Belloc, Mr. Max Beerbohm, Mr. Alfred Noyes and Mr. St. John Lucas. It would be tempting to discourse on the ancient rivalry of the two Universities, and then, as a set-off against the hoary old epigram, "The Oxford man looks as if the world belonged to him; the Cambridge man as if he did not care to whom it belonged," we might be tempted to insist on Dryden's famous tribute to the University, of which he would have preferred to be a member

"Oxford to him a dearer name shall be
Than his own mother-university.
Thence did his green unknowing youth engage;
He chooses Athens in his ripe age."

—and to remember that Byron went to Trinity College, Cambridge, merely because he was unable to obtain rooms at Christ Church. But perhaps it would be wiser to take Oxford's primacy as granted by all the best judges, and to proceed to jot down the notes we made on one or two extracts from Messrs. Seecombe and Scott's book that particularly took our fancy. One very amusing passage, borrowed from Moritz's "Travels in England," tells how a clergyman, drinking beer at an ale-house with other members of the cloth, proved his assertion that God was described in the Bible as a wine-bibber by quoting Judges ix. 13 Jotham's parable of the trees. Another, quoted from The Gentleman's Magazine for July, 1906, is noteworthy as trouncing Carlyle in right merciless and triumphant fashion for drawing so many pathetic(ally fallacious) pictures of Johnson's life at Pembroke. The third extract we marked was the story of the unsuccessful hanging of Anne Green, a narrative of rare and most engaging brutality; just the sort of story of which Mr. Ma chield ought to make a play or a "poem"! Certain Oxford men wrote verses to this young woman on her recovery. Among them were Peter Killigrew, H. Davenant, Anthony à Wood, Christopher Wren, and Sir Joseph Williamson. Christopher Wren, who, by the way, was at Wadham, was not only a great architect, he was a great geometrician and Savilian Professor of Astronomy in his University. As for Sir Joseph Williamson, he was a famous benefactor of his college, Queen's, and was for many years Secretary of State. To him, in the latter capacity, we owe it that Milton's Latin treatise, "De Doctrina Christiana," was censured in 1676 and not published till 1825.

HINTS FROM JAPAN.*

One may wonder what is being thought of Yoshio Markino in Japan. The reputation which he has acquired amongst ourselves, as a most gay philosopher and cunning artist, is enhanced by every book he gives us. But his countrymen may be much less beguiled by pictures that have now become entirely Western since Markino is sincere, and paints the thing he sees while in his text they still discover both the point of view and phrasing of Japan. Perhaps it is with him as with the portrait of that lovely European girl, which wrought such havoc in Markino's village; it was worshipped on account of Europe being "the most civilized country. When one worships anybody or anything, of course it looks very nice to his or her eyes!" But what appears to us to be most useful for the Japanese are Mr. Yoshio Markino's comments on the people of the West. "Half-a dozen wrinkles," he informs us, "were grown on my brow," when he was told about the exploits of the militant suffragettes. This book will give his earnest countrymen, if it is introduced into Japan, a wrinkle of another sort on every page. We have been hearing lately that the Japanese officials have been studying the Christianity of Europe, with a view to making an amalgam of religious systems, which is calculated to be suitable for Japanese requirements, and will have the tendency to further Japanese success. They know, much more than we do, what profound importance is attached to manners, and from this illuminating volume they may learn precisely how they should approach a low-necked damsel or the "Honourable Castle of the Queen of the John Bullesses." It will by this time have been gathered that the Anglicizing process does not yet entold the literary matter of our friend. This broken English occupies a perilous position, for it is a stone you either break into objectionable dust which of us has not rudely fled from some enthusiastic foreigner, or even from some alien member of our Parliament? or else the stone is shattered into jewels, as when we have English spoken with the right Parisian accent, or behold it written by Markino, in whose lectures, by the way, and correspondence there is just the same originality of method. How much we lose by fastening on every one the same grammatical conventions! Only when an author has the strength of mind to sign himself in several ways shall we have in our midst another Shakespeare. And the presence of Markino, criticizing, in so fresh a way, our institutions could be very profitably used. In case of strikes, for instance, he would give an excellent opinion, not unbiassed only and entirely free from prejudice, but founded on a diagnosis that is more than adequate. "What I like best in John Bullesses is that their nature is quite sentimental, yet they absolutely deny it. This very spirit has brought up many a great hero and heroine in England." Every point he illustrates with incidents from his own heterogeneous life or, now and then, from Chinese poetry. "The other day," says he, "a newly-arrived Japanese was asking the meaning of 'Bob.' I said, 'It is a quite new word since the African War. The gold piece represents the Sovereign, while the shilling represents Lord Roberts.' My John Bullish friend interfered with a killingly amazed face, and pointed out my mistake. I lost the confidence on my English from my Japanese friends ! " The best of brief descriptions of Markino's method is to call it the gay wisdom. In an age when mere solemnity imposes on the credulous we may well hope that his example will be followed by ourselves. Joseph Conrad teaches us how one should write about the sea, this other foreigner is teaching us how we may know ourselves. " First of all I am a foreigner, and am absolutely ignorant of the English custom." Yet we find him saying that " John Bulless knows exactly her own position, and never dreams fool's paradise. Perhaps in her mind she may rebel against herself, and may even dream a fool's paradise, but she has a wonderful conscience to come back to herself." A year or two and we shall have a brilliant novel written by Markino. He will cast aside his alien language—sacrificing thus a certain charm and humour, for he will no longer think that " Great Scott ! " means a man who has had too much whisky—he will have outgrown his language, and he will preserve his striking powers of observation, both as to the outward matters—English girls, he says, are made more beautiful by fog—and to the subtle problems of the heart.

* "My Idealized John Bullesses," by Yoshio Markino. 6s. net. (Constable.)

From "My Idealized John Bullesses," by Yoshio Markino. (Constable.)

Roller Skating.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

A CLOISTRAL POET.*

There is no doubt that those who in coming days look back upon the age of poetry lately closed will be able to see, even among poets very dissimilar in spirit, a similarity of workmanship and temper. It is always a hazardous thing to generalise ; and while such a poet as Francis Thompson can be seen to have sung his song in the 'eighties and 'nineties, it will certainly seem a dangerous statement to make that the poets of that time were content with a little, a restricted, inspiration, but were scrupulous to make that inspiration perfect in workmanship. Such names, however, as those of Lionel Johnson, Ernest Dowson, Arthur Symonds and Oscar Wilde (not he of " The Ballad of Reading Gaol " !), men who were more or less thrown together, or even of the remoter worker, Mr. Robert Bridges, all recur to the mind as poets who, in their different ways, were strangers to great gusts of inspiration, but who were faultless, even precise, in the scholarly technique of poetry.

It is this very precision that very largely accounts for some of the distinctive features of the writers who, succeeding to them, seek to break away from them. But among that cluster of spirits there is one who stands distinguished by a certain waif-like aristocracy of mien : not only in his person but in his poetry also. " In no page of his," says Miss Guiney in her article that appeared originally in the Atlantic Monthly and which is included as an introduction to this little book, " was there ever a rhetorical trick or an underbred rhyme." Which is true, if rather negative as praise. " If he could but work out his idea as music," she adds, " he preferred to do so with divers painstaking which less scrupulous vassals of the Muse would as soon practise as fasting and praying." Let anyone read so austere a poem as " Winchester " and they will see how precisely true this is. They will see also, by the way of incident, how there was no course other than this left to him, for not even his warmest adherent would claim for Lionel Johnson that he had a thing to say that burned in him like coals of fire. Life was to him a cloistral matter ; and cloistral not in the sense that whiteness may be the very heat of fire, but in the sense that whiteness is the calm elimination of colour. We may forgive a stumble in the man hasting to a goal, we may even expect, aye and even desire, it, as evidence of his earnestness ; but we shall not forgive a stumble in a man at easy leisure on his way.

Whoever, therefore, has been responsible for this present selection has perhaps done wisely in laying emphasis on this side of Johnson. There are several poems in the two volumes that he published that one would have liked to see here—poems where the steadiness of inspiration burned to an intenser flame, or where even he broke away in a looser

* " Some Poems of Lionel Johnson." Newly Selected. With an Introduction by Louise Imogen Guiney. 1s. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

and freer spirit altogether. This is only a personal inclination ; and there is no doubt that the present selection does lay emphasis on the quality chiefly distinctive of Johnson. " Of lonely quiet was my dream," he himself sang ; and it is this dream that pervades the pages of this book. It may linger lovingly over quadrangles and colleges in " Winchester " and " Oxford " ; it may finger tenderly the pages introduced to him in such colleges in " The Classics " ; it may turn over the thought of chosen friendships, ever swelling in " Walter Pater," to the metrical magic of " Gracious God keep him : and God grant to me

By miracle to see
That unforgettably most gracious friend,
In the never-ending end ;

it may defend its choices in " Magic." But always it is austere ; always it is aloof. Even when he is most near to the wildness of mysticism and other worldly glamour and colour, we yet find it soaked in classic deliberation and harmony, as in one of the loveliest of his poems, " Glories," included in this selection :

" Roses from Pæstan rosaries !
More goodly red and white was she :
Her red and white were harmonies
Not matched upon a Pæstan tree.
" Ivories blanched in Alban air !
She lies more purely blanched than you :
No Alban whiteness doth she wear,
But death's perfection of that hue.
" Nay ! Now the rivalry is done,
Of red, and white, and whiter still—
She hath a glory from that sun
Who falls not from Olympus Hill "

DARRELL FIGGIS.

THE WHITE WALLET.*

There is one certain immortality open to us all if we possess but a little literary skill, a little observation, and are not too far removed from the centre of things, and that is to keep a diary honestly and faithfully, setting down the time in its habit as we see it. Another method would be to look for pearls in the dust and pick them up into safe keeping, as Lady Glenconner has done in " The White Wallet." Every one of us who has the precious gift of admiration has found pearls in the dust many a time, and—left them there. Perhaps Lady Glenconner will set many of us a-walleting ; but to her is the first praise, for hers is the happy thought. Here, in " The White Wallet," are things known and things unknown. Here be my homely and simple things and things of undoubtedly aristocratic lineage ; a felicity from a grave-stone made centuries ago by some humble great craftsman in words ; the felicity of a child ; the unction of some obscure holiness ; beauties to which none can ever attach a name. There are, side by side, all the authentic great things of literature. " The White Wallet " needs no apology, and offers none. It consists of the things which have, from time to time, and for one reason or another, pleased an exquisite taste. Apart from the literary aspect of the book it has a personal interest. Lady Glenconner herself signs many of these delightful fragments. Others are signed " G. W.," by which we are reminded that one of our modern statesmen has found time and skill to render us the venal joyousness of Rosamund and Charles d'Orleans. " Madeline Wyndham " is yet another signature ; and we find " E. Wyndham Tennant " to a charming poem by a child. All of which gives us the clue if we have the understanding for it, and makes it easy or easier for us to follow the track of the mind—delicate and elusive—which selected these fillings for " The White Wallet." There are just a few things which, personally, one would wish away ; and even these, doubtless, have their reasons for inclusion. One hopes that Lady Glenconner has not exhausted her wallet, for her book is a green thought in a green shade, very welcome in a dusky and dingy winter.

* " The White Wallet." Filled by Pamela Glenconner. 5s. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

GARRICK AND HIS FRENCH FRIENDS.*

Small notice has hitherto been taken by biographers of Garrick's associations with Paris, and a considerable gap in the history of the stage is filled by Dr. Hedgecock's new book, largely based on Garrick's correspondence with French actors and authors, included in the two volumes edited in 1831 by James Boaden from originals now in the Forster collection.

In this English version of his thesis for the Paris Doctorat ès Lettres the author has allowed himself digressions in illustration of social life in London and Paris, and of the growth of Shakespeare's fame in France during the eighteenth century. Incidentally, he devotes several pages to the influence of French fashions in England from the time of Chaucer onwards.

The principal "French Friend" was Jean Monnet, who, after a youth not wholly creditable, had settled down as a theatrical manager. In 1719 Monnet brought his Comedy Company to London, where, as neither Rich nor Garrick was disposed to risk a Gallophobe agitation, he hired the Haymarket Theatre, with the result that, after several nights of "popular" disturbance, the house was closed by the Lord Chamberlain. Another friend was Jean Noverre, the creator of that form of ballet-pantomime still much in evidence in Leicester Square. In 1755 he, in his turn, with his "Fêtes Chinoises," was driven by excited patriots from Drury Lane. No unpleasantness of this kind marked the visit of Garrick to Paris in 1751, nor his second visit twelve years later, but his appearances on both occasions were in private houses, where he gave "readings," his favourite being the "dagger" scene from "Macbeth." He made the acquaintance of the leading actors of the French stage, including Le Kain, Prévile, Molé, Mademoiselle Clairon, and Mademoiselle Dumesnil, and met with many other distinguished persons in the salons of Madame Geoffrin, Helvétius, and d'Holbach. To Gravelot, the famous illustrator, Dr. Hedgecock makes but a passing reference, although (as Mr. Greig has reminded us in his book on Gainsborough) the Garricks were for many years his chief friends in London.

However friendly Garrick may have been with the heads of "the profession" abroad, he was very exclusive with regard to its representatives at home, and Hannah More, who was his intimate friend, and lived for some time in his house, wrote after his death: "I never witnessed in any family more decorum, propriety, and regularity, than in his; where I never saw a card, nor even met—except in one instance—a person of his own profession at his table." No doubt Mrs. Garrick, to whom he was devotedly attached, was largely responsible for this apparent excess of decorum.

Perhaps the least satisfactory of Garrick's French acquaintances was Le Texier (a fore-runner of such "quick-change" artists as Fiegoli and De Vries) who, spoilt by adulation, at length disgusted his French adorers by his intolerable conceit, and came to London to repeat successfully his Paris triumphs. According to Garrick's friends Le Texier repaid the great kindness of the English actor with gross ingratitude, though Horace Walpole, who never much cared for Garrick, declared that the Englishman was jealous of the Frenchman's success as a "reader" of plays in London drawing-rooms.

Dr. Hedgecock, as befits a scholar trained in the modern school of French historians, is much more concerned with the presentation of facts than of picturesque descriptions. Now and again he makes quite trivial slips, as when he writes of Suard's intention of translating Burney's "History of Music" "into English," of the "Condy" Museum at Chantilly, or of "Yorrick," meaning Sterne. He uses the word "resume" as equivalent to the French "resumer," and he writes "at London"; otherwise his English is generally idiomatic. His worst "mistake" is of a different kind to those just quoted. In describing Garrick's audacious treatment of Shakespeare's plays he says: "A grave

Garrick as Hamlet.

From an anonymous engraving of the period in the possession of A. M. Broadley, Esq.

*From "David Garrick and his Friends," by Frank A. Hedgecock. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

alteration, in more than one sense, is that by which he awakens Juliet in the tomb before Romeo is yet dead," a criticism actually printed on the same page whereon Mercutio's "Ask for me to-morrow, and you shall find me a grave man," is called an "objectionable pun."

The author says that "Les Saisons" "would hardly have saved Saint-Lambert's name from oblivion had not Jean Jacques Rousseau fallen amorous of his mistress." It is certain that his relations with the accomplished Emilie du Châtelet would have preserved Saint-Lambert's name, if not his fame.

Such little slips as are here mentioned are of no consequence in comparison with the dreadful "howlers" the author has justly exposed from the work of some other writers on Garrick, one of whom, for instance, deplores the omission from the "Mémoires" of Dangeau, who died in 1720, of any reference to Garrick's visit to Paris in 1751.

The great English actor loses nothing from the evidence of his French friendships. That he was liberal every one familiar with Boswell's book knew already; as for his vanity, let his old schoolmaster and lifelong friend speak. "No wonder, sir," said Johnson, "that he is vain: a man who is perpetually flattered in every mode that can be conceived. So many bellows have blown the fire, that one wonders he is not by this time become a cinder." As Dr. Hedgecock shows, there were many French bellows blowing on that fire, none more persistently than the middle-aged novelist and former actress Madame Riccoboni, who, in impetuous letters of mingled French and English, kept the "Dearling of my heart" informed of the latest theatrical and literary news of Paris, criticised recent English books—"The Vicar of Wakefield" and Young's "Night Thoughts," for example—and praised without reserve everything that came from Garrick's pen.

This valuable and entertaining book gains in attractiveness by the portraits (mostly from contemporary engravings), the caricatures and other pictures included. Liotard's painting of Garrick in 1751 forms the frontispiece. Favart, Madame Necker, and Madame Riccoboni are represented; there are plates showing Garrick in various characters, and other pictorial records of contemporary stage productions.

W. H. HELM.

* A Cosmopolitan Actor. David Garrick and his French Friends. By Frank A. Hedgecock. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

THE HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.*

"I have taken all knowledge to be my province," said Bacon long ago, but of late years the advance of learning has been so immense that to-day with regard to many things the most eager student must of necessity be largely ignorant. And yet, if life is to have its proper fulness, if our human capacity is not to remain, as it were, maimed and mutilated, there are many subjects of which we all require to know at least a little. Art and science, law and literature, history and politics, philosophy and religion—these are all things with which we all require some acquaintance, or else our daily round will be the drearier, and we shall be like those who walk with unseeing eyes amid a scene which is infinitely varied in its interest. But how are common folk, how are those whose other labour is heavy and whose leisure scanty, ever to learn even a little about the things which make life human? Encyclopedias oppress them with their bulk; learned works are often too costly or too difficult; and even where Public Libraries are at hand, choice is at once hazardous and perplexing. But a pocket volume of 250 pages, procurable for a shilling, and containing just enough information to make the large outlines of its subject clear and intelligible, meets at once many modest needs; and it is a hundred such volumes—of which the present ten are the fourth instalment—that the "Home University Library" is endeavouring to supply. Nor could any endeavour be more worthy of encouragement. To-day, for the first time in our history, the gates of knowledge have been opened wide for all. Half a century back the power to read with ease was in many classes of society almost a distinction; now it is a universal possession. Knowledge to-day "unrolls her ample page" to every eye, but none the less there is no more certain fact than that what the mass of men and women read is for the most wanting in all solid value. The general world has found in reading rather a new amusement than a new source of capacity and strength. We have learned to read, but have not yet learned to read wisely, and, like children, still prefer sweetmeats to what is substantial. But if we are to grow strong we must take to more wholesome fare, and for that this series attempts to give us at least a relish. And the attempt is certainly successful. No one of fair intelligence can even glance through these volumes without feeling that there is to be found in them something which is worth knowing, something which will give at once a larger outlook and a clearer insight, which by enlarging and invigorating the intelligence will add both to the enjoyment and usefulness of life. Take, for example, such topics as "Canada" or "India," about which we all hear so much and know so little, or that other theme of universal dogmatism and almost universal ignorance, "Climate and the Weather." In these volumes the reader will find the subject set out for him with such clearness that he can hardly fail to grasp its main outline, so that he is provided, as it were, with a framework into which every new piece of information he acquires will fall almost of itself, taking its proper place and helping to build up a well-ordered fabric of real knowledge.

But a book that can do that much has already, whatever its size, some of the qualities which in reality constitute a "great book." For books are too often estimated unjustly by their bulk. The old phrase μέγα βιβλίον μέγα κακόν is to-day too little in esteem, and the shelves of our libraries groan under the weight of volumes which might be half their size if only we could write better. For indeed to be at once clear and concise is one of the hardest of literary tasks. Brevis esse laboro, obscurus fio, said Horace of poets, and it is universally true both of the spoken and the written word. To state even a simple matter at once lucidly and with brevity is no easy task; to so state one which is complex and difficult needs much pains and a master hand, while when the statement is made, not to experts, but to the ignorant, the difficulty is quadrupled. Then it requires the rare gift of making no assumptions, of drawing, that is, no conclusions, and making no comments which postulate knowledge in the reader of which he is not possessed, so that the conclusions have for him no real validity and the comments are without meaning or content. In dealing, for example, with "French Literature" Mr. Strachey devotes 15 pages to Voltaire, but he only quotes three words from him—the famous Cultivez votre jardin—so that after reading his chapter, what we know is not anything real about Voltaire's writings, but only that he did write certain things and that Mr. Strachey has formed certain opinions about them. And a similar remark applies to Mr. Finlay's volume on "The School," which is rather a theoretical argument to show that "the foundation of pedagogic science must be firmly laid in the scientific treatment of genetic psychology," than a clear exposition of facts as to the nature of "genetic psychology" or of "The School" itself, as it exists to-day or has ever existed in the world of experience; while in Mr. Pollard's "History of England" there is observable the same tendency to reason about facts rather than to give them, and to use phrases, such as "the famous Salisbury oath," "justices in eyre," "tallage," and the like, which can have no meaning except to those who already know history. In fact, these three volumes seem to convey criticism more than information, and while they will often delight the expert may not unfrequently perplex the learner. On the other hand, the volumes on "Canada," "India," and "Rome," are models of what introductory handbooks should be. Mr. Warde-Fowler's work especially is the masterly summing up of a life's study. He writes with that complete simplicity which is the last outcome of complete knowledge. He records nothing that is trivial, but he omits nothing that is vital. Like a great artist, he produces his effect with a few decisive strokes, so that the main features of the history stand out in bold and unmistakable outline. The small beginnings of the infant state, the gradual growth based on the sure foundations of "duty and discipline"; the era of rapid development when "self-defence"—as in other Imperial stories—began "only too easily to slip into self-assertion"; the fatal union of "Dominion and Degeneracy"; the breaking up of the old republic, and the establishment of the new empire—all these are exhibited to the reader within a few hours like the clear-cut and yet coherent scenes of a great drama. And what has been said of the volume on Rome may be said equally of that on India. The immense theme seems incapable of brief treatment. It is the history of three thousand years, of a vast country, of three hundred millions of people presenting among themselves every diversity of language, habit, and religion, and in respect to all three alien and almost incomprehensible to ourselves. And yet within the compass of a few pages the main facts are conveyed in a manner which enables those who start—as the present writer started—in almost complete ignorance to feel that the word "India" will henceforth have for them a new meaning, and to understand, at least in part, why the problem of its future is the greatest problem that either nation or empire had ever yet to face.

The remaining volumes, which deal with subjects so diverse as "Anthropology," "The Climate and the Weather," "Philosophy," and "Architecture," present, perhaps, less difficulty of treatment than those already mentioned. "Philosophy," indeed, might seem to suggest a discourse which would "find no end in wandering mazes lost"; but Mr. Russell, by wisely limiting himself chiefly to an examination of "the theory of knowledge" has given a certain unity and consequent simplicity to his work, although the beginner who finds himself within twenty pages doubting the reality of a table, or learning that Berkeley allows its existence, but only as "a collection of ideas" (Leibniz says "a colony of souls") may begin to doubt whether, in spite of Mr. Russell's able endeavours to secure it, there can be any such thing as "simplicity" in the study of philosophy. Still, however this may be, "Anthropology," "The Weather," and "Architecture," are clearly themes which, unlike "History" and "Literature," admit of being adequately handled within

* "The Problems of Philosophy." By the Hon. Bertrand Russell.—"Climate and Weather." By H. N. Dickson.—"The History of England." By A. F. Pollard.—"Landmarks in French Literature." By G. F. Strachey.—"Anthropology." By R. R. Marett.—"Canada." By A. G. Bradley.—"The School." By J. J. Finlay.—"Rome." By W. Warde-Fowler.—"Architecture." By W. R. Lethaby.—"Peoples and Problems of India." By Sir T. W. Holderness. 1s. net each, Cloth; 2s. 6d. Leather. (Williams & Norgate.)

even a brief space, and the present volumes seem to contain just what an ordinary man might well have the desire and the ability to understand, while, as throughout this admirable series, there is appended to each of them a short Bibliography in which those who are specially interested in each subject will find just the guide they need to further and fuller study.

T. E. PAGE.

Novel Notes.

HECTOR GRAEME. By Evelyn Brentwood. 6s. (John Lane.)

There are two unrealities in this story. One is the abrupt change in the character of the hero's wife from a modest, lovable girl to a "full-busted, dyed haired, and loud-voiced" society lady, who smokes cigarettes and flirts ostentatiously. This is supposed to be the result of her husband's misconduct with a pretty nurse, and that misconduct is again shot upon the reader without any warning. Graeme's behaviour to Stara drives her to suicide, and he is haunted by her, although this does not seem to affect his military skill, for he leads the British forces to a signal victory over the German Army. The book is a dark study in the psychology of a proud, bad-tempered, brave soldier, and in military tactics. India, South Africa, and then Germany enable Graeme to show that underneath his brusque and made-up exterior there lies a real spark of military genius. Miss Brentwood lets the eccentricities of her hero explode in melodrama towards the end, and she is better in episodes than in the delineation of character. But the study of Graeme's aberrations is managed with considerable ability, one proof of which is that the reader is compelled to admire his qualities, even when they are overlaid with detestable features of insolence and self-will.

THE COWARD. By Robert Hugh Benson 6s. net. (Hutchinson & Co.)

It cannot be a pleasant book—a study of physical cowardice in an otherwise lovable and decent boy; but it is here, a book of some force, with many claims of scene and of character. "The Coward" is the story of Valentine Medd, second son of an honourable house, in whose annals physical courage was a matter of course, an unquestioned quality, meaning much more in truth to the members of the Medd family than any other quality; and Valentine Medd, a boy of sixteen, when first we see him, did not possess it. Lack of courage in man or boy spells tragedy, but in the tragedy of Valentine Medd the author seems to us to have resorted to unjustifiable tests of his young "hero's" bravery. At the beginning we find Valentine making excuses to himself for not riding next morning a horse that bucked and threw him that afternoon. But straight from this small shock we find him going to Switzerland with his impeccable elder brother, and climbing the Matterhorn with a party of friends. At an extremely dangerous and difficult jump this untrained boy of sixteen loses his head and refuses the attempt. Back at the hotel every one of the fine, old-crusted, very British party, admirable people though they are, talk in strained, solemn sentences of the shameful episode. Commonsense and humanity would have saved them much pain and greatly helped the boy. Again, when in Italy, Val has impulsively smacked the face of a man (not in itself a cowardly thing to do), who has insulted a girl, he is faced with a duel, to be fought with rapiers; and he funks it. It is all very dreadful, of course, and every normal Briton loves courage and hates cowardice, but the tests were extreme; the manner in which the conventionally high-bred Medd family treat this nervous boy is inhuman and foolish. With agony of mind Valentine faces the facts of his own lack of nerve, of the loss of love and respect; he feels his father's contempt and shame, his mother's grief, his sweetheart's estrangement. But he has his exalted moments, and we feel throughout the book that common-sense on their part might have saved him. A Roman Catholic priest understands the boy better than do any of the others, but he is an ineffectual character in the book. The author could have made a better case with more usual tests; but his story grips, and his coward wins our sympathies.

THE CHARWOMAN'S DAUGHTER. By James Stephens. 3s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

The story of Mary Makebelieve, the charwoman's daughter of Dublin, of her adventures with the prodigious policeman whose moustache bristled like wire and seemed as though it ought to crackle, and the young clerk whose hunger was his chiefest virtue (as indeed it is the virtue of all heroic men) these provide matter for an epic in 200 unflinchingly amusing pages. Mr. Stephens is already known as a poet of quite extraordinary talent, and as one of the most notable of the young Irish writers, and he shows in "The Charwoman's Daughter" that he possesses a pretty fancy and a sly, confident humour which bespeaks our attention through all his divagations and apostrophes. And the air of great romance which runs all through "The Charwoman's Daughter" is combined with so much shrewd observation and originality that we are entertained and delighted in a most magical manner by the veracious record of simple happenings. Sometimes only the writing of the book is a little too conscious for the true simplicity of perfect narrative; but this fault is rare, and for the most part Mr. Stephens' style is naive and pleasant, as befits the character of the story. Very often, too, it is exquisite in its imagery and in its delicious wise playing with facts in an atmosphere of poetry. The prodigious policeman, Mrs. Makebelieve, and the Cafferty family, are all wondrous and real; and Mary herself is presented with an understanding and imaginativeness that makes her a beautiful and charming memory.

BEGGARS AND SORNERS. By Allan McAulay. 6s. (John Lane.)

"Beggars and Sorners" is a story of 1750, and the scene is laid in Amsterdam, of which city many delicate impressions are given in the course of the book. Here are gathered many of those whose part in the '45 has made them outlaws, still conspirators in the cause of the Stuarts, bitter and unhappy in their exile. Through the book runs the strain of sadness that belongs inevitably to a record of intrigue and failure; but there is a pleasant and wholesome love-story which subdues the atmosphere of distrust into a picturesque setting to the tale. Where many stories of Jacobite hopes and fears have failed, through being either sentimental or affected, "Beggars and Sorners" is so free both from affectation and insincere emotion as to be entirely successful. It is, in fact, a sober and charming piece of work, full of thought and quiet, sure knowledge. When Helen Murray, a young and vivacious Scots lady, comes to Amsterdam for distraction after a severe illness, she finds at the house of her host, Emilius Six, a very mixed company of Jacobite beggars and spongers. Her experiences, which are both pleasant and unpleasant, include torture, espionage and an interview with the Pretender; and they come to an end, as far as this book is concerned, with her marriage to Emilius. We follow them all with pleasant and seldom-wavering interest; and Allan McAulay is sincerely to be congratulated upon her unusual standards, in this kind of story, of consistency and restraint.

YELLOW MEN AND GOLD. By Gouverneur Morris. 2s. net. (Nash.)

Lovers of the sensational will do well to obtain a copy of "Yellow Men and Gold," for it contains many dramatic moments and some peculiarly horrific details. It is a tale of treasure-seeking—a theme which usually fascinates—and Mr. Gouverneur Morris has certainly lost none of the opportunities he so skilfully makes for himself. Readers of fiction of this type do not usually expect much originality, but the author has given us a hero of quite a new kind. James Parrish, a week-knood American literary man, has come almost to the end of his resources, and starvation seems to stare him in the face, when Fortune puts wealth in his way in the form of a chart of the whereabouts of some sunken Spanish treasure. It is not necessary to give any of the details of a very breathless and bloodthirsty story, which eventuates in the acquisition by Parrish of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. The reader may be assured that Mr. Gouveneur Morris does this sort of thing very well indeed, and not many people are capable of enough self-control to spread the reading of such a story as this over more than one sitting.

THE HEALER. By Robert Herrick. 6s. (The Macmillan Company.)

All lovers of good, well-written novels should be grateful to Mr. Robert Herrick for his latest story, which bears the unmistakable stamp of careful and thoughtful writing. Briefly, the story is of a young doctor who entertains so deep a reverence for his profession that he becomes disgusted at the commercialism of modern medical practice and retreats to the wilds of Canada, there to earn for himself the title of "The Healer." He is called in to attend a girl who, while holiday-making in the district, has suffered concussion of the brain through diving on to a rock. He deems necessary a very critical operation, but is met with the uncompromising opposition of the girl's conventional mother. Eventually, however, the operation is undertaken at the girl's own request and is successfully accomplished. The Healer nurses his patient back to health and in the process falls in love with her. The marriage takes place, and the remainder of the story is occupied with the familiar episode of the incompatibility of two temperaments. The husband whom the woman really required, as her own mother had said, was "the good, plain, ordinary, sensible business man, who leaves the house with his newspaper after breakfast and comes back at night from his work, tired out and ready to be fed and amused." By a strange chain of circumstances, however, she won for her prosaic self an Idealist. The story is rather drawn out, but the sin is atoned for by the admirable descriptive power which Mr. Herrick has displayed, and by the many passages of fine English prose with which he has adorned his book.

MARIE. By H. Rider Haggard. 6s. (Cassell.)

In these thrilling pages Allan Quatermain, hero of heroes, tells the story of his first love and of the wonderful feats he was able to perform with the help of a gallant mare and a hair-triggered rifle. Once Mr. Rider Haggard begins, adventures spring up thick and fast, and these new chapters in Allan's autobiography are crowded with a variety of amazing experiences worthy alike of hero and author. The moment which Marie and Allan choose for plighting their troth is typical of other moments in this breathless story. Besieged in a blazing farm by a blood-maddened horde of Kaffirs and expecting every moment to be their last, the love which has hitherto been locked in their hearts wells up to their lips and the fateful words are spoken. Rescued in the nick of time, they realize that their path of true love is not fated to be a smooth one. Marie's father, old Marais, the Boer owner of the farm, has sworn on the Book before God that never with his will shall his daughter marry an Englishman. Moreover, he has pledged her hand to a wealthy cousin, whose subsequent villainies overshadow, if possible, those of the Zulu chief, Dingaan. Nothing could be more enthralling than the account of Allan's experiences with Dingaan in the Great Kraal, or among the vultures on the Hill of Death. Three times does Allan save Marie's life, but in the end Marie gives her life for his. The device by which the last sacrifice is effected has the true Rider Haggard touch, which may emphatically be said of every chapter in this excellent, all-absorbing novel.

FIRE IN STUBBLE. By Baroness Orczy. 6s. (Methuen.)

We always look forward to a dramatic story when we open a book by Baroness Orczy, and we always get what we want. Many a story has been written round about the Great Rebellion, and has told how loyal men died for King Charles I. "Fire in Stubble" shows the reaction from chivalry and loyalty, to meanness, roguery and profligacy in the reign of Charles II. Earl Stowmaries of Maries Castle England, was betrothed when seven years old, under unusual circumstances, to Rose Marie, the two-year-old daughter of a Paris tailor. When the girl is eighteen the tailor sends a reminder to the English Earl, and the English Earl, who is leading his own life of dissipation and gallantries, is desperate in his desire to be freed from the fetters. The story tells of the iniquitous plot, schemed by Stowmaries and his friends, to deceive and betray the innocent French girl. Michael Kestyon, an impoverished cousin of the Earl, and in truth a "pretender" to the Earldom, sells his honour for money, and undertakes the bit of villainy. He is to impersonate the Earl, ratify the early vows and carry off the bride "and thus for ever after leave on her fair maiden name a stain which would render her unfit to be acknowledged as the wife of any honourable gentleman." The plot is partly carried out, but fails before completion, not, however, in time to prevent bitter suffering to the two chiefly concerned in it—the false bridegroom and the injured bride. The authoress weaves her tale deftly, and cleverly reconstructs the period. The affairs of historic personages mingle with the affairs of the main characters in the story, and dramatic scene follows dramatic scene. We shall not be surprised to meet "Fire in Stubble" again, shifted from the covers of a book to the boards of the theatre.

POMANDER WALK. By Louis N. Parker. 6s. (John Lane.)

In the year 1805, we are told, Pomander Walk was a quaint little Chuswick crescent comprising six very small red-brick houses, facing due south, with a beautiful view across the river. "You might have thought the houses were meant to be inhabited by very small dukes, so stately were they in their tiny way." Such is the scene of this diverting story, and the characters appear and disappear with theatrical effect, now at the windows, now at the doors of the six little houses, or they meet on the lawn under the shade of the great elm-tree, or pair off in the convenient Gazebo, a shelter formed by a boxwood hedge. It is a tremendously entertaining little community that Mr. Parker introduces to our notice. Indeed, there is scarcely a page that does not provoke a smile, and more than a smile, whether we are watching Sempronius, Mrs. Poskett's yellow haired Persian cat, stalking Sir Peter Antrobis's thrush, or Mrs. Poskett herself stalking the inveterate bachelor, Sir Peter; or the Eyesore "catching" fish; or Miss Barbara Pennymint teaching her profane but eloquent parrot to give courage to her hesitating lover. The winding up of the story is of the stage, stagey, and we suspect the author of getting rather tired of manipulating his characters before the final "curtain," for the chronicle of their entries and exits degenerates almost into bald stage directions. Nevertheless, "Pomander Walk" makes an excellent "wholly detached" extravaganza with an old-world atmosphere all its own, and a sparkling vein of humour which should ensure for it a large popularity.

The Bookman's Table.

BEHIND THE RANGES. By F. G. Aflalo. 10s. 6d net. (Martin Secker.)

From such an experienced traveller and writer as Mr. Aflalo we expect an interesting book, and here we are by no means disappointed. We are taken on a magic carpet, hither, thither, over land and many seas; we have strange men and places vividly presented to us, and we often must regret that our acquaintance with them cannot be prolonged. Yet this is the regret that lies in travel. We may greet the rose, obeying Heine, and he would have been the first to tell us of the sad corruption in the rose's heart—or is it in the heart of him who travels to the rose? In this extremely fascinating book we have a quality which some may hold up as extremely reprehensible: we travel from the mundane to the heavenly. But the questions of behaviour in a train, the luggage on a steamer, and mosquitoes, can be of the utmost service if they are discussed as on these pages; while in "Rivers Running to their Goal" we have a chapter not unworthy of the best traditions of the "Quarterly Review," where most of it appeared. At this time of the year it is most pleasant to go down with Mr. Allalo to his various bathing places; most of all do we disport ourselves (in spirit) at the Doctor's Cove, Jamaica. When he talks of Russian ladies who dispense with costumes—so that there is no mixed bathing at Batoum—he does not seem to have been at some other of the Black Sea ports, for instance, at Odessa, where the ladies, whose pavilion is adjacent to the men's, array themselves—as do the foreign men—in costumes, for they often have to be towed back by fellow-bathers when the currents sweep them from their own immediate waters. As for bathing in the surf we recommend the other side of Mexico—the sharks but rarely make invasions—and for all the pleasure that Mr. Allalo has given us we will make him at least one valuable present, and that is of the most delicious bathe we ever had. It was at Tarragona, about seven o'clock; the night had fallen, but the undulating water of the Mediterranean was warm and playful; underneath was sand, and in the distance was the voice of a guitar. The moon had also laid a strip of super-royal carpet on the sea.

JUDGMENTS IN VACATION. By His Honour Judge Parry 7s 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Judge Parry's literary preferences are admirable. But his affection for Oliver Goldsmith and Charles Lamb might have saved him from the facile sneer and the epithet of contempt to which in these pages, particularly where critics and publishers are alluded to, he is a trifle too prone. Perhaps it is the style that is to blame. Perhaps the delicate nuance of his humour escapes us occasionally. When he is most severe, on the surface, he may be merely writing in a Pickwickian (or a Shavian) sense. Unless, however, these explanations serve, or he is acting on the principle of "What I have said, I have said," the modern form of the old tag littera scripta manet, it might have been well had the author allowed certain of these "judgments" to remain in the files of the publications in which they originally appeared. Incidentally he will puzzle those whose memories of the drama are not exact. On one page he tells us of "the brain-workers" who wrote "the only Shakespearean play of modern times"—"What the Butler Saw." He goes on to describe a dream in which Shakespeare patted him on the shoulder and remarked, "I couldn't have done it better myself." Which strikes us as a little unkind to Mr. Frederick Mouillot. But we are grateful for the inclusion in this book of the paper on Dorothy Osborne, which appeared so long ago as 1886. It was this paper, Judge Parry reminds us, which led to his receiving from Mrs. Longe her copies of the original letters and her notes upon them, whereby the full edition was at length published. "A Day of My Life in the County Court" is full of good things, the raw material of contemporary life. The chapters on "The Debtor of To-day" and "The Insolvent Poor" are (as to length) slight but (as to content) serious and weighty contributions to the study of a grave phase of our social system. Other noteworthy sections of the volume treat of "The Folk-Lore of the County Court"; "The Future of the County Court," as "a growing and popular tribunal" if freed from the shackles of the imprisonment for debt abuse; and "An Elizabethan Recorder"—William Fleetwood, Recorder of London from 1571 to 1591.

Queen Victoria.

From the drawing by Drummond, 1842.

From "The Early Court of Queen Victoria," by Clare Jerrold. (Eveleigh Nash.)

THE EARLY COURT OF QUEEN VICTORIA. By Clare Jerrold. With 17 Portraits. 15s. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

One very grateful feature of Mrs. Jerrold's new book, "The Early Court of Queen Victoria," is its very welcome absence of gush. Most authors of the day who discourse on Royal persons—more particularly women-writers and leader-writers—have so little self-respect, and so slight a notion of what "loyalty" means to a sensible person, that the attitude they adopt towards "the first magistrate of the land" to quote Johnson's phrase—could not be more abject and contemptible if the monarch, instead of being a constitutional sovereign, were a Muscovite autocrat, a Prussian king ruling by divine right, or a Japanese mikado heaven-descended. Mrs. Jerrold wisely refrains from exuding this sort of flunkeyism and sycophancy in her account of the early reign of King George's august grandmother. Recognising that Victoria was, after all, a normal and fallible woman, "subject to like passions as we are," and that at her death her name and fame passed into history, and must therefore submit to the historian's verdict, she depicts her in the most candid and human guise possible. The young Queen is shown cold and hard to the mother who, until her daughter's accession to the throne, never left her for ten minutes to herself. We observe her friendly and confiding to her Prime Minister, Melbourne, a man whose condonation of his wife's adultery ought surely to have precluded him from taking over the practical guardianship of a queen in her 'teens. While, in the famous "Bedchamber Squabble," and again in that terrible affair of Lady Flora Hastings, we see her as the true granddaughter of King George III., eager to get her own way, prompt to assert herself, and even obstinate in persisting in an ungracious and ungenerous blunder. Mrs. Jerrold's is a carefully written and well-informed book.

ONÉ: A PLAY IN FOUR ACTS. By Neän. 3s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

Neän belongs to the school of Maeterlinck, Fiona Macleod and the earlier Yeats. The sub-title of his play, "The Aureole and the Wondrous Gem," proclaims him a mystic of the mystics. The fact that one of the scenes is laid in a Swiss hotel, and that one of the characters is a Swiss waiter, confirms the impression. Any artist may write a play of the supernatural, selecting a world entirely unlike ours for his theme. Only a true believer would mingle the ordinary and the wonderful in this way. The motto, "Joy alone maketh Immortal," gives the key to the meaning of the play. "Salvation through joy" is its message. Cynthus, the hero, who curiously is not mentioned in the list of characters, is overcome with sorrow for the simultaneous loss of both his parents in Switzerland. He goes to Scotland to live with his uncle, the Lord Angus of Lar, and his wife the Lady Margaret. There he meets Oné, the wonder-child, whom, in fulfilment of a family legend, they have found in the ancient castle on the Bugle Rock, and brought up as their own. It is Oné who redeems Cynthus. To tell more of the story would not be fair to Neän. But "salvation through joy," again, the joy of service to man and beast, is its burden. A distinct humanitarian purpose is evident, though not obtruded. Whether this play would act well it is difficult to say. The plot is slight, and in reading one is helped enormously by the elaborate stage directions. But to read it is extremely interesting as typical of a certain trend of modern thought. Neän appears to be one of those who, having rejected older dogma, have erected for themselves a system far more elaborate than any mediæval hierarchy. Theosophy, spiritualism, esoteric Buddhism, humanitarianism are some of their panaceas for the ills of life. They have often expressed themselves in poetry, and it is very interesting to find them in the more material realms of drama. There is much the uninitiated must lose in "Oné," but its vague charm, the quality which for want of a better term we call "Celtic," is appreciable by all.

Notes on New Books.

MR. HAM-SMITH.

Mrs. L. M. Brigstocke has written Love's Artist (6s.) "to exonerate her sex from a theory, which seems to have been lately brought forward, that most women have a more feeble perception of what is honourable or dishonourable than men." The character who serves to demonstrate this theory is Denise Vernon, the daughter of Sir Nigel Vernon, and afterwards Lady Geoffrey Carlton. We are permitted to trace Denise's career from childhood to death, but we must confess that Mrs. Brigstocke has not captivated us with her narrative. A great deal, too, of the dialogue is very unnatural. Children of ten and twelve and fourteen years, however precocious, do not talk as Mrs. Brigstocke would have them talk. A child of fourteen does not speak of his sister, aged ten, as a "shocking Malaprop" nor would a young wife observe to her husband that she thinks he wants her to talk nonsense, "the sort of half-foolish, yet clever nonsense that certain modern authors, who shall be nameless, put into the mouths of their characters." Would any young wife in intimate conversation with her husband refuse to name "certain modern authors"? We are not complaining because Mrs. Brigstocke has failed to satisfy our curiosity; we merely quote it as an example of the unreality of the dialogue in Love's Artist. Mrs. Brigstocke takes herself very seriously, and her book is not slipshod. We are inclined to think that if she applied herself to the writing of a good story and not to the elaborating of a rather uninteresting theory, she could write a book which would secure a warm welcome.

MR. JOHN LONG.

The Last Stronghold, by Ellen Ada Smith (6s.), is a capital story, neatly constructed and ably told, in which we meet an uncommonly interesting set of people. It opens well, with a touch of mystery that rouses our curiosity at once. We gather that the heroine, Lucy Kaye, has had some great trouble in her past which has made her indifferent to everything and everybody. She comes suddenly into a comfortable fortune, left to her by an uncle; £1500 a year, and a fine old house richly furnished. She receives the news placidly, turns the house into a rest home for workers who have broken down, provides all the money needed to carry the scheme out, and goes to live in a lodge inside the gates of her grounds. The people she meets at this rest home interest her but slightly, though they are immensely interesting to those who read the book. One evening a stranger arrives, and the mystery (in which, we discover, a violin and an undiscovered deception have played a big part) deepens. At length Lucy is driven to confide in a great friend, who shows her a way out of her difficulty, and helps her to gain peace of mind and happiness once more. The interest is well sustained, and "The Last Stronghold" is an altogether enjoyable and entertaining book.

MESSRS. MURRAY & EVENDEN.

In Riquilda (6s.), Mrs. Kendall Park has hit upon a fresh scene and period for the setting of an historical novel. The heroine of the book—who supplies it with its title—is the daughter of Count Borrell, the ruler of Barcelona in the latter part of the tenth century. The love interest centred around Riquilda is the weakest portion of the book, but, on the whole, it is a moving and dramatic story, and one upon which the author may be warmly congratulated. The accounts of the fighting between Catalans and Moors are admirable.

MR. FRANCIS GRIFFITHS.

Perhaps Mr. Frank Burnett's strongest claim to attention is that he has enjoyed a great deal more experience of his subject Through Polynesia and Papua (12s. 6d. net) than is usually accounted adequate by the exponent of the "travel book." He has, that is to say, spent a considerable time in the South Seas, more particularly in regions such as the Solomon Islands, where the white man's influence is still a comparatively feeble thing. Even though he never rises to any great heights of descriptive writing, or displays any marked originality in his discussion of places, people, or customs, he yet provides us with alluring glimpses of a part of the world that doubtless holds some of the few secrets that are for naturalists and explorers to discover. It is impossible to discuss Mr. Burnett's book without alluding to his very strong dislike of missionaries, against whom he brings a long list of charges, some of them serious, but discussion of the rights and wrongs of this matter must be left to those who know. Another outstanding feature is an extensive gallery of photographs, not always particularly relevant to the text, which is sprinkled throughout with presentments of "woodland nymphs," "water nymphs," "belles," and "beauties," who are apparently immune from the ill effects of draughts.

MESSRS. W. RIDER & SONS, LTD.

To a world already glutted with its own sorrows and discords Mr. Elliott O'Donnell has presented a volume of horrors from the unseen world, for on opening his Byways of Ghostland (3s. 6d. net), we are introduced into a realm of gruesome and fantastic shapes. We are willing to find a "fearful joy" by the fireside in company with a book of fictitious ghost-stories; but tales of "phantasms of the dead, with skinless faces and glassy eyes," vampires, were-wolves and fox-women, presented as actual happenings, and related with a garniture of that dubious thing "occult science," are a little too much for our sense of proportion. The author fairly revels in horrors, as in his opening chapter, "The Unknown Brain," in which he sets out a highly-wrought account of a man who being pronounced dead by an incompetent physician, was all but buried alive. This would be quite ghastly enough for the appetite of the ordinary reader (or writer), but it is not enough for our author. And, accordingly the story is made lurid and horrible by a vivid description of the sufferings of the victim, whose natural pangs, while conscious in his ceremonies, were heightened by the presence of the "grey inscrutable eyes" of occult beings—creatures of the vampire type which haunt burial grounds for sinister purposes of their own. We do not find these creatures any more credible even under the name of "superphysical cerebrums," which is the quaint and picturesque title under which they appear. We pass on to accounts of haunted furniture, spooks with "yellow, ichorous eyes—gleaming, devilish eyes"; woodland demons—"tree devils," "blue dogs without heads"; death warnings and family ghosts, amulets, "occult inhabitants of the seas and rivers," and other "intangible, pulpy things that breathed the spirit of the Great Unknown." With due reservations in favour of the sane and normal side of psychical research, we prefer a book of fictitious ghost stories frankly presented as such.

Evidence of Appreciation !

Let it not be lacking in your home. Show your appreciation for Shakespeare, for Dickens, for Scott, for Thackeray, by suitably housing their masterpieces. Take good care of your books. Be hospitable ! Get a which provides luxurious and fitting accommodation for your book treasures. The Globe Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase is superb in itself and agreeably lends itself to artistic treatment. It is built of units (see illustration below) and can be arranged to suit the convenience of the room (see illustration above). One notable feature of a Globe-Wernicke Bookcase is that it can be purchased and built by degrees. If you only possess one hundred books, you need not buy shelf accommodation for 500. As your book possessions increase you can further extend the bookcase—vertically or horizontally. You need never, at any time, have too much accommodation (which means unsightly empty shelves), or too little accommodation (which means overflowing untidiness). At every stage in its growth a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase is complete—it looks so and it is so. The "Unit" idea reaches its highest perfection in the Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcases, which combine economy with efficiency, a pleasing, indeed superb appearance with unrivalled utility. If there be virtue in caring for one's books, then indeed, the Globe Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase provides an illustration of the great truth that virtue is made easy by circumstance.

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcase

Free Explanatory Catalogue 18B free from

The Globe-Wernicke Co. 44 Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.,

82 Victoria St., S.W. ;

98 Bishopsgate, E.C.

WARD, LOCK & Co.'s NEW FICTION.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH. At all Libraries & Booksellers.

THE PIONEER.

Harold Bindloss.

"There is a straightforward vigor about the tale; it is a plain, human, open-air romance of the healthiest kind."—Morning Leader.

THE RIVER OF UNREST.

Bertram Mitford.

Although Mr. Mitford has written some thirty novels, this has been pronounced by one or two prominent critics to be his best.

FOR THE QUEEN.

E. Phillips Oppenheim.

"Mr. Oppenheim ranges with assured mastery from grave to gay, while diplomatic scandals and political intrigues are woven with that delicate skill which we expect from him as a sort of right."—The Scotsman.

PRINCESS KATHARINE.

Katharine Tynan.

"The picture of the mother is both just and gentle, and the Irish background is delightful. One seems actually to feel the soft dampness and greenness of the country."—The Athenæum.

The MYSTERY of the RAVENSPURS.

Fred M. White.

"The story moves quickly and carries the reader on from crisis to crisis with great success."—The Spectator.

CHRISTINA.

L. G. Moberly.

"It is a pretty, simply told tale, which will delight this popular author's many readers."—Daily Telegraph.

IN LOVE'S LAND.

Effie A. Rowlands.

"From the start the reader's attention is held with a steady grip, and few can forego the pleasure of knowing how it all ends and reading on to the last page."—Irish Independent.

THE TRIANGLE.

Marie Connor Leighton.

"'The Triangle' shows this writer at her best. The plot is wonderful in its ingenuity, even for her, mistress as she is of such intricacies."—The Sportsman.

A DAUGHTER of the BUSH.

Ambrose Pratt.

"There is a fine breezy spirit of open-air chivalry about the book which makes it enjoyable to read as an interesting matter-of-fact romance."—The Scotsman.

A BLIND LEAD.

Lawrence L. Lynch.

A fine detective story by the author of "Shadowed by Three," and other detective novels.

GOD AND MAMMON. (3/6)

Joseph Hocking.

"Mr. Joseph Hocking has written many notable novels, 'with a purpose,' but nothing finer than 'God and Mammon.'"—North Devon Journal.

WARD, LOCK & CO., Ltd., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

GAY & HANCOCK'S LIST.

THE WORLD'S FAVOURITE POET.

POEMS BY

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

The only Complete and Authorised Editions.

Poems of Passion.	Poems of Progress.
Poems of Pleasure.	Maurine.
Poems of Power.	Three Women.
Poems of Cheer.	Kingdom of Love.
Poems of Sentiment.	Poems of Experience.
Yesterdays.

1s. net each in limp white cloth. 2s. 6d. net each in limp lambskin. 3s. 6d. net each in velvet calf. Postage 2d.

DOUBLE VOLS., handsomely bound, can be seen at your Booksellers'.

A remarkable Book, receiving general praise, having a large sale.

SIX BAD
HUSBANDS. SIX UNHAPPY
WIVES.

The above is one important chapter out of thirty five in the volume, and is specially recommended in the notice below.

A New Volume of Prose Essays.

ARE YOU ALIVE?

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Crown 8vo, cloth. 4s. 6d. net. Postage, 4d. A companion volume to "New Thought Common Sense," and just as stirring.

Methodist Times January 4, 1912. "This is essentially a book for women, and she has some very straight and striking things to say to them. . . . Mrs. Wilcox is old-fashioned enough to believe that there is nothing in all the world so wonderful or so beautiful as love. The series of sketches entitled 'Six Bad Husbands' and 'Six Unhappy Wives' ought to be circulated widely in tract form. The book as a whole is an excellent tonic. . . . She strikes the optimistic note throughout, and her book ought to do a lot of good to a lot of people."

GAY & HANCOCK, LTD.,

London: 12 & 13, Henrietta St., W.C.

Edinburgh: 34, North Bridge.

BLACKIE'S BEAUTIFUL ENGLAND

A New Series of Artistic Colour Books.

Fullscap 4to, bound in boards, with coloured panel; each volume containing 12 full-page illustrations in colour.

Price 2s. each net; also bound in levant grained leather or smooth lambskin, 3s. 6d. each net.

A new topographical series dealing with the famous beauty spots of England. The object of this series is not so much to provide a guide-book, as a bright, chatty description of the various localities, which shall teach the reader what he should see and appreciate. The illustrations are by Mr. E. W. Haslehurst, and the text has been written in each case by authors thoroughly conversant with the localities.

Volumes Ready:

OXFORD	By F. D. How
THE ENGLISH LAKES	By A. G. Bradley
CANTERBURY	By Canon Danks
SHAKESPEARE-LAND	By Walter Jerrold
THE THAMES	By G. E. Milton
WINDSOR CASTLE	By Edward Thomas
CAMBRIDGE	By N. Barwell
NORWICH AND THE BROADS	By Walter Jerrold
THE HEART OF WESSEX	By Sidney Heath
THE PEAK DISTRICT	By R. Murray Gilchrist
THE CORNISH RIVIERA	By Sidney Heath
DICKENS-LAND	By J. A. Nicklin
WINCHESTER	By Sidney Heath
THE ISLE OF WIGHT	By Edward Thomas
CHESTER AND THE DEE	By Charles Edwards
YORK	By George Benson

Other Volumes in Preparation.

N.B.—These books contain beautiful reproductions of pictures specially painted for the Series, and not collections of illustrations used in previous publications.

Beautiful Coloured Prospectus Post Free on application.

BLACKIE & SON, Ltd., 50, Old Bailey, LONDON, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING SUPPLEMENT

From Vasari's Lives of the Painters
(Macmillan & Co. Warner)

PALLAS AND THE CENTAUR AFTER SANDRO BOTTICELLI
(Royal Academy of Arts, London)

LIVES OF THE MOST EMINENT PAINTERS, SCULPTORS AND ARCHITECTS.

By GIORGIO VASARI. Newly translated by GASTON DE VILLI. With 100 Illustrations in Colour and 400 in Monochrome Collotype. 10 Vols. £15 net per volume (Macmillan and Philip Lee Warner.)

Giorgio Vasari was the first and greatest critic of Italian painting, and whilst the work of many of those who succeeded him has been discredited and destroyed by later research, the monoclasm of modern criticism have only confirmed and strengthened his authority. There have been various translations of Vasari that have either been able but unsatisfactory paraphrases or pedantic colourless renderings that have preserved neither the humour nor spirit of the original. M. de Vere's translation in these handsome volumes speaking of it so far as it goes in the opening volume is a careful, literal word for word turning into English of Vasari's text which preserves the structure and harmony of his sentences in order to convey some sense of the colour and movement of his style, and so the more accurately reproduce the manner and individuality of his writing, an appreciation of which counts for so much in arriving at a full understanding of it. All Vasari's Prefaces and Introductions, except that on technique are given, and there is an adequate index. A number of rare and unique works are included among the illustrations, which are reproduced with all that exquisite and artistic workmanship for which the Medici Society is famous. The first volume is now ready, and three other volumes will be published in the course of the year.

From Winchester (Blackie).

WINCHESTER COLLEGE.

A QUEEN'S KNIGHT.

By MILDRED CARNEGIE. With 12 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Mills & Boon.)

The field of historic romance has been well exploited by the maker of monographs during recent years, and, often enough, the most insignificant figure has been accorded the honours of full and detailed biography. Nevertheless, the right hand of good welcome should be extended to Miss Mildred Carnegie's new volume, for Count Axel de Fersen has not achieved the fame in this country which his career would seem to justify. He was born in 1756, of Swedish parents; and we catch our first glimpse of him as a handsome youth of eighteen, making his début at the French Court and melting the heart of Marie Antoinette. And, though Fersen's sagacity and comeliness carried him into many and varied spheres of service both in France, his adopted home, and abroad, his chivalrous devotion to the Queen was ever the dominant passion of his life. Miss Carnegie has given us a very sincere and sympathetic study of a true knight; and, although the murder of Fersen inevitably casts a gloom over the concluding chapter, her volume makes exceedingly pleasant reading, and may be unreservedly commended to all who desire some vivid pictures of France immediately before and during the Revolution.

THE WORLD OF BEWILDERMENT.

By JOHN TRAVERS. 6s. (Duckworth.)

It is always a matter of regret to a reviewer to come across a book in which descriptive power of unusual merit is handicapped by conventionality of subject. And it will generally be granted, we think, that it would tax genius to impart novelty to the well-worn properties of the Anglo-Indian drama as played by two husbands and two wives. Certainly Mr. Travers has not succeeded in interesting us profoundly in the phillandering of Jack Grant and Vere Stevenson; the former reminding us irresistibly of Bayes's hero in the "Rehearsal," who discussed with himself the contending claims of Love and Honour, even in the act of pulling on his boots. Mr. Travers's chief claim to originality as regards his plot, and it is one in these days to make for distinction, is that he makes his hero ultimately decide for Honour, and the siren of Sunla is triumphantly vanquished by the British Matron. The story ends in a somewhat minor key, and poor Nancy Grant's "enchanted dreamland, far, far away from the World of Bewilderment" still falls far short of the enchanted realm of romance. The strongest pages in the book are those describing Indian life and scenery; but the dialogue, too, is often excellent, with a realism that is apt to blind the reader to its excellence by its quiet unobtrusive art.

WILLIAM BLAKE, MYSTIC.

By ADELINE M. BUTTERWORTH. 15s. net. (Liverpool: Liverpool Booksellers' Co. London: Simpkin, Marshall.)

In this very beautifully-produced volume Miss Adeline Butterworth makes an admirable study of Blake's mysticism, as it reveals itself in his life, his poems, and his work as painter and engraver; but more especially (for the subject is too large to be covered in one long essay) as it is expressed in the wonderful series of drawings that he made for Young's "Night Thoughts." Forty-two of the plates and pages that Blake designed and engraved for that once popular didactic poem are here for the first time reproduced, and in a series of notes that supplement her essay Miss Butterworth explains their allegorical and inner significance. We are not among those eager worshippers of Blake who write as if he never took up his pencil in uninspired hours; there are spirits and flying angels in some of his pictures that no fear of being considered Philistines can induce us to see are not more gross and heavily fleshly than such ethereal essences ought to be; but we entirely share Miss Butterworth's admiration of these engravings for the "Night Thoughts," for the easy sense of lightness and motion conveyed in the figures, for the insight and large suggestion that underlies and informs them all. Even where, as too often happens, the great figures of Time and Death, or those of the human or spiritual creatures, are anatomically deformed and bad, the thought that fills the picture, the grandeur or beauty of the whole conception overwhelms such flaws of detail and renders them unimportant. The frontispiece is an exquisite reproduction of the well-known "Death Door" from Blair's poem, "The Grave." There is infinitely more of poetry, of imagination, of spiritual vision in this and the other engravings that Blake did for "The Grave" than Blair ever got into his lines, or was conscious of in his dreamings. Perhaps one does not quite realise how great Blake was, how high and daring his imagination, what a flight it soared beyond the capacities of the men whose books he illustrated, till one has read those books, and has moreover seen in other illustrations what other artists made of them. A study of the engravings from the first two "Nights" of Young makes us hope that somebody may be moved to issue the complete set of designs, and in the interval makes us grateful to Miss Butterworth for the sympathy and ability with which she has here introduced the student to them, and to her publishers for the care and artistic skill with which they have produced this book.

From A Queen's Knight: the Life of Count Axel de Fersen (Mills & Boon).

TRIANON.

From London South of the Thames (Black).

INTERIOR OF THE HALL OF ELTHAM PALACE
 (From an engraving published in 1804).

LONDON SOUTH OF THE THAMES.

By SIR WALTER BESANT. With 16 Full-page Plates, 112 Illustrations in the Text, and 3 Maps. 3os. net. (Black.)

This magnificent book brings to a close Sir Walter Besant's great survey of London, which is now complete in ten uniform volumes. It is unnecessary now to say anything of the historical importance of Sir Walter Besant's scheme, and it would be quite impossible to exaggerate it. "London South of the Thames"—like London North—is a topographical volume, and it contains notes upon every street or building of the slightest importance within the area of control of the London County Council. The illustrations are almost equally exhaustive, and publishers and editors may be congratulated upon a picture of the London of the beginning of the twentieth century as complete as is humanly possible.

LOVE IN A SNARE:

A Present-day Romance. By CHARLES GARVICE. 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

It is almost unnecessary for us to dwell upon the work of Mr. Charles Garvice, who is unquestionably one of the most popular—if not the most popular—authors of the day. In "Love in a Snare" all the characteristics which have endeared him to so wide a public are well to the fore, and the plot has the further advantage of being partially set in surroundings upon which Mr. Garvice has seldom written. Primarily, of course, the book is a love story, but the plot—which is remarkably well constructed—is strong and dramatic. His newest volume, in fact, is quite up to the level of its author's best work and is one that is well worth reading.

From Chats on Old Jewellery MEDIEVAL JEWELLERY.
(Unwin)

MASTERPIECES OF HANDICRAFT SERIES.

Edited by T. L. HARE. Each volume containing 16 plates, 8 being in colour, 1s. 6d. net each. (Jack.)

To Messrs. Jack's many useful and convenient series of cheap but reliable books is now added the "Masterpieces of Handicraft," which gives promise of being one of the most popular. The first six volumes of the new issue all come from the attractive pen of Mr. Egan Mew, and are entitled as follows: "Old Bow China," "Old Chinese Porcelain," "Royal Sevic China," "Japanese Porcelain," "Dresden China (Meissen Porcelain)," and "Chelsea and Chelsea Derby China." It is worth mentioning that neither old Bow china nor Dresden china have ever previously been treated in separate volumes in English. The books are of the format which the publishers have made so well known in the "Masterpieces in Colour" series, and they are exceedingly well illustrated in colour and black and white.

From Benvenuto Cellini THE SALT CELLAR OF FRANCIS I (Methuen) (Imperial Treasury, Vienna).

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

By ROBERT H. HOWARD, C. L. M. A. With 12 Illustrations
2s. 6d. net. (Methuen)

Mr. Howard Cust's short volume on "Benvenuto Cellini" — the latest addition to the Little Book on Art Series — is admirably adapted to the requirements of the public which demands such brief, business-like, and accurate studies of the great artists. It would seem a difficult matter adequately to cover all the space which so versatile an artist as Benvenuto Cellini demands in something less than 200 small pages, but the author undoubtedly succeeds in giving the reader a vivid picture of his hero together with a considerable amount of sound criticism. The illustrations to the volume are numerous and well-chosen.

From Dresden China (Jack). DOMESTIC PIECES.

From Japanese Porcelain (Jack).

A COURTIER AND A SAGE.

COLOMBINE : A FANTASY, AND OTHER VERSES.

By REGINALD ARKELL. With some Drawings by Frederick Carter. 2s. 6d. net. (Benn & Crown.)

There are some of the quaintest and freshest things we have read for a long while in this little book of Mr. Reginald Arkell's. His opening fantasy, "Colombine," is a whimsical, dainty dream-comedy, written partly in tricky, irregular verse and partly in prose. Two old countrymen are gossiping in the twilight just before quitting work and setting out to walk home, and from doubting the authenticity of the story of Pandora's box they come to doubt the existence of faeries, and are startled by the quiet arrival of Colombine. She sees them, and as soon as they recover from their fright and can talk to her, she tells them there is to be a fight thereabouts that night—Harlequin and Pierrot are coming to fight each other for the love of her. But when they arrive it seems they have been infected by the modern spirit and think fighting is out of date, and that the only sensible way is to submit their claims to arbitration. One of the old men goes home, the other lingers and is appointed to arbitrate between them, much to Colombine's disappointment, and the one who wins his case is the one who cannot plead or make any promises or utter his love at all. It is very gracefully and charmingly done, and the finish, when the old man goes and, after the others are departed, comes back with another old man, each of them carrying a lantern, and looking round and seeing nobody there is half uncertain whether he had not dreamt it all, gives just the right lanciful suggestion of unreality to the whole episode. The other poems in the volume—some score of them—are alive with the same fantastic humour and dainty, butterfly sentiment, and with an occasional swift, elusive note of pathos, as at the close of "A Letter from Home," or in "Love, Laughter, and After," and in "Memoranda." Mr. Arkell has been influenced, perhaps, by such poets as Ernest Dowson and Lionel Johnson, but his work has individuality and is full of promise that we shall look to see him fulfil. Mr. Frederick Carter's drawings are excellent and done in the very mood and spirit of the poem they illustrate.

From Through Greece and Dalmatia (Black).

From Cities seen in East and West
(Hurst & Blackett)

THE GOLDEN MOSQUE
(CITY OF LIONS).

CITIES SEEN IN EAST AND WEST.

By MRS WALTER TIBBITS With numerous Illustrations 16s net. (Hutchinson)

Mrs. Walter Tibbits is one of those rare travellers who can write a record of places she has visited and things she has seen that is not merely a dead catalogue of names and mechanical register of events, but an imaginatively realised recollection of all her personal experiences by the way. When she describes the picture takes on colour and life, and grows vivid enough to be seen by the inward eye of the reader. This account of her travels in Paris, on the Riviera, in India, and in Kashmir, is one of the most interesting and most charmingly written books of its kind that we have read for a long time. Mrs Tibbits has a happy touch in sketching a character, she not only describes a city, but tells you all about the lives and habits and customs of its people. Incidentally, she would seem, whilst among the religious mystics in the Himalayas, to have penetrated to those sacred mysteries of Hinduism which are hitherto supposed to have been kept strictly secret against intruding inquirers from the Western world. The many photographic illustrations add much to the value and interest of the volume.

PORTRAIT (REPRODUCED FROM A MINIATURE BY G. I. PENNY).

From Cover of The Malabar Magician
(Chatto & Windus).

TWO OLD WOMEN OF PORT BLANC: LIZE BELLEC AND HER SISTER, GAUD.

From The Night of Fires (Chapman & Hall).

THE MALABAR MAGICIAN.

By F E PENNY 6s (Chatto & Windus)

Mrs Penny is, of course, widely known as one of our leading writers upon Indian life, and her latest novel once again excellently displays her skill in depicting the Oriental character. "The Malabar Magician" is not, perhaps, its author's chef d'œuvre, but it is eminently readable. The book consists principally of a series of incidents in the life of Lawrence Hillary, "who comes and goes like the rain," an Inspector of Police in a district on the west coast of South India. It was fortunate for the hero that he attracted to his side so powerful a helper as the Malabar Magician, to whom, indeed, little seems impossible. The book will afford the reader plenty of excitement, but its principal value lies in the vivid series of Indian types which it presents.

THE NEW CHINA:

A Traveller's Impressions. By HENRI BOREL. Translated from the Dutch by C. Thieme. With 48 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

Mr. Borel's extremely interesting and suggestive book is meant, he tells us, "more as an artistic than as a scientific work." His chief object is to avail himself of "the poet's right to give a chain of personal and subjective impressions and to describe how I felt the tragic death of ancient beauty, overpowered by all that is ugly and vulgar in modern things. . . . But I also hope to describe how after sadness for this grievous death came consolation and confidence." The introduction of a Western gloss upon the ancient civilization of China was a thing which could hardly have been performed without the sacrifice of some of the beauty and quaintness of the old order of things. No doubt it is incongruous that railway, telegraph, and telephone lines should cross the ramparts of Peking, but the Chinese themselves see no more in it than incongruity; to them it is not a crime. "The first thing China wants," writes a ten-year-old boy quoted by the author, "is instruction. It must start with that. Then China will become the first empire of the world." Mr. Borel is a keen observer and many of his chapters have a delicately humorous touch. His book which is admirably translated and illustrated challenges the reader's attention.

From The New China (Unwin).

STÜPA IN THE YELLOW TEMPLE, HUANG SSU

From The Charm of Venice
(Chatto & Windus).

THE COURT OF THE PALACE
OF THE DOGES.

THE CHARM OF VENICE.

An Anthology compiled by ALFRED H. HYATT. Illustrated 5s. net. (Chatto & Windus)

This is a new edition to which have been added twelve illustrations after the water-colour drawings of Mr. Harold Sund. They enhance the charm of a book of varied charm. Indeed, there is so much charm, such richness of appreciation in prose and song, by authors old and new, that it would prove somewhat cloying if taken as a whole. But taken piecemeal and judiciously it is delectable. Of those who here pay tribute to the charms of Venice in many lights and moods are great figures of English, Continental, and American literature; also some who if not great are none the less ardent. To the winter-bound Londoner they seem as folk who are chanting and chatting about wonderland, or at any rate a haunt on a different plane from ours.

THE CONFLICT.

A Novel. By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS. 6s. (Appleton.)

The conflict is political, with the workmen's Socialist party and the united Republicans and Democrats for opponents; and it is personal. Jane Hastings, the rich man's daughter, Victor Dorn, the workmen's leader, Selma Gordon, the enthusiastic Socialist, David Hull, the self-deceiving "reform" politician, and Dr. Charlton, the scientist, are all involved in both campaigns. The late Mr. David Graham Phillips was a pitiless critic of American politics and social conditions, and "The Conflict" is a terrific indictment of corruption and general wickedness in the government of an

From Omens and Superstitions of Southern India (Unwin).

MALAYAN EXORCIST.

American city. The party bosses do not refrain from murder to defeat the Socialists, if Mr. Phillips is accurate, and judges and police are as venal as they are brutal. The moderate "reformers" are merely contemptible, while the Socialists (Marxian to a man - and woman) alone are high minded, honest, and decent alike in public and private life.

"The Conflict" is to be read as a study of American politics by an American, and it is eminently readable.

GREAT LOVE STORIES OF THE THEATRE.

By CHARLES W. COLLINS. Illustrated. (Werner Laurie.)

There is little of greatness about the majority of these stories, though they are all famous in their way. Romance is sometimes far to seek, but most of the heroines and some of the heroes, French and English, raise difficult or curious psychological problems. Nell Gwyn, Elizabeth Barry, Anne Bracegirdle, Adrienne Lecouvreur, Margaret Woffington, Mlle Georges, Dora Jordan, and Marie Dorval, are amongst the "dear, dead women." Mr. Collins has made liberal use of memoirs and stage records for the purpose of his presentation, trying throughout to give us historical narrative rather than romance. The result is a series of expressive stories and human documents, the tragedy, disillusion, or venality relieved occasionally by comedy or irony.

NEW ZEALAND: THE COUNTRY AND THE PEOPLE.

By MAX HERZ, M.D. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

This is a translation made by the author from the German original. There is a liberal share of history, geography, geology, etc., some of which we could spare, and a section on Maori art of which we would fain have more. Of the cities and the scenic attractions we are told in detail, which is sometimes picturesque and certainly appealing to the imagination. On administration, internal policy, the work of Seddon, and other things, the author has decided opinions. He is critical of New Zealand labour policy and of everything in which he feels that he detects a socialistic trend. About the New Zealanders generally he writes with interest rather than enthusiasm, aiming to be candid and comprehensive, and giving at least an honest surface study.

From New Zealand (Laurie).

MAORI ART: CARVINGS AND WALL DECORATION.

SCENTED ISLES AND CORAL GARDENS.

By C. D. MACKELLAR. Illustrated. 15s net.
(John Murray.)

Mr. Mackellar has wandered very far and wide over this earth, and explored many strange places. He is an observant and thoughtful traveller, full of human sympathy, and an amiable writer. Hence this book, which consists chiefly of old descriptive letters concerning life in the Torres Straits, in German New Guinea and the Dutch East Indies, brought up to date by useful notes, is excellent reading for young and old. Mr. Mackellar has much to say that is interesting concerning missionaries (to whom he is conspicuously fair), the disappearance of native races before the advance of the white man's "civilization," and the question of British or German supremacy in the East Indies. There are many entertaining sketches and anecdotes in these letters, as well as much valuable information, but a map of the journey taken, or at least of the East Indies, would have added to the reader's comfort, and its absence is to be regretted. All travel books need maps. It is cheerful to know that at Cooktown, in the Chinese Joss House, Mr. Mackellar found "enthroned in the place of honour above what we would call the altar, amidst golden dragons and the like—Randolph Caldecott's coloured hunting sketches from The Graphic!"

BIG GAME HUNTING IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

By JAMES DUNBAR BRUNTON, M.D. F.Z.S. Illustrated. 12s 6d net. (Melrose.)

Dr. Dunbar-Brunton's attractive volume is designed on eminently practical lines. The author presents the reader with full details as to equipment, hints on rifles, health, camp life, and bushcraft, and he even includes a short vocabulary of useful words in the Chinyanja, Swahili, and Chibemba languages. The remainder which is also the bulk of the book is devoted to the habits and customs of the various fauna, the best way to hunt them, the whole leavened with hunting-stories from the writer's own experience. Central Africa is an attractive country, and it seems to be without the climatic drawbacks of other portions of that continent. "It is," says the author, "a simple and primitive life the sportsman leads under these conditions" (camp life in the Bush), "a life so absolutely healthy that it brings out the best in the man, physically and mentally. In this country, having an elevation of 5000 to 6000 feet, there is no debilitating heat to contend with, the cool breezes blowing by day and the temperature falling so much at night during the winter season as to necessitate a liberal supply of blankets." The book is likely to prove of much use to the prospective traveller or big-game hunter.

From Scented Isles and Coral Gardens (Murray).

PREPARING RICE, TERNATE.
(Photo, Kerry, Sydney.)

THE HUNTING YEAR.

By WILLIAM SCARTH DIXON. With 8 illustrations from old prints. 6s. net. (Ham-Smith.)

Mr. Dixon is justly known as one of the first authorities

From On the Backwaters of the Nile (Unwin).

A SHAM FIGHT IN PATIKO.

From Big Game Hunting in Central Africa (Melrose)

BUFFALO BULL
(Photo, E. G. M. Leyer.)

upon hunting, and a new volume from his pen is assured of its reception by an appreciative section of the reading public. In "The Hunting Year" the author demonstrates very conclusively that the interest of hunting is not confined to "the madness of the gallop, forty minutes on the grass," but that "each month, each day brings round to the hunt servants its own peculiar duties, and the man who interests himself in the work of the moment as it comes round, not only has a fuller and deeper enjoyment of the good things of the season, but he comes in for fewer of the disappointments which are attendant on every hunting season." The author writes in a most attractive manner, and whether he is describing an Evening in July, November's Joys, April Glories, or a June Festivity, he is always very

From The Hunting Year (Ham-Smith).

From Big Game Hunting in Central Africa (Melrose).

LARGE BULL ELAND AND TWO GUN CARRIERS.
(Photo, F. H. Melland.)

readable. "The Hunting Year" should do much towards the achievement of the objects which the author has at heart.

MURPHY.

A Message to Dog-Lovers. By MAJOR GAMBIER-PARRY. With two Drawings by the Author. 3s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Nobody but a dog-lover could have written "Murphy," and every dog-lover

THE FOX

(From a painting by C. Hancock. Engraved by R. Parr.)

will make a welcome addition of it to his books about dogs. The charm of the narrative lies in its simplicity; it is an attractive, sympathetic study of a dog's character, and a reticent record of his master's sorrow on losing him. There is a suggestive, reverent chapter on the possibility of an animal possessing a soul that survives death.

From Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan (by the Baroness Albert d'Aethan, which Messrs. Stanley Paul will publish shortly).

APRIL: THE CHERRY BLOSSOM.
From Professor Conder's "Floral Art of Japan."

From Murphy: A Message to Dog Lovers (Smith, Elder).

Hi do,
by Jim

THE ARCTIC PRAIRIES:

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON Illustrated. 12s 6d net. (Constable & Co.)

A book like this of Mr. Ernest Thompson Seton enables us to realise all that we have lost in reducing the unknown to known reality. To-day only the Arctic plains and prairies are left to us. In this wonderland Mr. Seton and his friend Mr. Preble saw the sunlight on white plains and cliffs and headlands and the coming of spring to great ice-bound streams. It is a delightful record, and, unlike most books of travel in this, that we have no elaborate details of the shooting of wild creatures as though they were not, every one of them, Nature's children and had not cost almost as great a price in the making as did human-kind. Mr. Seton describes instead how he felt guilty after having killed a lynx with his gun, and he adds that it was the only time he used a gun on the journey. He penetrated as far as the Caribou country and describes its rivers and sunsets, its flowers and wild animals with great vividness, for he is an observer of the devout and reverent breed which gave us White and Jeffries and Alexander Wilson. For instance he tells how on the night of their return the travellers heard the partridge drumming; he says: "What a glorious sound of woods and life triumphant it seemed; and why did he drum at night? Simply because he had more joy than the short fall day gave him time to express."

From The Arctic Prairies (Constable).

SPORT IN VAN- COUVER & NEW- FOUNDLAND.

By Sir JOHN ROGERS, K.C.M.G., D.S.O., F.R.G.S. With 8 Illustrations and 4 Maps by the Author, and 27 Reproductions from Photographs. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

First and foremost, Sir John Rogers is a very keen sportsman, and in this attractively produced book he tells of his experiences on two autumn holidays in America. The Vancouver expedition was made by the author primarily for the fishing. "From the day," he says, "I read in the Field Sir Richard Musgrave's article, 'A seventy-pound salmon with rod and line,' and located the river as the Campbell River, I determined that should an opportunity arise, I, too, would try my luck in those waters." Nor did the Campbell River disappoint Sir John. Certainly he himself did not catch a seventy-pound salmon, but he saw one caught which was close on that weight; his own heaviest was a sixty-pounder—"the biggest but least sporting fish I had killed that month"—and in addition a fairly large number of fish weighing between forty and sixty pounds were his victims. Leaving the salmon, the author succeeded, in an arduous and unlucky trip, in obtaining a 13-point head of wapiti, and he finished his Vancouver trip with a Rocky Mountain goat on the mainland. Newfoundland brought Sir John more trophies, but an easier time. The book is thoroughly readable, and it is one that should be of the utmost interest and value to those sportsmen who can afford the time to make a trip to two countries which are comparatively little exploited.

THE LYNX.

[From The Complete Bowler (Black). BRETON PEASANTS PLAYING BOWLS AT MORGAT, NEAR BREST.
(After a photograph by Mr. Lachlan Taylor, Leigh-on-Sea.)

THE COMPLETE BOWLER:

Being the History and Practice of the Ancient and Royal Game of Bowls. By JAMES A. MANSON ("JACK HIGH"). With 14 Full-page Illustrations and 8 Diagrams in the Text. 3s. 6d. net. (Black)

Mr. Manson tells us in his preface that he has been playing bowls since 1869, which in itself is surely a recommendation for the game. It is, in fact an old man's game just as much as a young one's, and though we must confess that we ourselves have never found it particularly fascinating, we have thoroughly enjoyed reading Mr. Manson's book, which is divided into two sections—History and Practice. In the former the author details the origins of the game and includes, not only the famous Drake story, but also the accounts of it in Evelyn, Pepys, Swift, and other famous writers. It is worth while to notice that the history is brought down to as far as an account of the international matches of 1911. In the second half of the book the author appears in the rôle of teacher, and imparts much—obviously expert—advice. The book impresses us as excellent in every way—simply expressed, exhaustive, and readable.

From Sport in Vancouver and Newfoundland (Chapman & Hall).

ATHLETIC TRAINING FOR GIRLS.

Compiled and Edited by C. E. THOMAS. With 36 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. (Pitman)

Among the many books of sporting and athletic instruction which are published from year to year but few are designed especially for the use of girls. Mr. C. E. Thomas's excellent book, therefore, should meet with considerable success. The editor has himself written the greater part of the volume, but in certain special cases he has gone to outside contributors, who are experts on their subject. Thus Miss Annie Hillyard writes on gymnastics, Miss B. H. Grieve on net-ball, Miss Mabel E. Stringer on golf, Mr. M. J. G. Ritchie on lawn-tennis, and an anonymous gentleman on fencing; while, in addition, Mr. Thomas has had the assistance of Miss E. R. Clarke, a prominent player, both in the chapter on hockey and throughout the rest of the book. The author's intention has obviously been to make his book as practical and as easy to understand as possible, and in this he has certainly succeeded. The book may be strongly recommended to girls and to all interested in their athletic training.

From Athletic Training for Girls (Pitman).

DOUBLE SCULLING—ENDING FOR A START.

THE NATIONAL LIBRARY OF SPORTS AND PASTIMES:

Athletics. By E. H. RYLE —
Hockey. By ERIC H. GREEN and EUSTACE E. WHITE
With 32 illustrations. 2s
net each. (Nash.)

Messrs. E. E. White and E. H. Ryle, the joint editors of "The National Library of Sports and Pastimes," may be congratulated on the excellent beginning that the series makes in the two volumes above mentioned. The aim of the series appears to be utilitarian—the books being designed to fill the place of tutor rather than historian—and in this respect both the volumes are of equal value. Mr. Ryle, in his book on Athletics, devotes a chapter to all the principal events in a meeting, and the value of the book is considerably enhanced by a number of contributions from famous athletes on their own specialties. Mr. P. J. Baker, for instance, writes on the Mile; Mr. C. H. Porter and Mr. K. Powell on Cross Country Running and Hurdle Racing, respectively; Mr. H. A. Leeke on Putting the Weight and Throwing the Hammer; Mr. W. E. B. Henderson on Throwing the Discus; Mr. E. E. Leader on High Jumping, and Mr. S. S. Abrahams on Long Jumping. The clearness of the various instructions is a marked feature of the book, which also contains thirty two magnificent photographs. The illustrations to "Hockey" are possibly less effective, but they are no less instructive, for though the game is not a difficult one there is more in it than the mere spectator may imagine. Messrs. Green and White, for instance, classify no fewer than fourteen different kinds of strokes, of nearly all of which constant use is made. Every position on the field is adequately dealt with (we may again note the clarity of the authors' instructions), and there are chapters on Ladies' Hockey, Hockey for Schools, How to Umpire, and Hockey on the Ice.

FINLAND: THE LAND OF A THOUSAND LAKES.

By ERNEST YOUNG With 32 Illustrations 7s 6d net
(Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Ernest Young tells us that on his first visit to Finland he "constantly felt the need of some book of general information that would clear up many puzzling points connected with the history and customs of the people. How were the thousands of lakes that one meets with everywhere formed? What was the origin of the curious ridges that are so marked a feature of the landscape? Who was Duke Carl, the central figure in one of Edelfelt's pictures, and why is he pulling the beard of the dead man in his coffin? Who built the castles, and why? What did the men do in whose honour one finds that public statues have been erected?" And so Mr. Young's book on Finland is not a series of travel impressions or experiences, but a general handbook and introduction to the country. Clearly there was need of such a work as this dealing with a country so little visited as Finland. Of guide books there are none, and works of travel on the whole do not meet with the visitor's requirements. We have, therefore, no

From Athletics (Nash).

From Sport in Vancouver and Newfoundland (Chapman & Hall).

From Finland: the Land of a Thousand Lakes (Chapman & Hall).

CHURCH BOATS.

ST. CLEMENT'S
IN THE STRAND

From London—Artists' Sketch Book Series (Black).

thanking the author for the labour he has expended in an excellent cause. In eighteen very readable chapters he gives us an exceedingly comprehensive and well-balanced account of Finland, its people and institutions, its history, art, and government; the whole having been revised and corrected by Madame Arno Malmberg, the secretary for Finland of the Anglo-Finnish Society.

THE LABOUR UNREST:

What it is and What it Portends. By FRED HENDERSON. 2s. 6d. net. (Jarrold.)

Here is a book from the pen of a distinguished Labour leader and Socialist, which comes very opportunely at the present time. Mr. Henderson writes of present-day tendencies without bitterness or exaggeration, and the lesson that he draws from them—though doubtless it will be unpalatable to some sections of the community—seems to us to be obviously and unanswerably true. "However obvious the signs of impending change may be, they must, before they can be seen for what they are, break through that absolute reliance upon the stability of the existing order which limits each generation in the interpretation of current events. The signs seem obvious and unmistakable to us in later generations, not only because we see them in the full light of their realisation in history, but because we have become accustomed to the changed outlooks and institutions." The railway strike, says Mr. Henderson, was one unmistakable sign, and no doubt the present coal strike is another one even more unmistakable. If you take any interest in the signs of the times you will read "The Labour Unrest."

LONDON: A SKETCH BOOK; EDINBURGH: A SKETCH BOOK.

By LESTER G. HORNBY. 24 Illustrations in each Volume. 1s. net each. (Black.)

Messrs. A. & C. Black are famous for their books on art, and the announcement of a new series from their house is tantamount to a guarantee of excellence. No book-buyer will be disappointed by their latest venture. The Artist's Sketch Book Series makes a very delightful beginning with two charming little volumes by Mr. L. G. Hornby on London and Edinburgh—each containing a series of effective little sketches, in which the artist shows a sympathetic sense of atmosphere and no little technical skill. We like both volumes so well that we cannot say which we like best.

MORE BALLADS IN BLUE.

By EX-POLICE CONSTABLE GEORGE H. MITCHELL. 2s. 6d. net. (Jarrold.)

Some little while ago Mr. G. H. Mitchell published a collection of poems that he called "Ballads in Blue," and they met with a very favourable, even a rather sensational, reception. At that date Mr. Mitchell was a member of the police force. He has since entered the ministry, but in the preface and in one of the poems in his new volume, "More Ballads in Blue," he sufficiently indicates that he has not forgotten his former comrades nor lost any of his interest in them. He divides his book into Epistles, Miscellaneous, Serious, Personal, Love Songs, and Epitaphs and In Memoriam. The best of his verses are those in the "Serious" section, and amongst these the poems that touch on religion are the more satisfactory. Always Mr. Mitchell is most effective when he is handling the homeliest themes; he handles them with a plain simplicity, a fervour and earnestness of feeling that in such verse is more to the purpose than any fine technical finish or lapidary cunning in the setting of jewelled words. Those who welcomed Mr. Mitchell's first poems so heartily will, we are sure, give an equally hearty welcome to these "More Ballads in Blue."

From William Morris (Jack).

KELMSCOTT HOUSE, HAMMERSMITH, 1897.

CANTERBURY.

By G. R. STIRLING TAYLOR
Illustrated by Katharine Kimball
4s. 6d. net and 5s. 6d. net (Dent)

Very efficiently does Mr. G. R. Stirling Taylor sustain the high standard of the "Medieval Town Series" in the excellent little volume on Canterbury which has just been published.

From Canterbury (Dent)

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL

THE LAND OF THE LORDS MARCHERS.

By E. ELLIOT STOCK With 36 pen and ink sketches (from the Author's Photographs) by H. M. Wilson and R. C. Armour (also a route map) 5s. net. (Ouseley)

The "Lesser Known Britain" series makes an excellent start with Mr. Elliot Stock's very readable volume of travel impressions in Monmouth, Brecknock, and Herefordshire. The author's route took him from Newport, through Aber-gavenny to Hay, whence he returned southward to Chepstow

From Canterbury (Dent)

NORMAN TOWER,
CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

The story of one of the most romantic and interesting of English towns lends itself particularly well to treatment of the kind with which the many readers of Mr. Dent's series have grown familiar. It is possible that the author adds nothing to our knowledge of the town, but he has contrived to compress into a comparatively small space a very large amount of history not easily accessible previously. Some topographical notes and a number of attractive illustrations add considerably to the usefulness of the volume.

BLAKE
23 HERCULES ROAD
SA

From Famous London Houses (Dent).

A new book by A. St. John Adcock. Illustrated by Frederick Adcock to be published this month.

From The Life of the Right Rev. Ernest Roland Wilberforce
(Smith, Elder).

THE PALACE, CHICHESTER
(Photo, Marsh & Son, Chichester.)

and Caerwent by Dore and Raglan. This portion of England is undeservedly neglected by the ordinary tourist, but it abounds in beautiful scenery and possesses many historical associations. The author is well suited by his subject, and his book is in every way attractive. A further volume of the series, entitled "Beyond Hadrian's Wall" is promised for publication shortly.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT REVEREND ERNEST ROLAND WILBERFORCE,

First Bishop of Newcastle-on-Tyne and Afterwards Bishop of Chichester. By J. B. ATLAY, M.A., F.S.A. With 4 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Mr. J. B. Atlay's well-written and workmanlike biography of Bishop Wilberforce deserves, and will doubtless attain, a high place among clerical memoirs. The name of its subject is inseparably associated with the Bishop of Newcastle's fund, and, at a later date, with the Commission on Ecclesiastical Disorders in the diocese of Chichester. Throughout his life, however, his sincerity and transparent honesty won for him sympathy and friendship among all classes. In the words of the late Archbishop of Armagh, he was "surely touched with the beauty of holiness." His life is at once helpful and of the deepest interest, and Mr. Atlay may be warmly congratulated on the attractive manner in which it is set forth in his pages.

THE CHARTERHOUSE OF LONDON.

By W. F. TAYLOR. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

Mr. Taylor's is a book which will appeal not only to public-school boys, but to all interested in the history of London. Originally a Carthusian monastery, then the palace of Tudor and Elizabethan nobles, and finally a charity and school, the Charterhouse has had a sufficiently varied history, and a work of the kind that Mr. Taylor has written—thorough and exhaustive without being ultra-elaborate—should arouse a wide demand. Great names have always been connected with the Charterhouse, and in the region of literature alone its distinguished pupils include Addison, Steele, John Wesley, Grote, Thirlwell, and Thackeray. We can assure prospective readers that they will find plenty to interest them in these pages. A series of excellent illustrations from photographs forms a special feature of the volume.

From The Charterhouse of London (Dent).

From York (Blackie)

YORK MINSTER.

BYWAYS IN BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGY.

By WALTER JOHNSON, F.G.S. With 90 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Cambridge University Press.)

Mr. Walter Johnson's highly interesting and important work consists of a series of essays principally upon ecclesiastical archæology, and bound together by the author's insistence upon a "principle, which, in a former work, I ventured to call folk-memory. This folk-memory—unconsciously, for the most part, but sometimes with open ceremony—keeps alive those popular beliefs and practices which are individually called survivals." The first two chapters of the volume are devoted to Churches on Pagan Sites, and they are followed by others upon the Secular Uses of the Church Fabric, the Orientation of Churches, the Orientation of Graves, Survivals in Burial Customs, the Folk-Lore of the Cardinal Points, the Churchyard Yew, the Cult of the Horse, and "The Labour'd Ox." The book appeals more particularly to archæologists, but the general reading public will find in it much material of great and curious interest.

MARGARET OF FRANCE,

Duchess of Savoy, 1523-74. A Biography by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With photogravure Frontispiece, and 16 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net (John Lane.)

Miss Winifred Stephens has taken very great pains to tell us all that can be told concerning Margaret of France, the wife of Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, and has not laboured in vain. Not only is the life story of a very remarkable woman set out in plain and honest fashion—easily readable by all who will—but the French literary movements of the time receive attention, and there is a good account of that bad business, the duel between Jarnac and La Chataigneraie, and the no less discreditable case of Françoise v. Lemours. Margaret, Duchess of Savoy, was a product of the

From Byways in British Archæology (Cambridge University Press).

CHANCEL OF LYMINGE
CHURCH, KENT.
(Photo Mr. Edward Yates.)

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1912

Renaissance, when "in well nigh every department of life, from the schoolroom, where boys and girls studied together, even to the battlefield whereon men and women fought side by side as comrades-in-arms, the sexes worked in double harness." Her learning was not exceptional for the time, it is rather Margaret's wise statesmanship that is conspicuous. When the Duke lay ill, and "the Duke's ministers completely lost their heads, Margaret alone, in the midst of her terrible anxiety, retained her habitual calm. She presided over the Council; she arranged for the future government of the State in the event of her husband's death." The Duke recovered, and Margaret's efforts were put out to win toleration for their Waldensian subjects. Emanuel Philibert had indeed written that "persecution never did anything save create martyrs," but it is the influence of his wife that ends the hopeless campaign of extermination, and gives the Waldenses peace. There are many excellent portraits in this book and several useful appendices.

REMBRANDT'S ETCHINGS:

An Essay and a Catalogue, with some Notes on the Drawings.
By ARTHUR M. HIND. With 34 Plates Illustrating the Drawings and a Complete Series of Reproductions (330) of the Etchings. In 2 Vols. 21s. net. (Methuen)

The publication of a complete series of reproductions of Rembrandt's etchings is a task at once honourable and difficult, and Messrs. Methuen, together with their engravers and printers, must be very warmly congratulated upon the second volume of this work, which is wholly composed of the etchings. The first volume of the work is introduced with a few short critical chapters and a biographical summary, followed by a bibliography and a chronological catalogue of the etchings compiled by the author the fruit of what must have been years of patient work. It would be difficult to over-estimate the value of this book to artists and collectors alike.

From Margaret of France (Lane).

NATURE IN ITALIAN ART:

A Study of Landscape Backgrounds from Giotto to Tintoretto. By EMMA GURNEY SALTER, M.A. With 49 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Black.)

Miss Salter's purpose in this admirably reasoned and very well written volume is to show how carefully the great Italian masters of painting considered the landscape of their backgrounds. "The distinctive merits," she says, "of the treatment of Nature by the mediæval and Renaissance painters of Italy has for the most part been considered as merely accessory to their figure-subjects; its distinctive merits have been insufficiently appreciated." Nevertheless, it is clear to Miss Salter that "there existed from the thirteenth century an attempt to study Nature for her own sake, tracing the development of landscape from the summary conventions of Giotto and his followers to its magnificent culmination in the Venetian school." The volume contains a large number of excellent reproductions from the Italian masters.

From Rembrandt's Etchings (Methuen).

LIEVEN WILLEMSZ VAN COPPENOL, WRITING MASTER: THE LARGER PLATE
18

RUBY HEART OF KISHGAR.

By ARTHUR W. MARCHMONT. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

A jewel with a past—such is the ruby heart of Kishgar, every facet of which, we are told, has cost a life. Stolen from its temple when Russia was busy looting the province of Kishgar, the anniversary of the day of sacrilege is regularly marked by the death of a member of the secret society which is pledged to recover the missing stone. At the time the story opens, the ruby is supposed to be lodged in the safe of a house in Park Lane, the temporary abode of the royal Saxenhof household. We say "supposed" for throughout this tantalizing tale things are by no means what they seem. To begin with, the beautiful Lady Manforth has deftly substituted a replica for the real stone in order to win a wager, then, before she can replace it, her husband in a fit of jealous rage destroys the ruby, but a subsequent examination of the residue of the destroyed stone proves unmistakably that it was not the genuine ruby after all; nor does it help matters when Lord Manforth discovers the actual stone he took from his wife, for it turns out to be paste, and not the genuine ruby. Who has the ruby? Again and again in a series of kaleidoscopic situations, Mr. Marchmont succeeds in baffling and mystifying us to a mortifying extent, false trail follows hot upon false trail, and our eyes are continually being opened only to find that they are still half closed. The happy result is that all who begin "The Ruby Heart of Kishgar" will certainly read breathlessly on to the very last page, and even then, we predict, few will be able to lay the flattering unction "I thought as much!" to their sleepless souls.

THE UNHOLY ESTATE.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

The "Unholy Estate" is the loveless marriage, and Mr. Sladen has written this novel avowedly

From Nature in Italian Art (Black).

PORTRAIT OF CHARLES D'AMBOISE
by Solario (Louvre, Paris).

From William the Silent,
by Jack Collings Squire, which Messrs. Methuen will publish.

"WILLIAM THE SILENT."
(From a portrait by Mierevelt in the Reyks Museum).

to protest against the unequal divorce laws that set a man free from an unfaithful wife but will not release a wife from an unfaithful husband unless he has also deserted or been actively cruel to her. The story is a little slow in getting started, but once it is under way it goes briskly with no lack of incident and sensational developments. However much one may sympathize with Nancy, one must but realize that she brought her troubles upon herself by marrying a man she did not love instead of the man she did but this takes nothing from the strength and significance of her story, which opens in Wales, passes over to Egypt where she accompanies her husband whose regiment is quartered there and ends in England, after she has found a road out of her unhappiness and is married to the man she should have married at first. There are some vivid pictures of life in Cairo and some sketches of religious life in revivalist circles in Wales but the Rev. John Ingleby is not to be accepted as at all fairly representative of the Evangelical clergy. Mr. Sladen has subserviated everything to the forcing home of his problem, and he makes Ingleby too rascally a hypocrite in order to drive it home with a sledge hammer. The story is interesting, it would have been better if in some respects it had been rather more reticent, but it is ably and vigorously done and pretty sure to provoke discussion.

THE KING'S KISS.

An Historical Romance. By LOUISE M. STACPOOLE KENNY. 6s. (Digby, Long.)

Miss Stacpoole Kenny introduces us in her latest novel to many famous and exalted personages of the France of the middle seventeenth century.

From An Injured Queen
by Lewis Melville, which Messrs
Hutchinson will publish shortly.

THE RT. HON. LADY CHARLOTTE
CAMPBELL—AFTER HOPPNER.

The heroine, Anne Marquise de Saint-Armand, tells the story of the embrace which she was forced to receive from "le roi soleil" as the price of a kinsman's life. That kiss cost her the love of her husband for a long time, and many are the trials and humiliations through which she has to pass before she regains it. Two other love stories complicate matters and heighten the reader's interest. Miss Kenny's spirited and romantic story is effectively worked out, and it should have a considerable success.

From Charlotte Sophie, Countess Bentinck (Hutchinson).

LADY MILNES—
AFTER COSWAY

THE LADY OF BEAUTY (AGNES SOREL).

By FRANK HAMEL. With 16 Illustrations. 15s. net.
(Chapman & Hall.)

The "Lady of Beauty" was the nickname, doubly earned, of Agnes Sorel, the beloved of Charles VII. of France, and the first maitresse en titre of the French Court. As mistress of the Château of Beauté, which was presented to her by Charles, she was clearly entitled to her nickname, and the illustrations to the present volume permit the reader to gain some idea of the justice of the more obvious translation of the appellation. Historians differ considerably as to the real influence of Agnes upon Charles; they differ even in their interpretations of her character. Miss Hamel, however, has few doubts, and her presentation of her heroine is entirely—and with much justification—rose-coloured. The book, which is written in its author's most attractive manner, introduces the reader to a comparatively little-known period of French history, and it is altogether worthy of the appreciative reception which it will doubtless receive.

Frontispiece from Mary, Queen of Scots (The People's Books) (Jack).

SONGS FOR MUSIC.

By FRED. E. WEATHERLY. (37, Woburn Square, W.C.)

There is always a welcome for a volume of songs from the pen of this favourite writer. To turn the pages of this latest collection is to be struck constantly by the versatility of the author as regards style and theme, and at the same time by his strong personality as regards the music of his words and the charm of his effects. Here, for instance, we find the now old-fashioned ballad-song of sentiment, the tuneful song of the "Christmas Fairy" who came down to the little sick child; then we pass to a stronger style in "The City Gates," a song of youth and love—as two young men marching in the morning, as pilgrims glad of peace at evening. We are charmed too with the slight ruggedness in the simple song "All That I Have," with its felicitous effect of silver and gold and broideries and song and love. There are humour, pathos, mystery, strength and simplicity in these "Songs"; and they tell of sea, of land, of city, of garden, of love, of life, of death. It is a treasure-trove for composers in search of words.

NAPOLEON AND KING MURAT.

By ALBERT ESPITALIER. Translated from the French by I. Lewis May. With frontispiece and 16 illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

This translation of M. Espitalier's biography— "compiled from hitherto unknown and unpublished documents"—will be very acceptable to the student and to the general reader. Murat was a great leader of cavalry; as King of Naples he was contemptible. The notion that Murat was a pioneer of Italian unity, a forerunner of Cavour and Garibaldi, a champion of national independence, has, perhaps, long been exploded. But if the idea still finds supporters, M. Espitalier's work will hardly leave any room for doubt. The vanity of Murat, his restless ambition, and his utter incompetency as a political ruler—in striking contrast this to his conspicuous ability as a soldier—all these things have been told, and here they are tabled with pitiless accuracy. Excuses may be urged for Murat's conduct. Napoleon was setting up kings on all sides, was himself unmistakably an Emperor, and a greater monarch than his crowned

From Napoleon and King Murat
(Lane).

PAULINE BONAPARTE.

contemporaries. Why should not Joachim Murat, Marshal of France, be a king not only in name but in reality, since his old commander, General Buonaparte, was so veritably an Emperor? From the first he chafed at his impotency at Naples, and fretted to be a royal personage in the eyes of Europe, fearing the Emperor's displeasure, and yet ever seeking to get rid of his overlordship. Murat's ambitions for a kingdom of Italy toppled him off his throne. Had his loyalty to Napoleon endured, the result might have been different—who can say? Certain it is that Napoleon, after Elba, when Murat's fortunes were crumbled to the dust, would not forgive the defection of his old comrade in arms, and Murat was not at Waterloo. Yet in the exile at St. Helena, Napoleon lived to regret his harshness, "and to ask himself whether, if that incomparable sabreur had been at hand to lead them, his cavalry might not have forced the British to give way." Vain speculation! But a throne was no place for Murat. Caroline, his Queen consort—Napoleon's sister—was far abler in State affairs than her husband.

From Margaret of France, Duchess of Savoy (Lane).

MARGARET OF FRANCE IN 1548.
From a painting by Corneille de Lyon at Versailles (Photo, Giraudon).

From The Lady of Beauty
(Chapman & Hall).

THE LADY OF BEAUTY.
(After a portrait by Belliard.)

FIGHTERS AND MARTYRS FOR THE FREEDOM OF FAITH:

Stories in Stained Glass. By LUKE S. WALMSLEY. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net. (Jas. Clarke.)

The germ of Mr. Walmsley's book has already seen the light in booklet form, but the volume should be none the less successful for that. The original reason for its existence lies in the fact that at Fairhaven, in Lancashire, the beautiful Congregational Church contains, in its coloured windows, a series of portraits of notable Protestants. It is with these personages that Mr. Walmsley's book is concerned, and the illustrations throughout are photographed from the original glass. The book presents a series of biographical studies of John Wycliffe, Savonarola, Martin Luther, William Tyndale, John Knox, Henry Barrowe, John Robinson, Oliver Cromwell, John Milton, George Fox, John Bunyan, Isaac Watts, John Wesley, William Carey, John Williams, and David Livingstone. The author has carried out his task with much success, and the book may be recommended as in every way accurate and satisfying to the imagination.

THE PIONEER.

By Harold Bindloss. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

The sterling qualities of your genuine bush-bred colonial never had a better exponent than Mr. Bindloss, and in Lisle, the virile hero of "The Pioneer," these qualities are embodied so attractively that they put to shame the refinements of the

From Fighters and Martyrs for the Freedom of Faith (Jas. Clarke).

From Dürer's Great Engravers Series
(Heinemann).

THE MARRIAGE OF THE VIRGIN.
(From the Life of the Virgin)

super-civilised hero of fiction who lounges behind an immaculate shirt-front through a comfortable three-hundred-page life. The wilds of British Columbia--and in this novel you will learn what "the wilds" really mean--make an ideal environment for Lisle's exploits, which for the most part are concerned with his efforts to clear the memory of a dead comrade. Lisle's friend, it seems, acted as guide to two cousins, George and Clarence Gladwyne, on an expedition through the wilds. Disaster overtook the party, their canoe was wrecked in a rapid, and with the canoe vanished practically all their provisions. To make matters worse, George Gladwyne had injured his leg by a fall from a rock. At length it was arranged that Clarence and the guide should proceed separately in search of certain stores which they had buried on the way up, and in the event of these being found, they were to return to George; otherwise, they were to push on in search of help. Eventually Clarence brought back assistance from a hunter's camp, but it was too late, his cousin was dead; and rumour had it that the guide, who subsequently reached a Hudson Bay post, there to die of exhaustion, had actually found the buried stores, but instead of turning back had cravenly pursued his journey, abandoning the crippled man. The story tells how the intrepid Lisle follows the Gladwynes' trail, and the discoveries he makes lead to a clever series of problematical situations involving the honour of Clarence and the happiness of the woman he professes to love. Altogether a fresh, stimulating, wholesome story, and one which should only be banned by parents who do not wish their fledgelings to succumb to the fascinating lure of the wilds.

DÜRER:

Great Engravers Series. 64 pages of Illustrations, with Short Introduction by ARTHUR M. HIND. 2s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

The production of the Great Engravers Series has once more laid the art-loving public heavily in the debt of Mr. Heinemann, who has quite clearly spared no expense in the production and equipment of the admirable little volumes that Mr. Hind edits. Engraving is a subject that has long been neglected by publishers, and there are few books issued at a popular price which are of any use to those interested in the art. On the other hand, the aim of the Great Engravers Series is no less ambitious than to "present the whole history of engraving and etching in illustration." The reading-matter of the volumes is necessarily restricted, but, in Durer at least, Mr. Hind finds it possible to include lists of books of reference and of the engravings of his subject, in addition to a short critical introduction. One of the principal features of the reproductions themselves—which in other respects also seem to us to be excellent in every way—lies in the fact that the paper on which they are printed has a smooth, but not a glazed, surface, by which means the illustration is always entirely visible at whatever angle the light may strike on it. This is a very real and very important advance in the mechanics of the production of art-books.

THE BOYS' FROISSART:

Selected from Lord Berners' Translation of the "Chronicles" By MADALEN EDGAR, M.A. With 16 illustrations by M. MEREDITH WILLIAMS. 5s net (Harrap)

Miss Madalen Edgar's book may stand for a model of its kind. She has been wise enough to retain the original style of Lord Berners' translation of Froissart's "Chronicles" with but slight alteration. Berners' version may not be an entirely accurate translation, but it is certainly one of the most readable and is probably the one to appeal most to the sentiments of the section of the reading public to whom this volume is addressed. And Miss

From Durer—Great Engravers Series (Heinemann).

THE KNIGHT, DEATH, AND THE DEVIL

Edgar has also made an excellent selection of incidents. The old favourites are here—together with a few chapters which may be less familiar to the youthful reader. Well printed, and illustrated by Mr. Meredith Williams, the volume should be noted by all who are on the look-out for an acceptable present for a boy.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS.

6d. net each (F. C. & E. C. Jack)

With the first twelve volumes of this new series of educational books, Messrs. Jack make an excellent beginning of a great undertaking—which is to bring the most recent knowledge on all subjects within the reach of the most modest purse. Each book is specially written for this library by a recognised authority, and the distinguishing features of them all are their scholarly reliability, the simple clearness with which they are written, and their pleasant readability. Shakespeare and Dante are dealt with in two of the volumes, by Professor Herford and A. G. Ferris Howell; Women's Suffrage by M. S. Fawcett; The Science of the Stars by E. W. Maunder; Roman Catholicism by H. B. Coxon. The twelve volumes are devoted to history, science, philosophy, botany, sociology, religion and literature; they are well printed, artistically bound, and will make an educationally valuable, as well as an attractive, addition to the shelves of any library. We are nowadays getting used to well-produced works at very low prices, but we know of nothing in this way that excels Messrs. Jack's "People's Books." In our next Number the series will be discussed more at large in an article by Mr. T. E. Page.

From The Boys' Froissart (Harrap).

EDWARD III. CROSSING THE SOMME BEFORE THE BATTLE OF CRÉCY.

Frontispiece from Shakespeare (The People's Books)
(Jack).

THE ETERNAL STRUGGLE:

By NEWMAN HARDING. 6s. (John Long.)

Mr. Newman Harding has written an excellent, full-blooded romance of the days of the Merrie Monarch, the scenes of which are laid in seventeenth-century America. A notable lord, one of the reckless gallants of Charles II's Frontispiece from Bergson (The People's Books) (Jack).

Court, is sent out to Massachusetts in 1662 to effect the arrest of two of the regicides who have sought sanctuary there in the little colony of religious refugees. He goes ostensibly on another and more friendly mission, but an incautious companion, the swaggering and quaintly humorous Sir Toby Maynard, lets out his secret when he has been drinking too freely, and it is not long before the two Royalists and their followers find their liberty and their lives menaced by the members of the sturdy Puritan settlement into which his lordship has come to bring so much of disquiet, jealous anger and unhappiness. The interest of the book centres on two beautiful Puritan girls on one in particular who is to marry a manful Puritan neighbour, but whose loveliness so subdues the inflammable heart of my lord from England that he is presently involved in subtle intrigues and bold schemings that are to end happily for others, but not for him, after he had seemed to have ruined the life of the girl he loved and had won to love him. In the main, it is the story of how this apparently conscienceless cavalier finds his soul and is in the hour of his bitterest defeat wrought to a nobler height than he has ever reached before. It is a strong and chequered love tale intensely alive throughout and unfolded with no little dramatic power. The book has caught the vigorous atmosphere of those early American years, and is memorable alike for its skill in characterisation and the varied interest of its narrative

Frontispiece from Dante (The People's Books) (Jack).

HONESTY:

By M. E. FRANCIS. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mrs. Francis Blundell has chosen a novel and queer little house for the heroine of her new book—a house on wheels—a van, with two little rooms inside it, and a large stock of crockery which Honesty and her husband sell as they travel from place to place. Honesty is young and pretty, and Zachary Short her husband, is middle-aged, and they are wonderfully happy together travelling along, until a miserable misunderstanding suddenly estranges them. The plot is developed very skilfully, and each character we meet in the story is sympathetically and realistically drawn, bearing witness to the author's keen insight into human nature. It is a quite uncommonly fine story, full of freshness and power; well worth writing and as well worth reading.

CHARLOTTE SOPHIE, COUNTESS BENTINCK :

Her Life and Times, 1715-1800. By her descendant, Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. In 2 Vols. With about 60 Illustrations. 24s. net. (Hutchinson.)

The heroine of Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond's very readable volumes lived in an extremely interesting period of European history. During her life France passed from Louis XIV. through the age of Voltaire and Rousseau to the Revolution and the beginning of the Napoleonic era. Charlotte Sophie appears to have taken the greatest interest in passing events, and she frequently possessed an inside knowledge of politics. She had, for instance, a King of Sweden as her suitor, and she was friendly with Marie Thérèse and Frederick the Great. But the greater part of the volumes is devoted to the correspondence of this remarkable old lady: an extremely valuable "find" on the part of Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond. The work is, indeed, of unusual interest and importance.

POEMS.

By SEUMAS O'SULLIVAN. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsel.)

In addition to his new poems Mr. O'Sullivan includes several from earlier books—including one printed for private circulation in 1909—in this liberal and welcome collection. Of the younger Irish singers he is the one least likely to find his due at first. His appeal is apt to be lost save in restful, brooding, or cloistral hours. He is a poet of gleams, moods, glimpses, often subtle or delicate, though he hints of high passions and even tragedy. Both his wistfulness and his intensity are gracefully ordered and concentrated. There is a more literary air about him than there is about most of his young contemporaries, yet it is the air of one who has been sad and unsatisfied even as he brooded over the masters in the study and the library. It sometimes seems that he ought to have been a tragic dramatist, not a lyricist. Certain of his pieces suggest unknown but individual Gaelic singers of earlier days, though he is not so tense or outspoken as they. His artistry is choice and finished.

Frontispiece from Blake's Poems (Blackie).

Frontispiece from The Book of Snobs (Blackie).

ETAÍN THE BELOVED, AND OTHER POEMS.

By JAMES H. COUSINS. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsel.)

The old Irish story of Étaín is one of a significant few that have found a new life and interest in this generation. At stages they suggest a decided kinship with ancient Oriental lore or intuition on the subject of human progression and destiny. Like others of his contemporaries Mr. Cousins is concerned with the esoteric significance of the tale. His reading and the modifications he has made are matters on which interested students may well have much to say; the question of the faith and vision of the older Celts in Ireland is difficult and complex though fascinating. Mr. Cousins at any rate has turned his conception to really poetical purpose. In this and other poems of the volume it is seen that he is slowly working out a philosophy of the universe, and he chooses old and new Irish themes that suit him and help him in this purpose. In the broad sense the philosophy is theosophic. Sometimes he seems more concerned with theory and thought than with poetry, but he has his spells of vision and ecstasy, and the expression is frequently felicitous. With a number of new writers in Irish and in English Ireland's literary expression becomes varied and arresting. Mr. Cousins promises to be one of the most considerable of those who think and sing.

THE RED LETTER LIBRARY:

Poems. By WILLIAM BLAKE—The Book of Snobs. By WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY. With Frontispieces 2s. 6d. net each. (Blackie.)

To Messrs. Blackie's well-known series of reprints, the Red Letter Library, have recently been added the two books mentioned above. It is almost unnecessary for us to speak of the merits of the Red Letter Library, which is concerned less with cheapness (though the books are cheap) than with artistic production and careful editing. Characteristic introductions by Mr. G. K. Chesterton—to "The Book of Snobs"—and Mrs. Meynell—who has also made the selection of the poems in the Blake volume—add to the value of these two re-issues.

From The Print Collector's Handbook, a new and revised edition of which Messrs. Bell will publish shortly.

ARRIVÉE DES LÉGUMES. AMIENS
(From an original etching by Auguste Lepere). 70.

THE GAMBIA,

Its History, Ancient, Mediæval and Modern, together with its Geographical, Geological, and Ethnographical Conditions. By HENRY FENWICK REEVE, C.M.G., M.I.C.E., etc. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Mr. Reeve writes more in sorrow than in positive anger concerning the British Government's lack of appreciation of the Gambia and its inhabitants, but the author's irritation at our non-progressive ways and his exuberant enthusiasm for the political methods of Dr. Jameson, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and the late Mr. Cecil Rhodes do not add to the value of a work done with thoroughness and care. Mr. Reeve is anxious to arouse our interest in the British Possessions in North-West Africa, and in especial to the important strategical value of a great harbour and waterway in that part of the world. To that end he tells us the full story of the Gambia from the legendary period of pre-Phœnician navigators down to the French Concessions of recent years, and dwells with emphasis on British responsibility to the people of this ancient Colony. The manners and customs of the various races of the Gambia—who rejoice under the names of Jollops and Floops and Mandinges—are described with fidelity, and special chapters are given to the birds, beasts, and fishes, and the geography and geology of the lands where Mungo Park wandered. On Missionary work Mr. Reeve is silent. The author's hatred of the slave trade, his real desire for the welfare of the native races, and his long experience in North-West Africa, entitle him to an attentive public for this book on the Gambia.

HIS FIRST OFFENCE.

By J. STORER CLOUSTON OS. (Mills & Boon.)

To take a notorious crime, and to "guy" it might seem at the first blush a poor way of writing a farcical story. But Mr. Clouston is far too clever a writer to offend the taste of his readers, and "His First Offence" is a thoroughly enjoyable book. It satirises, incidentally, the growing taste for criminal investigation which is being fostered in respectable folk by the recently increased confidential alliance between the Press and the police for the pursuit of absconding criminals. When Irwin Molyneux and his wife lose their tempestuous cook on the very day chosen for a visit by the Bishop of Bedford, they are forced, in desperation, to tread the uneasy path of deceit. Mrs. Molyneux disappears, and becomes her own cook. The Bishop is over-suspicious, and Mr. Molyneux is an unpractised liar, so the visitor quickly concludes that his host's stumbling explanation of Mrs. Molyneux's strange absence from home conceals a horrible tragedy. When Mr. Molyneux, after an agony of paralysed inventiveness, suddenly flies, leaving behind him an unbelievable statement as to the cause of his departure, the Bishop puts the matter in the hands of the police. From this point onwards, the story is a most ingeniously complicated farce of clues, private detectives, and ridiculous suspicions. Mr. Clouston, who is already an institution in contemporary letters, never lets his invention or his gaiety flag for an instant; and he continues throughout to be genuinely exciting, as well as funny, in his own inimitable fashion.

From The Gambia (Smith, Elder).

GREY RIVER CAMP, JUNCTION WITH GAMBIA;
THE FIRST SAILING VESSEL ON THE GREY RIVER.

From The Print Collector's Handbook (Be

A SLANT OF LIGHT IN POLPERRO HARBOUR
(From a mezzotint by Sir Frank Short, R.A.)

THE HILL OF VISIONS.

By JAMES STEPHENS. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsel)

In this the second poetical volume by Mr. Stephens, there are many notes and moods. The longest effort, "A Prelude and a Song," rises from pretty fancy to vision and rapture. In a few lyrics, like "The Fulness of Time," there are bold, fine thoughts. Strong human sympathy and a dramatic power of expression give individuality and life to other pieces. Yet more are somewhat marred by oddity or waywardness. There is a touch of Puck about Mr. Stephens in more than his casual hours. He sees poetry and mystery in seemingly lowly and humble things; he has also flashes of spiritual intuition; but there is a middle stage, one of psychic elation or intoxication, when the results, though poetical in expression, are apt to be somewhat irresponsible. But even at his oddest he is individual. He is one of the surprises of the newer Ireland; able to pipe and dance and sing on slight provocation almost anywhere between slumland and elfland.

MR. WYCHERLY'S WARDS.

By L. ALLEN HARKER. 6s. (Murray.)

It is seldom that the reviewer has so pleasant a task as in reading one of Mrs. Harker's books, and yet there are few books which it is so difficult to review. For Mrs. Harker's books are not easily labelled. There is nothing in them sensational or audacious, and no plot solid enough to stand analysis or summary. She has individuality, that illusive and impalpable quality which defies analysis and explanation. In a sense Mrs. Harker may be said to represent the persistence of the Cranford tradition. Her work has the same narrow limitations and the same sympathy and power of giving life and vividness to characters essentially familiar and commonplace. Her humour is less sure, and her command of pathos is not to be compared with Mrs. Gaskell's. But the outlook is much the same, and Mrs. Harker shares with Mrs. Gaskell a weakness for "mothering" her characters. It is all very delicate, tender and charming; and when that is said, there is little more to say. Mrs. Harker's stories ought not to be reviewed, they ought to be read and read again by all who love true and daintily finished stories of real children. "Mr. Wycherly's Wards" begins after the death of Miss Esperance with the removal of the delightful and helplessly impractical old scholar and his two young nephews to Oxford. Here, after failing miserably to grapple with an incompetent and voracious charwoman, Mr. Wycherly is rescued by the wife of Oxford's youngest don, and entrusted to the care of an ideal housekeeper. This is how Jane Anne comes into the story, for Jane Anne, whose other name

From The Gambia (Smith, Elder).

THE RIVER AT KOSSEMA.

From Ruins of Desert Cathay (Macmillan).

TIRICH-MIR PEAK, SEEN FROM BELOW CHITRAL AGENCY.

was Allegra, was the housekeeper's niece. Her mother had been an English maid and her father a brilliant but erratic Greek journalist, and the little orphan girl soon became the central figure in Mr. Wycherly's life, and consequently in Mrs. Harker's book. Jane Anne is entirely delightful and diverting, and the development of her character and the incidents of her girlhood make up the greater portion of the story. She is a fascinating figure, a creation of pure delight, and in saying goodbye to her on the last page we feel a genuine sense of loss. We can only hope that Mrs. Harker will fill the blank with another book about her subsequent adventures. Jane Anne is too enchanting to lose

RUINS OF DESERT CATHAY:

Personal Narrative of Explorations in Central Asia and Westernmost China. By MR. AUREL STEIN. In 2 vols. With 9 Coloured Plates, 6 Panoramas, 3 Maps, and 334 Illustrations from Photographs. 42s. net. (Macmillan.)

The sumptuous and magnificent production of the two volumes embodying Mr. Aurel Stein's personal record of his travels in the unknown countries of Central Asia does no more than justice to the importance and vital interest of their contents. In the course of a brief note it is almost impossible even to hint at the wonderful store of good reading that "Ruins of Desert Cathay" affords.

Mr. Stein's long journey, partially in the footsteps of Marco Polo, was made under the auspices of the Indian Archaeological Survey, and extended over a period of more than two years and a half, and it has been abundantly justified by its remarkable scientific results: "Our topographical surveys, now in course of detailed publication by the Indian Trigonometrical Survey, on the scale of four miles to the inch, fill ninety-four map sheets of the standard size . . . and the mere unpacking and first arrangement of the thousands of archaeological objects in basement rooms of the British Museum, which were made available for what seemed like a temporary immurement, took close on six months. The decipherment and publication of the manuscripts and documents, probably over 14,000 in number and in about a dozen scripts and languages, are bound for a long number of years to claim the learned labours of quite a staff of Orientalist savants." It is no exaggeration to say that probably this is one of the most important books of its kind that has ever been published.

From Ruins of Desert Cathay (Macmillan).

TESTING RAFT OF INFLATED SKINS ON A TANK OF NAR-BAGH.

From The British West Indies (Pitman)

SHIPPING BANANAS IN JAMAICA.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Their History, Resources, and Progress. By ALGERNON E. ASPINALL. 7s 6d net. (Pitman & Sons.)

This book, the latest volume in the "All Red" Series, justifies its title. Mr. Aspinall tells all that the general reader need know concerning the past and present of the West Indies, and reminds us of the foundations of these colonies laid by the great seamen of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—freebooters and pirates all, in modern judgment, of "the abolition of slavery—which was the first of a series of crushing blows that the West Indian proprietors were compelled to face," and of the present prosperity of the colonists. There are chapters on the Flora and Fauna of the islands, on the industries, on the civil and religious liberty enjoyed; on education, on the West Indian Press; and on railways, steamers, banking, telegraphs and business in general. Mr. Aspinall has taken considerable pains to show the cost of living—"it is possible to live in comparative comfort in the country districts of the West Indies for £100 per annum"—to describe the pleasures and amusements of the inhabitants, and to deal with the opportunities of a new-comer.

WANDERINGS IN MEXICO.

By WALLACE GILLPATRICK 7s 6d net (Nash)

This is an unassuming volume which deals in an amiable manner with a country that has lately been returning to its ancient state of turmoil. Mr. Gillpatrick's sketches cannot be compared with those of his countryman, Charles Flandrau, and in spite of the publisher's note on the cover it can scarcely be said that this is a "unique and lively chronicle of travel and adventure in Mexican highways and byways." The story is not unusual and it is given in no striking prose; we do indeed come on a sentence like the following—"he was my secretario, though no one knew this but him and me." Yet these lapses are rare, and the illustrations are quite good. Mr. Gillpatrick says nothing of the recent Revolution, although he was present at the anniversary festivities of 1910, which were followed so soon by the dramatic outbreak at Puebla. The best part of this book deals with a stay at a Durango silver mine, and from the point of view of psychology it is not without interest, for it is what you would expect from the typical American whom you meet in Mexico. For instance, the Governor of Tlaxcala, Don Prospero Catuantzi, is described in the most solemn, not to say banal, manner. You might just as well be solemn in describing Sancho Panza. It is curious how one can miss so fine a chance, and good Don Prospero himself would much deplore it. This book has the advantage that it does not adulate Porfirio Diaz everywhere; there is a quantity of other interesting matter and the unpretentiousness of it all is in its favour.

From Among the Malagasy (Jas. Clarke).

IN THE DEPTHS OF THE FOREST

From The Complete Gardener (Cassell).

THE TERRACE GARDEN AT WOODSIDE, CHENIES, HERTS.

THE COMPLETE GARDENER.

By H. H. THOMAS. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (Cassell.)

Besides being editor of The Gardener, Mr. H. H. Thomas is the author of various useful and popular books, such as "The Ideal Garden," and "The Garden at Home." In "The Complete Gardener," a large volume running to nearly six hundred pages and beautified with a hundred and twenty-eight full page illustrations, to say nothing of numerous smaller drawings, he has set himself to give practical information to the garden-lover concerning everything in the way of shrub, flower, fruit or vegetable he is ever likely to wish to grow, and he has fulfilled his task admirably. Mr. Thomas avoids needless technicalities, and conveys his expert knowledge on these subjects with a clarity and simplicity that make this not only the fullest and best-informed but the most readable and easily intelligible aid to the amateur gardener that any man could desire. It is literally an "Enquire Within upon Everything" connected with the laying out, planting, cultivation and care of a garden.

POPULAR BOTANY.

By A. E. KNIGHT and EDWARD STELL, F.L.S. Part I, 7d. net. (Hutchinson.)

This is the first part of a new serial publication that is to be completed in eighteen parts, and will include about a thousand illustrations. It is a Natural History of Plants, telling in a popular manner the plants' life-histories - how they are constructed, their process of growth, the relations between plant and plant, their influence on human life and industry, all their associations with the world around them from first to last. The illustrations are from photographs that are excellently reproduced and a beautiful engraving in colours is given with each part.

From Wonders of Plant Life (Cassell).
Reviewed in THE BOOKMAN for March, 1912.

VENUS FLY TRAP.
SHUT.

From Wonders of Plant Life (Cassell).

VENUS FLY TRAP
OPEN

THE PROSE WORKS OF PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

Reprinted from the original Editions and Edited by RICHARD HERNE SHEPHERD. 2 Vols. 2s. 6d. net each. (Chatto & Windus.)

In these two tastefully produced pocket volumes Messrs. Chatto & Windus reissue Mr. Herne Shepherd's collection of the complete prose works of Shelley, including his two early romances, "Zastrozzi" and "St. Irvyne," that with all their crudities and absurdities are not to be overlooked by any student of the development of Shelley's genius; his political and religious pamphlets, his "Essays and Letters from Abroad," and a variety of minor papers. His "Address to the Irish People" has a peculiar timeliness just now; and if some of his theological speculations no longer seem so daring as they did to his orthodox contemporaries they have lost none of their value and interest as records of his mental and moral outlook and the growth of his individuality. Matthew Arnold thought Shelley's essays and letters deserved to be far wider known than they were, and hazarded an opinion that they would perhaps "resist the wear and tear of time better, and finally come to stand higher, than his poetry." Few of us will endorse the latter half of this dictum, but fewer will dissent from the first half. Shelley's prose is not always great, but it is always good, always fearlessly outspoken, and it has never been more conveniently or attractively presented than it is in these two volumes.

GOD AND MAMMON.

By JOSEPH HOCKING.
3s. 6d. With 2 Illustrations.
(Ward, Lock.)

George Tremain is a young man of very considerable ambition. He has done well at school, and, later, he has distinguished himself in his father's business as solicitor. In fact, he allies promise with his ambition. A leading barrister, who takes an interest in the young man, advises him to seek his fortune in London, with the proviso that he has no entanglements. Now, George loves Mary Trefry, but he is so obsessed with the idea that marriage is the death-blow to success that he leaves her without having put the crucial question. It is hardly necessary to follow the later fortunes of Mr. Hocking's hero, when he has made his mark in London as a financier. The moral of the tale is strongly brought out in the climax, when Tremain discovers for himself the emptiness of worldly success, and the solace of a woman's love. Mr. Hocking's latest book is in every way worthy of one of the most popular writers of the day. The story is not perhaps dramatic, but it is in every way interesting, and the gradual development of the character of the hero is an achievement of which the author may well be proud.

YELLOWSANDS.

By ADAM GOWANS WHYTE. 6s. (Blackwood.)

Mr. Gowans Whyte calls "Yellowsands" a holiday tale, and a holiday tale it is, with one of the most unsophisticated and most likeable heroes who ever walked the pages of a book. Hilary Gibbs is proprietor of a prosperous vinegar factory; he has come slowly to feel that life amid the rush of business is not the ideal thing, and drawn by some reviving recollections of his youth he goes away for a long holiday and puts up at a literary boarding house at Yellowsands. The little literary people who board there are touched in with a light and amusing satire, but Hilary does not feel at home with them; he makes acquaint-

From Populus Botany (Hutchinson).

EDELWEISS (Leontopodium alpinum).
(Photo by G. R. Lallance.)

ance with a reserved, sad-featured lady living in loneliness at a neighbouring bungalow, and serves more or less unconsciously as the chief instrument in bringing about a reconciliation between her and her husband whom a misunderstanding has separated from her. The story is a sentimental comedy of the best kind, never lapsing into sentimentality on the one hand nor into farce on the other, but, with its undertow of seriousness and a secondary love affair that is only serious in the pleasantest fashion, keeping you thoroughly entertained throughout. This is certainly one of the cleverest and most charmingly written novels that the spring has brought us.

From Tripoli and Young Italy
by Charles Lapworth and Ellen Zimmern which Messrs. Stephen Swift will publish shortly

BLÜCHER AND THE UPRISING OF PRUSSIA AGAINST NAPOLEON, 1806-15.

By ERNEST F. HENDERSON, Ph.D.,
L.H.D. With 31 Illustrations and 10
Maps. 5s. net. (Putnam's.)

The latest addition to the "Heroes of the Nations" series is a volume that seems likely to fill a very real want. It is indeed strange, as Dr. Henderson says, that Blücher "has never been made the subject of an English biography and that of his German lives none have been translated into English." This book should, therefore, be assured of its welcome—more especially so since, like the companion volumes of its series, it is primarily intended for the general reader. The author lays particular stress upon the period which corresponds with Blücher's military activity—1806-1815—and he ends with an excellent and detailed summary of the operations which culminated in the battle of Belle Alliance—or Waterloo, as English historians style

THE BLÜCHER MONUMENT AT CAUB.
(From a photograph.)

From Blücher and the Uprising of Prussia against Napoleon (Putnam's).

it. The book forms altogether a most useful and readable survey of its period.

CRENLAND CASTLE.

By MORICE GERARD 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Morice Gerard's work is always thoroughly readable and attractive, and "Crenland Castle" is no deviation from this rule. It differs from the majority of its predecessors among this author's work by being a romance of the present day, but it is quite sufficiently strong in general interest to rival the popularity of any of Mr. Gerard's historical studies. The story, which is developed in an unexpected and dramatic manner, centres round the ownership of Crenland Castle, an attractive property on the northern sea-coast, but the reader's sympathies will be aroused, and his interest principally held, by the attractive personalities of its hero and heroine—types which are developed in Mr. Gerard's best manner.

From Tripoli and Young Italy (Stephen Swift).

D. APPLETON & CO.'S FIRST LIST OF SPRING BOOKS.

THE ADVENTURES OF A MODEST MAN.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. Author of "The Common Law." 6s.

The scene of the story is Paris, whither a New York magnate has taken his two attractive daughters. Written with all Mr. Chambers' grace of diction; all delicious from beginning to end and full of the joy of life.

THE CONFLICT.

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS. Author of "The Husband's Story." 6s.

The story of a capitalist's daughter who loves a leader of the people. The struggle between Love and Duty is depicted in the incisive and courageous manner that has made the author's work popular with English readers.

THE DEPARTMENT STORE: A NOVEL OF TO-DAY. By MARGARETE BOHME.

Author of "The Diary of a Lost One." 6s.

This romance deals in a remarkably frank manner with life in the modern emporium—those huge stores which are to-day a striking feature in every modern city. One of the most interesting romances of the season.

THE FORBIDDEN WAY.

By GEORGE GIBBS. Author of "The Bolted Door." 6s.

This novel of society life follows the career of a big forceful mine owner who goes into society with his beautiful wife, becomes dazzled by the social whirl and treads dangerously near "The Forbidden Way."

THE SINS OF THE FATHER.

By THOMAS DIXON. 6s.

Another story by the author of "The Clansman," which has had an enormous circulation in this country and in America. It deals with a phase of the negro problem in a highly dramatic manner and is a romance of absorbing interest.

CAP'N WARREN'S WARDS.

By J. C. LINCOLN. Author of "The Woman Haters." 6s.

There is a charming love story running through the book, and forming an admirable contrast to Captain Warren, the bluff old sea captain who finds himself in high society.

CHARLES DICKENS.

By BELLE MOSES. Crown 8vo. 331 pages. With Frontispiece. Cloth, gilt top. 5s.

A little volume which treats more particularly of the author's heroines and the influence of women on his life.

THE AMERICAN YEAR BOOK, 1911:

A RECORD OF EVENTS AND PROGRESS. Demy 8vo. 863 pages. With full bibliography and index. 15s. net.

The new volume of this important annual is now ready, dealing with American affairs in every department.

THE REFERENDUM.

By W. B. MUNRO. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s. net.

This timely volume explains in fullest detail the principles of the Referendum, the new weapon of Democracy which is now attracting so much attention.

THE COMING GENERATION.

By W. B. FORBUSH. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 4c2 pages.

A full presentment of the forces that are working for the betterment of the rising generation. 6s. net.

CORPORATIONS AND THE STATE.

By THEODORE E. BURTON. Cloth. Crown 8vo. 250 pages.

Deals with the origin, the development and the regulation of Corporations. 6s. net.

AMERICAN TRANSPORTA- TION PROBLEMS.

By S. O. DUNN. Crown 8vo. Cloth.

Discusses the rates, service and financial return of transportation. 6s. net.

25, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

New Volume in Crown Theological Library.

Pharisaism : Its Aims and its Methods.

By REV. R. TRAVERS HERFORD, Author of "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash." Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net. In preparation.

New Volume in Theological Translation Library.

The History of Religious Freedom.

By FR. RUFFINI, Rector of the University of Turin. Demy 8vo. Cloth. Ready shortly.

An Examination of Professor Bergson's Philosophy.

By DAVID BALSILIFF, M.A. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net. Ready.

The Problems of the Pacific.

By FRANK FOX, Author of "Ramparts of Empire," etc. In active preparation. Medium 8vo.

Captain Cartwright and his Labrador Journal.

Edited by CHARLES WENDLE TOWNSEND, M.B.

With an Introduction by DR. WILFRID I. GREENFIELD.

A Journal of Transactions and Events on the Coast of Labrador. With Illustrations from Old Engravings, Photographs, and a Map. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net.

The Hibbert Journal A Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF APRIL NUMBER. READY ON 1st.

The Right to Strike and Lock-Out. By ROBERT A. DUFF, D.Phil.
The Jesus of 'Q'—the Oldest Source in the Gospels. By GEORGE HOLLEY GIBBERT.

The Great Question. By WILLIAM DILLON, Chicago.
Brahma. An Account of the Central Doctrine of Hindu Theology as understood in the East and misunderstood in the West. By PROFESSOR S. A. DESAI, Holkar College, Indore, Central India.

The Essentials of a University Education. By Principal W. M. CHILDS, University College, Reading.

Is Civilisation in Danger? A Reply. By JOSEPH MACAIG.
Fresh Light on the Synoptic Problem. Matthew a Lucan Source. By ROBINSON SMITH, M.A.

The Occult Obsessions of Science—with Descartes as an Object-Lesson. By LOUIS I. MORE, Professor of Physics, University of Cincinnati.

Business, Goodness, and Imagination. By GERALD STANLEY LEE.
The Religious Philosophy of Rudolf Lucken. By Baron FRIEDRICH VON HUGEL.

Divine Promptings. By SIGNORA RE-BARTLETT.
Social Service. No. 3. What Public School Men can do. By S. P. GRUNDY, General Secretary, Manchester City League of Help.

With Discussions, Survey of Recent Philosophical and Theological Literature, by Prof. G. DAVES HICKS and Dr. JAMES MOTTET, and Signed Reviews.

Super royal 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. Post free, 2s. 9d.

Yearly Subscriptions, commencing with any number, 10s. per annum, post free.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' LIST

A NEW NOVEL BY MRS. BARCLAY

Author of "The Rosary"

THROUGH THE POSTERN GATE:

A Romance in Seven Days.

With Nine Coloured Illustrations by F. H. TOWNSEND.

Crown 8vo. Cloth extra, 6s.

THE LAND OF THE BLUE FLOWER

By FRANCIS HODGSON BURNETT, author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." Crown 8vo. Cloth extra, 1s. net.

THE SHAPE OF THE WORLD

By FRYDYN ST. LEGER, author of "Diaries of Three Women of the Last Century," etc. Crown 8vo. Cloth extra, 6s.

"In spite of the tragedy that must always hover around the abnormal conditions, comedy is the prevailing spirit throughout. Good comedy, genuinely witty, and never vulgar. . . . Very real talent." Daily Chronicle

STAR LORE OF ALL AGES

By WM. LYMER ORCUTT, author of "A Field Book of Stars," etc. With 114 Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

IN THE AMAZON JUNGLE: Adventures in a remote part of the Upper Amazon River, including a sojourn among the Cannibal Indians.

By ALGOT LANGE. With 86 Illustrations from Original Photographs by the author. 8vo. Cloth extra.

Send for New Lists

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

From The Tree-Dwellers (Harraf).

'SHARPTOOTH WAS AFRAID OF WILD ANIMALS.'

From The Later Cave Men (Harraf).

"THEY LOOKED SO MUCH LIKE WOLVES
THAT THEY GOT VERY CLOSE BEFORE
THE BISON THREATENED."

INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL HISTORY SERIES.

By KATHARINE ELIZABETH DOPP, Ph.D.
Illustrated by HOWARD V. BROWN. The Tree Dwellers. With 15 Full page Illustrations and 42 in the Text. 1s. and 1s. 6d.
net.—The Early Cave-Men. With 17 Full page Illustrations and 57 in the Text. The Later Cave-Men. With 27 Full page Illustrations and 83 in the Text. 1s. 3d. and 1s. 6d.
net each. (Harraf.)

This new series strikes out an entirely new line. It is designed obviously for young children, by whom, we have no doubt whatever, it will be fully appreciated. The author's aim appears to be to supply as vivid a presentment as possible of the subjects of her volumes, but the books are also largely educational and each chapter is prefaced with a short series of "Things to Think About," and concluded with a longer list of "Things to Do." So skilful is the author, and so interesting has she made her little books, that some children may regard them as a new and elaborate game. But there can be no question as to the general efficiency and utility of the series, which may be warmly recommended. The publishers have been very generous with the illustrations, which are as good as they are numerous.

STEINLEN AND HIS ART.

A Portfolio of Twenty-Four Cartoons, with a Critical Introduction and Descriptive Notes. 10s. 6d. net (Chatto & Windus.)

In a book which we reviewed recently, Sir Frederick Wedmore speaks with a graceful gusto of the eagerness with which, in the old days, in Paris, he used to part with his sou, every Sunday morning, to get the new copy of Le Gil Blas Illustré, and rejoice over the latest Steinlen; and the handsome set of Steinlen reproductions which has been published, by a happy chance, almost simultaneously, probably contains some of the very pictures over which that fortunate young amateur of fine things so enviably Blackwoods' Books.

FIRST SPRING LIST.

The Nonconformist Treason: Or, the Sale of the Emerald Isle.

By MICHAEL J. F. MCCARTHY, Author of "Priests and People in Ireland." 6s. [Immediately]

Mr. McCarthy, in forceful and graphic phrases, exposes the machinations of the present Government and the folly of their supporters. He contends that Home Rule would mean anything else but Home Rule, and having made a lifelong study of the History of Ireland, and being himself an Irishman, the author substantiates the grounds of his indictment in a very able and telling manner. The book should be invaluable to all those who have the welfare of Great Britain and Ireland at heart, and particularly to those who are to take an active part in the approaching struggle.

Old Irish Life.

By J. M. CALLWELL. Illustrated. 10s. net.

"In this most entertaining volume Miss Callwell attains a very high level."—Athenium

"A most engaging book, full of the tragedy and comedy and pathos of Irish life."—Liverpool Courier.

"Miss Callwell is to be congratulated on a vivacious and attractive book."—Standard.

Chiefs and Cities of Central Africa. Across Lake Chad by way of British, French and German Territories.

By OLIVE MACLEOD. With 250 Illustrations and 7 Maps. 21s. net. [In the Press]

This is an account of Miss Macleod's travels into the heart of Africa. Her journey lay for the most part in territory never before entered by a white woman. The discovery of Mao Kabi Falls, named after Miss Macleod herself, was one of the most striking episodes of this adventurous undertaking.

Service Yarns and Reminiscences.

By COLONEL C. F. CALLWELL, C.B. 6s. [In the Press]

A most entertaining book of reminiscences of peace and war.

Chances of Sports of Sorts.

By COLONEL T. A. ST. QUENTIN, Late 10th and 13th Hussars. 21s. net. [In the Press]

Colonel St. Quentin writes of sporting experiences both at home and abroad in a fascinating manner. India has been the scene of most of his exploits, and the tale of his adventures in the sportsman's paradise will be read with the greatest interest.

A History of the Indian Mutiny.

Reviewed and illustrated from Original Documents, by G. W. TORRESE, C.I.F., Ex-Director of Records, Government of India. Vol. III. With Plans and Illustrations. 20s. net. [Immediately]

This third volume completes Mr. Torrese's great and monumental work on the Indian Mutiny.

FICTION. 6s.

"The name of 'BLACKWOOD' on a novel is a guarantee of good literature."—Saturday Review.

THE MOON ENDURETH: TALES AND FANCIES.

By JOHN BUCHAN, Author of "Preter John," etc.

A collection of Mr. Buchan's brilliant stories, one of them "The Lemman" has been declared by good critics to be one of the finest modern examples of the short story.

GEORGE WENDERN GAVE A PARTY.

By JOHN INGLIS.

Now running as a serial in "Blackwood," which at once puts upon it the hall mark of the highest literary merit.

YELLOW SANDS.

By ADAM GOWANS WHYTE, Author of "The Templeton Tradition."

A highly diverting comedy recording the remarkable holiday adventures of a retired manufacturer of vinegar, who with extraordinary success and tact fills the unexpected role of Cupid's ambassador.

A DERELICT EMPIRE.

By MARK TIME.

An engrossing story of India left by an enthusiastic Socialistic Government to manage her own affairs.

LUCRETIA BORGIA'S ONE LOVE.

By H. GRAHAM RICHARDS, Author of "Richard Somers."

In the lurid history of the Borgias Mr. Richards finds a fitting field for his adventurous pen, and he gives us here a most thrilling and vital story of the Italian Renaissance.

THE HEART OF DELILAH.

By CHRISTOPHER WILSON, Author of "The Missing Millionaire."

This book should be welcome to all who are tired of the "poignant" and "virile" problem novel. It is a good rattling story, arresting, well constructed and most fascinating.

William Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh and London.

BOOKS THAT COMPEL

A NIGHT in the LUXEMBOURG

By REMY DE GOURMOND. Translated with Preface and Appendix by ARTHUR RASSOMI.

This is the first time that a translation appears in English of a book which has been translated in every other European language.

A NEW SYSTEM of PSYCHOLOGY

By A. L. LYNCH. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2 vols. 21s. net.

The long lost episode to the famous Oriental tale have at last been discovered by Mr. Lewis Melville among the Beckford papers at Hamilton Palace.

THE EPISODES OF VATHEK

By WILLIAM BECKFORD. Translated by Sir FRANK L. MARZIALS, with the original French, and an Introduction by LEWIS MELVILLE. Medium 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

SOME OLD ENGLISH WORTHIES

By DOROTHY SENIOR. Medium 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LEAVES OF PROSE

INTERLEAVED WITH VERSE.

By ANNIE MATTHESON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

OFF BEATEN TRACKS IN BRITTANY

By EMIL DAVIES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

IN DEFENCE OF AMERICA

FOR THE ENLIGHTENMENT OF JOHN BULL

By BARON VON LAURH. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

IMAGINARY SPEECHES:

And Other Parodies in Prose and Verse

By JACK COLLINGS SQUIRE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"Should be in the library of every politician who has a sense of humour."—Glasgow Herald

"It denotes the arrival of a welcome addition to the ranks of our humour writers."—Daily Telegraph

SHAKESPEARE'S END

And Two Other Irish Plays

By CONAL O'RiORDAN (NORRIS CONNELL). Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. O'Riordan has talent of a very exceptional character. There is something here that is fine, completely achieved, unique."—Daily News

RECENT FICTION:

AN EXCELLENT MYSTERY

By COLNETS RUSSELL. Author of "Five Women and a Caravan." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

LADY ERMYNTRUDE and the PLUMBER

By PERCY FENDALL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The Galibertian situation created by carrying Lloyd Geoghegan to its conclusion are most wittily handled by the author."—Sunday Times.

THE CONSIDINE LUCK

By H. A. HINCKSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A SUPERMAN IN BEING

By LITCHFIELD WOODS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

SIXTH EDITION NOW READY.

DAUGHTERS OF ISHMAEL

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN. With a Preface by JOHN MASFELD. Price 6s.

"A real service to humanity. It ought to be in the hands of every priest, clergyman, and minister of the English-speaking race, and of every politician as well."—CHRISTOPHER SMOKE, in The Sphere.

"The 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' of the White Slave Traffic."—Liverpool Post. "Of its sincere purpose there can be no question. Mr. Kauffman's handling gives no unnecessary offence."—The Times

IN A GERMAN PENSION

By KATHERINE MANSFIELD. Price 6s. Second Edition.

"Uncommonly bold and artistic."—Fanny Fair.

"A masterly piece of work."—World

"We have seldom read more vivid sketches with so great an economy of word."—Morning Post.

"STARTLINGLY REALISTIC."—Daily Telegraph.

Send a postcard for "Books that Compel" post free from STEPHEN SWIFT & Co., Ltd., 10 John Street, Adelphi, W.C.

From The Life Boat and its Story
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

CAPSIZING THE LIFE BOAT:
"JUST GOING OVER."

gloated. For although the letterpress which precludes them does not openly confess it, many of these drawings were done in the first place for boulevard journals—for the Gils Blas Illustré or the Muliton, or the famous Chambard. They are none the worse for that, of course; they include, indeed, some of Steinlen's tensest and tersest, and most characteristic stuff, for it is when he is working most tigerishly, with lines that leap and quiver with the tension, his eye fixed on some stray scrap of topical life, his hand stamping down its elements on a sketch-book page that will be reproduced by the thousand before night, and bite its way into uncountable brains on the boulevards next morning, that Steinlen's character concentrates and projects itself most completely into his work. A Switzer by birth, it was a novel of Zola's, so they say, that plucked him, in the first place, to Paris; and one seems to get the best of him when he is given no time to amplify, in Zola's self-suffocating fashion, his brusque and brutal first-hand notes. Not much need be said about the unsigned Introduction to the folio or the accompanying "Notes." The writer, whoever he may be (there is a queer suppression of identities all through the book), compares his subject with Rodin, and says he is "one of the great artists of France"; but for the rest, he concerns himself rather tediously with Steinlen's ethic, instead of with Steinlen's art. He sees him as a popular preacher taking "the misery of the poor, their immorality, and the corruption that is rampant everywhere and in every class" for his themes—and so passes on to an indignant assurance that Paris contains about 30,000 apaches and only 8,000 police. Very remarkable, to be sure—but not precisely the sort of figures that lovers of noble draughtsmanship want to study. And it is to collectors of pictures, not to expert criminologists, that one wishes to recommend this book. If they do not know Steinlen already they will gloat, as delightedly as Sir Frederick in Paris, over the work of a fiercer and more masterful Phil May—perhaps, even, a Genevan Hogarth. And those who do know their Gils Blas or that old, exquisite book "Dans la Vie," will thank Messrs. Chatto & Windus the more readily for submitting some of the best pages of both to the perils of a Channel crossing.

From God and Mammon
(Ward, Lock).

"HE LIFTED HIS HEAD AS HE SPOKE,
AND HANDED A SLIP OF PAPER TO GEORGE."

Constable's New 6s. Novels.

PAUL'S PARAGON

W. E. Norris

"The touch of sadness and tenderness through the story makes the reader feel that things really human are here handled, and handled with a masterly and human touch. A memorable novel!"—DAILY MAIL.

THE GOOD GIRL

Vincent O'Sullivan

"A novel which we can heartily admire we defy anyone to lay it down after the first few pages." OBSERVER

EVERYBODY'S BOY

Lindsay Bashford

"A charming, fantastic story with delightful backgrounds of a most entertaining group of characters express themselves with refreshing wit . . . cleverly individualised." DAILY MAIL.

A LOST INTEREST

Mrs. George Wemyss

"There is a splendid touch of farce in this book: It is a delightful comedy with real seriousness behind it, written with a masterly combination of light wit and deep insight."—MORNING LEADER.

SUCCESS

(2nd Impression)

Una L. Silberrad

"Miss Silberrad in her new novel has succeeded. It is the admirable humanity of Miss Silberrad a novel that gives it its depth and beauty—a humanity that bestows on even the least of her characters that something which we call reality."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

HERITAGE

Valentina Hawtrey

"Miss Hawtrey has a distinct and powerful talent of her own. There is a sombre strength in this story. But it is a fine, bold conception, developed with vigour, sympathy and skill."—DAILY MAIL.

QUEED

(10th Impression)

Sydnor Harrison

A CIRCUIT RIDER'S WIFE

Corra Harris

CONSTABLE'S NEW BOOKS.

MY IDEAL

JOHN BULLESSES

Yoshio Markino

Illustrated by the Author, with 6 Plates in Colour, and 20 Black and White Drawings. 6s. net

"Rarely has more refreshing and penetrating criticism been passed upon the Englishwoman of to-day than by the well-known Japanese artist and writer, Mr. Yoshio Markino, who, as will be seen in this book, deftly analyses the character of our countrywomen, and shows us how they appear to the enlightened Eastern mind."

THE ARCTIC PRAIRIES

Ernest Thompson Seton

With 32 full-page Photographs and 125 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by the Author. 12s. 6d. net.

"He has written a book of quite unusual merit, and its pages abound in graphic descriptions of travel and sport in the mysterious Far North. Apart from the human interest of the story, its scientific value as regards both the fauna and the flora of the Arctic prairies is marked. There are many illustrations, and where maps are needed they are given."—STANDARD.

IN THE CARPATHIANS

Lion Phillimore

(10s. 6d. net.)

"She adds a graphic pen and a keen eye not only for detail, but for beauty and significance."—TIMES "Her freshness of mind, her receptivity, and her vivid instinct for beauty makes her writing individual and attractive."—ATHENEUM "Mrs. Phillimore's method of doing it and telling it and thinking it constitutes the charm of this picturesque book."—DAILY CHRONICLE

The Life of Charles Lamb's Friend.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN RICKMAN

(Illustrated 10s. 6d. net.)

Orlo Williams

"A book that should prove a valuable addition to our knowledge of Charles Lamb and his circle, apart from the individual interest attaching to its subject."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE. "Mr. Williams' labours are important; for he has brought to light several new points concerning Charles Lamb."—DAILY MAIL. "Altogether this is a most interesting and informing collection of letters."—MORNING POST.

THE TUDOR DRAMA

(6s. net.)

C. F. Tucker

Brooke, B. Litt., Oxon.

"A scholarly work, Mr. Brooke's information is full and exact" says THE SCOTSMAN.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF ANCIENT ROME

(Demy 8vo., 8s. 6d. net.)

Jesse Benedict

Carter

A study of the development of Religious Consciousness from the Foundation of the City until the Death of GREGORY THE GREAT.

THE GARDENER AND THE COOK

Lucy H. Yates

Author of "The Modern Kitchen," etc. (3s. 6d.)

An informing book on the care and management of the Garden, especially with a view to securing a variety of appetising dishes for the Table.

"It is full of pleasant writing and of pictures, but above all it is a book of recipes, mostly derived from the garden, but useful in all houses where not only the library but the dining-room has its culture."—T.P.'s WEEKLY.

THE GREY STOCKING

Maurice Baring

(4s. 6d. net.)

CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., 10, Orange St., London, W.C.

DENT'S NEW BOOKS

THREE NEW NOVELS

The Labyrinth of Life.

By E. A. U. VALENTINE. Crown 8vo., 6s.

A Prodigal Daughter.

By HALLIE FOLL. Crown 8vo., 6s.

Branston Heath.

By C. REGINALD FROCK, F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo., 6s.

WALTER RAYMOND'S RECENT BOOK

The Revenues of the Wicked.

Crown 8vo., 6s.

A Re-issue of some of his Somersetshire Tales.

Tryphena in Love, and Young Sam and Sabina.

Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

The Book of Simple Delights.

Illustrated by HERBERT COLF. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

MEDIÆVAL TOWNS

4 NEW VOLUMES

Jerusalem, Canterbury, Santiago, Lucca.

A Series of "Literary Guide Books" dealing specially with the story of each town, with numerous Topographical Drawings, Reproductions from Paintings and Sculpture, Maps and Plans. Pocketable. Cloth, 3s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. net. Roan, 4s. 6d. and 5s. 6d. net.

Prospectus Post Free on request

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

Edited by OLIPHANT SMYTHON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo., 5s. net. This series is designed to provide a suitable means of acquiring what may be termed an analytic knowledge of the "types" or component parts of our literature. The first volume is now ready.

English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy.

By PROF. JAMES SMITH, M.A., University of Edinburgh. [Prospectus.]

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

600 VOLUMES. Now Ready.

Annotated Catalogue Post Free.

Send for SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT LIST giving full particulars of many new and interesting Publications.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 28, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

From Modern Germany (Nash)

GENERAL STORES, HAMBURG.

From The Print Collector's
Handbook (Bell).

LIBERTY'S CLOCK.
(From an original Dry
Point by Muirhead Bona.)

FLEMINGTON.

By VIOLET JACOB.
6s. (John Murray.)

It is not surprising that Mrs. Jacob's novel has already passed into a second edition. There is a strength of characterization in it which arrests the reader, in spite of the fact that there is no love-interest. The only woman is a keen, resolute Scots lady, whose Whig sympathies bring her grandson, Archie, into the predicament of having to choose between his party and his friend in the opposite camp. This conflict of interests is one which would have attracted Stevenson, and, without suggesting that this novel is reminiscent, we are conscious that its qualities appeal to us with something of the force which the older writer put into "The Master of Ballantrae" and "Weir of Hermiston." Madam Flemington dominates Archie. But the trust unconsciously placed in him by James Logie touches the conscience that lay under his political creed, and after the battle of Culloden he sacrifices his life to save his friend and political foe. It is a Fortarshure novel of the '45 period. The main scene is laid in the vicinity of Montrose, where some brisk fighting occurs. But Mrs. Jacob etches in her characters with such crispness that her success in stating the plot is almost forgotten in the skill with which the pedantic Lord Balmillo is drawn, and also Skirling Wattie. There is not a minor character in the story who does not live, from Mr. Duthie, the minister, to Callandar, the Whig captain. Towards the end the reader hopes that Mrs. Jacob will manage to relax the bonds which are closing round Archie, but her strength of conception is unpaired, and the story moves to its sombre close with a volume of conviction which almost reconciles one to the disappointment of such hopes. It is not often that so vital and penetrating a story appears upon the Jacobite period. Mrs. Jacob disdains cheap effects and sentimental airs; she has managed to get inside the heart of the struggle as it moved certain types of Scottish character, and we congratulate her upon a remarkable success.

THE REWARD OF VIRTUE.

By AMBER REEVES. 6s. (Heinemann.)

"Girls are so much easier." The book begins and ends with this reflection, first on the lips of Mrs. Baker, and lastly on the lips of her daughter who, in the course of the story, has become a wife and a mother. And yet Evelyn is not easy. She is foolishly brought up by her parents, especially by her mother. She slips into girlish follies at school and after school. "Nobody troubled to watch her growing mind and give her new standards to fit its new capacities. She was allowed unchecked to blunt her sensibilities in a silly tinsel flirtation, while Mrs. Baker continued to treat her as though she were ten years old." When she finally marries Mr. Leonard Day, her untrained mind lands her in worry and misunderstanding, but she is the daughter of her mother, and, when her baby girl is born, the same instinct is roused in her. She means to be her daughter's greatest friend, forgetful of the fact that this ideal of her mother had worked out unfortunately in her own case. So the book ends, foreshadowing great complications ahead. It is cleverly written, as a study in the relations of mother and daughter, and as a gentle satire upon the cheap, facile way in which these relations are often accepted. But the most interesting part of the book is

From Royal Tunbridge Wells

by Lewis Melville, which will be published shortly by Mr. T. C. Nash

THE BATHS AND LIBRARY.

(From a print in the collection of Mr. A. M. Bradley.)

the description of a girl's adolescence. The jarring notes of Evelyn's married life are not nearly so convincing as the troubles into which she plunges herself at the Gorrige's and the Cunningham's.

A HISTORY OF CHIRK CASTLE AND CHIRKLAND, WITH A CHAPTER ON OFFA'S DYKE.

By MARGARET MAHLER. With 16 Illustrations. 6s. net
(Bell.)

Miss Mahler's painstaking history of Chirk Castle principally covers the period between 1165, the date of the Battle of Crogen between Henry II. and the Welsh, and the Civil War, when it was occupied by both Parliamentary and Royalist troops in turn. During the interval between these dates the Castle and its surrounding country was by no means without history. "The men of Chirk have met Owain Glyndwr on the field of battle, and have helped to turn the scale at Bosworth, and the women have come to their doors to gaze at French prisoners taken at Pontiers or Agincourt," we are told. But Miss Mahler's book probably has value rather for its records of more peaceful times, and more particularly in the chapters on work and wages the reader will find much of curious interest. The volume is excellently produced and is illustrated from photographs and old prints.

THE NORTH-EAST PROSPECT OF CHIRK CASTLE, IN DENBIGHSHIRE.

From A History of Chirk and Chirkland (Bell).

CHIRK CASTLE FROM THE NORTH-EAST
(From a print in the British Museum).

From Annals of the Strand (Chapman & Hall).

THE SAVOY CHAPEL

ANNALS OF THE STRAND.

By E. BERESFORD
CHANCELLOR. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
(Chapman & Hall.)

Probably the two most generally interesting streets in London are the Strand and Fleet Street, and Mr. Beresford Chancellor has become the historian of both, for his "Annals of the Strand" is to be followed immediately by his "Annals of Fleet Street." He has levied toll on all the best records relating to the Strand and its many byways, and has arranged his material with admirable lucidity. Having dealt with the topography of it and told of its famous inhabitants, he devotes two chapters to the streets north of the Strand, and two to the streets south of it; then passes to histories of the Savoy, of Somerset House, the Strand churches, Inns of Court, theatres, notable houses, and the taverns and coffee-houses. It is curiously interesting to follow the changes that have come over the street, from the far-off years when the river lapped all along one side of it, through the picturesque days of Elizabeth, down almost to our own times; but there should have been something said about Henry S. Leigh, "the poet of the Strand," who lived in it and filled many of his poems with its echoes; and did not Charles Keene live somewhere along the Strand, too? But these are the only two omissions from a book that is otherwise the fullest and most interesting history of this part of London that we have ever read. The illustrations are numerous and well selected, and excellently reproduced; they present a vivid panoramic view of the Strand of yesterday and the day before, and fill one with a hankering after its old quaintness, its old air of quietness, a hankering that Mr. Chancellor's glamorous and delightful narrative pleasantly intensifies.

From Cracow

by Leonard Lepsy, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish shortly.

HIGH ALTAR IN THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY.

Works by Robert Louis Stevenson

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES

ORIGINAL EDITION, Fcap. 8vo, price 5s.

With 12 full-page Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations in Black and White by JESSE WILCOX SMITH. 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

POCKET EDITION, with Introduction by ANDREW LANG, and Portrait. Fcap. 8vo, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, 3s. net.

This Edition contains an Introduction specially written by Mr. Andrew Lang, and a portrait of Alison Cunningham, to whom Stevenson dedicated the book.
"My second Mother, my first Wife,
The angel of my infant life."

The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde
Fcap. 8vo, sewed. 1s., Cloth, 1s. 6d.

The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde

With other Fables

Crown 8vo, bound in Buckram, with Gilt Top, 5s. net.

Silver Library Edition—Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Pocket Edition—Fcap. 8vo, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, 3s. net.

MORE NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS The Dynamiter

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON and FANNY VAN DE GRIFT STEVENSON

Crown 8vo, bound in Buckram, with Gilt Top, 5s. net.

Silver Library Edition—Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Pocket Edition—Fcap. 8vo, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, 3s. net.

THE WRONG BOX

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE

Crown 8vo, bound in Buckram, with Gilt Top, 5s. net.

Silver Library Edition—3s. 6d.

Pocket Edition—Fcap. 8vo, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, 3s. net.

Longmans, Green & Co., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM Mr. ANDREW MELROSE'S SPRING BOOKS.

DR. JOHNSON AND FANNY BURNLEY. By C. BREWSTER TINKER.

Demy 8vo, Cloth. Illustrated. Price, 7s. 6d. net.

BIG GAME HUNTING IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

By J. DUNBAR BRUNTON, M.D.

Medium 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Top, with Numerous Illustrations and Maps. Price, 12s. 6d. net.

A book which is not the record of a professional hunter, but the simple recollections of hunting experiences in the recreations of a medical man. A leading London paper "discovered" Dr. Brunton, the published stories of his big game hunts led to a public demand for more, and this book.

NEW NOVELS AT 6s.

THE TRAGIC PRINCE.

By A. R. WEEKES, Author of "Faith Unfaithful," and

R. K. WEEKES, Author of "Fellow Prisoners."

Another of the small list of novels which were submitted to the adjudicators in Mr. Melrose's Prize Novel Competition.

THE DEVIL'S WIND.

By PATRICIA WENTWORTH (MRS. G. F. DILLON),

Author of "A Little More than Kin," "A Marriage under the Terror," etc.

THE DAMSEL DARK.

By CLARA TURNBULL.

This "first novel" took a high place in the selected MSS. which were submitted to Messrs. A. C. Benson, A. E. W. Mason, and W. J. Locke, in Mr. Melrose's Prize Novel Competition.

In his report, Mr. A. C. Benson, while putting "The House of Liston" first, says, "From the point of view of direct and popular appeal, 'The Damsel Dark' is probably the most effective."

THE WHITE SHRINE.

By GERALD VILLIERS-STUART,

Author of "The Soul of Cressie," etc.

Popular Edition of a well-known Book.

LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH.

By ALEXANDER BRYCE, M.D.

Cheap Edition—Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price, 2s. 6d. net.

ANDREW MELROSE, PUBLISHER, LONDON.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

With 30 pages of Illustrations, 2 Portraits, and 3 Maps.
Small royal 8vo. 10/6 net.

The Gambia

Its History, together with its Geographical, Geological, and Ethnographical Conditions, and a description of the birds, beasts, and fishes found therein. By HENRY TENNICK REEF, C.M.G., M.F.C.I., F.P.G.S., F.A.S., &c.

Scotsman—"Mr. Reeve's volume should have no slight influence in determining whether we should con- tinue to put with one of the main highways of West Africa commerce."

With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo. 3/6 net.

Murphy: a Message to Dog Lovers

By MAJOR GAMBRIER-PARRY, Author of "The Pageant of my Day," &c.

Punch—"It is a simple history of an Irish terrier, a beautiful and supremely intelligent animal who devoted to the service and joy of his master an unpassable genius for love and friendship. Let dog lovers all the world over read this book. They will be as grateful for it as I am."

With a Portrait from a Drawing by GEORGE RICHMOND, R.A.
Small demy 8vo. 7/6 net.

Edward King, 60th Bishop of Lincoln

By the Right Hon. G. W. F. RUSSELL.

Church Times—"Mr. Russell has done his work sympathetically and well, not only writing in his own delightful and easy style, but giving to the world a really good picture of Edward King."

Large post 8vo. 7/6 net.

Men and Measures: a History of Weights and Measures, Ancient and Modern

By EDWARD NICHOLSON, F.R.C.S., F.C.S., Surgeon-Lieut.-Colonel, Army Medical Department, Author of "The Story of our Weights and Measures," &c.

Spectator—"This highly interesting history. Not the least interesting part of the book is to be found in the curious differences brought about by local customs and other causes."

With a Map and 48 Illustrations. 8vo. 12/6 net.

Plain Towns of Italy: the Cities of Old Venetia

By EGERTON R. WILLIAMS, Author of "Hill Towns of Italy."

Large post 8vo. 5/- net.

A Nurse's Life in War and Peace

By E. C. LAURENCE, R.R.C., With a Preface by SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., &c.

Large post 8vo. 7/6 net.

The Child of the Dawn.

By ARTHUR C. BENSON, Author of "The Upton Letters," "From a College Window," "Beside Still Waters," &c.

Large post 8vo. 6/- net. With 5 Maps.

Morocco in Diplomacy.

By F. D. MOREL, "Author of 'Great Britain and the Congo,'" "Nigeria: Its People and its Problems," &c.

NEW 6/- FICTION.

The House of Robershaye

By EMMA F. BROOKE, Author of "A Superfluous Woman," &c.

Manchester Guardian—"A vivid, nervous story, written with a curious studied intensity. Mrs. Brooke's style is sometimes exceedingly right and fine and sometimes has a quality only to be described by the old-fashioned word elegant."

Denham's: or a Web of Life

By ALEXANDRA WATSON, Author of "The Case of Letitia," &c.

Country Life—"A simple, unpretentious story of considerable charm."

In the Press.

The Common Touch

By AUSTIN PHILLIPS, Author of "Red Tape," &c.

Love Gilds the Scene, and Women Guide the Plot

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE, Authors of "Incomparable Bellairs," "French Nan," &c.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

From The Making of London (Clarendon Press).

PRINCE HENRY'S ROOM
(17, FLEET STREET).

to do more than testify emphatically to the merits of this Golden Treasury of English Prose. Professor Cowl's nice yet catholic taste, his sense of proportion and of harmony, his judgment, both critical and distinguished, have produced a work which all true lovers of literature will read and prize, and re-read with increasing gratitude. One hopes that it will find its way into the hands of all students of English literature without being degraded into a text book for examination purposes.

THE MAKING OF LONDON.

By SIR LAURENCE GOMME, F.S.A. With 13 Illustrations 3s. 6d. net. (Clarendon Press)

That Sir Laurence Gomme is an authority upon London goes almost without saying, and that he wields an effective pen he has already proved in his work upon "The Governance of London." In the little book now before us, the author devotes his attention principally to the more picturesque side of London's history, and very attractive indeed does he make it. Starting from the very earliest times the author devotes most attention to the London of the Romans, Saxons and Normans, but he includes also chapters which bring his account down to the present day. In a sense the book is designed as an introduction to a new edition—now preparing—of "The Governance of London," but it is entirely complete in itself and we know of no other convenient volume so attractive at once for the student and for the general reader.

THE DEBTOR.

By MARY ANGELA DICKINS. 6s. (Hutchinson & Co.)

Mary Chichester is a young widow who keeps a tea shop in London. She has led a very unhappy life until she meets John Donaldson, an aviator, to whom she becomes engaged. Donaldson is obliged to go over to America on business and

AN ANTHOLOGY OF POETIC PROSE.

By PROFESSOR COWL. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

The compiler of an anthology, whether of verse or prose, stands in greater danger than the author of an original work, however humble. The one enters the lists as it were with a challenge; the other comes before "the public" rather in the guise of a suppliant. For if a man give you the best of himself, however poor that best may be, you may not,

with so much justice, complain as if he fail to give you the best of others, and as to what is the best there may be many opinions. Quot homines, tot sententiae. To represent with any degree of adequateness the vast wealth of English Imaginative Prose within the compass of some three hundred pages was a task of exceptional difficulty. Professor Cowl has accomplished that task with conspicuous success, for while there are, as it was inevitable that there should be, some beloved and cherished passages omitted, there is scarcely anything here which one would willingly sacrifice to secure the inclusion of them, from the beautiful Extract from Sir John Mandeville's "Voyages and Travel," which opens the present volume to that from Fiona Macleod's "The Silence of Amor," which closes it. If one took up the book with some trepidation, one laid it down with a sense of gratitude and relief because Professor Cowl had proved himself so worthy of the task which he had undertaken. Within the brief limits of this review it is impossible Frontispiece from The Book Lover's Anthology (Clarendon Press).

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

From The Life of John Henry, Cardinal Newman (Longmans).

THE WORKS OF Robert Louis Stevenson

The House of Cassell were the Original Publishers of the undernoted volumes of "Stevenson's" Works, for which they still hold the copyright.

TREASURE ISLAND

Edition de Luxe—The most sumptuous edition of this masterpiece ever published. With 12 Coloured Plates by JOHN CAMERON. Limited to 250 numbered copies. Parchment gilt, gilt top, 30s. net. Illustrated Edition, with 12 Coloured Plates, by JOHN CAMERON. 7s. 6d. net. Library Edition, with 50 Original Illustrations by WAT PAGET, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. Popular Edition cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition, on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

THE BLACK ARROW

With 8 Full-page Illustrations by H. M. PAGET. Library Edition, cloth, 6s. Popular Edition, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

KIDNAPPED

With 16 Full-page Illustrations by W. HOLT, R.S.A. Library Edition, cloth, 6s. Popular Edition cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE

Illustrated Edition. With 12 Coloured Plates by WAT PAGET. Cloth gilt, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. Library Edition. With 10 Full-page Illustrations by W. HOLT, R.S.A., 6s. Popular Edition, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

CATRIONA

A Sequel to "Kidnapped". With 16 Illustrations by W. HOLT, R.S.A. Library Edition, cloth, 6s. Popular Edition, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

ISLAND NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

With 28 Illustrations by GOLDEN BROWN and W. HATFIELD. Library Edition, 6s. Popular Edition, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Pocket Edition on thin paper, 6d. 4, cloth limp, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet call, 4s. 6d. net.

A TEMPTING FICTION LIST:

VIOLET FORSTER'S LOVER

THE ENGLISHWOMAN

CASTLES IN SPAIN

RORY OF WILLOW BEACH

A QUIET HOLIDAY

Richard Marsh, 6s.

Alice & Claude Askew, 6s.

Ruby M. Ayres, 6s.

Valance Patriarche, 3s. 6d.

Oona H. Ball, 1s. net.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LONDON, E.C.

Please ask for
Pitman's Spring List

THE NEW DRAMATIC LIST NOW READY.

WHO'S WHO IN THE THEATRE

A Biographical Record of the Contemporary Stage.

Over
780 Pages.

Compiled and Edited by JOHN PARKER.

Cloth, 6 - net.
Leather, 8' 6 net.

BIOGRAPHICAL SECTION—Calendar of notable Theatrical Events—Full Details of the New Play Productions and important Revivals of the year in London, the Provinces, New York, and Paris—Reviews of the Dramatic Year in London and New York—Genealogical Tables of famous Theatrical Families, compiled by J. M. Bulloch—Exhaustive Dramatic and Musical Obituary—Full Particulars of the principal Theatres in London, New York, Paris, and Berlin—Seating Plans of the leading London Theatres, &c., &c.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM: Its History and Treasures. A View of the Origins of that Great Institution, Sketches of its Early Benefactors, and a Survey of the Priceless Objects preserved within its walls.

By HENRY C. SHELLEY.

Author of "Inns and Taverns of Old London," &c. Demy 8vo., handsome cloth gilt, gilt top, with 30 Full-page Plate Illustrations.

12 6
net.

THE ROMANTIC STORY OF THE MAYFLOWER Pilgrims and its Place in the Life of To-day.

By A. C. ADDISON.

With 50 Full-page Plates. Royal 8vo., cloth gilt, gilt top.

7' 6
net.

JAPAN OF THE JAPANESE.

By Professor J. H. LONGFORD.

Author of "The Story of Korea," &c. Imperial 8mo., cloth gilt, gilt top. With 29 Full-page Plates and Coloured Map.

6/-
net.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES: Their History, Resources and Progress.

By ALGERNON E. ASPINALL.

Author of "The Pocket Guide to the West Indies," Secretary to the West India Committee. Demy 8vo., cloth gilt, gilt top, with Map and many Full-page Plate Illustrations.

7' 6
net.

THE LETTERS OF PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY. Collected and Edited by ROGER INGPEN. New and Cheaper Edition with additional matter and corrections. In 2 vols., demy 8vo., cloth, with Photographs and Illustrations. 12 6 net. Hand made Paper Edition, 21 net.

12/6
net.

MYSTICISM & MAGIC IN TURKEY.

By LUCY M. J. GARNETT.

Author of "Turkey of the Ottomans." Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, gilt top, with Illustrations.

6/-
net.

OLD COUNTRY INNS.

By HENRY P. MASKELL and E. W. GREGORY.

Large crown 8vo., cloth, with numerous Illustrations. New and Cheaper Edition, with List of Inns, Glossary of Curious Signs, and List of "Reformed" Inns.

3/6
net.

FRENCH PROSE WRITERS OF THE XIXth CENTURY AND AFTER. With Biographical and critical notices in French, and Literary and Bibliographical notes in English.

3/-
net.

By VICTOR LEULIETTE, B.-ès-L., A.K.C.

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS.

London: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD., 1, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1912

their marriage is delayed till his return, but in the interval Mary discovers she is suffering from heart disease and cannot live longer than a few months. She conceals this terrible fact from her future husband lest he should worry about her and be unable to attend to his work. Miss Dickens strikes a vivid contrast between the utter unselfishness of her nature and the complete selfishness of his. It comes to pass that a miracle converts Mary, a non-believer, to the Catholic religion, and she steadfastly remains a devout Catholic, though it separates her from the man she loves. The characters are well drawn; the heroine possesses a fine and admirably revealed personality; and though the story leaves us a little unconvinced, it is cleverly written and full of interest.

THE BODY OF HIS DESIRE.

By MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED. 6s. (Cassell.)

The sub-title of this novel is "A Romance of the Soul," a description that helps to prepare the reader for the discovery that the story contains only three characters of importance: the Rev. Reginald Chalmers, to whose evangelical sermons all London is flocking, Mr. Donck Van Dreen, a mysterious lodger in Bloomsbury, deeply interested in psychic and psychological phenomena, and Neseta, the heroine, who is not a character in the usual sense of the word, but the mysterious incarnation of Mr. Chalmers's physical revolt against the asceticism of his teaching. It is the highest praise of Mrs. Praed's skill to say that she has sustained the interest of this weird romance to the very end, and that she has in an admirable degree realised Coleridge's classical definition of the successful treatment of the supernatural by compelling in us a willing suspension of disbelief. The author has very thin ice to skate over, and occasionally disaster seems inevitable in the conversations between Chalmers and his Desire Incarnate, but she shows on the whole quite remarkable adroitness in avoiding a plunge into the ludicrous. Van Dreen is sketched with a cunning vagueness and hint of mystery entirely in keeping with this unusual story.

From The Body of his Desire (Cassell).

"HIS HEAD BENT NEARER TO THE DIVAN."

From The Life and Work of Frank Holl (Methuen).

"DID YOU EVER KILL ANYBODY, FATHER?"

THE LIFE AND WORK OF FRANK HOLL.

By A. M. REYNOLDS. With 20 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Methuen.)

Mrs. A. M. Reynolds's life of her father is not only a charming monument of filial piety, it is also a well-balanced and very readable piece of biography. It contains in addition some sound, but very naturally—perhaps rather too appreciative criticisms of his work. In this latter respect, however, the author sees clearly enough that "his lasting fame as an artist will rest on his portraits alone. It was in these latter, unquestionably, that his genius found its truest expression—in these that he was most truly and purely an artist." Holl was, indeed, naturally and pre-eminently a portrait-painter—and his also was a virile and highly attractive character, which is well pictured by the author, who may be congratulated upon a singularly taking piece of work.

WILLIAM MORRIS:

His Homes and Haunts. By the COUNTESS OF WARWICK. With 12 Drawings in Crayon by A. FORESTIER and 4 other Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net. (Jack.)

The Countess of Warwick may be warmly congratulated upon her excellent little biography of William Morris, which has just been added to Messrs. Jack's well-known "Pilgrim Series." The author presents us with an admirable picture of her hero in the short space that the scope of the series will allow for, but, by the exercise of unusual powers of selection, she seems to us to have included all that is essential for a proper understanding of the life and art of Morris. Mr. A. Forestier's twelve illustrations are admirable.

THE SILVER HORDE; THE SPOILERS; and THE BARRIER.

By REX BEACH. 1s. net each. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Rex Beach is an American author who is widely read in his own country and gives every promise of an equal popularity in England. Of the three books now before us, all, we understand, have been previously published in America, but all now see the light for the first time on "this side." In reality, therefore, these are books for which we might have expected to have to pay 6s. from the first, but at 1s. they are probably destined to be more widely read and—for the series is cloth bound—they are hardly less durable in character. The author's work is always spirited and entirely readable and he has considerable powers of characterisation on broad lines. "The Silver Horde," "The Spoilers," and "The Barrier" are all stories of the Yukon country, the atmosphere of which is obtained to admiration. It is remarkably difficult to lay down any one of these books when once you have begun it, and all who care for strong and moving drama may be confident that their shillings will be well invested in Mr. Beach.

From The Heart of Life (Cassell). "I FELT THAT YOU WERE LOOKING AT ME, AND I WAS FLATTERED BY IT."

THE HEART OF LIFE.

By PIERRE DE COULEVAIN. Translated from the French by Alys Hallard. 6s. (Cassell & Co.)

For contemplative spirits who are really interested in the magic of nature, the subtleties of character, and the mystery of life this pleasant blend of novel, autobiography, travel-book, and philosophical dicta will possess considerable fascination. We are led in a leisurely and well-rewarded way through Switzerland, Savoy, Paris, etc., and are even more interested in the vision and philosophy of the guide and story-teller than in the leading characters of the essential tale. These are a young pair of seeming incompatibles, rather hastily divorced, who find by slow stages how much they really mean to each other. In this underlying tale there is only one crude incident, all the rest is subtle and delicate. The period is our own; indeed, radio-activity and modernism are amongst the interests. Unhappily on this side of the Channel we are seldom privileged to find so much mind and temperament in a novel. It is the work of an artist with the sense of wonder. There are certain incidental English interests, by the way, but the broad appeal is human and psychic. The translation and the English publication are good and kindly deeds.

LA LEG-ENDE
DES SIECLES.

Par VICTOR
HUGO. In
3 vols. With frontispieces. 1s.
net each (Nelson).

The French branch of the Nelson house seems to be as enterprising as its English parent, and the latest evidences of its activities is afforded by its republication of Victor Hugo's complete works in fifty-one volumes, at the remarkably low price of 1s. each. The volumes are of the convenient format already so well known in this country in connection with the Nelson sevenpenny reprints. They are prettily bound in cloth, and exceedingly well printed on good paper, while each possesses a coloured frontispiece. There should undoubtedly be a public in this country for so cheap and so attractive an edition of the works of one of the giants of French literature. "La Légende des Siècles," which represents Hugo's most considerable poetic achievement, is particularly well worthy of the attention of students of French

Cover design from The Silver Horde.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

Frontispiece from La Légende des Siècles—Vol. III.
(Nelson).

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1912

THROUGH THE POSTERN GATE:

A Romance in Seven Days. By FLORENCE L. BARCLAY.
With 9 illustrations in colour by F. H. TOWNSEND. 6s.
(Putnams.)

"Through the Postern Gate" is an idyllic love story, set in the pleasant surroundings of an old Cambridge garden, the action of which takes place in the course of one golden week. Mrs. Barclay describes, with remarkable delicacy of feeling, the love of a young man of twenty-six for a woman ten years his senior, and her gradual awakening to a realisation of her love for him. Unfortunately, the heroine has a duty—imaginary, perhaps, but still strongly felt—towards an elderly professor whose inseparable companion is an umbrella "of undecided figure." The seven days of happiness are threatened by the selfish intrigues of Miss Ann, the professor's sister, but—in an original and highly-effective manner, which we are pledged not to divulge—the author contrives a triumphantly happy ending. "Through the Postern Gate" is an exceedingly readable romance, and one with all the elements of popularity. It should, we think, outdo even its author's earlier novels in this respect.

"IT WAS ALWAYS YOU WANTED," SAID THE BOY."

from Through the Postern Gate
(Putnams)

a higher note and is the finest of the lot. These "Adventures" are not Mr. Chambers at his best, but they offer good entertainment, humorous and romantic, and are an admirable introduction to Paris and its suburbs.

From The Adventures of a Modest Man (Appleton).

"I REALISED THAT I WAS GOING TO KISS HER IF
SHE DIDN'T MOVE—AND SHE DIDN'T."

THE ADVENTURES OF A MODEST MAN.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. 6s. Illustrated. (Appleton.)

There is a pleasant flavour, reminiscent of love's young dream and life at twenty, in these short stories, all with happy endings, which Mr. Chambers has loosely fastened together in this volume. The quality varies. Sometimes the reader may be moved to mirth—over the stolen pig, for instance, and the Vassar College Summer School, and the man in the car who accidentally tied the shoe string of his fair neighbour to his own—at other times to quiet memories. "Dream-land," the story of a sculptor and of a soul and body, strikes

Frontispiece from For the Queen
by E. Phillips Oppenheim, which Messrs.
Ward, Lock will publish shortly.

LATEST NOVELS IN GREAT DEMAND

Published by STANLEY PAUL & Co. at Six Shillings each.

RHODA BROUGHTON

BETWEEN TWO STOOLS (Second Edition).

ARABELLA KENEALY

THE WOMAN-HUNTER (Second Edition).

DOUGLAS SLADEN

THE UNHOLY ESTATE (by the Author of "The Tragedy of the Pyramids," Eighth Edition).

ARCHIBALD MARSHALL

THE MYSTERY OF REDMARSH FARM (Third Edition).

THE LIFE OF CESARE BORGIA RAFAEL SABATINI. Illustrated. Second Edition. 16s. net.

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF THE VATICAN Dr ANGELO S. RAPPOPORT. Illustrated. Second Edition. 16s. net.

A WINTER HOLIDAY IN PORTUGAL By CAPT. GRANVILLE BARKER. Coloured frontispiece and 40 original drawings. 12s. 6d. net.

DAVID GARRICK & HIS FRENCH FRIENDS By Dr F. A. HEDGECOCK. 10s. 6d. net.

AN ACTOR'S NOTE BOOKS A Record of Some Memories, Friendships, Criticisms, and Experiences, of FRANK ARCHER. 7s. 6d. net.

WOMAN ADRIFT The Menace of Suffragism. By HAROLD OWEN. 6s.

STANLEY PAUL & Co., 31, Essex Street, London.

Mr. Fifield's Spring List.

THE SOLEMNIZATION OF JACKLIN: Some Adventures as the Search for Reality. A Novel. By Florence Farr. 6s.

THE EGO AND HIS OWN. By Max Stirner. 525 pages. 2s. 6d. net, postage, 4d. A new popular edition of this extraordinary book, containing the boldest statement extant of the philosophy of egoism.

THE BLOOD OF THE POOR: An Introduction to Christian Social Economics. By Godfrey Blount. 3s. 6d. net. "We welcome it as the work of a fresh, original, thought provoking mind." Sheffield Telegraph.

"A fine piece of stimulating argument . . . complete and convincing."—Oxford Chronicle.

A LIVING WAGE A NATIONAL NECESSITY: How best to get it. By C. C. Cotterill. 6d. net. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage, 1d. and 2d.

THE ENGLISH AGRICULTURAL LABOURER. By Rev. A. H. Baverstock. With Introduction by G. K. Chesterton. 6d. net. Postage, 1d.

NEW POETRY AND DRAMA.

SONGS OF JOY AND OTHERS. By William H. Davies. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage, 2d.

HELEN, AND OTHER POEMS. By Bernard Drew. 2s. 6d. net.

TRANSLATIONS FROM HEINE AND GOETHE. By P. G. I. Webb. 2s. 6d. net.

DRAKE IN CALIFORNIA. Ballads and Lays by Herman Scheffauer. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage, 2d.

BALLAD SONGS AND POEMS. By Evelyn Young. 1s. 6d. net.

THE MORNING'S CUP. By C. H. Frogley. Vellum wrappers. 1s. net.

METRED PLAYLETS. By Dr. Winslow Hall. 1s. net.

VALE: A Book of Verse. By Leonard Inkster. 1s. net.

THE CAP OF CARE. By James Pickering. 1s. net.

A MODERN CRUSADER: A Propaganda Play. By Mrs. J. A. Hobson. 1s. net.

DEMOCRACY AND THE CONTROL OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS. By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. 3d. net. Postage, 1d.

OF THE EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN. By Caroline A. Eccles. 3d. net. Postage, 1d.

THE VINEYARD. A Monthly Magazine devoted to the Literature of Peasant Life. 6d. net. Postage, 1d.

THE UTOPIAN. A Quarterly Magazine of Ideals. Edited by the Hon. Rollo Russell. 6d. net. Postage, 1d. October, January, April and July.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S BOOKS.

PITT AND NAPOLEON: Essays and Letters.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D.

Reader in Modern History, University of Cambridge. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. Ready immediately.

In this volume Dr. Rose presents a series of essays, supplementary to his life of William Pitt, and dealing with the characters and careers of Pitt and Napoleon. It will also contain a valuable selection of important new letters by and concerning Pitt.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF JONATHAN SWIFT.

Edited by F. ELINGTON BALL, Litt.D.

With an introduction by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Ossory. To be completed in six volumes. Demy 8vo 10s. 6d. net each. Vol. III. ready shortly. Vols. I. and II. already published.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

New Volumes.

BEDE'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY of ENGLAND.

Revised translation with introduction, Life and Notes, by A. M. SELLAR, late Vice-Principal Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. 5s. Now Ready.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE.

With Illustrative Notes, Analysis and an Index. Edited by J. A. GILES, D.C.L. 3s. 6d. Ready immediately.

London: G. BELL & SONS, LTD., York House, Portugal St., W.C.

From Sidgwick & Jackson's List.

Cr. 8vo] Four New Novels. [6s.

HERSELF. By ETHEL SIDGWICK. Author of "Promise"

TREACHEROUS GROUND. By JOHAN BOJER. Author of "The Power of a Lie"

THE WOMAN WONDERFUL. By WILFRED HEMERY. (All the above now ready)

A CANDIDATE FOR TRUTH. By J. D. BERESFORD. Author of "The Early History of Jacob Stahl," &c. [April 15.

New Drama.

RUTHERFORD & SON. By GITHA SOWERBY. (As performed at the Little Theatre.) Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

THE NEW SIN. By B. MACDONALD HASTINGS. (As performed at the Royalty Theatre.) Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. net. "The New Sin will rank among the most remarkable plays of recent years."—Morning Post.

Two Anthologies.

AN EASTER ANTHOLOGY. Collected, arranged and edited by Prof. WILLIAM KNIGHT. Fcap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MINIATURES. A collection of Nature Essays by G. A. B. DEWAR. Fcap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

General.

THE LIFEBOAT AND ITS STORY. By NOËL T. METHLEY, F.R.G.S. With over 70 Half-tone Illustrations. In designed cover. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

GARDEN DESIGN in THEORY & PRACTICE By MADELINE AGAR. With 4 Colour Plates, 2 Half-tones, and over 90 Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S GREAT POEM:

THE EVERLASTING MERCY.

"The Poem of the Century."—Evening Standard. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Fourth Impression.

3, ADAM STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON, W.C.

present work could stand alone as a complete history of the household fire, which of all the features of home has proved most important to the growth of human sentiment in these cold northern regions. The very name has, indeed, a tender significance, and our songs are full of the national conviction that :

“ Of all roads to happiness ever were tried
There's nane halt sae sure as ane's ain fireside.”

It was quite natural then that the fireplace should become the great object of decoration in northern Europe, from the twelfth century, when the introduction of chimneys encouraged architects to improve the inside of rooms, which had, to that time, been as full of wood smoke as a Highland cottage still is with the reek of peat. But the change did

From The Waverley Dickens
(Waverley Book Co.)

MR. VENUS.

CHIMNEYPICES AND INGLENOOKS.

By GUY CADOGAN ROTHERY. Illustrated. 6s net.
(L. Werner Laurie)

In the early chapters of his “Ceilings and their Decoration” Mr. Rothery gave us a very clear account of the beginnings of all things architectural. Even if his valuable sketch had not paved the way for the subsequent books of this series, Mr. Rothery’s methods are so thorough that the

From Chimneypieces and Ingle Nooks (Laurie).

ENGLISH 17TH CENTURY
CHIMNEYPICE FROM
BROMLEY-BY-BOW.

Frontispiece from The Woman with the Pack :
a Sketch in 3 Scenes and 1 Tableau, by Gertrude Vaughan, which Mr. Ham-
Smith will publish shortly.

THE HEAVY CROSS, BY CONSTANTIN ISENBERG
(by permission of Mr. Isenberg of the Doré Gallery).

not come all at once, for even as late as the sixteenth century Holinshead marvels “ at the multitude of chimnies laterlie erected,” whereas in his “ young daies there were not above two or three, if so manie, in most uplandish townes of the realm . . . but eeh one made his fire against a reredosse in the hall, where he dined and dressed his meat.” Mr. Rothery’s book is full of good pictures.

STAR LORE OF ALL AGES :

A Collection of Myths, Legends, and Facts concerning the Constellations of the Northern Hemisphere. By WILLIAM TYLER OLCOTT. With 58 Full-page Illustrations and 50 in the Text. 10s. 6d. net. (Putnams.)

Mr. Olcott has written two earlier volumes—“A Field Book of the Stars” and “In Starland with a Three-inch Telescope”—which serve to some extent as introductions to “Star Lore of all Ages.” This last volume, however, is essentially complete in itself and it is perfectly capable of being intelligently studied by one who has not read its predecessors. In addition to this, it is bound to arouse the reader’s interest. The author’s avowed object is to tell “ the history of the stars and how the constellations came to be named,” for which purpose he has drawn on myth, legend, and fact alike. The volume contains much valuable material in a readable form, and a feature is the fine series of photographic reproductions from the paintings of old masters, which forms the bulk of the full-page illustrations.

CANADIAN MASTERPIECES

PUBLISHED BY THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED, TORONTO.

1. FRAGMENTS OF SAM SLICK.
L. A. Burpee.
2. A LITTLE BOOK OF CANADIAN ESSAYS.
L. A. Burpee.
3. SONGS OF FRENCH CANADA.
L. A. Burpee.
4. BY CANADIAN STREAMS.
L. A. Burpee.
5. FLOWERS FROM A CANADIAN
GARDEN.
L. A. Burpee.
6. A CENTURY OF CANADIAN SONNETS.
L. J. Burpee.
7. HUMOR OF THE NORTH.
L. J. Burpee.
8. THE ROMANCE OF CANADIAN TOWNS.
L. J. Burpee.
9. HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN CANADA.
L. J. Burpee.
10. CANADIAN PATHFINDERS.
L. J. Burpee.
11. CANADIAN ELOQUENCE.
L. J. Burpee.

UNIFORM WITH ABOVE—

12. MADAME JANVIER'S CHURCH.
Mary E. Hickson.
13. CANADA MY HOME, and Other Poems.
Grant Balfour.
14. THE OTHER WISE MAN.
By Van Dyke

All the above are obtainable in three styles of binding.

CLOTH	-	-	-	-	2/-	NET EACH.
LAMBSKIN	-	-	-	-	4/-	NET EACH.
VELVET PERSIAN, LIMP	-	-	-	-	6/-	NET EACH.

HEAD OFFICE, TORONTO, CANADA.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED.
MANSION HOUSE CHAMBERS, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, E.C.

From Campaigns on the North-West Frontier
(Murray).

A FRONTIER HOUSE: GURKHA PIQUET.

A YACHTSWOMAN'S CRUISES.

By MAUDE SPEED.
Illustrated. 6s. net.
(Longmans.)

Mrs. Speed is an enthusiastic sailor, and whether she is cruising about the Channel with her husband in a 6-ton cutter or an 11-ton steamer, or voyaging on a liner to more distant parts, is full of praise for the sea. As for sea-sickness, "these few tips may be of use (writes Mrs. Speed).—Never allow them (the sufferers) to go below if there is any motion. Keep them looking at the line of horizon and nibbling dry biscuits, and if they begin turning pale make them sing—lustily, for all they are worth, and incessantly.

My sister once felt ill when crossing from Sark to Guernsey in a sailing-boat, and said she kept the sickness off entirely by singing to the two boatmen all the time." So, list you, landsmen all, and when in trouble on the vast deep sing for all your worth, and hang the consequences. Mrs. Speed chats quite pleasantly to the reader of her yachting experiences, and of her visits to Morocco, Lisbon, Sicily, and the Near East; and the simplicity of these travellers' tales is their chiefest recommendation. There must be many stay-at-homes who will enjoy the "Yachtswoman's Cruises" and be happy in the company of their author. All good sailors will, of course, appreciate the book.

THE PILGRIM KAMIMITA.

By KARL GJELLERUP. Translated by JOHN E. LOGIE.
6s. net. (Heinemann.)

If the "Arabian Nights" and "The Light of Asia" could by any conceivable process be rolled into one, the result might be something like this very remarkable and interesting story. The author has dived deep into Buddhist lore, and he has grasped, we should say, to an almost uncanny degree, the peculiar ways of thought and feeling of the Orient, its love of the transcendental, its perception of some mysterious connection between Nature and the souls of men. And throughout the whole of this, to us Occidentals, strange mixture, there runs an exquisite feeling for the beauty and poetry of life. The scene on the "terrace of the sorrowless trees," where the blood-red blossoms float down, is full of the witchery of a Chopin nocturne. We can almost catch the odour of the blossoms of the night lotus and feel the presence of "the mounting of mountains, the place of eternal snows, the resting-place of the holy ones." To this earthly motif a spiritual one is added—the magic influence of the Buddha, without whom the exalted lover degenerates into sottishness, and through whom the vile Thug, or worse than a Thug, ascends to the heights of holiness. The plot follows a well-worn path, but this path is so full of the glamour of the East and the heroine is so far removed from the ordinary ruck of humanity that we follow her fortunes with unflagging interest. From the moment when, like Nausicaa, she is discovered playing at ball, to the time when she is reunited to the lover so unworthy of her, according to our ideas, her poetic and yet most human personality dominates the field.

CAMPAIGNS ON THE NORTH WEST FRONTIER.

By CAPTAIN H. L. NEVILL, D.S.O. With Maps. 15s. net.
(Murray.)

Lord Roberts, in a Foreword, recommends this short history of all the campaigns on the North-West Frontier to soldiers, and "to those who may be concerned in the administration of our policy on that wild border." And, doubtless, all soldiers and Indian Civil officials will find much that is valuable to them in Captain Nevill's admirably ordered chapters. But there should be a wider public, for, as the author very properly reminds us: "Ignorance of India and its affairs has been a standing disgrace in the past to the bulk of the British nation," and Captain Nevill, by the avoidance of over much military detail has done his best to arouse the interest of the non-military reader. Moreover the modesty of the author, and the utter absence of the tone of the "expert" and the note of professional superiority—things so tiresome to the plain civilian that he is frankly bored by a large number of volumes by military men—make this history of 'the Indian Frontier' was particularly acceptable to the average man. Captain Nevill's quite relevant speculations on the future form an interesting conclusion to the book, and a full set of maps, in addition to numerous illustrations and diagrams of various engagements, increase our obligations to the author.

From A Yachtswoman's Cruises (Longmans).

WAREHAM, POOLE HARBOUR.

From To-day in Egypt (Hurst & Blackett).

SUGAR INDUSTRY OF NAG-HAWADI:
THE DISCHARGE OF CANE ON THE MILL

TO-DAY IN EGYPT:

Its Administration, People and Politics. By ALFRED CUNNINGHAM Illustrated 12s 6d net. (Hutchinson.)

So many travel-books—both of the lighter and the heavier kind—have taken Egypt for part, at any rate, of their inspiration that we were a little sceptical about Mr. Cunningham's "To-day in Egypt." That was before we had opened the book, however. Once we had got into it we found it decidedly original in subject-matter and attractive in treatment. The volume is a careful study of the present political condition of Egypt, its public services, finance, and trade, together with a couple of chapters on the Soudan and "Our Position in Egypt." The author believes, and points out with much logic and force, that "the presence of Lord Kitchener will not only guarantee protection to natives and Europeans with vested interests in Egypt, it will ensure that the administration of every department which makes for the progress of the country and its prosperity will be faithfully, honestly and energetically carried out in the best interests of all. . . . The following pages are intended to show something of the task Lord Kitchener has before him, and to enable the British public to gain an insight into Egypt as it actually is to-day, divested of the mantle of glamour thrown over it by enterprising tourist agencies, and to realise, in the light of municipal progress and essentials of civilisation, some of its needs." All who are interested in the administration of our Empire should read this remarkably interesting and thought-provoking work.

JAPAN OF THE JAPANESE.

By JOSEPH H. LONGFORD. 6s. net. Illustrated. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.)

Mr. Longford, late H.M. Consul at Nagasaki, and now Professor of Japanese at King's College, London, has given us in these three hundred pages a book that makes for liberal enlightenment. It represents the experience and the study of many years, and at every stage reveals the hand and mind of one who is master of his subject, one whose presentation is characterised by both sympathy and discrimination. Most people know in a general way that the modern evolution of Japan is an amazing romance, but with all that has been said and written on this fascinating theme popular knowledge thereof remains vague or incorrect in a number of essentials. The heart and secret of the Island Empire are very far from being understood in the West even yet. Thus, of the intimate home lives of the Japanese, Mr. Longford himself admits that we know no more now than we did forty years ago. But his book undoubtedly enables us to see well inward into Japan. We have, first of all, a detailed study of the country and people, followed by an expressive historical sketch, with chapters on the Imperial family, the nobility, and the samurai; then an exceedingly interesting account of the Japanese women and their evolution, pages on social institutions, language and literature, poetry and drama, Press, law, police and prisons, navy and army, transit, industry, trade, and other importances. The developments often read like romance. Much in the story is of special and peculiar interest to the English reader. It is good to possess a work that so capably treats a great subject, and so agreeably widens ways of knowledge.

From Japan of the Japanese (Pitman).

ENTRANCE TO SHINTO SHRINE NEAR YOKOHAMA.

From My Adventures among South Sea Cannibals (Seeley), reviewed in THE BOOKMAN for March, 1912.

AMBRYN IDOLS.

THROUGH TIMBUCTU AND ACROSS THE GREAT SAHARA.

By CAPTAIN A. H. W. HEYWOOD, 16s. net. (Seeley, Service & Co., Ltd.)

This is an account of a journey which the author made from Sierra Leone to the source of the Niger, whence he followed the course of that river to Goa and finally penetrated across the Sahara to Algiers. His purpose was to ascertain how far it would be possible and feasible to run a railway across the desert, and he comes to the conclusion that such a line, even if almost insurmountable difficulties did not stand in the way of its construction, could serve very little purpose. Into his travels of 3,758 miles, however, he managed to pack much keen and sensitive observation, and much good sport with big game; and this record of his experiences, glowing with the memory of dangers faced and difficulties overcome, should find a ready welcome wherever the spirit of the true British sportsman is appreciated. To the general reader the most interesting chapters will be those in which the author describes his seventy-five days in the Sahara itself.

THE WAVERLEY DICKENS.

The Posthumous Papers of The Pickwick Club. By CHARLES DICKENS, with Introduction by ANDREW LANG, D.Litt., and 3 Illustrations in Colour by FRED BARNARD, and 8 by CHARLES PEARS.—THE ADVENTURES OF OLIVER TWIST, by CHARLES DICKENS, with Introduction by A. C. BENSON, C.V.O., M.A., etc., and Frontispiece in Colour by FRED BARNARD, and 4 Illustrations by CHARLES PEARS.—Complete in 30 Vols. Instalment price, 75s. (Waverley Book Company.)

The Waverley Dickens, of which the first three volumes have been sent to us, gives every promise of being an edition in every way worthy of the genius of the great writer. The principal features of the edition—the introductions by distinguished modern novelists and critics, the colour reproductions of Fred Barnard's illustrations, and the 120 new character studies by Charles Pears—have already been announced in the pages of THE BOOKMAN, and there remains little for us to say. But now that we have seen them we have no doubt whatever that the volumes will be a lasting joy to every book-lover. They are of convenient size, light to the hand, and printed in a manner which we have never seen equalled in books of the price. Mr. Ralph Hall Caine, the general editor of the series, and Mr. Charles Home MacCall, its designer, may be warmly congratulated on so happy a result of their labours

From Through Timbuctu and Across the Great Sahara (Seeley).

THE SPRING OF EL QUETTARA.

THE TAILED HEADHUNTERS OF NIGERIA.

By A. J. N. TREMEARNE. 16s. net. (Seeley, Service & Co., Ltd.)

The author tells us that he had always wanted to go to West Africa; and when, in 1900, he was offered a commission as a Special Service officer in the Ashanti Expedition, he eagerly seized the opportunity of visiting that fascinating country. And, although upon this occasion his sojourn was but a short one, the call of the coast was too strong for him, and he very quickly returned to it, this time making his way to Northern Nigeria. Since then he has served in different parts of Western Africa not only as a military and a police officer, but also in political and judicial capacities, and he may, therefore, justifiably claim a more perfect knowledge of his subject than most of his fellow travellers. The result is a portly, well-equipped and freely-illustrated volume, full of valuable and fresh information concerning the habits and customs of the native tribes, who, it would appear, are not nearly so black as they are painted. The book is indispensable to students of anthropology; but Major Tremearne's picturesque and human style should assure it, also, a place upon the shelf of the general reader with a taste for fireside travels.

A HISTORY OF PAINTING.

By HALDANE MACFALL. Vol. 8 7s 6d. net (Jack)

In our article on Mr. Morrison's monumental "Painters of Japan," to be found in a recent number of THE BOOKMAN,

From The Tailed Headhunters of Nigeria.
(Seeley).

THE GREAT NORTH ROAD
TO KUMASI.

Frontispiece from Rock Gardens (Williams & Norgate)
(of which a new edition will be issued shortly).

the hope was expressed that some day Art will come to be with us, what it has for centuries been to the Japanese, a permeating and essential influence in our everyday lives. There are many signs that point to the accomplishment of this pious desire, and not the least amongst them is the welcome that has been accorded to Mr. Haldane Macfall's "History of Painting," with two hundred plates in colour, of which we have now received the eighth and last volume, and over which the writer of this note has spent more hours than he cares to admit. Dealing with "The Modern Genius," from Crome and Turner to the post-impressionism of Cezanne, Van Gogh and Gauguin, Mr. Macfall again impresses us by the healthy eclecticism and broad sympathy of his outlook. Soldier first, artist and novelist next, and man of the world always, he is no mere art critic using the shibboleths and catch-phrases of a cult. There is no nonsense about him. He is the sane, highly-trained, judicial minded onlooker offering himself as guide, and if we reject his offer so much the worse for us. And, whilst we are on this subject, we may mention a rather amusing slip which has been made by a contemporary anent the dedication of this last volume of Mr. Macfall's "History." The writer, "Bernard Lintot," accuses him of snobbishness for paying this tribute to a mere duchess, to wit, Her Grace of Rutland, praising him in the same breath for dedicating another volume to that great artist, Yvette Guilbert. Of the former Mr. "Lintot" speaks as one "whose connection with art is as debatable as her connection with society is certain." Is it conceivable that any contemporary art-critic, even if he does hail from "No. 1, Grub Street," should be unaware of the fact that the Duchess of Rutland was once the Marchioness of Granby, and that, in that incarnation, she was recognised as a portrait-painter of outstanding merit? We may live in a democratic age, but surely that is no reason why duchesses should not have their due as well as singers of French ballads.

From The Betts of Wortham in Suffolk,
1480-1905 (Lane).

WORTHAM MANOR (BY KIND PERMISSION OF PAUL B. FEARON, ESQ.).

THE BETTS OF WORTHAM IN SUFFOLK, 1480-1905.

By KATHARINE FRANCES DOUGHTY With 25 Illustrations
12s. 6d. net (Lane)

This story of an ancient and now, unhappily, extinct country family may not appear, at first blush, particularly attractive to the general reader. The Betts, as a family, never came into any great prominence; they were worthy, hard working people with a considerable sense of their duty towards their country, but they were hardly distinguished. But it is such books as Miss Doughty's which supply much of the real stuff of history. The author's transcriptions of the charters and correspondence of the family afford many details of the highest interest to those who may wish to reconstruct the position and daily surroundings of a household of the "landed gentry" during more than four centuries. Not the least interesting portion of the book consists of the numerous farming accounts and household wages. On May 20th, 1656, for instance, we find that 4s. was the sum paid for 1 lb. of butter, and 5s. for half a load of straw, while "on March 25th, 1664, servants' wages are entered:

	£	s.	d.
"Joseph his half years wages ..	2	10	0
Katherin Smith her
wages ..	1	0	0

"Another man Sam received £1 15s. The men's wages were considerably more than double the wage paid half a century before . . . and the yearly wage of women servants has risen proportionably."

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS.

By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY.
6s. (Cassell & Co.).

Here we have a Canadian heroine and a Canadian environment, though the latter is somewhat shadowy. There are happenings of a kind no longer possible, apparently, in the fiction of the blasé Mother Country. There is a good run of sensations, beginning with the kidnapping of the infant daughter of a rich employer. The path of revenge, the course, or rather courses, of true love, the complications, the ordeals, and the happy ending are all of a kind which serious home novelists have been afraid to think of in our somewhat cynical generation. Certain episodes would be too "tall" even for the United States. It is something to find the Canadian spirit so fresh and bold, it would be curious if the overseas dominions were to start forth and give us the old orders and sensations anew, many in Old England, whatever the critics think, must have more than a sneaking regard for them still. It must be added that "The House of Windows" holds human and likeable folk, as well as sensation, indeed, there is a spirit about it which interests and compels our attention.

AMONG THE MALAGASY:

An Unconventional Record of Missionary Experience. By J. A. HOULDER. With 16 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. (Jas. Clarke)

Mr. Houlder says of his very attractive volume that it is "mainly a record of missionary life and experience in the 'Great African Island' (Madagascar) when the land was ruled by Rāmilaiarivōny, its all-powerful Prince Minister, with occasional references to a few of the more public events which took place during that period." Its "unconventionality" lies probably in the fact that it is one of the most readable books, whether of travel or of missionary experience, that we have come across for a long time. Not only has the author a number of interesting experiences and more or less unpleasant adventures, but he was

From The Romance of Nice
(Duckworth).

RUINS OF THE ROMAN AMPHITHEATRE
AT CIMIEZ.

From Off the Beaten Track in Brittany, by Emil Davies, to be published shortly by Messrs. Stephen Swift quartered in Madagascar during the period previous to the French occupation of the island, and is therefore in a position to tell of an interesting period in its history. His observation of the native character is keen and humorous, the writing is good, and, in a word, it is a book that you should read whether or not you are interested in missions.

A WINTER HOLIDAY IN PORTUGAL.

By CAPTAIN B. GRANVILLE BAKER. 12s. 6d. net. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul.)

Captain Granville Baker writes lightly and pleasantly as if in good humour with himself and Portugal. He saw a good deal that was charming, not a little that was quaint, and a certain mixture of mediævalism and modernity. He has himself illustrated as well as described what he thought characteristic and expressive. Incidentally he presses Camoens and his poetry into service. He makes Lisbon and other haunts realistic to the general reader, while he essays to do justice to the river scenery and mountain magic of Portugal. Politically the book is up-to-date, but many will be more attracted by the scenic and social revelation, including the appeal of the country as a winter resort. We are left with the sense that here is a place of old-world picturesqueness and romance, which has been unduly neglected by the heart and imagination of outer folk in these latter years.

ALI BABA AND THE FORTY THIEVES.

And other Tales from the Arabian Nights. With 8 coloured and 8 black and white illustrations. 1s. 6d. net. (Blackie.)

Messrs. Blackie's "Stories Old and New" series is—or, at any rate, ought to be—by now so well known that it is almost unnecessary for us to do more than mention the name of a recent addition to the library. "Ali Baba," companioned by "The Magic Horse, and Abou Hassan or The Sleeper Awakened," makes a particularly charming volume, and lends itself well to illustrations, particularly when coloured. The present is not, we are aware, supposed to be a time when children welcome books as presents, but we hope that it is unnecessary to apologise for this brief note on a very pretty little volume.

THE NIGHT OF FIRES AND OTHER BRETON STUDIES.

By ANATOLE LE BRAZ. Put into English by Frances M. Gostling. With 24 illustrations from Photographs by W. A. and F. M. Gostling. 5s. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

The spell of Brittany is felt in England almost as keenly as in France, and for that reason Mrs. Gostling's excellent rendering of Anatole le Braz' "Night of Fires" should be assured of its reception. The author himself a Breton understands the character of his countrymen as no outsider can possibly hope ever to do, and in this volume we are presented with five studies or stories descriptive for the most part of the life and strange customs of the inhabitants of the more secluded parts of Brittany, and above all giving an insight into their religious beliefs—a curious blending of Christianity and Paganism. The first study, which gives the title to the book, is possibly the one which will make the widest appeal, but all the sketches were more than worthy of translation into English, and we have no doubt but that the public will be left asking for more.

EUGENE DELACROIX.

By DOROTHY BUSSY. With 26 illustrations. 2s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

Mrs. Bussy's excellent study of the art and life of Delacroix, originally published in 1907, is about to enter upon what we hope will be a new lease of life in a cheaper form. Since the original publication of the book, a little more attention has been turned in this country to the work of the great French master, but he has not yet received his deserts. Indeed, for the general public, his art is still, like his tomb in Père La Chaise, "on the heights, in a place a little apart." The new edition will be fully illustrated.

From A Winter Holiday in Portugal (Stanley Paul).

LISBON SEEN FROM ALFREITE.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1912

From War Pictures from Clarendon. (Frowde).

VISCOUNT FALKLAND.
(From the portrait in the Bodleian Library.)

WAR PICTURES FROM CLARENDON.

Edited and arranged by ROBERT JAMESON MACKENZIE, M.A.
2s. 6d. net. (Clarendon Press)

Mr. Mackenzie desires to bring back Clarendon's History of the Great Rebellion and Civil War in England to its due place in the current literature of the country. Clarendon's long and stately tomes, his leisurely style, and the crush of modern interests have rather relegated him to the sombre and dusty immortality of the bookshelf. He is too

From A Poet's Children: Hartley and Sara Coleridge, by Eleanor
A. Towle, which Messrs. Methuen announce for publication.

SARA COLERIDGE.
(From the drawing by George Richmond.)

epic as a whole for a crowded and pre-occupied period. Even the present more modest and proportioned volume is imposing in comparison with the average claimants for the favours of new seasons. It is an expressive offering, and ought to make Clarendon acceptable and vivid again to the general reader and to students. Apart from the tale of fields and frays the selection contains grave and thoughtful studies, one of the most interesting of which is the section devoted to Falkland.

MOROCCO AFTER TWENTY-FIVE YEARS:

A description of the Country, its Laws and Customs, and the European Situation. By DR. ROBERT KERR. With 46 Illustrations and 2 Maps. 10s. 6d. net. (Murray & Evenden.)

Morocco is perpetually before the public eye, and any book which tends to increase our knowledge of a country practically unknown to the European and much misunderstood by him the only remaining independent state in the north of Africa—should be assured of its welcome. Dr. Kerr has lived in the country for no less than twenty-five years, and he therefore speaks with authority. His book is designed throughout upon practical and utilitarian

From The Life of George Borrow (Murray).

GEORGE BORROW, 1821
(From a hitherto unpublished painting by John Borrow, now in the possession of W. F. T. Jarrald, Esq.)

lines. The author does not, perhaps, seek to charm by any particular graces of style, but there is no reason why he should be neglected on that account. His volume affords a comprehensive and exhaustive sketch of the history, trade, and inhabitants of Morocco, while particular attention has been bestowed upon the Christian missions in that country, the diplomatic and consular service (which, so far at least as this country is concerned, stands in obvious need of reform) and the present political situation. There are many excellent illustrations, and finally it may be noted that "the whole proceeds derived from the sale of the book will be devoted to the building of a hospital for Morocco's sick and suffering, who need our help and who claim our sympathy."

THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL LORD ANSON.

By WALTER VERNON ANSON, Captain R. N. Illustrated
7s. 6d. net. (Murray)

Captain Anson hardly does justice to his distinguished ancestor. Too much space is given to the politics and Parliamentary doings in England in the Eighteenth Century—matters that many historians have dealt with and not enough to the great seaman, whom Captain Anson very properly calls "the Father of the British Navy." True, Lord Anson "seldom wrote or talked, although his advice was sought by all," but there are so many to whom the gallant sailor is the merest name, and who know nothing of Anson's famous voyage round the world, or of his great work at the Admiralty, that a fuller biography would have been welcome. However, Captain Anson has done a service in recalling to this generation the horrible state of the navy in 1740, and the character of the finest seamen of the time. What glimpses we get of those bad old days in the admiral's letters! A mutiny on the Sunderland is to be inquired into—"caused by the captain having retreated from three men-of-war, which he sighted, and which the men thought he should have engaged, though far superior in force to him"—and these men, it must be remembered, are always being left unpaid and are poisoned by bad victuals and want of decent accommodation. "The Lynn is about to pay her men two weeks in six of their pay, but as some of the ships are seven years in arrear he (Anson) thinks this would cause discontent!" And no wonder! Beer is the sailor's drink—"the captains all agree that the men's health depends chiefly upon it"—and often enough it is bad and insufficient. Yet "a life on the ocean wave," with all its unsanitary horrors, had its devoted followers in those days, as this "Life of Lord Anson" reminds us.

From Life and Recollections of Mazzini (Longmans).

MAZZINI.

TANGIER 1861-1864.

By E. G. M. ROUTH. 12s. net. (Murray.)

We are unacquainted with this writer's name; it is the name of one who writes and not that of a dull compiler. Reading through this volume we may be of the opinion, first of all, that anyone with such materials could have produced a fascinating study, but the social records of our occupation of Tangier are not by any means the only matters dealt with. Military details, topographical accounts, municipal affairs, are treated in the same amusing fashion—we apply the word "amusing" in the Gallic sense. It seems that we have in our midst a new historian, and certainly we shall look forward with high expectations to this author's coming work. The way in which the records have been interwoven with the comment is delightful, and we can most confidently surmise that this book, when it is brought to one of Tangier's treasurers, dear Samuel Pepys, in the Shades, will have his warm approval. By the way, there is a hitherto unpublished portrait in it of himself. Nor does there seem to be a single document or map or pamphlet or contemporary journal which has managed to elude this wary writer. And with all this light upon a dark spot in the history of England, we may ask if such a book—so German in its thoroughness, and in its execution so extremely French—is needed. If we are to treat each incident in our colonial enterprise with such minuteness shall we not be overwhelmed? But many lessons may be—and we hope they will be—learned from a perusal of these three and twenty years. An excellent account is also given of the visit of a Moorish Embassy to England, where the predecessors of old Hajji Baba "did not look about or stare at the ladies, or express the least surprise, but with a courtly negligence in pace, countenance and whole behaviour, answering only to such questions as were asked with a great deal of wit and gallantry." On their return, however, they were "dragged by mules for the space of 12 leagues through a country of stones and bryers."

From The Life of Admiral Lord Anson (Murray).

ANSON.

From The Empress Josephine, which Messrs. Sampson Low will publish shortly.

L'AVÈNEMENT DE BONAPARTE.

Par ALBERT VANDAL (de l'Académie française). Introduction par LORD ROSEBERY. In 2 vols. With Frontispieces 1s. net each. (Nelson.)

This attractive reprint—in the original French—of one of the most important pieces of Napoleonic literature should meet with a warm welcome in this country, as well as in France. Referring to the work, in a lengthy and scholarly introduction, Lord Rosebery says: "M. Vandal prend Bonaparte au moment où il ne fait qu'aspirer au pouvoir absolu; il le quitte en possession de ce pouvoir. Il nous montre en grandes lignes et dans le détail ce que furent les difficultés, combien il s'en fallut de peu que l'entreprise n'échouât ou ne devint ridicule, ce qui revient au même. Quand elle eût réussi, les complications furent à peine moindres, elle ne furent vaincues que grâce à Frontispiece from L'Avènement de Bonaparte—Vol. I.

(Nelson).

une patience, un tact et une prudence que l'on s'étonne de rencontrer chez le héros. . . . Le lecteur . . . se verra conduit à travers une suite de scènes émouvantes et grandioses par un esprit aussi séduisant que pénétrant." The two volumes form a recent issue of the "Collection Nelson," they contain about 1,000 pages of reading matter, are well bound and printed, and are of a size uniform with that of the well-known Nelson's Library.

HAVOC:

By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM. With 1 Illustrations in Colour by HOWARD CHANDLER CHRISTY. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

"Havoc" is, in our opinion, the best book of Mr. Oppenheim's that we have read. In saying this, we are mindful of a long series of admirable sensational stories and romances and of one or two very clever studies of character—notably, for instance, in "The Illustrious Prince," which was published some two years ago. In his latest novel the author returns once more to the field of what is styled by his publishers "international intrigue," of which he is the peculiar master. It is not our intention to attempt to describe the plot—such a task would, indeed, be entirely beyond us—but it may be hinted that the action and mystery, of both of which there is a great deal, hinge upon the possession of a very important political document, which has escaped from the hands of the Austrian Chancellor. How it passes into the possession of a bewildered, but—happily—plucky, London business man and the complications that ensue while it is in his possession we must leave the reader to discover for himself.

From Havoc (Hodder & Stoughton).

From A Tramp in Spain,

by Bart Kennedy,

which Messrs. Sampson Low issue a new edition shortly

SPAIN RE-VISITED.

By C. GASCOIGNE HARTLEY. 12s. 6d. net. Illustrated (Stanley Paul)

Mrs. Gallichan is an enthusiast in her admiration for the country that she knows so well, and about which she has written so widely and entertainingly, but she is no mere gushing chronicler of fleeting travel impressions, and is at pains to furnish ample and logical reasons for a preference that may seem a little over-emphatic to those of her compatriots who know little of Spain at first hand. Only when one has lived there for longer than the period of a temporary holiday, she explains, does one realise the essential difference in the life of the people, a life far more primitive than that of London, more satisfying, directed not chiefly towards gain, or even comfort, but towards the more eternal things of human existence. Having lived there, she declares, one is apt to find London and its ceaseless occupation with the really unimportant things of life, "a little ridiculous." Some countries, she adds, leave one indifferent, but Spain one must either love or dislike. Her last visit to the country was after an absence of ten years, and she draws as her objective, the province of Galicia, finding it singularly unlike the Andalusia that she already knew and loved, but representing, in its inhabitants and institutions, a finer and more individual national character. The Galleyans have a larger proportion of Celtic blood in their veins than the ordinary Iberians, an admixture doubtless responsible for the almost universal appreciation of the arts that is to be noticeable among the peasantry, who sing their own poems at their work, and are usually both delighted and competent to discuss the relative points of the great painters of their nation with any sympathetic stranger. And they are not only artistic to a degree extraordinary in so unsophisticated a race, they are also a people of extraordinary enterprise in affairs. It is suggested that the Phœnicians have left their permanent impression on the country, whose special characteristics are repeated among the Galleyans. Though now degraded to a provincial dialect, their language was once the medium chosen by the most gifted old-time troubadours in which to express their poetic thoughts, and it is interesting to note that contests of wits are still part of the programme connected with a Galleyan peasant's wedding. A special chapter is devoted to the women of the province. Other chapters deal exhaustively with its history and archaeology, with racial and local customs, and with the religion of the people, which a prominent inhabitant assured Mrs. Gallichan was far less a factor in the national life than in England. From her own observations, however, Mrs. Gallichan believes that few Galleyans are opposed to an enlightened Catholicism; they fight only a Church which refuses to keep in touch with social progress. The text is supplemented by an interesting series of photographs in half-tone, and by an adequate index.

THE ROMANCE OF NICE.

By JOHN DOUGLAS ERRINGTON LOVELAND. With 10 Illustrations. 6s. net. (Duckworth)

Mr. Loveland's "Romance of Nice" is a gossiping and vivacious history of that town and its surrounding country from mythical times to the present day, with notes on the scenery and buildings of importance. "I have ventured to try and show," he says, "that there is much that is interesting, not alone in the history of the country, but also in its legends and folk lore, its people, small as well as great, its wonderful flora, and in that charm which pervades it that so speedily seizes on the stranger within its gates." Mr. Loveland has collected a large variety of anecdote which is bound to interest the general reader quite as much as intending visitors to the town.

Lithograph from Eugène Delacroix
(Duckworth).

POLONIUS: "WHAT DO YOU READ, MY LORD?"
Hamlet, Act II, Scene II.

From The Isle of Wight (Blackie).

IN FRESHWATER BAY.

BEAUTIFUL ENGLAND:

The Isle of Wight. By EDWARD THOMAS.---York. By GEORGE BENSON. Both with 12 Illustrations in Colour by ERNEST HASLEHUST. 1s. 6d. net each. (Blackie.)

"Here Europe's terror and Britannia's pride,
The world's great terror, can with safety ride;
Here George's thunder unprovoked may sleep,
Rocked by the swellings of the subject deep;
On thy soft bosom peace may here repose,
Whilst France and whirlwind are in vain its foes."

Certainly, as Mr. Thomas points out, only a driven reporter would now write of Cowes in such terms as these, though our next quotation is quite modern in spirit:

"No more to foreign baths shall Britain roam,
But plunge at Cowes, and find rich health at home"

These lines were written in 1781 by one of the "discoverers" of the Isle of Wight, and Mr. Thomas has made excellent use of them (and some others equally delightful) in one of the most fascinating volumes of Messrs. Blackie's "Beautiful England" series. Mr. George Benson, who writes on York, quotes no poetry, but his account of the history of the city and Minster is altogether readable. In both volumes Mr. Haslehust's illustrative powers are seen to great advantage, and his "York Minster" and "York from the City Walls" in particular are excellent pieces of work.

A YEAR WITH THE GAEKWAR OF BARODA.

By the REV. EDWARD ST. CLAIR WEEDEN, M.A. With 25 Illustrations. 16s. net. (Hutchinson.)

At a time when grave doubts have been only too freely expressed as to his loyalty to the British rule in India the Gaekwar of Baroda stands in need of an apologetic. Mr. Weeden's book, which is mainly a compilation from letters addressed to his mother during his stay in India, was written with no such intention, but it is only the more effective on that account. The author is not, perhaps, a trained observer, but he shows himself to be at least shrewd and keen. What an actor the Gaekwar must be, never once to have been taken off his guard by the author! The reader's impression must be that the accounts of the unfortunate affair at the Durbar have been, at any rate, considerably exaggerated. Mr. Weeden, of course, is biased upon the side of the Gaekwar, but there is no reason why his general impressions should be hailed as false. "His Highness . . . has the intelligent look of the clever, well-educated man, and the indefinable expression of one who is accustomed to be obeyed. His countenance is eminently pleasing without being strikingly handsome, and shows great determination, frankness, and amiability. . . . He talks rapidly and well, and has a charming smile. . . . Kind, generous and just, he is one of the wisest, ablest and most enlightened rulers that India has ever yet seen."

From My Life among the Bluejackets, by Agnes Weston, of which Messrs. Nisbet are publishing a new (the 9th) and cheaper edition.

ROYAL NAVAL BARRACKS, DEVONPORT: A R.N.T.S. MEETING.

AMONG THE ESKIMOS OF LABRADOR.

By S. K. HUTTON, M.B., Ch.B. Vict., F.R.G.S.
With 47 Illustrations and 2 Maps 16s. net.
(Seeley, Service & Co.).

Dr. Hutton has spent some three or four years at Killinck, one of the loneliest mission stations on the coast of Labrador. His work has lain among the Eskimos of that country, and one of its results is the very readable and highly interesting book now before us. The Eskimos of Labrador exhibit, of course, the same characteristics as those of their brothers in Greenland, but they appear to be considerably more civilized and, perhaps, rather less simple in their habits. In the course of a short note it is impossible for us to give any adequate idea of the adventures and humours with which the author has been brought into contact. We can, however, promise the reader that he will find entertainment as well as instruction between the covers of this book.

THE COUNTRY HEART AND OTHER STORIES.

By MAUDE EGERION KING. 6s. (Fifield.)

"The Country Heart" is an unusual book. Most of the stories which it contains are undeniably what a schoolboy would call "pi." Yet, for once in a way, that is not a defect. Here are none of those literary, or unliterary faults, which one has grown accustomed to expect in books written with a moral purpose. Once or twice the purpose obtrudes itself with an artistic emphasis, becomes explicit instead of remaining implicit. But this is seldom. Miss King is an artist. She can tell a story, has a crisp, fresh style, and a never failing sense of humour. Above all she has the gift of drawing character. Even in the few pages in which one is in their company, one gets to know her people as living beings. A kind of rural charm pervades many of the stories, giving them an idyllic savour, but Miss King never shrinks from realism, and she can tell a tale of sordid circumstance like "Salvation" honestly and well without being either sentimental or unpleasant.

Quite a number of characters get "saved," in the orthodox manner of the religious tract, but even that does not spoil the book's literary merit. For one feels that Miss King, while undoubtedly earnest in her moral views, can take an impersonal and purely artistic interest in the progress of her puppets from black to white. It would be a pity if readers allowed themselves to be frightened away from the book, suspecting a series of

From Among the Eskimos of Labrador.
(Seeley.)

THE ESKIMO BOY.

thinly disguised sermons. For when they have got used to a spirit not commonly present in current fiction, they will find that they are reading a volume of short stories of unusual merit.

From My Irish Year.
(by Padraic Colum, which Messrs. Mills & Boon will publish shortly.)

From Captain Cartwright and his Labrador Journal.
(Williams & Norgate.)

CAPTAIN CARTWRIGHT
VISITING HIS FOX-TRAPS.
W. Hiltor, Engr. T. Medland, Sculp.

MYSTICISM AND MAGIC IN TURKEY.

By LUCY M. J. GARNETT. With 12 Illustrations from Photographs. 6s. net (Pitman.)

The Dervishes of Mohammedanism are popular figures in fiction or in the files of magazines and newspapers, but

From Mysticism and Magic in Turkey (Pitman).

MEVLEVI NEOPHYTE LEARNING
THE DEVR.

From In Jesuit Land
(by W. H. Koebel, which Messrs. Stanley
Paul will publish shortly).

A CHIRIGUANA WOMAN.

comparatively few people have any realization of the beliefs for which they stand. Miss Garnett's book should, therefore, be particularly welcome, the more so in that it is compact, readable, and inexpensive. Her aim has been to give a "thoroughly impartial" account of the "religious doctrines, monastic organisation, and ecstatic powers of the Dervish Orders," and in this she seems to us to have indisputably succeeded. The book derives much importance from the fact that it throws light upon the faith of a large number of our own subject peoples.

CAPTAIN CARTWRIGHT AND HIS LABRADOR JOURNAL.

Edited by CHARLES WENDELL TOWNSEND, M.D. With an Introduction by DR. WILFRID T. GREENEILL. With 20
Illustrations and a Map. 5s. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

The bulk of this volume is devoted to a reprint of the "plums" of Captain George Cartwright's "Journal of Transactions and Events during a Residence of nearly Sixteen Years on the Coast of Labrador," which was published at Newark, Notts., in 1792. These little-known volumes contain much that is nowadays of the highest interest, whether to those interested in one of the most neglected of British possessions, or to students of humanity—for the author of the Journal is frank and veracious almost to a fault. At the time of its publication, the Journal seems to have obtained some attention, for Southey—who had met the author—writes: "I read his book in 1793, and, strange as it may seem, actually read through the three quartos. . . .
The annals of his campaigns among the foxes and beavers interested me more than ever did the exploits of Marlborough or Frederic; besides, I saw plain truth and the heart in Cartwright's book, and in what history could I look for this? . . . Coleridge took up a volume one day, and was delighted with its strange simplicity." Dr. Townsend's share in the present volume is a preface, an introductory biography of Cartwright, and many textual notes. He seems to us to have performed his duties as editor with much discretion, and the result is a book in every way fascinating.

From Dairying.
(Cassell.)

STUDENTS IN A DAIRY SCHOOL MAKING CREAM CHEESE.

DAIRYING :

A Book for all who are engaged in the Production and management of Milk. By JOHN PRINCE SHELTON. With 32 Plates and 22 Illustrations in the Text. 7s. 6d. net. (Cassell.)

The growth of dairying the most important of our agricultural interests -has been, as Professor Sheldon points out, of recent date, until now the art has been raised almost to the status of an exact science. "There is now precision," we are told, "where formerly uncertainty prevailed in many points of dairying, and it would appear as if there were not much left to discover." The growth of knowledge has entailed a larger quantity of advice, and readers will find that every one of the 450 odd pages of Professor's Sheldon's book is indispensable. The author, however, has studied his subject from its foundations: soils, treatment of land, breeds of cattle, forage, and feeding, all occupy the author's attention before the chapters on the milk trade, bacilli in dairying, butter and cheese making are reached. In fact, the reader will find that this book is a perfect encyclopædia on its subject: the whole expressed in a style admirably simple and easily comprehensible. The illustrations are numerous and excellent.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A COURT PAINTER.

By H. JONES THADDEUS. 12s. 6d. net. Illustrated. (Lane.)

Mr. Thaddeus has had an eventful as well as a successful life: apart from his varied artistic and Bohemian experiences one gets the impression that he has seen all Europe, and parts of other continents, in evening dress, as it were. Sovereigns, statesmen, popes, politicians, painters, and more, pass before us in his crowded and lively pages. He tells a number of delightful, and some piquant, stories, adding incidentally a memorable page to what may be called Whistlerian literature. In fact he is a capital story-teller, and there is an unstudied air about the book as a whole, which adds to the appeal of the numerous good things. It is really a book of recollections, of men and things eminently worth recording, and the author only gives us his own views and philosophy incidentally. These, when they come, have considerable frankness and candour, sometimes running counter to popular notions or predilections. They give a flavour and fulness, however, to the revelation, though they may hurt some prejudices. The book is very human, conducive to kindness as well as to laughter.

MANALIVE.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. With Frontispiece. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

To attempt any outline of the story of "Manalive" would be to misrepresent the book. It would read like the synopsis of an outrageously farcical extravaganza. Whilst you are reading the first chapter or two you are nearly exasperated into throwing the volume down and dismissing it as wilful and freakish nonsense. But if you persevere you will presently find a sort of order growing out of the chaos, a meaning glimmering through where all had seemed meaningless. There is no direct holding the mirror up to nature, but you have some of the fundamental truths of life embodied in grotesque allegory. No men and women would behave as the men and women do in "Manalive", apparently the only sane person among them is the man who comes into the story jumping over a wall, having thrown his bag and umbrella over before him, and thereafter goes rushing about and acting like

From Recollections of a Court Painter (Lane).

POPE PIUS X SITTING FOR HIS PORTRAIT TO THE AUTHOR.

Frontispiece from Manalive (Nelson)

From The Black Brotherhood and some of its Sisters (Macdonald & Evans).

"THE PATENT IMPERIAL SQUELCH-IT-OUT HANE FIRE EXTINGUISHER DIED ITS DUTY NOBLY."

an irresponsible lunatic. There are good things in the book; there were bound to be, seeing it is Mr. Chesterton's; if it irritates you on one page it tickles you to laughter on the next; and for the idealism and the gay philosophy that underlie its wildest and most violent absurdities it is well worth reading once, but you feel that Mr. Chesterton ought not to do it again.

THE BLACK BROTHERHOOD AND SOME OF ITS SISTERS.

A Story of Home and School. By R. P. GARROLD, S. J. With 6 Illustrations. 5s (Macdonald & Evans)

Those people, far too few in number, we are sure, for if the author had his deserts he would be one of the most popular of the day—who are acquainted with Mr. Garrold's books know that they are invested with an almost indescribable charm which lasts long after the mere reading is finished. The author knows his subject so well; boy nature holds no secrets from him; and accordingly he is able to invest what, from a synopsis, might seem quite an ordinary school story, with conviction and truth. His stories make not only good reading and good presents for that section of the public to whom they are obviously addressed, but they are even more satisfying to the adult. Therefore, if you have a son you will buy him "The Black Brotherhood" for his next present.

and first of all you will read it yourself, not because you wish to affix to it your private nihil obstat, but because you will enjoy it and also because you may understand your son better after you have done so.

From The Search for Semperswig (Elkin Mathews).

THE SEARCH FOR SEMPERSWIG.

And other Poems Old and New. By HARRY B. HERMON-HODGE. 2s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews)

The principal poem in Mr. Hermon-Hodge's collection is a wildly farcical narrative of how a party of very miscellaneous adventurers sailed in search of the semperswig, which seems to have been some kind of herb or twig by the use of which little things could be transmuted into big ones, but it was never obtained because the whole thing is an extravagant, uproarious nightmare and the semperswig is, of course, a part of it. The verse is fluent, easy, and bubbles over with irresponsible humour and high spirits. There are some capital parodies in the book and many of the shorter poems are particularly smart and cleverly turned. It is all just the lightest, most frivolous of light verse, gay, whimsical, rollicking, broadly funny, to be read for amusement only when you are in a mood to do nothing but laugh. There are more serious poets than humorous ones, and we gladly welcome so smart a recruit as Mr. Hermon-Hodge into the ranks of the merry minority.

WARD, LOCK & Co.'s NEW FICTION.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH. At all Libraries & Booksellers.

THE PIONEER.

Harold Bindloss.

"There is a straightforward vigor about the tale—it is a plain, human, open-air romance of the healthiest kind."—Morning Leader.

THE RIVER OF UNREST.

Bertram Mitford.

"A tale rich in incident and character, set against an effective background of savagery and mystery."—The Scotsman

THE COURT of the ANGELS.

Justus M. Forman.

"The tale is written in the author's best vein, it may be doubted indeed whether he has done anything that has more combined charm and poignancy."—The Scotsman.

THE WOMAN WHO TEMPTED.

Gertrude Warden.

The woman in question is one of the most ingenious inventions ever conceived from a novelist's brain

HER SACRIFICE.

Arthur Applin.

"The action of the plot never flags, and the interest of the reader is held spellbound from beginning to end."—Dundee Courier

A SON of the IMMORTALS.

Louis Tracy.

The most romantic of all Mr. Tracy's fine stories.

IN LOVE'S LAND.

Effie A. Rowlands.

"From the start the reader's attention is held with a steady grip, and few can forego the pleasure of knowing how it all ends and reading on to the last page."—Irish Independent.

THE TRIANGLE.

Marie Connor Leighton.

"The Triangle' shows this writer at her best. The plot is wonderful in its ingenuity, even for her, mistress as she is of such intricacies."—The Sportsman.

A DAUGHTER of the BUSH.

Ambrose Pratt.

"There is a fine breezy spirit of open-air chivalry about the book which makes it enjoyable to read as an interesting matter-of-fact romance."—The Scotsman.

ROGUES IN ARCADY.

Sir William Magnay.

A detective novel of engrossing interest.

GOD AND MAMMON.

(3/6) Joseph Hocking.

"Mr. Joseph Hocking has written many notable novels, 'with a purpose,' but nothing finer than 'God and Mammon.'"—North Devon Journal

WARD, LOCK & CO., Ltd., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

MR. LANE'S BOOKS

Recollections of a Court Painter

By H. JONES THADDEUS 12s. 6d. net.

Hand-omely Illustrated by the Author's pictures.
Standard: "There can be no doubt that the book will have a well-deserved popularity. It is interesting from many points of view, and well and easily written."

The Anarchists

By E. A. VIZETELLY

Illustrated 10s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard: "Mr. Vizetelly's book is of great interest, and should be read by all who care to wander a time from the highways of history. The author's imperturbable impartiality makes him an ideal historian."

The Betts of Wor- tham in Suffolk

By KATHARINE DOUGHTY

Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.

Athenaeum: "Miss Doughty has performed an act of piety to the dead and usefulness to the living by collecting the memorials of this ancient family."

Margaret of France Duchess of Savoy 1523-1574

By WINIFRED STEPHENS

Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.

Pall Mall Gazette: "Not to be classed with the rack of popular biographies. It is not only well composed and written, it is the work of one who knows her subject through and through."

Napoleon and King Murat

By ALBERT ESPITALIER

Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.

Translated by J. L. MAY.
Observer: "A striking narrative... an admirable translation, a painstaking work."

About Algeria

By CHARLES THOMAS-STANFORD.

Illustrated 5s. net.

Pall Mall Gazette: "We are well pleased with this attractive volume. There are some admirable drawings by Mr. R. Bernier Thornton of exquisite Arab doorways."

Beauty and Ugliness

By VERNON LEE and C. ANSTRUTHER-THOMSON. Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.

Sunday Times: "Stimulating studies of psychological aesthetics, which are indeed a monument of learning, observation, and analysis, and must rank as an invaluable contribution to a difficult subject."

The Journal of a Sporting Nomad

By J. V. STUDLEY

Illustrated 12s. 6d. net. (Ready shortly)

Footprints of Famous Americans in Paris

By JOHN JOSEPH CONWAY

With an Introduction by MRS. JOHN LANE

Illustrated 12s. 6d. net. (Ready immediately)

Recollections of Guy de Maupassant

By His VALET, FRANCOIS

Illustrated 10s. 6d. net. (Ready immediately)

THE ODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

Published in Canada by The Musson Book Co., Limited.

A WORK of GREAT INTEREST to SCOTSMEN.

THE SCOTSMAN IN CANADA

By WILFRED CAMPBELL and
GEORGE BRYCE, M.A., D.D., LL.D.

In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. Cloth Gilt. 16 Illustrations.

Complete in Box.

Just a few Press Opinions.

'The Times' Literary Supplement—A comprehensive survey into which Dr. Campbell, the well-known poet and dramatist and bibliographer of the Canadian Archives, has put much care and detailed study.

The Daily Chronicle—Dr. Bryce's volume is more a scholar's history. Here we have the tale of the West written by a man of the West with a knowledge of the world. Having lived for nearly forty years on the banks of the Red River, he can visualise the making of the West in a way that the mere compiler of books can never attempt. In Dr. Bryce's volume we have the most comprehensive picture of this half continent that has yet been written.

Athenaeum—Two important volumes record and analyse with painstaking thoroughness and marked ability. That the research necessary for the compilation of such a work as this has been a labour of love for Mr. Wilfred Campbell, the well-known poet and scholar of Ottawa, and for Dr. George Bryce of Winnipeg, we can well believe. That their effort was worth the making no one will doubt who looks, even cursorily, into the nine hundred odd pages. . . . we know of nothing more comprehensive in the shape of biographical and historical records of the lives and doings of the Dominion's more prominent citizens, than "The Scotsman in Canada."

Aberdeen Free Press—Mr. Wilfred Campbell is fully alive to the romantic and picturesque aspects of his subject. . . . After this introductory digression Dr. Campbell passes to his main subject—the Scot in Eastern Canada—which he handles in an altogether delightful and interesting fashion. . . . Taken altogether, the joint authors of the "Scotsman in Canada" have produced a notable work. It is a worthy record of a vast subject. They have been successful of making a readable story of what in less capable hands would have become a mere catalogue of names. Their book is one which will appeal to the Scotsman in Scotland scarcely less than to his kinsman in the Dominion.

The Scotsman.—We have had several works recently on the part played by emigrants from our own northern country in the building up of modern Canada, but the two volumes "The Scotsman in Canada" are likely to rank as the standard authority on the subject. . . . Both writers have already done good work in the field of Canadian literature and history, and the present undertaking will increase their reputation. . . . The present work is one which should appeal to Scottish readers all the world over.

LONDON: SAMPSON LOW,
MARSTON & CO., LIMITED
Overy House, 100, Southwark
Street, S.E. and Tudor House,
32, Warwick Lane, E.C.

PRICE
21/- net.

George Allen & Co.'s List.

(Incorporated SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co., Ltd. and GEORGE ALLEN & SONS.)

THE HORSE and its RELATIVES

By R. LYDEKKER, F.R.S.

With 70 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

There is no other book in this country or abroad which gives so thoroughly up-to-date and trustworthy a summary of the leading features of the natural history of the horse and its living and extinct relatives as this work. (May 2nd.)

New Novels. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

THE VOICE FROM THE NIGHT:

By C. E. STERREY.

[Just out

"A Murder Mystery Story greatly above the ordinary, ending with a surprise solution which would have done credit to Wilkie Collins himself"—Vanity Fair.

"A rousing and sensational Detective Story. Mr. Sterrey's plot assuredly is exciting."—Daily Telegraph.

THE THIRD CHANCE:

A Study of Love, Life, and the Stage.

By GLADYS WATERER.

THE EMPORIUM:

A Story of the Latest Society Craze.

By ALEC HOLMES.

THE DRAMA OF LOVE AND DEATH.

A Study of Human Evolution and Transfiguration.

By EDWARD CARPENTER.

Cloth, Crown 8vo, gilt top, 5s. net.

[Just out

"Mr. Carpenter's triumphant command over language, his searching perspicuity, retain their dominion, and the rich ore of his mind is as unalloyed as ever."—Athenæum.

THE BROWNING CYCLOPÆDIA

A Guide to the Study of the Works of Robert Browning. With copious Explanatory Notes and References on all difficult passages. Revised. Small 8vo, Cloth, 10s. 6d. ;

Colonial Edition, Cloth, 3s. 6d. [Sixth Edition.

BROWNING'S MESSAGE TO HIS TIME:

His Religion, Philosophy, and Science.

With Portrait. 12mo., Cloth, 2s. 6d. [Fifth Edition

BROWNING STUDIES

Select Papers by Members of the Browning Society.

With an Introduction by Dr. EDWARD BERDOE.

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

[Third Edition

BROWNING and the CHRISTIAN FAITH.

On the Evidences of Christianity from Browning's Point of View.

By Dr. EDWARD BERDOE.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s.

[Second Edition

BROWNING FOR BEGINNERS

By Rev. THOMAS RAIN, M.A.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 2s. 6d.

ESSAYS ON ROBERT BROWNING

By MARIAN LITTLE. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 3s. 6d.

A BROWNING PRIMER

A Companion to the Pocket Volume of Selections from Browning.

By E. P. DEFRIES.

[Sixth Edition.

Imperial 32mo, Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Leather, 2s. net.

BROWNING'S SORDELLO:

A Commentary.

By K. M. LOUDON.

Imperial 32mo, Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Leather, 2s. net.

BROWNING'S 'SAUL,' and other Poems.

By S. GUNNINGTON.

Imperial 32mo, Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Leather, 2s. net

BROWNING'S POEM: A DEATH IN THE DESERT. With Introduction and Notes.

By the Rev. G. U. POPE, M.A., D.D.

Imperial 32mo, Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Leather, 2s. net.

London: GEORGE ALLEN & CO., LTD., Ruskin House,
Rathbone Place, Oxford Street.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

NEW 6/- FICTION.

Love Gilds the Scene

and Women Guide the Plot

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

The Common Touch

By AUSTIN PHILIPS.

Kingfisher Blue.

By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE

Blinds Down.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

A Diana of Quebec.

JEAN MCILWRAITH

On May 9th. With a Portrait of Col. GREY, C.S.I

Large Post 8vo. 6/- net.

Tales of Our Grandfather: or India from 1856.

(Colonel L. J. H. GREY, C.S.I.)

By F. and C. GREY.

Ready May 9th With a Portrait of the Author

Large Post 8vo. 6/- net.

Seeking Fortune in America.

By F. W. GREY.

In the Press. Small Demy 8vo. With 6 Illustrations.
6/- net.

The Church in the Pages of Punch.

By the Revd. D. WALLACE DUTHIE,

Author of "The Case of Sir John Fastolf,"
"A Bishop in the Rough," etc.

Ready May 7th With a Portrait. Fcap 8vo. 2/- net.

The Robert Browning Centenary Celebration at Westminster Abbey, May 7th, 1912.

Edited with an Introduction and Appendices.

By PROFESSOR KNIGHT.

ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

CENTENARY EDITION.

In 10 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net each. Printed in bold type on fine paper.

The Edition will be limited to 500 numbered copies for sale in this country and 250 copies for sale in the United States, and the volumes will be sold in sets only. An additional 26 copies for England (and 26 for the United States) will be specially printed on JAPANESE PAPER, to be sold at £10 10s. net the set, each copy being numbered. With Introductions by Dr. FREDERIC G. KENYON, C.B., Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum, and a Portrait Frontispiece to each volume, several of the portraits appearing for the first time.

Volume I ready May 7th, the subsequent volumes following at short intervals, so that the edition may be completed in the Centenary Year.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

NOW READY.

CRISPI'S LETTERS

The most sensational Political Memoirs of recent years

The first two volumes of THE MEMOIRS OF FRANCESCO CRISPI (translated from the documents collected and edited by Thomas Palamenghi-Crispi) have just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. The first volume narrates the stirring story of Garibaldi's famous campaign, and unfolds from the inside a full record of the triumphant struggle for Italian unity. Both volumes disclose interesting diplomatic secrets and throw considerable light on the political history of modern Europe—on the reasons why, for instance, when Tunis was occupied by France, Italy proceeded to annex Tripoli, and the Powers of Europe acquiesced in her doing so. The second volume has a particular timeliness, in that it tells of Crispi's secret mission to France, Germany, England, and Austria, the outcome of which was the Triple Alliance. Italy would have preferred to include France to the exclusion of Austria, but Bismarck pronounced such an alliance impossible and "of no use to us." There are passages from Crispi's letters and diaries reporting Bismarck's amazingly frank opinions concerning the destinies of France, the intentions of Germany, the powers exercised by the Vatican, the impracticability of disarmament, and other problems, as topical and as momentous now as they were then. There can be no doubt that these volumes will prove the most sensational, as they are certainly the most important, political memoirs of recent years.

THE MEMOIRS OF FRANCESCO
CRISPI

Vol. I.—EXILE—THE THOUSAND
Vol. II.—THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE

ILLUSTRATED.

Price 16/- net each

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Now ReadyWHO'S WHO
IN DICKENS*A Complete Dickens Repertory in Dickens' own words*

Compiled by

THOMAS ALEXANDER FYFE,

Author of "Dickens and the Law," etc.

"To the Dickens student—and, in these days, who is not, more or less, an admirer of the novelist—the new book is a mine of knowledge."—Glasgow Evening Citizen

"To many Dickensians 'Who's Who in Dickens' will be a welcome work. Even among those who think they know the novels by heart, a difficulty in recalling the book wherein some minor character appears is not an uncommon experience. The 'Who's Who' will solve the difficulty in a moment."—Truth.

"An entertaining volume and a valuable reference book."—London Opinion

"Altogether excellent as a guide to the Dickensian characters, and a thoroughly entertaining anthology of portraits of those immortals."—T.P.'s Weekly.

"To dip into it is to enter anew to a marvellous company; it is vastly more entertaining than DeBrett, Burke, or that other Who's Who by which its title was suggested."—Glasgow News.

Price 6/- net.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

Now ReadyLITTLE
INCIDENTS

BY

FREDERICK WATSON

Mr. COULSON KERNAHAN says:—"Frederick Watson has a style of his own, and writes always with humour, originality and distinction. His humour is fresh, natural, whimsical, spontaneous. His work has something in common with that of Mr. Barry Pain, but resembles the work of no other writer. . . . That Mr. Watson has made a success with his first book is evident, and I hope that he will follow up his first success by another on similar lines."

The Globe says:—"A delightful and refreshing humour bulks largely in this modestly entitled volume. We confess to having taken it up with no particular enthusiasm, but as we read our interest grew, and we experienced the utmost difficulty in laying it down again. There is more than wholesome laughter in this book; there are touches of genuine pathos, of genuine human interest. Altogether this is a book to buy and to keep beside one as an antidote for the grey days which will come at some time or another."

Price 2/6 net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers, London

Mr. Murray's New Books.THE ROMANCE OF WORDS

A POPULAR BOOK ON THE SOURCES OF THE ENGLISH VOCABULARY.

By ERNEST WEEKLEY, M.A.,

Professor of French and Head of the Modern Language Department at University College, Nottingham.
Sometime Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge

Crown 8vo Pp. xii + 212 3s 6d. net.

Athenium "(Professor Weekley) has a sense of humour and of the life of to-day which is not always characteristic of professors. . . . we wish many to share the enjoyment which the book has given us."Observer "A book of extraordinary interest; everyone interested in words should immediately obtain a copy."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

JULIA FRANCE AND HER TIMES

GERTRUDE ATHERTON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE FOREST ON THE HILL

EDEN PHILLPOTTS' NEW NOVEL.

"It is a brilliantly clever study of elemental passions that Mr. Phillpotts has given us, a story to read and to remember, a story as remarkable for its close description of the forest on the hill, and for its strong, rare talk of the minor characters as it is for its fuller studies of the principal one." — *Daily TelegraphTHE FAMILY LIVING

E. H. LACON WATSON'S NEW NOVEL.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE ST., W.

Stanley Paul's Latest 6s. NovelsBETWEEN TWO STOOLS (3rd Ed.) Rhoda BroughtonTHE WOMAN-HUNTER (2nd Ed.) Arabella KenealyTHE UNHOLY ESTATE Douglas Sladen

Author of "The Tragedy of the Lyman" (5th Ed.)

THE WATCH NIGHT Henry BettTHE BRIDLE OF LOVE Kate HornMAIDS IN MANY MOODS H. Louisa BedfordDUCKWORTH'S DIAMONDS H. Everett-GreenVEENI THE MASTER R. F. LamportTHE SECOND WOMAN Norma LorrimerTHE THREE ENVELOPES Hamilton DrummondMYSTERY OF REDMARSH FARM (4th Ed.)

Archibald Marshall

THEIR WEDDED WIFE Alice M. DiehlTHE CHILDREN OF ALSACE René BazinTHE ACTIVITIES OF LAVIE JUTT

Marguerite and Armand Barclay

A GREAT RUSSIAN REALIST: The Romance and Reality of DOSTOIEFFSKY J. A. T. LLOYD
With Illustrations 10s 6d netA WINTER HOLIDAY IN PORTUGAL. By Capt. GRANVILLE BAKER Coloured Frontispiece and 40 Original Drawings 12s. 6d netDAVID GARRICK AND HIS FRENCH FRIENDS.

By Dr F. A. HEDGCOCK 10s 6d net.

AN ACTOR'S NOTE BOOKS. A Record of Some Memories, Friendships, Criticisms, and Experiences of FRANK ARCHER. 7s 6d netWOMAN ADRIFT: The Menace of Suffragism.

By HAROLD OWEN 6s

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31 ESSEX STREET LONDON.

A charming and sprightly Travel Book full of delightful plates in colour and half-tone.

IN SUNSHINE
SWITZERLAND
AND SNOWPrice
12/6 net.

By E. B. d'AUVERGNE,

Author of "Lola Montez."

THE WHITE GODS

Price 3/6 net cloth; 6/- net leather.

"This is a volume, written in very beautiful English, containing the confession of failure of a man who loved a girl in southern lands, but on travelling to northern regions was influenced by the White Gods and forced to marry a northern maid. The pages brim over with life-long regret of one who seeking to touch the stars fell back into the depths abysmal. A dainty volume by a dreamer and a poet." — Freeman's Journal.WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.Chatto & Windus's New 6s. Novels*THE GOVERNESSBy Mrs. ALFRED HUNT and VIOLET HUNT.
With a Prefatory Chapter by FORD MADDOX HUEFFER.THE MALABAR MAGICIAN

By F. E. PENNY.

"A book to enjoy without reservation" — *Daily ChronicleCOMMONERS' RIGHTS

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

"With every successive book which issues from her pen, Miss Constance Smedley proves her self more and more to be a literary artist worthy of consideration. Her latest volume is very much the best piece of work she has yet given us." — *Sunday TimesUP TO PERRIN'S

By MARGARET B. CROSS.

"A human, moving, lovable book, as good as anything she has done." — *Evening StandardINNOCENCE in the WILDERNESS

By THEODOSIA LLOYD.

"In insight into temperament, in good writing and in restrained balanced execution, 'Innocence in the Wilderness' is a fine novel." — Morning Leader.THE ENDLESS JOURNEY, &c.

By NETTA SYRETT.

"There is not one of these little tales that is not worthy of a reputation for significant and highly finished work." — *Pall Mall GazetteTHE SHOE OF A HORSE

By CHRISTOPHER STONE.

"In vigour, freshness, and sincerity, it stands strongly on its own merits. We have enjoyed it heartily." — Morning Leader.THE WISDOM OF WAITING

By MABEL INCE.

"The 'Wisdom of Waiting' is daintily and finely drawn. The characters act and speak to the life. There is much gentle humour." — Daily Mail.THE CHILDREN'S BREAD

By MAUDE LITTLE.

"Altogether a book of conspicuous charm, full of the fragrance of nature and pulsating with human emotions." — World.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM'S NEW NOVEL

Does anyone wish to read a New Novel which will hold and absorb and enchain him till the very last sentence is reached?

"If so, let him order 'Havoc,' by E. Phillips Oppenheim. I took it up just as I had risen to turn down the lights, and glanced over the first two or three pages. I sat down and read it on and on till I had finished. Never was a narrative told in a more arresting way. There is no pause, no break, no turning aside, but the workmanship is skilful in the highest degree, and, though the story depends on the familiar fear of a foreign invasion, the treatment is quite unhackneyed. The peace of Europe depends on the possession of a certain document, and the manner in which the document is safely secured for England, with the happiest results, though after dangers and adventures which take away the breath, will astound the most practised novel reader. . . . A book which, of its kind, is as good as it could be." British Weekly.

HAVOC

By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM

Author of "The Illustrious Prince,"
"The Falling Star, etc." 6s.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

MORICE GERARD'S NEW NOVEL

Morice Gerard's great Spring Romance with a present day setting, but full of the excitement and chivalry which have made his historical novels popular the world over.

"Mr. Morice Gerard is an effective teller of tales."—Morning Post.

"Morice Gerard's fame as a writer of stirring romances is an established one."—Glasgow Herald.

"Few living writers have advanced more rapidly in the public favour than Mr. Morice Gerard." Lady's Pictorial.

"Morice Gerard has a high reputation as a producer of well-constructed and crisply-written fiction." Northern Whig.

CRENLAND CASTLE

By MORICE GERARD

Author of "Rose of Blenheim," etc. 6s.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

M. E. FRANCIS'S NEW STORY

"On such an auspicious occasion I venture to wish both her and 'Honesty' the best of good wishes."—Punch.
(HONESTY is M. E. FRANCIS'S 21st book.)

"Lovers of the country, and especially of the West Country, are accustomed to sit at the feet of 'M. E. Francis,' and 'Honesty' will not help them to abandon the habit. I, at any rate, can vouch for the fact that the atmosphere of this story banished the gloom of a most dreary day. The author reproduces the charm of the country spontaneously, she never forces the note, she does not strive after great effects. But the effects are here, because intimacy and a sense of style are here."—Punch.

"If anyone wants a tale dramatically and romantically written, 'Honesty' can be recommended. It is interesting and touching." Daily Mail.

"Honesty is just a sweet and pure cottage girl. . . . Mrs. Francis gives not merely a pretty story, but a picture of real life such as will cause her public real pleasure, and stir the hope of more such tales to follow."—Daily Telegraph.

HONESTY

By M. E. FRANCIS

Author of "The Tender Passion," etc. 6s.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

Mrs. FRED REYNOLDS'S NEW NOVEL

What's in a Name? "The Gifted Name," by Mrs. FRED REYNOLDS, is a very clever and moving story of domestic relations.

"What's in a name? The possession of a great one may sometimes be an undesirable inheritance, the effort to live up to it producing a stultifying effect in the mental development of the inheritor. 'The Gifted Name' tells of something of the kind in the career of young Richard Farland, who would have followed in the footsteps of his forebears and become a gallant soldier; but, when that was denied him, found himself incapable of achieving greatness in any other way, and showed a tendency to drift. He became a slacker, quite content to live on the fame and income of his mother, who was herself a brilliant upholder of that gifted name. It is a clever study of a young man's egotism, of his shilly-shallying and selfishness, which, after all, were but a veneer to be shed when he discovered himself."—Daily Chronicle.

THE GIFTED NAME

By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS

Author of "These Three," etc. 6s.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

FOUR IMPORTANT BOOKS.

THE EGO AND HIS OWN.

By MAX STIRNER.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

A new popular edition of one of the most remarkable expositions of the philosophy of egoism ever written. One of the great books of the world, hardly known save to students of really original literature.

"He is more profound, more exact, than Nietzsche." Morning Leader

BERNARD SHAW AS ARTIST-PHILOSOPHER.

By R. M. DEACON.

1s. net. Postage 11d. Cloth, 2s. Postage 3d.

"It is perhaps the best examination of Bernard Shaw that has been published in English. Students who will keep this little work at their elbow, will be enabled to find more in Shawianism than is dreamt of in their philosophy." Dundee Advertiser

THE SOLEMNIZATION OF JACKLIN. SOME ADVENTURES ON THE SEARCH FOR REALITY.

A Novel By FLORENCE FARR.

Crown 8vo. Cloth Gilt 6s.

THE COUNTRY HEART, AND OTHER STORIES.

By MAUDE EGERTON KING.

Crown 8vo. 6s. net

"Few novelists are gifted with more of sympathetic understanding of humanity at large than Mrs. King. She goes straight to life as it is lived among all classes." Daily Telegraph

"They are studies which, by reason of their depth and power, deserve wider sale than any volume of short stories is likely to achieve." Academy

"A book for any season and any age." Nation

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

ROBERT BROWNING.

ALL'S WELL: Being optimistic thoughts from the writings of Robert Browning. Selected by Graham Hope. Crown 8vo., leather 2s. 6d. net.; linen 2s. net.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

AUTHORS wishing to make arrangements for publishing are invited to communicate with the Principal, The Empire Literary Agency, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, E.C. MSS. of all kinds, by known and unknown Authors, are read; if needed typed; and if approved, placed with Editors and Publishers. Special attention to first Novels.

Literary Work placed to the best advantage. Write for free prospectus of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. We placed a full-length novel, within a week of receipt, with a leading London Publisher at excellent terms! "Locksley," Presburg Rd., New Malden, Surrey.

REMAINDERS.

Glaisner's List No. 385 of SELECTED Remainder Books, Now Ready. Post Free on application.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited, Booksellers,
265, High Holborn, London, W.C., and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

N.B.—It is essential to send for list at once to obtain the best bargains.

JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. JOHN LONG draw particular attention to the following deeply interesting Works which they are shortly publishing:—

The Viceroy of Ireland By CHARLES O'MAHONY. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 16s. net. Prospectus post free.

King René D'Anjou and his Seven Queens By EDGUMBE STAFFY. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net. Prospectus post free.

Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes By EDGUMBE STAFFY. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net. Prospectus post free.

Through Dante's Land: Impressions in Tuscany By Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT, Author of "Britanny to Whitehall," etc. With 32 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net. Prospectus post free.

Pheasants: In Covert and Aviary By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With four magnificent Coloured Plates from life, by H. GRONVOLD, and numerous other Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 4to. Price 10s. 6d. net. Prospectus, with Coloured Plate, post free.

Frame and Nerves: The True Curative System By PERCIVAL G. MASTERS. With 32 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net. A system of Exercises devised to promote health and not muscle development only. It particularly aims at building up the nervous system. Prospectus post free.

JOHN LONG'S POPULAR NOVELS SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

At all Libraries and Bookse'lers

The Sin of Youth By LESLIE MORTIMER, Author of "The Men We Marry," etc. Just out

The Temptation of Nina By R. PENLEY, Author of "The Strength of Evan Meredith" Just out

Memory Corner (2nd Edition) By TOM GALLON Author of "The Great Gay Road"

Clouds (3rd Edition) By CHARLES TIGGLEDEN Author of "A Flutter With Fate"

The Eternal Struggle (2nd Edition) By NEWMAN HARDING, Author of "Thou Shalt Not"

The Fen Dogs (3rd Edition) By STEPHEN FOREMAN, Author of "The Overflowing Scourge"

Austin's Career (2nd Edition) By VIOLET TWIFLIDALE, Author of "Hypocrites and Sinners"

Anna Strellitz (2nd Edition) By LOW LATHEN

The Compromising of Jane (3rd Edition) By ANNE WEAVER

The Spinster By HUBERT WALLS, Author of "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers," etc. Shortly

The Woman Between. By EDMUND BOSANQUET, Author of "A Society Mother" Shortly

The Gate Openers By K. L. MONTGOMERY, Author of "The Cardinal's Pawn," etc. Shortly

Pillars of Smoke By MRS. STANLEY WRENCH, Author of "Love's Fool," etc. Shortly

The Waster By MRS. HENRY TIPPLETT, Author of "The Power of the Petticoat," etc. Shortly

The Rider of Waroona By G. FIRTH SCOTT, Author of "The Last Lemurian," etc. Shortly

Great was the Fall By a NAVAL OFFICER Shortly

The Fugitive Years By KATHARINE SIMPSON, Author of "Jeanie o' Biersdale" Shortly

The Price of Possession By the Author of "Improper Prue." Shortly

LONDON:

JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

Macmillan & Co.'s List.

THOMAS HARDY.

The Wessex Edition of the Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse.

With Prefaces and Notes. In 20 vols. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each. Printed from new type. Each volume will have a frontispiece in Photogravure and Map. Two volumes issued monthly.

1. Tess of the d'Urbervilles. With a new General Preface.
2. Far from the Madding Crowd.

* * * Prospectus post free on request.

A Lyttel Booke of Nonsense.

By RANDALL DAVIES. Illustrated with old Woodcuts. Fcap. 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

The Life of David Livingstone.

By C. SILVESTER HORNE, M.P. Illustrated. Globe 8vo. 1s. net. [Macmillan's New 1s. Library.]

Individuality and Art.

By HERBERT E. A. FURST. Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

The Venetian School of Painting.

By EVELYN MARCH PHILLIPPS. Illustrated. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The Kingdom of God.

A Course of Four Lectures. Delivered in the Examination Rooms at Cambridge by the Rev. WILLIAM TEMPLE, Headmaster of Repton. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVELS.

Pan's Garden. A Volume of Nature Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "The Centaur," etc. Illustrated by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Immediately.]

The Sign. By Mrs. ROMILLY FIDDEN (Katharine Waldo Douglas). Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly.]

The Touchstone of Fortune.

By CHARLES MAJOR, Author of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Van Cleve. By MARY S. WATTS, Author of "Nathan Burke," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly.]

NEW TWO-SHILLING EDITION OF

The Novels of Maurice Hewlett.

With Frontispieces. In cloth binding. Crown 8vo. 2s. net each. Two volumes issued monthly.

5. The Stopping Lady.
6. Fond Adventures.

The Giant Fisher. By Mrs. HUBERT BARCLAY, Author of "Trevor Lordship." Pott 8vo. 7d. net. [Macmillan's 7d. Series.]

The Three Knaves. By EDEN PHILLIPOTS. Pott 8vo. 7d. net. [Macmillan's 7d. Series.]

Gardening for the Ignorant. (A NEW BOOK.) By Mrs. C. W. EARLE and Miss ETHEL CASH. Globe 8vo. 1s. net. [Macmillan's New 1s. Library.]

BROWNING.

A Primer of Browning. By F. M. WILSON. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Life of Browning. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo. 2s. net. [English Men of Letters.]

Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning. By ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. Globe 8vo. 4s. net. [Eversley Series.]

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's Spring Books

ANIMAL LIFE IN AFRICA.

By Major I. STEVENSON HAMILTON. Foreword by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Illustrated, Maps, Plans, &c. Royal 8vo. 18s. net.

BY JOHN GALSWORTHY.

MOODS SONGS AND DOGGERELS.

Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE MANSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE OLDEN TIMES.

By JOSEPH NASHE. Introduction by REGINALD BLOMFIELD, A.R.A. Large 4to. With 164 Full-page Plates (2 in colour). 30s. net.

THE LURE OF THE SEA.

By L. L. PATTERSON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

DIVORCE.

By LARI RUSSELL. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE SELECTED WRITINGS OF WILLIAM SHARP. VOL. I. Poems.

VOL. II. Studies and Appreciations.

Edited by ELIZABETH A. SHARP. Uniform with the "Works of Fiona Macleod." To be completed in Five Volumes. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net each.

WAR AND ITS ALLEGED BENEFITS.

By I. NOVIKOW. Preface by NORMAN ANGELL (Author of "The Great Illusion"). Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE MODERN PARISIENNE.

By OCTAVE UZANNE. Introduction by BARONESS VON HUTHEN. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

"The work is certainly one of the most notable that has appeared during recent years. The work is one of great ability, rare insight, and infinite pathos." Trusted Courier

MOVING PICTURES.

By F. A. TALBOT. With 96 pp. of Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

ON THE ART OF THE THEATRE.

By E. GORDON CRAIG. Illustrated. 6s. net.

MICROBES AND TOXINS IN NATURE.

By DR. LILIANNE BURNETT. Preface by Prof. L. MECHNIKOFF. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 5s. net.

NEW AND RECENT 6s. NOVELS

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE Upton Sinclair

THE COST OF IT Eleanor Mordaunt

PASSION FRUIT E. C. Vivian

"May be warmly recommended to any reader in search of an interesting and intensely human story peopled by life-like characters, and told in straight and nervous English." Sunday Times

HE WHO PASSED (To M.L.G.) Anon
"If authentic, poignant to tears, if not, marvellously well invented." Daily Mail.

LITTLE BROTHER Gilbert Cannan
"Once taken in hand extremely difficult to lay down." Daily Telegraph.

ESTHER Agnes E. Jacomb
"A striking novel, full of quiet strength." Morning Leader.

THE ADJUSTMENT Marguerite Bryant
"Throughout fresh, sincere, and well-written and full of good studies." Times.

MARJORIE STEVENS V. Taubman-Goldie
"This well-written novel mirrors nature with humorous tenderness and honesty, much charm and philosophy." Sunday Times.

THE PRISON WITHOUT A WALL Ralph Straus
"Will remain long in our memory. A very sound and able piece of work." Westminster Gazette.

MAIDS' MONEY Mrs. H. Dudeney
"Brilliant character sketches, sufficient to make 'Maids' Money' one of the most interesting novels we have read lately." Saturday Review.

JUGGERNAUT E. F. Benson

THE REWARD OF VIRTUE (2nd Imp.) Amber Reeves

A LIKELY STORY Wm. de Morgan

THE DOP DOCTOR (12th Imp.) Richard Dehan

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 248. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

MAY, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 19

"BOOKMAN'S" GALLERY—

The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell 53

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY

THE READER—

Robert Browning By PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY
Robert Browning's Father By SIR W. R. NICOLL, LL.D. .. 63

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS

NEW BOOKS—

Browning's Early Work By ROGER INGLIS
A Poet's Children By W. E. A. AXON
Witty Degeneration of the Heart. By COUTSON KERNAN
Pick and Shovel By J. H. INGRAM

Three Children of Anteus By DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 78
The Irish Renaissance .. 78
Professor Stuart's Reminiscences .. 79
A Psychological Novel By LEWIS McLELLI .. 80
Travels round London By MAY BYRON 80
English Philosophy By V. V. .. 81
A Batch of Novels .. 82
St. Clare and Her Order .. 83
Old Irish Life By H. A. HINKSON 83
The True Traveller By EDWARD THOMAS .. 84
Dostoevsky By GEORGE SAMPSON 85
A New Life of St. Francis .. 86
Verse of Yesterday and To-Day By FRANCIS BICKLEY .. 86
Village Life 87
Here and Hereafter By JOSEPH CLAYTON 87

Love in London 88
The Playwright By DARRITT EGGIS 88
About Shakespeare 89

NOVEL NOTES

Edith Christie A Daughter of the Rich The Bride of Love Lord of Longray For the Queen A Fery Land For John Lobb and Flow Sharrow A Long Shadow Innocence in the Wilderness A Derelict Empire Herself Ruth of the Rowldrich Dicky Diver 90-93

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE

London Stories Anna Celtica The Autobiography of a Working Woman — The Comedy of Catherine the Great William James — Colour Music 93-96

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 96

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The June BOOKMAN will be a Wilkie Collins Number, and will contain a special article on Wilkie Collins, by Arthur Compton-Rickett. Among the principal contents also will be "Heroes of Armageddon," by Walter Sichel; "The Centenary of John Forster," by Borrie Twede; "John Galsworthy's Poems," by A. St. John Adcock; "Recent Histories," by Thomas Secombe; "Victor Hugo," by F. G. Bettany, Charles Lamb, etc., etc.

For much assistance with the Browning illustrations in this Number we are indebted to the kindness of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., Mr. Elkin Mathews and Messrs. Cassell. To Mr. Mathews, too, we are under particular obligations in connection with the extremely interesting discoveries on which Sir William Robertson Nicoll has based his article concerning Browning's father.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. are marking the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Browning by the publication of a handsome Centenary edition of his works in ten volumes. These are to include all the poems contained in previous complete editions, with the addition of a few short poems of various dates that the collected editions have not hitherto taken in. Each volume is to contain a Biographical and Bibliographical Introduction by Dr. Frederick G. Kenyon, C.B., Director and Public Librarian of the British Museum, and will have a frontispiece portrait in photogravure, several of these portraits being now first published. The first volume will be ready on May 7th, and the others will be issued at short intervals, so that the edition may be completed during the Centenary year.

"George Wendern gave a Party," by John Inglis, which has attracted so much attention whilst it has been running serially in "Blackwood's Magazine," is to be published in book form by Messrs. Blackwood and Sons almost immediately.

Messrs. Constable are following their admirable anthologies "In Praise of Oxford" with one by Rosaline Masson "In Praise of Edinburgh," and they have one in preparation "In Praise of Cambridge," by Sidney Waterlow.

In February last, Dr. George Brandes celebrated his seventieth birthday, and the great Norwegian critic's numerous admirers in this country will be glad to hear that he has at length been persuaded to come to England and deliver a series of lectures at certain of our Universities. He has undertaken also to give one popular lecture on "Shakespeare" or "Hamlet" in London, about the middle of May. Dr. Brandes' famous critical study, "William Shakespeare," and his "Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature," are published over here by Mr. Heinemann.

Mr. Herman Scheffauer is publishing, with Mr. Fifield, a collection of American border ballads entitled "Drake in California." These comprise some of his later and relatively more popular poems. Mr. Scheffauer is a native of California, and was engaged there for some years in architecture, in the meantime making a notable place for himself as one of that distinctive school of Californian poets, of whom Joaquin Miller and Edward Markham are the leading figures. His first volume of verse, "Of Both Worlds," was published in San Francisco in 1903. Later he gave up architecture, travelled abroad, settled in London in 1905, wrote for Macmillan's and other of the literary magazines, and returned to San Francisco after the earthquake. He then wrote his poetic and symbolical forest-play, "The Sons of Baldur," which was produced at the yearly midsummer festival of the famous Bohemian Club of San Francisco. Those who have seen them

Mr. Herman Scheffauer.

From a photograph by Dr. Arnold Genthe, of New York.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. William Watson

whose poetical drama, "The Heralds of the Dawn," Mr. John Lane is publishing.

say that these dramatic festivals are absolutely unique and that in many ways they are the most impressive of modern dramatic productions. They are given at night in the heart of a forest of giant and primeval redwood trees, some of them thousands of years old and of enormous height and girth. The plays, produced but once each year, are lavishly staged and costumed, with great choruses, illuminations of the hills and woods at the close, etc. They are a peculiar evolution of a new dramatic form, and among the first of modern open-air performances. Having published a second book of poems, "Looms of Life," in New York, where he spent two years in a settlement in the Ghetto, Mr. Scheffauer returned to London at the end of 1910. He has since won a considerable vogue in England and America as a writer of short stories, and has written various special articles of national interest for some of the most popular of the London magazines. His "Masque of the Elements," a poem based on the everlasting recurrence of cosmic life and death, was recently published by Messrs. Dent, and he has just finished a sort of epic novel of London, which will probably make its appearance this autumn.

Mr. Scheffauer says, by the way, that his literary preceptor in California was Ambrose Bierce, a most remarkable but neglected figure in American literature. Some of the greatest and most wonderfully imaginative of modern short stories will be found among those that make up his volume, "In the Midst of Life." Mr. Scheffauer has dealt with the work of Bierce in an article called "The Death of Satire," that is to be published presently in the Fortnightly.

The Washington Post reports a dinner party given by President Taft at the White House, with Mr. and Mrs. George C. Riggs as the principal guests. Mrs. Riggs' (Kate Douglas Wiggin's) play, "Rebecca of Sunny Brook Farm," was being presented that week at a Washington theatre, and after the dinner the President and his party attended the performance. At the end of the third act the house, having recognised Mrs. Riggs, raised an enthusiastic demonstration, and called insistently for a speech. President Taft rose and presented Mrs. Riggs to the audience, who greeted her with tumultuous applause that continued until, for a second time, the President got up and presented her to them. No living author in America is more popular in her books or enjoys a wider personal popularity than Kate Douglas Wiggin.

Mr. H. H. Thomas has added two more volumes this Spring to the list of his works about gardening—"The Complete Gardener," which we reviewed last month, and "The Garden At Home," which we notice elsewhere in this Number. Both books are published by Messrs. Cassell. Mr. Thomas is a gardener by heredity; his father was head gardener to Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle, and though at the outset of his career he was made a clerk in a bank, the other sort of bank on which the wild thyme grows drew him back to itself, and after acquiring special knowledge by several years of work in the Royal garden with his father, he had two years of gardening in France, then studied for two years at Kew. In 1900 he became Assistant-Editor of The Garden, and since 1907 he has been Editor of The Gardener.

By courtesy of the American "Bookman"

Lady Thackeray Ritchie.

The facial resemblance of Lady Ritchie to her father comes out strikingly in this photograph.

Mr. Frederick Watson whose new book, "Incidents," we review elsewhere, is the son of "Ian Maclaren," but though he follows his father into literature he has a vein of humour and manner of writing that are entirely his own. He is only now beginning a career, but has contributed already to Punch, the British Weekly, and the Westminster Gazette, and has at present a serial story for boys, "White Man's Gold," running in that excellent magazine, The Captain. Moreover, he has edited a collection of essays by various authors, "From a Northern Window," that was published last year by Messrs. Nisbet, and a volume of his father's sermons, "Respectable Sins," that was published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. At present Mr. Watson is engaged in writing a historical romance, "The Afterglow," that deals with a fine romantic episode in the later career of the Young Pretender. Withal, he is far from being one of those writers whom Byron disliked, the author who is all author. At Sedburgh school, at Edinburgh University and at Cambridge, he not only won a reputation as a contributor to the school and college magazines, but as a cricketer and athlete; and nowadays, though he finds time for the writing of fiction, he is also in business as a publisher, and is a partner in the firm of Messrs. Nisbet & Co.

Mr. Lewis Melville writes thus: "I beg you to give me a few lines in which I may correct a remark made in my review in the April issue of Sir George Trevelyan's "George III. and Charles Fox." Fox began to gamble less and less after 1792, the book says; and I pointed out that it was high time for him to begin to reform at forty-three years of age. My attention has been called to an 'Erratum' of one line at the end of the 'Contents,' from which I learn that 1792 was a misprint for 1782. This makes a very great deal of difference to the strength of Sir George's Trevelyan's defence of Fox. What appeared to be a piece of special pleading concerning a man of forty-three, is a very natural argument to adduce on behalf of one ten years younger. I regret my comment the more, because I should have known that the distinguished author was extremely unlikely so to blunder."

Mr. Keighley Snowden's next novel, "Bright Shame," tells the extraordinary case of a sculptor of genius who goes in search of a son he had not known had been born to him. The book will be published shortly by Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

We are sorry that an error was made in the dates which form part of the title of Mr. E. G. M. Routh's admirable volume about Tangier, which was reviewed in our last month's Supplement. The correct title of the book, which is published by Mr. John Murray, is: "Tangier: England's Lost Atlantic Outpost, 1661-1684."

In consequence of ill-health Mr. Yone Noguchi has been compelled to defer the publication of "The American Diary of a Japanese Girl," which Mr. Elkin Mathews was hoping to publish this season. In a letter that Mr. Mathews has just received from him, Mr. Noguchi says: "I wish you will do nothing with that American Diary till I will send you the definite report."

James Stephens.

Author of "The Charwoman's Daughter" (Macmillan) and "The Hill of Visions" (Maunder), two books that we reviewed last month.

Frontispiece portrait in "The Hill of Visions" (Maunder).

In his new novel "The Family Living" (John Murray), Mr. Lacon Watson pictures the lives of the country clergy with an inside knowledge of his subject, for he comes of a clerical family and was born at Sharnford Rectory in Leicestershire. His father has five brothers of whom two also were ordained; moreover, his mother's father was a clergyman, and Mrs. Lacon Watson is a clergyman's daughter. He was educated at Winchester and Caius College, Cambridge. For seven years he tried schoolmastering, first at Reading, afterwards at Blair Lodge, in Stirlingshire, and there are side-lights, too, on the schoolmaster's life in the "Family Living."

Whilst at Blair Lodge, Mr. Lacon Watson wrote a good deal, chiefly verse and essays; and in 1894, resolved to take up literature seriously, he came to London, settled in Staple Inn, and proceeded to bombard the daily and weekly Press with prose and verse. The Pall Mall Gazette was the first paper to give him any real encouragement. Most of the sketches in "An Attic in Bohemia" and "Benedictine" appeared there. He published his first volume, a collection of essays, in 1896. Then Mr. Elkin Mathews published three other of his books, "The Unconscious Humorist," "An Attic in Bohemia," and "Christopher Deane," the latter being his first novel.

About 1905 Mr. Lacon Watson ventured into the publishing and bookselling line, and his experiences may serve as a warning to authors who think they can publish better than the publishers can, for he lost £12,000 before he came out of it. Nevertheless, it enabled him to enjoy for a while the luxury of publishing his own books, and "Barkers," issued last year by Mr. John Murray, was the good fruit of his misfortunes.

The portrait of Browning on our cover is from the painting by Rudolph Lehmann, in the National Portrait Gallery.

The presentation plate portrait of Stevenson given in our last Number is the property of Mr. Walter H. Barnett. Stevenson gave Mr. Barnett a sitting for it out in Sydney, when he was visiting Australia in 1893.

BOOKMAN'S GALLERY.

THE RIGHT HON. G. W. E. RUSSELL.

THE Right Honourable George William Eiskine Russell was born in London in February, 1853. He is the youngest son of Lord Charles Russell, who was the sixth son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, and he is a nephew of the renowned Lord John Russell. He was educated at Harrow and at University College, Oxford, he was Mr. Gladstone's private secretary and held office in three administrations. Noble in character as well as in birth, he represents the highest type of a true aristocracy.

I have read a great many reviews of Mr. Russell's books, and repeatedly I find the reviewer writing of him as if he was a garrulous old gentleman with a good memory and a ready pen. True, he has a good memory and a ready pen, but the rôle of the idle gossip it would be constitutionally impossible for him to adopt. I cannot imagine him, for instance, taking the place of the late Mr. Labouchere in the smoke-room of the House of Commons, smoking innumerable cigarettes and retailing chatty scandal to a circle of admirers. He is more than "good company," as we say; he is a man in whose presence everything base and ignoble perishes. Few men can talk so entertainingly; he bubbles over with humour, but it is the type of humour which springs from a large and generous heart, not from a sour and cynical spirit. On the title page of his latest book—"Afterthoughts" (Grant Richards)—is printed a saying of Bayard Taylor's: "Epimetheus, the after-thoughted, receiveth access of vigour in looking backward, and groweth reversely from age to youth." It is extraordinarily apposite to Mr. George Russell, for no man of my acquaintance is more youthful in spirit than he or keeps to such an extent (what he himself is so fond of quoting) "The young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks." Perhaps family cares make men grow old. Mr. Russell is a bachelor, and in his very full life, favoured as we have seen by circumstances, he has never lost the enthusiasm of youth. The lines have fallen unto him in pleasant places; yea, he has a goodly heritage, but no one can accuse him of neglecting his opportunities or of being blind to his good fortune. No one could be less blasé than he; for the complex varieties of life he has a keen relish. Most of the literary giants of the Victorian era whom we have known only in print, he has known in person. With the leaders in Church and State he has worked or fought, for he "was ever a fighter." Fortunately he has kept a diary ever since he was twelve years old. In an edition of "Collections and Recollections" he tells us the story of the diary. "Several attempts at diary-keeping I had already made and abandoned. This more serious endeavour was due to the fact that a young lady gave me a manuscript book attractively bound in scarlet leather; and such a gift inspired a resolution to live up to it. Shall I be deemed to lift the veil of private life too roughly if I transcribe some early entries? '23rd.

'Dear Kate came; very nice' '25th.—Kate is very delightful.' '26th.—Kate is a darling girl. She kissed me.' Before long, Love's young dream was dispersed by the realities of Harrow; but the scarlet book continued to receive my daily confidences. Soon—alas for puerile fickleness!—the name of 'Kate' disappears, and is replaced by rougher appellations, such as 'Bob' and 'Charlie,' 'Carrots' this, and 'Chaw' that. To Harrow succeeds Oxford, and now more recognizable names begin to appear—'Liddon' and 'Holland,' 'Gore' and 'Milner' and 'Lymington'.

But through all these personal permutations the continuous Life of the Diary remained unbroken, and so remains even to the present date."

To those who have never tasted of the sweets of Public School and University life, the devotion of their sons to school and college is wholly inexplicable. The man whose education was derived from a private tutor at home sneers at the product of the public school who speaks with emotion of his glorious school days. It is a kingdom to which he has never had access, a realm where he is a total stranger. The public school spirit and the indefinable charm of Oxford are subjects on which Mr. Russell writes, I think, at his best.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell.

"I love her. Let the critics rail,
My brethren and my home are there."

Harrow and Oxford have entered into his life and have become part and parcel of his nature. In this connection I think I am justified in quoting an extract from a letter which he once wrote to me. He says: "An Oxford education is, in my deliberate judgment, the greatest intellectual advantage which a man can enjoy—not merely in regard to the things learnt, but even more, in the widening of one's outlook on life, and the cultivation of the temper which seeks Truth and loathes prejudice. One may learn to argue anywhere, but Oxford teaches one to think. When I say 'Oxford,' I mean the University, with all its traditions and atmosphere. . . ."

In all his life this veneration for the Public School and the University has played a most important part, and any sketch of Mr. Russell, however brief, would be incomplete without a reference to it. It is generally known that "The Hill," the most successful of modern Public School stories, owes a great deal to the assistance of Mr. Russell—an assistance which Mr. Vachell has suitably acknowledged. And there is another story of the same class—"Follow Up" by Mr. A. D. Fox—in which Mr. Russell took a great interest; he once described it to me as "a good complement to 'The Hill.'" This affection for the spirit of the Public School is best expressed in the poetry of Henry Newbolt, another product of the Public School and the University:—

"We'll honour yet the school we knew,
The best school of all:
We'll honour yet the rule we knew,
Till the last bell call.
For, working days or holidays,
And glad or melancholy days,
They were great days and jolly days
At the best school of all."

Dr. Johnson, in one of those oracular sayings of his, observed that "a man must write a great deal to make his style obviously discernible." I have on my shelves a dozen books written by G. W. E. Russell, and I might have more. Are they enough to "make his style obviously discernible?" Matthew Arnold said to Mr. Russell on one occasion, "People think that I can teach them style. What stuff it all is! Have something to say, and say it as clearly as you can. That is the only secret of style." Mr. Russell's work falls into two categories. He writes every Saturday in the Manchester Guardian on any conceivable subject; often a Manchester Guardian reader suggests a theme which Mr. Russell may be relied upon to treat entertainingly. Periodically he collects these articles and publishes them under some such attractive title as "Collections and Recollections," "A Pocketful of Sixpences," "Some Threepenny Bits," "Seeing And Hearing" and so on. His latest "collections" are "Afterthoughts" and "One Look Back." They are all rather similar in character. If all were provided with Indices (most of them are), one would be pretty certain to find many pages numbered under Matthew Arnold, Gladstone, Beaconsfield, Bedford, Wilberforce, Liddon, Kingsley, Browning, Bright and many other familiar names. In "Afterthoughts" Mr. Russell again conducts us round his Portrait Gallery and stops to discourse in a fascinating manner on the men whom he has known intimately—on Matthew Arnold, on Kingsley, on James Payn and, of course, on Gladstone. Every page is entertaining and illuminating, and his style is faultless; he has obeyed Matthew Arnold's dictum; he has something to say and he says it clearly. Never has he printed a page of slovenly prose. "One Look Back" (Wells Gardner, 10s. 6d. net), however, is a more ambitious book than "Afterthoughts." We are told that this is not a "full-dress autobiography," but it is undoubtedly the most personal book he has yet published. We still tread the same paths, Harrow and Oxford and Parliament and the Church, but Mr. Russell is at greater pains to show us his own footprints and to take us into his confidence, revealing at the same time his ambitions and ideals and desires. "The idea of Life as Service was always present to my mind," he writes, and "One Look Back" is an eloquent commentary on that noble aim. The chapter on "Home" is certainly one of the most beautiful things he has ever written. In addition to these collected articles, Mr. Russell has published some fine biographies and books of literary criticism. It is generally admitted that the best critique of Matthew Arnold is the volume by Mr. Russell in the "Literary Lives" series of Hodder and Stoughton, and his study of Sydney Smith in the "English Men of Letters" (Macmillan)—again, a subject very much after his own heart—is one of the best in that remarkable series. Mr. Russell is a strong churchman, and indeed had it not been for a serious illness while at Oxford, he would probably have taken holy orders. He has published volumes on eminent church divines, and all reveal his gift for writing English, his sympathetic and discerning criticism.

Mr. Russell's scrap-books are among his most cherished possessions and contain some exceedingly amusing cuttings. I remember him showing me on one occasion the following about an unknown namesake of his: "George Russell described as a 'Singing Pilgrim' was charged with playing a concertina in the streets on Sunday for the purpose of collecting alms. The prisoner said he only sang Moody and Sankey's hymns and received money without asking for it. He was discharged with a caution." It is hardly justifiable, perhaps, to twist this humorous cutting into a text for a sermon on Mr. Russell, but a pilgrim through life he has been—observing, noting, enjoying. That diary of his which was first used in the book which brought him literary renown ("Collections and Recollections") is a pilgrim's diary, and I do not think that the mine of anecdote and experience is yet exhausted. Unless I am much mistaken future students of the manners and men of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries will find in the books of Mr. George Russell their richest quarry, and will esteem them as highly and love them as greatly as we value and appreciate the diaries of Pepys and Evelyn.

I. N.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

May 1st to June 1st, 1912.

Messrs. G. Allen & Co. (Incorporating Messrs. Swan,Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd., and Messrs. George Allen & Sons.)

- BALFOUR-MURPHY, W. J.—The Rise and Fall of Nations. 5s. net.
BOUCHER-JAMES, S.—The Soul's Destiny: Poems. 5s. net.
BRYANT, T. HUGH.—The Churches of Suffolk. In 2 Vols. East and West. Illustrations. Sold separately, 2s. 6d. net each.
COX, REV. J. CHARLES.—The Churches of Nottinghamshire. 2s. 6d. net.
GUILFORD, EVERARD L.—The Memorials of Old Notts. With about 35 Illustrations. 15s. net.
HOLMES, ALEC.—The Emporium: A Novel of Society. 6s.
HIND, C. LEWIS.—Babazon and his Art. 24 full-page (coloured) Illustrations. 21s. net.
JONES, E. ALFRED.—The Memorials of Old North Wales. With many Illustrations. 15s. net.
MAETERLINCK, MAURICE.—Joyzelle. To be issued in Pocket Edition for the first time. 2s. 6d. net and 3s. 6d. net.
SEDGWICK, CAPTAIN F. R.—The Russo Japanese War. Part II. Liao-Yang. Cloth and maps in pocket, 5s. net.
WUNDT, PROFESSOR WILHELM.—Outlines of Psychology. Translated by Rudolph Pintner, Ph.D. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- BLACK, J. SUTHERLAND, and CHRYSTAL, GEORGE (Editors).—The Life of William Robertson Smith. Illustrated. 15s. net.
BLACK, J. SUTHERLAND, and CHRYSTAL, GEORGE (Editors).—Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith. Frontispiece. 10s. net.
CROCKETT, W. S.—Abbotsford (Beautiful Britain Series). 1s. 6d. net.
ELLIOTT, MABEL SOPHIA.—Historical Geography of the British Isles. 1s. 6d. net.
LICHTENBERGER, ANDRÉ.—Alsace. (Les Braun Voyages). 1s. 6d. net.
SHENESSEY, S.—The Children's World. 1s. 6d. net.
SHERINGHAM, H. T.—Coarse Fishing. 4s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- CLAY, BERTHA M.—For Love and Life. 6d.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—Red Room. 1s. net.
PEMBERTON, MAX.—War and the Woman. 6s.
PEMBERTON, MAX.—Guide to London. 6d. net and 1s.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- BROWN, VINCENT.—The Chief Constable. 6s.
KIDSON, ETHEL.—Hemlock. 6s.
KITCHEN, ADVOCATE.—A History of Divorce. 7s. 6d. net.
REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—The Grey Terrace. 6s.
THOMAS, EDWARD.—George Borrow: The Man and His Books. 10s. 6d. net.
THOMAS, GILBERT.—Birds of Passage and Other Verses. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- FRANKAU, GILBERT.—Catalogue of the Paris Salon Exhibition. With 300 Facsimile Illustrations. 4s.
FRANKAU, GILBERT.—One of us. A Novel in Verse. 3s. 6d. net.
WHISTON, WILLIAM (Translated).—The Complete Works of Flavius Josephus. With Maps and Illustrations. In 2 Vols. 5s. net per vol.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Junior Geography for 1911. 2s.
MARICHAL, J. P. R., L.E.S.L., and GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—New Junior French Reader. 2s.
MOFFATT, C. W. P., M.A., M.B., B.C.—Science French Course. 3s. 6d.
TATE, A. J., M.A.—New Junior Latin Reader. 2s.

Messrs. A. C. Fifield.

- BURN, F. BONHAM.—The Miracle, and other Poems. 1s. net.
GUEST, DR. HADEN.—The Care and Nursing of Children and Babies. 1s. net.
HOBBSON, MRS. J. A.—A Modern Crusader. 1s. net.
PICKERING, J.—The Cap of Care. A Narrative Poem with Interludes. 1s. net.
WEBB, A. PELHAM.—Sonnets. 1s. net.
WILLIAMS, HAROLD.—The Ballad of Two Great Cities. 1s. net.

Funk & Wagnells Company.

- BAGNELL, ROBERT.—The Economic and Moral Aspect of the Liquor Business. 3s. net.
DALTON, PROFESSOR FRANK EUGENE, F.S.A.—Swimming Scientifically Taught. 5s. net.
DUBOIS, PAUL, M.D.—The Education of Self. 340 pages. 6s.
JACKSON, SAMUEL MACAULEY, D.D., LL.D.—The New Schaff Herzog Ency. of Religious Knowledge. Now complete in 12 quarto vols., aggregating about 6,000 pages. £12 12s. net.
PATTERSON, CHARLES BRODIE.—Living Waters. or, Rivers to the Ocean. 156 pages. 4s.
RAYMOND, GEORGE LANSING, LL.D.—Suggestions for the Spiritual Life. 6s. net.
THOMSON, WILLIAM HANNA, M.D.—The Life and Times of the Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. 5s. net.

Messrs. Gay & Hancock, Ltd.

- FITZGERALD, PERCY.—Pickwick Riddles and Perplexities. 1s. net.
LAUNSBURY, G. CONSIANT.—Poems of Revolt and Satan Unbound. 1s. 6d. net.
LINCOLN, JEANIE GOULD.—The Luck of Rathcoole. 6s.
MACGRATH, HAROLD.—The Carpet from Bagdad. 6s.
MATHEWS, JOHN L.—The Log of the Easy Way. Life on the Mississippi. 6s. net.
MATHEWSON, ANNA.—The Song of the Evening Stars. With Caricatures by Signor Caruso. 2s. 6d. net.
POWERS, CAPTAIN J. T.—The Garden of the Sun. 6s.
SCRIBNER, FRANK K.—The Secret of Frontellae. 6s.
STEAD, ROBERT J. C.—Songs of the Prairie. 1s. 6d. net.
WILSON, CATHERINE.—The Modern Evangeline. 6s.

Messrs. G. Harrap & Co.

- CABOT, E. L., and EYLES, E.—Character Training: A Complete Course for the School Career. 3s. 6d. net.
EDGAR, M. G., M.A.—The Boys' Froissart. With 16 Illustrations by Morris M. Williams. 5s. net.
TAINE, H.—La Littérature Anglaise (Extraits Choisis). With Exercises and Notes by R. T. Curran, M.A. 8d.
WEISGERBER, L. J.—Cinquante Petites Lettres en Français. With Exercises and Vocabulary. 6d.

Messrs. Herbert & Daniel.

- ASHE, EDWIN M.D.—Faith and Suggestion. Including an account of the remarkable experiences of Dorothy Kearn. 3s. 6d.
EVANS, GEORGE.—The Child of His Adoption. 6s.
GALES, R. L.—More Studies in Arcady. 5s.

- GIBBS, PHILIP.—The Life of Lord Byron. 10s. 6d. net.
McCULLAGH, FRANCIS.—Italy and Tripoli. A War for a Desert. 10s. 6d. net.
MEYNELL, VIOA.—George Eliot. (The Regent Library). 2s. 6d. net.
INGPEN, ROGER. P. B. Shelley. (The Regent Library). 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- The Memoirs of Lord Clarendon. 2 Vols. Vol. I. Exile. The Thousand. Vol. II. The Triple Alliance. Illustrated. 10s. net each vol.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

- CROKER, MRS. B. M.—The Company's Servant. 7d.
CUNNINGHAM, ALFRED.—To Day in Egypt. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. 12s. 6d. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—In the Vortex. A Latin Quarter Romance. 6s.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- CROKER, MRS. B. M.—The Serpent's Tooth. 6s.
"IOTA." Patricia. A Mother. 6d.
KEIGHTLEY, S. R.—The Pukemen. 6d.
LE BLOND, MRS. AUBREY.—Charlotte Sophia, Countess Bentinck. Her Life and Times, 1715-1800. In 2 vols. with numerous Illustrations from original paintings, facsimiles of letters, etc. 24s. net.
MELVILLE, LEWIS.—An Injured Queen. Caroline of Brunswick. In 2 vols., fully illustrated, and with reproductions of many rare prints. 24s. net.
SAUNDERS, MRS. BAILLIF.—Lady Q. 6s.
STEWART, J. A.—A Son of God. 6d.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

- BOOTHBY, GUY.—Bushigams. 6d.
CANTILL, JAMES, and JONES C. SHERIDAN.—Sun Yat Sen, and the Awakening of China. Fully Illustrated. 5s. net.
FITZGERALD, PERCY.—Jane Austen: A Study. 3s. 6d. net.
HIGDON, T. G.—The Labomier. A Poem. 6d. net.
MATHERS, HIFEN.—Man is Fire. Woman is Tow. 6s.
MIKSZATH, KALMAN.—St. Peter's Umbrella. 1s. net.
SYLVA, CARMEN.—Poems. Translated by A. H. Fenn. 2s. 6d. net.
TOLSTOI, COUNT LEO.—Tales from Tolstoi. 6d.
WARDEN, FLORENCE.—Inn by the Shore. 1s. net.
YORK, CURTIS.—Carpathia Knox. 6d.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- BROWNE, COLONEL HAMILTON.—A Lost Legionary in South Africa. 12s. 6d. net.
FORD, SEWELL.—Odd Numbers. 6s. net.
HARDING, MRS. AMBROSE.—The Dominant Chord. 6s. net.
HARGRAVE, BASH.—A Year's Gardening. 6s. net.
HARGRAVE, MARY.—Some German Women and Their Salons. 7s. 6d. net.
HUMBL, FERDUS.—The Blue Talisman. 6s. net.
LITTLE, MAY.—The Complete Cake Book. 2s. 6d. net.
WESTFALL, W. PERCIVAL, F.L.S.—Wild Flowers in Their Homes. 1s. net.
WHITE, CLAUDE GRAHAM, and HARPER, HARRY.—The Aeroplane in War. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans Green & Co.

- ALLINGHAM, WILLIAM.—Arranged by HELEN ALLINGHAM.—By the Way. A Collection of Short Poems, Fragments and Notes.
COFFEY, P. Ph.D. (Louvain).—The Science of Logic. An Inquiry into the Principles of Accurate Thought and Scientific Method. Vol. 1. 7s. 6d. net, ready. Vol. 2. nearly ready.
JAMES, WILLIAM.—Essays in Radical Empiricism.
RUSSELL, MATTHEW S. J., REV.—The Three Sisters of Lord Russell of Killowen: Sketches of Convent Life. With Portrait and other Illustrations.
SARSON, MAY, and PHILLIPS, MABEL ADDISON. With Preface by the Rev. A. A. DAVID, D.D., Headmaster of Rugby.—The History of the People of Israel.
SERBAIL, ANTONIO ROSMINI.—Theodicy. Essays on Divine Providence. Translated with some Omissions from the Italian Edition of 1845. 3 vols.
THORNTON, PERCY MELVILLE.—Some Things we have Remembered: (Samuel Thornton, Admiral, 1797-1859, Percy Melville Thornton, 1841-1911) 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

- BAYLEY, STANHOPE.—The Campaign of Rome, A Symphony, and In the Sleep of the Sun. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
BORTHWICK, MARGARET J.—The Book of the White Butterflies. 1s. 6d. net.
BOURCHIER, M. H.—Verses by the Way. 1s. net.
STOCKER, R. DIMSDALE.—Illusions and Ideals. 1s. net.
VISTAR, E. H.—The Phantom Ship and other Poems. With a Preface by W. H. Helms, and a Frontispiece by Violet Helm. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- CLINCH, GEORGE, F.S.A. Scot., F.G.S. London. With 12 Illustrations and a Map. 2s. 6d. net and 3s. 6d. net.
HAKVEY, A., and CROWTHER-BEYNON, V. B., M.A., F.S.A.—Leicester and Rutland. With 12 Illustrations and 2 Maps. 2s. 6d. net and 3s. 6d. net.
HOPE, ANTHONY.—A Servant of the Public. 2s. net.
LUCAS, E. V. (Edited by).—The Pocket Edition of the Works of Charles and Mary Lamb. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. 6 Vols. 5s. each. Vol. III. Books for Children.
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—The Missing Deloria. 1s. net.
WILDING, ANTHONY F., Champion, 1910-1911.—On the Court and Off. Specially Illustrated. 5s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- ANNESLEY, MAUDE.—Nights and Days. 6s.
AUTHOR OF "MASTERING FLAME"—Ashes of Incense. 6s.
COLUM, PADRAIC.—My Irish Year. 10s. 6d. net.
LILLEY, ARTHUR A.—Twenty Four Years of Cricket. 7s. 6d. net.
PAIN, HARRY.—Stones without Tears. 6s.
STEVENS, F. S.—Mountain of God. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
STODDARD, F. W.—Tramps Through Tyrol. 7s. 6d. net.
TROUBRIDGE, LADY.—Body and Soul. 1s. net.
WARNER, P. F.—England v. Australia. 7s. 6d. net.
WODEHOUSE, P. G.—The Prince and Betty. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

- BORENIUS, TANCRED (Edited by).—History of Painting in North Italy. By J. A. Crowe and G. B. Cavalcaselle. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations. 3 Vols.
BURGHCLERE, LADY.—Life of James, First Duke of Ormonde, 1610-1688. 2 Vols. With Illustrations.
CLAY, SIR ARTHUR, Bart.—Syndicalism and Labour. An Abridged and Cheaper Edition. 1s. net.
EDGCOMBE, RICHARD.—Journals of Lady Shelley, with Portraits.
HARRIS, F. R.—Life of Edward, First Earl of Sandwich, 1625-1672. 2 Vols. With many Portraits and Illustrations.

HOWORTH, SIR HENRY, K.C.I.E.—Gregory the Great. With Illustrations, Maps and Tables.
 JACKSON, F. HAMILTON.—Rambles in the Pyrenees. With numerous Illustrations.
 LACEY, MARY E.—With Dante in Modern Florence. With Illustrations.
 PAYNE, CHARLES H. (Edited by).—An Account of My Life (Gohur-Ikbal) by Her Highness Nawab Sultan Jahan Begam, Ruler of Bhopal. With Map and Illustrations.
 TALMAGE, MRS.—Autobiography of T. De Witt Talmage, D.D. With Portraits.
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN A., F.I.S.—The Genus Rosa. Part XX. 21s. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BAZIN, RENE.—De Toute sou Ame. 1s. net.
 CHANDLER.—The Mantle of the East. 1s. net.
 DICKENS, CHARLES.—Barnaby Rudge. 2s. net.
 HARRADEN, BEATRICE.—Out of the Wreck I Rise. 2s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Notre Dame de Paris. Vols 1 and II. 1s. each net.
 RENAN, ERNEST.—Souvenir d'Enfance. 1s. net.
 SILBERRAD, UNA L.—Ordinary People. 7d. net.
 SNAITH, J. C.—Fortune. 7d. net.
 WETHERELL, ELIZABETH.—Wide Wide World. 6d. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

CUTHBERTSON, DAVID, Sub-Librarian, Edinburgh University Library.—A Tragedy of the Reformation: Being the Authentic Narrative of the History and Burning of the "Christianus Restitutio," 1553. With a succinct account of the Theological Controversy between Michael Servetus, its Author, and the Reformer, John Calvin. 5s. net.
 HENDERSON, JANET E.—The Skipper's Daughter. 2s. 6d.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

"ADELPHOS."—"Ush": A Novel. 2s. net.
 BARNES-LAWRENCE, ASHLEY L.—John Daunt Novel. 6s.
 DE VEER, W.—A Benedict's Escapade. A Novel. 6s.
 FOSTER, MILDRED.—A Rose Amidst Scotch Thistles. A Novel. 6s.
 FRYERS, AUSTEN.—The Uncreated Man: A Novel. 6s.
 HARDY, OSWALD H.—At Amisbüll: Verse. 1s. net.
 "NOMAD."—The Woman Decides: A Novel. 6s.
 RIDLEY, WINIFRED.—The Omen: A Novel. 6s.
 WHISH, EVELYN.—Ave, Verum Corpus: Devotional. 6d. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BOX, G. H., M.A. Prefatory Note by SANDAY, W., D.D., LL.D., Litt.D.—The Ezra-Apocalypse. 10s. 6d. net.
 DAVIS, W. G., A.S.A.A.—Examination Notes on Municipal Accountancy. 1s. net.
 DAY, J. E.—Stockbrokers' Office Organisation, Management and Accounts. 7s. 6d. net.
 Famous Speeches. (Second Series.) Selected and Edited with Introductory Notes by Herbert Paul. 7s. 6d. net.
 HARFORD, REV. CANON, M.A., and the REV. CANON MORLEY STEVENSON, M.A. With the REV. J. W. TYLER, M.A., as Assistant Editor.—Prayer Book Dictionary. 25s. net.
 MITCHESON, F. A.—Tramways Rating Valuations and Income Tax Assessments. 2s. 6d. net.
 SLATER, J. A., B.A., LL.B. Assisted by upwards of Fifty Specialists as Contributors.—Pitman's Commercial Encyclopedia and Dictionary of Business. Vol. II.
 Teaching Composition.—A Book of Modern Method, Practice, Suggestion, Experiment, and Experience by J. Eaton Feasey, with an Introduction by J. A. Green, M.A. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.
 TIPTON, P. J. VARLEY.—Junior Civil Service Arithmetic. 1s. net.
 Tobacco: from Grower to Smoker. (Common Commodities of Commerce Series). 1s. 6d. net.
 TOVEY, PHILIP, A.C.I.S. Prospectuses: How to Read and Understand them. 1s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ALLINSON, A. R.—Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. 24s. net, set.
 BROADLEY, A. M.—The Royal Miracle. 16s. net.
 CAMBRIDGE, ADA.—The Retrospect. 6s.
 COTES, MRS. EVERARD.—The Consort. 6s.
 D'ANETHAN, THE BARONESS ALBERT. Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. 18s. net.
 GERARD, DOROTHEA.—Exotic Martha. 6s.
 HAMILTON, COSMO.—Impertinent Reflections. 2s. net.
 HERVEY, H. J.—Cameos of Indian Crime. 12s. 6d. net.
 HOLBACH, MAUD M.—In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. 10s. net.
 HYDE, JOHN DALISON.—The Feet of the Years. 1s. net.
 LEVY, M.—Paul's Popular Code. 1s. net.
 MATHERS, HELEN.—Gay Lawless. 6d.
 MATHEW, THE MOST REV. ARNOLD H., D.D.—Life and Times of Rodrigo Borgia, Alexander VI. 16s. net.
 PEARCE, CHARLES F.—Love Besieged. 6d.
 SHIRES-MASON, MRS.—The Loves of Stella. 6s.
 SNOWDEN, J. KEIGHLEY.—Bright Shame. 6s.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Swelling of Jordan. 6s.
 WORTH, MARIE.—Everyday Savouries. 1s. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

ANDERSON, ROBERT, CAPTAIN.—An Artillery Officer in the Mexican War. 7s. 6d. net.
 "BADSWORTH."—Auction Bridge. New Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
 "BADSWORTH."—Principles of Bridge. 3s. 6d. net.
 BANKS, ELEANOR.—Stenographer's Ready Reference.
 BARCLAY, FLORENCE L.—Wheels of Time. Fourteenth Impression. 1s. net.
 BLAKEMAN, A. NOEL.—Personal Recollections of the War of the Rebellion.
 COLMAN, SAMUEL.—Nature's Harmonic Unity.
 CRUMPTON, M. NATALINE.—Leaflets from Italy.
 FAIRCHILD, ARTHUR H. R.—A View of Poetry: A Critical Study of its Nature and Value.
 GREGORY, LADY.—Irish Folk Historic Plays. N.S.
 HOLMES, JOHN HAYNES, D.D.—The Revolutionary Function of the Modern Church. 6s. net.
 ISAACS, ABRAHAM S., Ph.D.—What is Judaism? 5s. net.
 KIMBALL, GUSTAVUS S.—Commercial Arithmetic.
 LANGE, ALGOT.—In the Amazon Jungle.
 MACNUTT, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS.—De Orbe Novo.
 McKREADY, KELVIN.—A Beginner's Star Book.
 PAGE, CURTIS HIDDEN.—Plays of Molière. 4 Vols. 3s. 6d. net each.
 SEELIGMAN, E. R. A.—The Social Evil.
 SERVIS, GARRETT P.—Astronomy in a Nutshell.

The Fleming H. Revell Company.

HERRICK, GEORGE F., D.D.—Christian and Mohammedan. 5s. net.
 HULBERT, HENRY H., D.D.—The Church and Her Children: A Practical Solution of the Problem of Child Attendance. 3s. 6d. net.
 WILLETT, HERBERT W., Ph.D., Professor in the University of Chicago.—The Call of the Christ: A Study of the Challenge of Jesus to the Present Century. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

BRADLEY, CUTHBERT.—Fox-Hunting from Shire to Shire. 13 Plates (6 in Colour), and upwards of 100 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 DUNNE, FRANK.—Draughts Praxis. Second Edition. 3s. 6d.

RAWNSLEY, F. W., M.A.—Introductions to the Poets. 2s. 6d.
 ZIMMER, G. F., F.R.Hort.S., F.L.S.—Dictionary of Botanical Names and Terms, with their English Equivalents.

Messrs. Sampson Low Marston & Co.

FORD, ERNEST.—Short History of Music in England. 5s. net.
 KIRCHHEISEN, FRÉDÉRIC M.—Bibliographie du Temps de Napoléon. 2 Vols. 12s. 6d. net and 8s. net.
 MENEVAL, BARON DE.—The Empress Josephine. 10s. 6d. net.
 TROWER, ARTHUR.—Our Homestead and its Old World Garden. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

BAGSHAW, FRÉDÉRIC G.—The Royal Family of England. 2 Vols.
 FIELD, MICHAEL.—Poems of Adoration. 5s. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

LARDNER, CAPTAIN E. G. D., F.R.G.S.—Soldiering and Sport in Uganda. 12s. 6d. net.
 MCCORMICK, NORA H.—A Bush of Rosemary: Poems. 1s. 6d.
 TOLSTOY, COUNT.—Where Love is, there God is Also, The Godson, What Men Live by, If you neglect the Fire you don't put it out, and, What Shall it Profit a Man? (Scott Library.) 1s. net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

ALISHORN, LIONEL.—Stupid Mundi. 10s. net.
 CLAYTON, JOSEPH.—Robert Ket and the Norfolk Rising. 10s. 6d. net.
 HOWE, P. P.—J. M. Synge. A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.
 MACHEN, ARTHUR.—Hieroglyphics. 2s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTS, R. ELLIS.—Henrik Ibsen. A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson, Ltd.

BUTLER, C. A.—Social Conditions in Oxford. 5s. net.
 CARTER, B. A.—Ready Guide to British Birds. With Coloured Plate. 2s. 6d. net.
 SIDGWICK, F. (Edited by).—Ballads of Robin Hood and other Outlaws. Being the Fourth Volume of "Popular Ballads of the Olden Time." 3s. 6d. net.
 STEWARD, B. D.—Treasure of Thule. Novel. 6s.

Messrs. Skeffington & Co.

BARDSLEY, REV. J. V. N., M.A.—The Church of England and her Endowments. 2s. net.

Messrs. Smith Elder & Co.

ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS. Centenary Edition. In 10 Vols. 10s. 6d. each, net. Printed in bold type on fine paper. Limited to 500 numbered copies for sale in this country and 250 copies in the United States. Sold in sets only. An additional 20 copies for England and 26 for the United States will be specially printed on Japanese Vellum, 410 10s. per set, to be sold at a higher price, each copy being numbered. The works will be arranged in chronological order, and Dr. Frederic G. Kenyon, C.B., will contribute a bibliographical and explanatory preface to each leading poem. Each volume will have a frontispiece portrait of Robert Browning in photogravure, several of the portraits appearing for the first time. Vol. I. ready May 7th.

Mr. Stephen Swift.

BECKFORD, WILLIAM.—Episodes of Wathek. Translated by the late Sir Frank T. Marzials with an Introduction by Lew. Melville and Photogravure of the Author. 21s. net.
 BELLOC, HILAIRE.—Waterloo. Coloured Maps. 1s. net.
 DAVIES, EMIL.—Off Beaten Tracks in Brittany. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 DE GOURMONT, REMY.—A Night in the Luxembourg. With Preface and Appendix by Arthur Ransome. 5s. net.
 EARLE, RICHARD.—Shadows Out of the Crowd. 6s.
 KENNEDY, J. M.—English Literature, 1880-1905. 7s. 6d. net.
 KERSEY, WILLIAM.—The Darksome Moods of Bagdad. 6s.
 LAPWORTH, CHARLES.—Tropics and Young Italy. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 LYNCH, ARTHUR, M.P.—Psychology: A New System. Vol. I. 10s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, STEPHEN.—The King: A Play. 2s. 6d. net.
 POUND, EZRA.—Sonnets and Ballads of Guido Cavalcanti. 3s. 6d. net.
 RANSOME, ARTHUR.—Bohemia in London. 2s. 6d. net.
 TITTIERTON, W. R.—From Theatre to Music Hall. 1s. 6d. net.
 VON TAUBE, HIRON.—National Education. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Kegan Paul Trench & Co.

ANONYMOUS.—Rays of the Dawn or Fresh Light on Some New Testament Problems. 3s. 6d. net.
 ELLIS, MRS. HAVELOCK.—Lover's Calendar. The. 1s. net.
 JOUNCOURI, MARIE DE.—Letters to Young Housekeepers. A Supplement to "Wholesome Cookery," by same author. 1s. 6d. net.
 ILLIE, ARTHUR.—Rama and Homer: The Epic of Hindustan. Showing the many similarities that exist in the Illad and Odyssey and Ramayana. Illustrated. About 3s. 6d. net.
 SIEVEKING, I. GIBERNE.—Memoir of Sir Horace Mann. With 8 Plates. About 10s. net.
 STONE, J. HARRIS.—England's Riviera. With many Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 15s. net.
 WARNER, IRENE E. TOYE.—In Light and Darkness. Hope! 1s. 6d. net.
 WRIGHT, DUDLEY.—A Manual of Buddhism. With Introduction by Professor Edmund Mills, D.Sc.—About 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BONNEY, PROFESSOR T. G.—The Building of the Alps. 12s. 6d. net.
 BROWN, H. ROWLAND.—Butterflies and Moths at Home and Abroad. 7s. 6d. net.
 COURLANDER, ALPHONSE.—Mightier than the Sword. 6s.
 DAWSON, W. HARBUTT.—Social Insurance in Germany. 6s. net.
 DUNLOP, O. J.—English Apprenticeship and Child Labour. A History. 10s. 6d. net.
 ENOCK, C. REGINALD.—The Secret of the Pacific. 12s. 6d. net.
 GARNER, J. L.—Cesar Borgia: A Study of the Renaissance. 12s. 6d. net.
 LEPSZY, L.—Cracow: Its History and Antiquities. 10s. 6d. net.
 MACGOWAN, J.—Men and Manners of Modern China. 12s. 6d. net.
 THURSTON, EDGAR.—Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. 12s. 6d. net.
 VILLIERS, BROUGHAM.—Modern Democracy: A Study in Tendencies. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

ASKEW, A. AND C.—In Lover's Lane. 6d.
 BOOTHBY, GUY.—The Beautiful White Devil. 7d. net.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—The Unknown Lady. 2s. net.
 HILL, HEADON.—My Lord the Felon. 6s.
 HUME, FERGUS.—Red Money. 6s.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Jew's House. 6d.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—An Eye for an Eye. 1s. net.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—In White Raiment. 7d. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—The Long Arm. 6d.
 "RITA."—Vivienne. 6d.
 TURNER, LILIAN.—Written Down. 3s. 6d.
 TYNAN, KATHARINE.—A Red, Red Rose. 6d.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—Private Selby. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED. M.—The Secret of the Sands. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED. M.—The Crimson Blind. 7d. net.

THE READER.

ROBERT BROWNING.

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY

THE curious group of anniversaries which has been with us for the last year or two, has had no parallel for more than a generation. But students of literary history could, without a Macaulayan memory, give a considerable list of similar coincidences, which are indeed, though the intervals at which they occur are very irregular, rather the rule than the exception. For closeness and distinction, however, it would be hard to match, and perhaps impossible to beat, the quartette which has just been completed by the anniversary of the birth of Browning.

It is a little amusing, and more than a little pitiful, to remember how much of the commemoration in each case has taken the form of that apparently irresistible "cock-fighting" which, to so many people, seems to provide their whole notion of criticism: of attempts to exalt or depress the "novelist of the classes" or "of the masses" and to pit the "poet of form" against the "poet of thought." Let us see if, for once, we can escape this pitfall, or at least this rut, and find something to say about Browning-by-himself-Browning, if we can at any rate keep clear of the old cock-pit and make comparisons, should comparison be necessary, only with the great poets of the past and the great precedents which they have, as far as such a thing is possible, established for the present and the future.

Not easily shall anyone have read all that has been even recently said about such a poet—especially one who was not long ago the subject of so much engouement. But I do not seem to have met anywhere a full recognition or discussion of one characteristic of his which, sometimes for good and sometimes for evil, distinguishes his poetry from that of nearly all other poets in kind, and from that of all other poets, almost without exception, in degree.

The words "Impressionism" and "Impressionist" were not (so far as I know) invented for many years after Browning began to write poetry: they were certainly not in common use very much before his death, and they had not, even then, been much extended beyond the arts of design. But such an Impressionist as Browning, in the sense in which the word has a proper and useful reference to poetry, the world had never seen before and is very unlikely to see again. Of course all poets, as distinguished from mere versifiers, are impressionists, in that they give us, to use Mr Pater's memorable correction of Coleridge, "their sense of fact" instead of the mere fact itself: while it may be added that there is actually the same distinction between users of verse who simply leave the metre to do what it can for itself, and those who impress their own colour and tone upon it. When Pope wrote "Windsor Forest," though he might have got the fresh impression by simply stepping out of doors, he preferred to draw on his books, and so produced a pretty, orthodox, dead, académic. When he wrote the "Character of Atticus" spite if not truth stamped a quasi-real impression on his mind, and he produced a master-piece. But in truth there is no need to labour so obvious a point. From the day and the poem in which Horace looked upon Soracte, to the day and the poem in which Tennyson (no odious or odorous comparison here!) saw with the eye of the mind Sir Lancelot and the Queen riding through the coverts that he had seen with the eye of the body; long before the one and ever since the other, poets have been impressionists in this way, and have been so of necessity. Nor has this impressionism been limited to the sense of sight, bodily or imaginative. All narrative, all reflective, all emotional poetry that has been good for anything has borne, in this way or that, to one extent or another, the hall-mark of the personal impression upon it.

In this sense and direction, therefore, Browning is not more of an impressionist than all good poets are: or is more so only in the ratio of his goodness. But there is another way in which the title is very specially and peculiarly his—in which indeed, as was said above, hardly any one can compete with him for it.

With nearly all poets, at least until very recently, the impression has been, merely or mainly, a sort of basis or study for the complete poem. In some cases, perhaps most, all but traces of it have vanished before the completed poem makes its appearance; in others it is obvious enough. But in Browning the process is different. In certain instances, whether the best or not we shall see presently, this process of absorption does take place: but in others, in the vast majority of his work indeed, it does not. Every phrase has behind it a more or less vivid impression: it is of more doubtful advantage that every impression sometimes insists on having its phrase.

Photo by Fradelle & Young. Robert Browning, 1881.
From "The Works of Robert Browning" (Smith, Elder).

Take for early examples, that incomparably beautiful passage which was afterwards enlarged and incorporated in "Dramatis Personæ" as "Nothing can be as it has been before," and "Pauline." Compare the first with Donne's (or anybody else's, for it does not here matter in the least) "Absence," or the "Bracelet" poem, or any other characteristic Caroline-metaphysical piece. The resemblances are striking enough: they are of the common-places of Browning criticism. But the differences! To the Caroline, the out-of-the-way images and ideas which his fancy or his imagination evokes are real but transient things; he may dwell on them less or more, but he is not consciously, at any rate not supremely, interested in the fashion in which they reach his mind, impress themselves on it, blend or transmute themselves, and depart. Browning is. He called himself

Robert Browning.

Drawn by R. Lehmann at Rome, May 22nd, 1859.

"You writer of plays," and some, even among his admirers, have unkindly denied him anything but monodramatic genius: to which allowance Wamba's comment as to Rowena's forgiveness is painfully applicable. The fact is that Browning is always dramatic, but that his drama has very peculiar and rather uncanny characteristics. Not only is he, like poor Ludwig of Bavaria, the only spectator: but in an Emersonian fashion he is the theatre, the actors, the stage-manager, the scenshifter, and most important of all, the play. The whole thing is a record of an impression of Robert Browning's, and unless you can by some hocus focus substitute your mind for his, or at least put yourself into some telepathic connection with it, you must remain a hopeless outsider.

Again, take "Pauline"—that remarkable critique and key of all Browningism, which, having offered it in vain to an entirely indifferent world, he locked away from the

Robert Browning, 1835.

From "The Works of Robert Browning" (Smith, Elder)

ungrateful public for a generation; and of which he seems not himself to have perceived the full virtues. Half a love poem, half a study of Shelley, and wholly (as he fortunately did not forget to tell us), written in pursuance of a plan involving the assumption of several different characters "and representing "a crab from the Tree of Life in his tool's paradise" it is simply a continuous, if prentice-hand, record of the impressions taken by a mind fully forged, but very imperfectly finished. From this point of view it is quite intelligible that Browning, though patient to an almost unexampled degree of questions about his work, should have frequently professed himself unable to answer them. There is no reason to suspect trick or pose here. The impression had originally been a weak or rapidly passing one (the most famous instance, "Childe Roland" was evidently due

Robert Browning.

From the water-colour drawing by D. G. Rossetti (begun in London and finished at Paris, 1855-1856), in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. Reduced reproduction from photogravure plate in Vol. I of "The Works of Robert Browning," Centenary Edition. (Smith, Elder.)

Robert Browning.

From an oil painting by Gordigian.

From "The Works of Robert Browning" (Smith, Elder.)

to that "fierce vexation of a dream" which is known to be as passing as it is fierce) and the mind was unable to replace itself in the sensitive condition or position of yore.

If there be anything in this view of Browning's poetic character, the utter and long-continued neglect of him by the literary vulgar; the comic engouement which after many years substituted itself for neglect in the same

Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

From an oil painting by Gordigian.

From "The Works of Mrs. E. B. Browning" (Smith, Elder.)

class of persons; and the comparative drop in appreciation which has, still among the same class, though by no means universally, followed since, become more easily intelligible than ever. The rather common notion that Browning's original readers (where he had any) were offended or "put off" by eccentricities of style, diction, or verse, is, I believe, quite mistaken. There are very few such—in fact, hardly any at all—in "Pauline" and

50, Wimpole Street.*Residence of Elizabeth Barrett, from 1842 till 1846, when she married Browning.

Marylebone Parish Church, Marylebone Road, where the Brownings were married.

The North and the South.
 (Hans Christian Andersen's visit to Italy
 May, 1861.)

1-
 "Now give us lands where the olives grow,
 Cried the North to the South,
 Where the sun with a golden mouth can blow
 Blue bubbles of grapes down a vineyard-row!
 Cried the North to the South.

"Now give us men from the sun-lit plain,"
 Cried the South to the North,
 By road of work in the sun and the rain
 Made strong, and brave by familiar pain
 Cried the South to the North.

2-
 "Give me lower hills and intenser sun,"
 Said the North to the South,
 Since west by symbols and bright degrees
 I, childlike, climb to the dear Lord's knees
 Said the North to the South.
 "Give me strange souls for belief and prayer,"
 Said the South to the North,
 Who stand in the dark on the lowest stairs
 Of the approaching day. He is there,
 Said the South to the North.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning's last poem "The North and the South."

It was written by her on Hans C. Andersen's visit to Italy at the end of May, 1861, and is in the handwriting of her husband, Robert Browning.
 (Facsimile of original in the British Museum.)

"Paracelsus"; not many in "Strafford" or even in "Sordello." It was not till the British public had definitely announced its intention not to like Mr. Browning yet, that he began to stick these bandcrillas in its hide. And when his more than thirty years of probation had passed, he had got too thoroughly into the habit to give it up, and the newer generation of readers had been taught to expect it, and not merely to endure it but to find that, as the French girl said of kummel "Ça pique dans le nez."

These new readers had indeed been brought, by panting Time as he toiled after Mr. Browning, to understand, or think they understood, the Impressionist process itself. To readers of 1830, no doubt, this process seemed unintelligible and not worth the trouble of understanding. The youngest of us in 1912, unless he is a mere crétin, can hardly think himself cleverer than some of the persons who formerly pronounced judgment upon "Sordello" in almost the exact words just used. But the matter put before them had not gone through the processes that they had taught themselves to think necessary; and they declined to perform those processes for themselves. In fact, perhaps they could not.

In another generation a great many people had learnt how to understand, and a great many more had learnt that they ought to understand: and yet another passed again, and it had become more or less of a matter of course, a casual trick, and so on. Which things are common enough. But what is worth enquiring into is how far this peculiar fashion of poetry-writing produced or helped what is good, and what is not so good, in Browning's poetry.

That it had a great deal to do with the remarkable volume of that poetry must of course be obvious at once. A large, much the largest, part of Browning's work is simply what has been called a "record"—run straight off the plate or roll or whatever anybody likes to call it, of one part of the mind, as it has received the action of another. It is doubtful whether much of it ("The Ring and The Book" for instance) could have been produced in any other way. A poet who worked in any other fashion must have got sick of, or confused in, that extraordinary maze of going over the same ground from different starting points. Even Browning must (appropriately enough to the subject) have had to get up his brief on it with unusual care. But, that once done, he had only to adjust the machine, and Murderer-Browning, Martyred-wife-Browning, Pope-Browning, were ready to reel off their impressions as the different rolls or wheels were inserted. I think he could have given us another dozen or score if he had been so minded—that the four original volumes might have been fourteen or forty. In fact, the whole of his later work showed the dangers of the method, and such things as "Ferishtah's Fancies" and the "Parleyings," may be called its awful examples.

But fortunately Browning had a guardian angel, ready at any moment to save him from these dangers. Too

19, Warwick Crescent, Paddington Green,

Browning's London Residence from 1861-1887.

often he evaded the angel's care ; but fairly often also, he did not. This "dear and great angel" was the Spirit of Metre in its nobler and more intricate forms. When the pure impressionist and almost improvisatore mood was on him, he contented himself with measures facile, ingenious, but undistinguished except in the doubtful way of eccentric rhythm or diction—with blank verse, sermoni plusquam propior, with current couplets, or with blocks of intertwisted rhyme where the intertwisting is, rather too evidently, not a means of procuring symphony but a mere shift for avoiding trouble and giving the impression its head.

But when the angel said "Beware of haste" what a different thing it was! The greatness of Browning's actual powers as a metrist was surprisingly long in being recognised, or rather not so surprisingly, seeing that his "thoughtfulness" was the bait that first caught most fish, and that the seeker after thought often has a virtuous but mistaken notion that metre and it are not so much friends as foes. He had, however, as a fact, no superior in variety of metrical art ; and few in exquisiteness and intensity when he listened to the Angel. Of metre, which is the nectar of the immortal soul, it may be said, as was said so greatly of meat which is the ambrosia of the mortal body, that it "must be humoured, not drove." Browning "drove" it far too often, rattled it over the stones, shook the divine breath out of it, made one, to borrow and amend his own phrase, "less than half in a rapture and more than half in a rage" But sometimes also he did not, and then there is the rapture without the rage

He had another gift of fortune, too, that he was never so lucky as when dealing with love, the passion that depends most on impression to begin with, and submits itself most happily to transmutation of impression afterwards. And so he gave us what would take a catalogue of unconscionable length to enumerate of masterpieces. Sometimes the mere single impression submits itself to almost complete artistic development and so in a way suppression, as in the very greatest things, "The Last Ride Together," "In a Gondola," the vision of the moon in "Christmas Eve," and scores of others. Sometimes, even in long pieces such as "Pippa Passes," and "Easter Day" itself or in "Fifine at the Fair" it does the same—but more generally in these it thrusts itself forward and shows a certain insubordination. Often, as in the abundant and blessed lyrical fragments, from the "Heap Cassia, sandal buds" of "Paracelsus" to the glorious Epilogue of "Asolando," it gives just the necessary impulse and no more. But it is always present. The fatal suggestion of the "copy of verses"—the paper, and the pen, and the ink, and the "Now we'll write a poem"—never occurs except in the case of persons in whose case it is not of the slightest consequence whether it occurs or not. Frequently, of course, the rapidity of the fashion in which the impressions present themselves, pass, and are succeeded by others, is something of a trial ; sometimes it is, for Caliban.

From the original water-colour sketch made by J. T. Nettleship in 1886 as a first study for his large painting in oils illustrating a scene from Browning's "Caliban on Setebos." Both the sketch and the painting are the property of Mr. Elkin Mathews who has kindly permitted us to reproduce the former. The painting was exhibited in the Academy of 1887. Browning watched the progress of the picture with great interest and in a letter to Mr. Elkin Mathews, Mr. Nettleship says that when it was finished the poet expressed great satisfaction with it, declaring "This is my Caliban, not Shakespeare's!"

Robert Browning

reading "The Ring and the Book" at Naworth Castle, September 19, 1869. A drawing by the Earl of Carlisle, in the possession of Marchesa Edith Peruzzi de Medici.

From "The Works of Robert Browning" (Smith, Elder.)

honest folk who do not give themselves airs, rather a puzzle to disengage the original impression itself, and a greater one to make quite certain of the artistic total that was intended to result. I think that, having made my explorations by the natural way of reading for some fifty years and more, I can make my way about Browning as well as most people, and I have, of course, private ideas that, in some of the crucies, most people are wrong and I am right. There is, I think, only one poem in the whole vast range where I confess myself completely baffled, or rather where I can see half a dozen different interpretations, none of them satisfactory, and that is "A Serenade at The Villa." But the theory at which I have been hinting, here at least, gives me a clue to the cause of the difficulty, if it does not solve it. The piece is an instance of mixed impressions which have run themselves together in the first process, and which the poet has not cared—or perhaps has not been able—to disengage in the second.

Such things are inevitable in the scheme: they occur indeed sometimes in poets whose defect is the want of spontaneous impression, not the superabundance of it. But the solace of the sin, if sin it be, is constant and abundant. When the art and the original impression work together the result is a vividness, an absence of bookishness, which is hardly to be found in any other poet, except in exceptions like Blake. The unearthliness which some people (thank Heaven! not all) find in Shelley is perforce not felt; and even in the most thoroughly "wrought-up" poems the sense of superabundant art or virtuosity which some (thank Heaven! again not all) find in Keats, and Tennyson, and Swinburne cannot possibly occur. Even the people, if there still be any such, who complain of Browning's "obscurity," can hardly, unless they are of infrahuman composition, charge him with aloofness. He may seem reading "The Ring and the Book" at Naworth Castle, September 19, 1869. A second drawing by the Earl of Carlisle, in the possession of Marchesa Edith Peruzzi de Medici.

Robert Browning

From "The Works of Robert Browning" (Smith, Elder.)

far in one way: he is always humanly near in another.

Of course he sometimes, nay, very frequently, allows and indeed encourages the impression to water itself out too much. In his own words (for there is no such commentator on Browning as Browning himself, and anybody who likes literary questing may look for two passages in "Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau" and "Red Cotton Nightcap Country" to illustrate this article)—

"Here are very many words

All to pourtray one moment's rush of thought,
And very well they do it!"

But the "very well" is by no means always to be "meant sarcastic." Still, it cannot be denied that "The Inn Album" and "Red Cotton Nightcap Country" itself, to name no others, would have been infinitely better things in the time and at the scale of "Men and Women" than they are actually: and that almost everywhere, except in places where the sweet compulsion of lyric interferes, there are apt to be alarms and excursions of metrical rigmarole which none but fanatics will do more than suffer, with but occasional gladness. In this world, however, you must take things as you can get them; and it must now be a very curious, a very one-eyed, lover of poetry who grumbles or hesitates at the gift that was given just a hundred years ago to an England—necessarily at the moment quite unconscious of its luck, and fated to be very scantily grateful for that luck till half the time was over. The greater poets, and even the lesser for that matter, so long as they are poets, never repeat their predecessors; but it is difficult to imagine any poet even distantly suggesting the idea of a second Browning. The faults could be mimicked but hardly followed; the merits are inimitable; the combination of both unique.

How he has struck nearly three full generations of contemporaries we know; how he will continue to strike futurity may perhaps be guessed with less rashness than usual. That a good deal of him (as of almost all the more voluminous poets) will be little read, is of course a certainty, made more certain by the very considerations which have been advanced here. That a very large proportion, especially of the lyrics (always the most immortal, because of the most poetical part of a poet's work) will survive, these same considerations make as certain. For they unite three appeals—the first two of which by themselves have been wont to serve as sufficient passports to the Land of Matters Unforgot

These are charm and distinction of form; directness of human interest of subject; and, finally and most especially, that other human interest of process of development and presentation which has been here dwelt on. Whether in this last, anything which has stimulated growth may, as such stimulants sometimes do, turn to a cause of decay, is as yet uncertain except to the Diviner intelligence. But there is very little falsehood in Browning; there are few poets who were less liars; and where there is little falsehood, there is not much fear of decay.

ROBERT BROWNING'S FATHER

BY SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.

IN 1910 there appeared "The Life of Robert Browning with Notices of his Writings, his Family, and his Friends by W. Hall Griffin, completed and edited by Harry Christopher Minchin." It was recognised at once by Browning students that in this book we had one of the most important contributions to our knowledge of the poet's mind and history. Professor Hall Griffin, whose labours were unfortunately cut short by death, had given years of his valuable life to an exhaustive study of Browning's history. He had the co-operation of Browning's friends and relatives, and above all he was able to make, with Mr. Barrett Browning's sanction, an extensive examination of the books in the Palazzo Rezzonico, those "wisest, ancient books," amid which the future poet passed his childhood. This examination was exceptionally fruitful in results.

Robert Browning, the poet's father, was described as a living encyclopædia. He had "the scent of a hound and the snap of a bulldog" for an old or rare volume. He was an ardent explorer of the bookstalls of London, and in later days of the Quais of Paris. His extraordinary collection of volumes had a lifelong influence on his son, who read them eagerly.

Professor Griffing gives many interpretative references. For example, he shows how Browning profited by his father's immense historical reading, how he derived from that storehouse of fact and fancy, "The Wonders of the Little World," by the seventeenth century Coventry divine, Nathaniel Wanley, the story of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin"; how he derived from the Works of Cornelius Agrippa his preface to "Pauline";

how he was led to write, when a young man of three-and-twenty, his first acknowledged poem of "Paracelsus."

Browning the elder possessed three folio volumes containing the Works of Paracelsus. Another book owned by Browning's father was Melander's "Jocoseria," from which, in 1883, Browning took the name of one among his volumes. For a fuller account the reader is referred to Professor Hall Griffin's admirable book.

Robert Browning's parents were deeply interested in religion. Six years before his birth his mother had joined the Congregational Church which met at York Street, Walworth. Until her death, forty-three years later, she might have been seen Sunday after Sunday walking thither even from Hatcham, after the family had left Camberwell. Not even the acutest neuralgia could keep her from her place. Professor Griffin says that in 1820, under her influence her husband, "who had been brought up as an Episcopalian and is said to have been more liberal in doctrinal matters, also joined the Congregational body."

The poet himself adored his mother, and was in early days passionately religious. The minister of York Street Chapel was described by the late Rev. Edward White, who worshipped as a boy along with Browning, as one who "combined the character of a saint, a dancing master and an orthodox eighteenth century theologian in about equal proportions." Browning attended the chapel and read omnivorously, and was for a brief period under the influence of "Queen Mab," an atheist and a vegetarian. This phase, however, did not continue by any means.

Mr. Elkin Mathews, the eminent publisher, has very

Robert Browning, 1875.

After the portrait by G. F. Watts, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery.
From "The Works of Robert Browning." (Smith, Elder.)

kindly lent me some writings of the elder Browning, which fell into his hands a good many years ago under the following circumstances.

In 1882, Mr. Mathews was at St. Leonards on a holiday and happened to stay at the same boarding-house as a very old lady who had been a friend of the Browning family. Her name was the Baroness von Müller, and she must have been about eighty at the time. Mr. Mathews, who was a young Browning enthusiast, fell into conversation with the Baroness who told him that she had known the poet's father very well indeed, that she possessed many of his letters and manuscripts. Later on she sent a bundle of manuscripts to Mr. Mathews. He took extracts from these, retained one or two of the originals by the Baroness's permission and returned the rest to her.

I imagine from Professor Griffin's book that some part at least of the papers owned by the Baroness von Müller must have been examined, but, with one slight exception, none of them, so far as I know, has been put in print, and some of them throw a light on the relations between the poet and his father.

I

The first manuscript in my hands is entitled "Horæ Claytoniæ." The date is about 1820. The larger part of the document consists of religious poems evidently written from Sunday to Sunday after hearing sermons by his minister, the Rev. George Clayton. The extracts will be more intelligible if I give a prefatory note on the preaching of Mr. Clayton.

Mr. Clayton belonged to an eminent Dissenting family. He and his brothers were indeed among the aristocrats of Nonconformity. They had large private means. } They were strongly Conservative in their

The Rev. George Clayton who baptised Robert
From and inspired the "Horæ Claytoniæ" of his father,
lent by Mr. Edwin Mathews tendencies, and they were backed by well-to-do middle-class congregations, by whom they were held in great reverence. The late Rev. Edward White, Browning's contemporary, had, as his friends well remember, a strong satiric vein. He laughed at the Clayton pomposity, and he used to say that for the young people in Walworth Chapel the most attractive part of the service was a long extempore prayer in which the events of the week, so far as they related to the Chapel members, were discussed in a veiled form. When Mr. Clayton was offering a prayer the sharp boys were tearing away the veils and discovering the individuals referred to. Mr. Clayton however, was evidently a man of mark in his own way. I have before me a volume entitled "A Course of Sermons on Faith and Practice, delivered by the Rev. George Clayton at York Street Chapel, Walworth, 1838-1839." It is published by T. Ward & Co., of Paternoster Row, and a preface explains that the discourses of which it is made up were taken down in shorthand and corrected by Mr. Clayton. "Upon application being made to him, Mr. Clayton kindly fell in with the views of his people in this respect, and at the especial request of the reporters, undertook to correct any verbal inaccuracies which might creep into the reports. The publishers [the editors] now take leave of their fellow members, assuring them that next to the delight which they experienced in listening to the delivery of the sermons, they feel extreme pleasure in having been the humble instruments of their perpetuation."

The sermons deal with the Apostles' Creed and the Decalogue. They are couched in the style of the period, and are not wanting in fire and spirit. They are in fact comparatively liberal for the time. Thus the "charnel-house" theory of the Resurrection is repudiated. "All we wish to contend for is that the same body, substantially considered, whatever variation there may be in some of its qualities, shall be raised from the tomb. What, for example, should you think of a murderer who being detected and brought to justice fifteen or thirty years after the fact of his crime had been committed, should plead that it was not the same body which had committed the crime, and that therefore it would not be just to inflict upon a body differently constituted, the punishment of a crime which had been committed in a body otherwise constituted? You would feel that this plea was not tenable—that it was not for a moment to be allowed: because though, perhaps, once in seven years the whole system of our corporeal organization changes, yet we continue to be, substantially, and to all moral purposes, the same persons."

29, De Vere Gardens, Kensington.
Browning's last home in London (1887-1889).

Mr. Clayton's ethical teaching is sufficiently robust. He is passionately opposed to loveless marriages "without the least union of heart, the least similarity of taste, or the least communion of spirit. Who does not know that there are many marriages of convenience? Who does not know that in circles of the highest rank, as well as in circles of a lowlier grade, many a marriage is undertaken purely on this conventional principle. It is just a bargain struck between title and title, family and family, settlement and counter-settlement, and this is called marriage! The institution of God absolutely resents this affront, and disavows any approving countenance upon such engagements."

The versified paraphrases of Mr. Clayton's sermons by Browning the elder are absolutely without literary merit, although they are sufficiently fluent and conventional. The following is a fair specimen.

"Ah! could but Satan to our eyes appear
In that dread form which Milton has portray'd
What human bosom but would shrink with fear?
What hardened heart that would not be afraid?
Ah! sinner far more dreadful is the smile
Than that black frown which threatens and alarms
For 'tis his business sinners to beguile,
And not to fill their bosom with alarms."

San Clemente Gate, Arezzo.
by which Caponsacchi and Pompili made their escape.
From "The Ring and the Book," by Robert Browning. (Smith, Elder.)

Robert Browning.

Chicago, Illinois, being by F. L. & M. Clarke

also in the Armour Institute,

The following is as good as many and no better than most.

BALAM

I shall see him! but not now!
Shall behold him! but not near
Shall the sceptic behold to which all shall bow
When the day-star of life shall appear!

Rising to melodious sounds
Brighter than yon orb of day,
Heav'n and Earth's remotest bounds
Shall his sovereign power obey

Where are now those num'rous foes
That lately dar'd presume to rise,
And with Enchantments would oppose
The Sov'reign ruler of the skies?

Moab trembles with affright,
Edom seeks the shades of night,
Humbled Midian shall adore,
Amalek shall be no more,
Whilst o'er Canaan's wide domain
Israel shall victorious reign.
See the star of Jacob's race,
Glittering harbinger of day,
Rising on the world to chase
Sin and Ignorance away.
Yes! Eternal he shall reign!
Angels and mankind adore
He thy Sceptre shall retain
When time shall be no more.

Lord! my heart is humbled now;
Lowly at Thy feet I bow
Earthly visions, falsely bright,
Vanish from before my sight.

All that mortals seek below,
All ambition can bestow
When beheld in Gospel light
Vanish from before my sight.

"From street to street he piped advancing,
And step for step they followed dancing."

"The Pied Piper of Hamelin," by Robert Browning

Illustration by W. Ralston, from Messrs. Cassell's "Penny Ballad" series

The manuscript has a certain value as showing that the elder Browning was warmly in sympathy with the teaching of his minister and the religious opinions of his wife. The poet and his wife seem to have been essentially of the same mind. "I am," wrote Elizabeth Barrett, "a Congregational Christian." Their poetry is largely religious, and it may well be doubted whether it could ever have taken the form it did had it not been for their training in Congregational Christianity. Certainly it could never have come from any section of the Church of England or any other section of dissent at the time. It was in a manner Evangelical with a broad outlook.

II.

More curious are Browning the elder's excursions in his son's domain. Professor Griffin mentions the version of the Pied Piper by Browning's father, and he says that it leaves little room for speculation as to whence came the poet's tendency to odd rhymes and humorous verse. He gives a short extract and mentions that the version ends abruptly after about sixty lines with the following note: "I began this not knowing that Robert had written on this subject; having heard him mention it, I stopped short. I never saw his manuscript till some weeks afterward. R. B., 2nd March, 1843." "This note was evidently added some time after the lines were written, for Browning's poem was published in November, 1842; possibly this publication suggested the note. At a later date the father was bold enough to complete his version by the addition of some two hundred lines, so that it assumed about the same proportions as that of his son." The manuscript in my hands has no note, but it seems worth quoting as a literary curiosity

HAMELIN

There is at a moderate distance from Hanover
On the Weser, a river of singular fame,
A town which the French and the rats often ran over,
But though report varies,
Yet sage antiquaries
Are all in one story concerning its name,
Which is Hameln (But you had better perhaps Turn over our atlas and look at the maps)
This place without flattery
Seemed one vast rattery—
Where the rats came from no mortal could say—
For one put to flight
There were ten the next night,
And for ten overnight there were twenty next day.

The Scene of the Murders, January 2, 1698. A View in the "Pauline" district taken from the Via di San Paolo.
From "The Ring and the Book," by Robert Browning (Smith, Elder).

With double the number before the next morning.
Indeed the inhabitants gave the mayor warning
That unless these intruders were driven away

The rats and taxation
Would bring on starvation—
And if so—then this was their firm declaration
That they wouldn't stay!

The rats however laughed at that,
Down they came trooping pit-a-pat—
And all the town seemed rat, rat, rat!
This made the magistrates determine
To lay their heads together
And reason whether

They could not "oust" these vermin
Traps, poison, terriers, cats and ferrets,
Each discussed their several merits,
Not one of which, nor all together,
Weighed with the Aldermen one feather
Since every man
Pursued his plan,

To which if no one else agreed
No plan of theirs should e'er succeed;
Nor could they for a moment bear it
That other men should have the merit
Of clearing Hameln from rats.

The market rose: and cats were done
At half--three-quarters--seven-eighths--one!
The House were Bulls for the account

And several Jobbers that had Bear'd
Were on the settling day declared
Ducks to a large amount!

Still cats were on the rise
But notwithstanding this control
The rats contriv'd to head the poll
In vast majorities!

(Now, should the slightest hesitation
Come across the reader's mind
Because the proofs of this narration
Are very difficult to find

Here are Schochius
Eruthius

And Kirk historians living by use:

It were absurd
To doubt the word
Of men so famous, learn'd and pious
So let us once for all be just
And take their narrative on trust).

Photo by W. H. Green

Robert Browning.

The Mayor and Aldermen in council sat
Striving—contriving—pondering—scheming—
Rating—debating—musing—dreaming,
Abusive words and contests rising
Surprising schemes of their advising

Outdone—by schemes
Still more surprising
And all about a rat!

Amidst this terrible up-
-roun

The porter stationed at the door

Announced a stranger
calling there,

With something urgent to declare
Of vast importance to the Mayor.

"About the rats?"

"It is," replied the porter. "That's

"The very thing!" the Court declare.

This news of course
Came with electric force;

All discord in a moment
vansh'd—

Scarcely a whisper now was heard.

"Hush! and shake hands!" were ev'ry
word.

The "Square Old Yellow Book."

Showing the letter from Arcangeli, written on the day of Guido's execution
From "The Ring and the Book," by Robert Browning (Smith, Elder)

The Mayor put on a serious face,
And cried, "Walk in; if that's the case."

"Well, sir? And what are your pretensions?"

This was addressed
Just in the tone which folks repeat
When of some cheat
They're under apprehensions;
With rather an unpleasant feeling
About the man with whom they're dealing;

(But let that rest.)
Indeed the fellow talk'd to so
Seem'd of the lowest of the low.
Let your fancy now describe
A vagrant of the gipsy tribe;
Tall, gaunt and meagre, in a dress
Which spoke the depths of wretchedness;

Patches—black, yellow, red and blue,
Rags of ev'ry shape and hue.
His hungry look, his piercing eye,
Close lip, bent brow and stooping gait
Seemed all conjectures to defy
About his state.

Yet there was in his face
Something above the commonplace,
Something which gave one a surmise
Of greatness in disguise:

The wandering Jew,
For aught they knew,
Whilst others fancy
'Twas Nostradamus,
Once so famous

For catching rats and necromancy
The Mayor displayed a world of tact
When canvassing the vagrant act:
Rubbing his chin, at last out came,
"I say you—mister, what's your name—

"Pray who are you?
Why is it thus
You come to us—

And what is it you want to do?"
Wrath sparkled in the vagrant's eye.
He paused—then made him this reply:
"Who am I? Then you never knew
"Or heard of the Pied Piper?"—whew!
Their hands and eyes were all surprise—
"You—the Pied Piper?" each one cries:
"And from this nuisance if set free
Are we to be

Indebted to the Devil and thee?
No! let us twenty fold endure
Than have recourse to such a curse."
But from without
Was heard a shout

"Mind, Aldermen, what you're about!"
This was interrupted by
"Pray, what's all that to you and I?
We're ruined if these rats remain—
And where's the harm
Of any charm

That gives the Devil his rats again?"
The council act on this advice:
All is agreed except the price.
They then call in and ask the man—
"Can you, my friend—no doubt you can Drive all these rats from Hamelin? Come
We'll not dispute about the sum;
Just tell us what you would be paid—
Short bargains are the best, 'tis said."

"Five hundred pounds—I ask no more,"
(Said he)—"this granted, I restore,
To the best of my ability,
Hamelin to its tranquility."

[The following is a version of the well known story that is told of a Cardinal Crecentius who was said to have been haunted by the "apparition of a Dog—ever after his behaviour at the Council of Trent—]

Crecentius—the Pope's Legate

At council high of Trent,

Was (fifteen hundred fifty two March twenty five) intent

Writing of letters to the Pope

Till far 'twas in the night—

When rising to refresh himself

He saw a wondrous sight:

A Black dog of vast magnitude

Eye flaming:—Ears that hung
Down to the very ground almost,

Into the chamber spring.

Facsimile of poem in the handwriting
A version of the same poem by
The original is the property of kindly lent it

Ashamed and trembling at the deed
The common councilmen agreed;
And this the mob outside "encore"
Sixteen times louder than before
(Where were the consciences? you cry—
What's that to you—was their reply;—

Let him but play—the rats away,
We'll rub that score off by-and-by).
The piper struck up "Toot—toot—toot!"
Upon his more than magic flute.

"Yes, I'm in tune," he cried. "And now—"
(Making the Citizens a bow)

"Just for a moment follow me—
And you shall see what you shall see!"

And what a sight they saw!
Lur'd by the magic notes a throng
Of rats came scampering along—
The companies, some millions strong,
Quitted the town—the roads were lin'd,
Nor was one straggler left behind
When they came to the Weser's bank,
Then with a general scream,
Plung'd headlong in the stream,
And sank!

The business was completely done—
The rats had vanish'd—ev'ry one!
Yet as they sauntered round the place
There was on ev'ry townsman's face
A blank!

*Then came directly towards him
 And laid himself down under
 The table where Crescentius wrote;
 He call'd, in fear & wonder
 His Servants, in the anti-room,
 Commanded every one
 To look for & fend out the dog:—
 But looking— they found none!
 The Cardinal fell melancholy
 Full sick:— soon after, died:
 Laid at Verona as he lay
 On his death-bed he cried—"Woe— 'take away the Dog—
 That kept at his Bedside!"*

of Robert Browning the elder Browning appears in "Asolando"
 Mr. Elkin Mathews, who for reproduction.

For a few moments' recollection
 Brought powerfully this reflection
 They now had Lucifer to thank!
 The very crowd that roar'd aloud
 To have infernal means employ'd,
 Rack'd with despair, now asked the Mayor
 How he could dare
 Employ the devil in this affair?
 Oh, how much better had it been
 Even to let the rats remain.
 Indeed their feelings were so keen
 They almost wished them back again.
 But mind, the rats were all decoy'd
 Into the Weser, and destroy'd.
 The Mayor quite frightened by the crew,
 Asked of the Bishop what to do?
 The Bishop frowned:—
 And told him, "Rather, sir, than I
 Would have a finger in the pie
 I would myself be drowned.
 Didn't I warn you all?" "Not you!"
 Exclaimed the Aldermen, "'tis true
 You said the end would justify
 The means; and gave us leave to try,
 And if successful, then defy
 His works and him and his queer clothing."
 Then said the Bishop, "Give him nothing!"
 All this while the Piper stood
 Wrap't in melancholy mood

Outside the door,
 The scorn of all the neighbourhood,
 And hooted by the rich and poor.
 'Twas then a Beadle from the Corporation
 Gave him most civilly an intimation
 The Mayor and Aldermen thought fit
 That he should quit;
 "Could he do better than submit?"
 "No," said the Piper, "Stop a bit!
 Go back and ask them if they dare
 Bilk of me any legal fare?
 Give me my wages— I depart
 And leave the town with all my heart;
 But till the promised sum you pay
 Here will I stay."
 "Nay," quoth the Beadle gently, "Nay!"
 "No," cried the people, "go away!"
 And if you fail,
 Here are the stocks and there the jail!
 Know then that we're
 Extremely and bitterly severe
 On ev'ry vagabond found here."
 "Well, then, if you would have it so,"
 Said the Pied Piper, "I must go.
 But let me play,
 By way of letting people see,
 Since you have kept your word with me
 How very grateful I can be.
 One little tune— then haste away."
 We've heard in olden time of one
 Who turned beholders into stone,
 And could the story be believed,
 What wonders music has achieved.
 'Twas with the Piper so—
 Scarcely had he played, when lo!
 Ev'ry bosom felt a thrill,
 Mayor and Aldermen stood still,
 Travellers on horse and foot
 Stood as if they'd taken root
 All bow'd to music's powers,
 And magic seemed to rule the hour,
 Heads and hearts allow the sway,
 Old and young the spell obey;
 Its influence held them dumb.

Fain would they struggle— tain they'd fly,
 But 'tis in vain they strive and try.
 All to its powers succumb.
 The minstrel from beneath his coat
 Another reed pipe drew,
 Then was a cheerful lively note
 Heard ev'ry street and alley through,
 Whilst the strange mendicant's stern brow
 Scowl'd with the blackest hatred now,
 From side to side his dark eye roll'd,
 His look was dreadful to behold.
 He stamp't his foot! though not a word
 Was spoken, yet his victims heard.
 The loveliest children in the place,
 Laughing—smiling—full of play,
 Dancing to the lively measure,
 Following the sound with pleasure
 As the piper led the way.
 But of a sudden one might trace
 A change in every dancer's face.
 Grinning ghastly—staring wild,
 An awful spectre ev'ry child
 In that vast crowd;
 Raving, shrieking, groaning till
 The dance was stopped at Coppleburg hill;
 When lo! a cavern opened wide
 By magic malice reft—
 The whole procession went inside—
 Not one was left!

The spell was now complete! Then closed the cave
Over them all—a sad, untimely grave!

The corporation unprepared
For this, at one another star'd,
And many a scheme was tried in vain
To get the children back again.

At length, pursuant

To some grand scheme of their recorder,

They by an edict gave an order
That children never should play truant,
Nor organ ever should be playing,
And all Italian boys found straying

With hurdy-gurdy, pipe or mouse,
The new police were told to seize on,
As rogues found guilty of high treason,

And lodge them in the station house.

Moreover, any of the throng

Who dared to hum or sing a song

Were sure to rue it;

And all were seized who, right or wrong,

Were listening to it.

And not content

With this, they raised a monument

Not quite so tall

As that which Pope was pleased to call

"London's tall bully," but so high

That ev'ry traveller passing by

Might read thereon, engraved in stone,

In Latin (true monastic jargon)

The story we have just completed,

Showing how vilely they'd been treated—

But not a word about their bargain!

Well, after several summers past,

And all enquiry at a stand

A traveller from some distant land

Waited upon the Mayor,

Having something to declare

That probably would make him stare.

Most certainly he stared, and "Well,"

Said he, "And what have you to tell?"

"Why, all the children that you know

About a century ago

Were swallowed up, you think, and still Lie buried under Copplesburg hill,

Are found at last,

Rid of all their travelling mania,
Safe and sound in Transylvania."

How got they there?

Railroads and steam were not invented,

The world with horses was contented.

Moving about was rather tardy,

Neither Montgolfier nor Lunardi

Having yet travelled through the air.

The fact is, he had read by chance

Something about the "Piper's dance,"

And having blundered on a race

Whose origin he could not trace

To this conclusion wisely came

"They certainly must be the same."

Where it is useless to dispute

It shows our wisdom to be mute,

So what became of that wild rout

Seems settled now without a doubt.

I give on the two previous pages a facsimile of another poem, "Crescentius," in the handwriting of Browning's father. This poem is to be found in "Asolando"—"The Cardinal and the Dog," with variations. Whether it was suggested by the elder Browning to his son, or whether, as is more likely, it was a variation by the father of the son's poem I cannot say positively. But in this connection we have an interesting and so far as I know unsolved problem. We have no means of dating the poems in "Asolando." One of the best Browning critics is of opinion that many of them were old and were gathered together by the poet for his last publication. It is almost certain, to say the least, that many of them were by no means recent, but as yet we have no way of discriminating between the old and the new. Browning's father died in 1866, and the poet himself in 1889.

The Palazzo Rezzonico, Venice.

where Browning died, December 12, 1889.

It is now the residence of his son, Mr. Robert Barrett Browning.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MAY, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original ballad not more than forty lines in length
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best account in a hundred words of how a woman has acted or might act with chivalry towards another woman, or towards a man
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.

- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR APRIL.

- I This Competition has proved remarkably popular. Among the numerous Lyrics sent in many are too commonplace in style and theme, and show little of imagination or poetic feeling or utterance, but quite a satisfactory percentage of the poems are distinctly meritorious. We award the PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA to Miss VERA LARMINIE, of 44, Longridge Road, Earl's Court, London, S.W., for "The Night Raid," a dramatic lyric of real emotional and imaginative power.

THE NIGHT RAID.

The night drew down, the night drew down,
And lights shone yellow from the town,
The dripping fog hung heavily
Twixt leaden sky and leaden sea.

The night drew down, the night drew down,
And fires burned red within the town;
The hulls of ships drew soundlessly
Out of the shadows of the sea.

The night drew down, the night drew down,
And children slept within the town;
The muffled oars swung noiselessly
Above the silence of the sea.

The night drew down, the night drew down,
And women shrieked within the town;
The rattle of the musketry
Died out upon a sullen sea.

The night drew down, the night drew down,
And dead men slept within the town,
The dripping fog hung heavily
Twixt leaden sky and leaden sea.

We select these from among the best of the other lyrics received :

SORROW AND I.

Sorrow came sighing to me, ah me!
When Spring was abroad in the land,
"I too can love, and I love but thee,
"Then give me," she said, "thy hand,
Give me thy heart and my heart shall cling
Closer than life to thee,
My soul shall be thine for remembering—"
Sorrow said this to me!

From a portrait by Robert Barrett Browning.

Robert Browning, 1889.

From "The Works of Robert Browning." (Smith, Elder).

Photo by W. H. Grove

The Lying in State of Robert Browning, at the Palazzo Rezzonico, Venice.

Sorrow was Beauty to me, ah me!
Her hair was the veil of the night,
Her eyes were the stars that we dream, not see,
And her voice was the wind in its flight.
She took my heart in her hand, and it sighed
Strange music—and ceased to be,
She rapt my life in her life, and it died—
Sorrow did this to me!

Sorrow was dearest to me, ah me!
When summer was sweet in the air,
She bloomed in my life like a flowering tree,
Whilst I grew withered and bare
She hung my heart on a chain of years
As a jewel for all to see,
She gave me her heart that was drowned in tears—
Sorrow gave this to me!

Sorrow went sighing from me, ah me!
When the winter was nigh,
"Give me the heart that I gave to thee,
For I go," she said, "to die!"
She gave me my life—it was withered and sere—
My heart—it had ceased to be—
And the love that had lain in it, warm and dear
Sorrow took this from me!

(Kathleen Knox, 11, Hughenden Avenue, Antrim Road, Belfast.)

THE TOILERS

"We have the payne and traueyle, rayne and wynd in the felde"
JOHN BALL (Fourteenth Century)

Slaves of the scythe and the sickle, to work as the seasons run,
Binding the sheaves in the harvest, bathed in the heat of the sun, Ploughing the fields in the springtime—when shall our work be done?

*For each hide turned by our ploughing, and all the corn that it yields,
"We have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields."*

Swept by the winds of winter, soaked and sodden with rains,
Our burden is hard in the bearing; we are smitten of dolorous pains;

We gather our Lord's good harvest, but what see we of its gains?
*For each hide turned by our ploughing, and all the corn that it yields,
"We have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields."*

With never a hope of resting, sorely driven are we;
And we drive the kine to their grazing, fair or foul let it be;
And we cease not for age nor for sickness, nor for infirmity
*For each hide turned by our ploughing, and all the corn that it yields,
"We have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields."*

We drink salt sweat to refresh us, and labour we take for our bread;
And weariness closes our eyelids before the daylight be sped;
And we hear deep sobs in the night-time, and the sound of tears that are shed.

*For each hide turned by our ploughing, and all the corn that it yields,
"We have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields."*

Cruelty, lust, oppression, and hard, unpunished crime—
These are the bars from freedom, past which we needs must climb;

And ye who hear us know it, bearing the cry of our time:
*For each hide turned by our ploughing, and all the corn that it yields,
"We have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields."*

(Claude L. Penrose (G.C.), Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.)

SONG.

Life is funny, isn't it?
Life is very droll.
Lots of money—isn't it?—
And precious little soul!
Life is funny,
Shed your money,
Pay the toll!

Love is honey, isn't it?
Love is very sweet.
Heaven, Sonny, isn't it?—
And never time to eat!
Love is honey—
Takes you, Sonny,
Off your feet!

Death is—death is—what is it?
Just a beauty sleep?
End of things or not, is it?—
Ah well, that can keep!
Life is funny!
Love is honey!
Death may reap!

(C. G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire.)

A MOONLIGHT SONATA.

My Garden hath no flower with hues like thine,
No Lily half so fair, nor Rose, nor Eglantine,
When there on Summer-eves I watch thee stray,
I count as naught the flowers that bloom by day.

The flaming glories of the West grow dim,
The breeze is dead, and hushed the throstle's hymn;
The Moon stays lingering low behind the pine,
There is no room for other charms than thine

And when from out the dusk of night you pass,
And stand transfigured on the moonlit grass,
The sleeping flowers and all the birds at rest
Dream of the scents and songs that please them best.

(E. W. Priest, 101, College Road, Norwich.)

We also commend the lyrics sent by Margaret McIntyre (Ealing), Mabel Ainev (Wood Green), R. H. Evans (Constantinople), Miss D. K. Bouleau (Bath), M. F. Cock (Ashford), Rev. A. J. Ashley (Cannock), D. Anderson (Dumfries), Alfred Victor Waller (Sunderland), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), G. R. Harvey (Aberdeen), Mrs. H. H. Penrose (Frimley Green), Ronald E. Rigg (North Shields), C. M. Walkerdine (Birmingham), Gwendoline Rees (Southport), Thomas Lanfear (London, S.E.), Violet D. Dean (Bromley), Mrs. E. H. Marshall (Merton Park), F. Page (St. Albans), Albert Morrison (Glasgow), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Margaret F. Barron (S. Tottenham), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon), C. Jones (York), John C. Turner (Lockerbie), E. E. Kellett (Cambridge), M. A. Newman (Badingham), W. S. Howden (Lincoln), Vivien Ford (Bristol), Frederic Lois (Plaistow), J. C. Church (Castleford), Joanna A. Brock (Monifieth), Muriel Monks (Lincoln), Rev. E. C. Lansdowne (S. Woodford), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Dorothy H. Berry (Colchester), H. A. Cole (Newtownards), A. Clark (High Wycombe), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), Miss E. C. Brown (Walsall), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Miss E. F. Parr (Bristol), T. Sefton (Bolton), H. Beckett (Wolverhampton), Wilfred Dale (Westminster), E. Herbert Jones (Wolverhampton), Miss E. Moore (Liverpool), Emily Lewis (Mansfield), J. D. C. Monfries (Edinburgh), A. J. Dick (High Wycombe), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Frank Rhodes (Scarborough), Arthur E.

Turner (W. Kensington), Jane Stuart Binnie (Glasgow), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Ethel Gooch (Godalming), Jeanne Butler (Westbury-on-Trym), Ralph P. Buckenridge (Glasgow), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Scarborough), Margaret Painter (Wimbledon), N. D. Gullick (Clifton), Miss J. A. C. Smith (Edinburgh), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), J. R. Ellaway (Basingstoke), Miss Wilkie (Falmouth), F. M. Purkis (Gloucester), J. W. M. (Argyll), Charles Webb (King's Lynn), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), A. E. Tomlinson (Middlesbrough), A. Eleanor Pennington (Brighton), David S. Wadson (Gorleston), Charles L. Pavton (Edgbaston), Mina Gardner (London, S.W.), Gertrude Pitt (Hamstead), Theodore Maynard (Cricklewood), D. M. Tweedale (Birkdale), Charles Williams (St. Albans), Clement H. Whitby (Yeovil).

II. —THIS PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Miss Evelyn M. Abbott, of The Croft, Old Malton, Yorks, for the following :

THE MAN WHO COULD NOT LOSE — BY R. H. DAVIS
(Duckworth)

"In his sleeves, which were long, there were twenty-four packs."
BRET HARTE, The Heathen Chinee

We also select for printing :

A TRUE WOMAN — BY BARONESS ORCZY (Hutchinson)

"If there's anything in which I shine,
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs."

BYRON, Don Juan

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath)

THE ART OF THE ORATOR — BY R. EDGAR JONES
(A & C Black)

"But I go on for ever"

Tennyson, The Brook

(K. S. Venkataramani, Victoria Hotel, Chepante Gardens, Madras, India)

LETTERS TO MYSELF — BY A WOMAN OF FORTY (Werner Laurie)

"Why all this toil and trouble?"

WORDSWORTH, The Tables Turned

O. H. Rhayton, Bloomsbury House Club, Cartwright Gardens, W.C.)

THE SECOND WIFE — BY THOMPSON BUCHANAN.
(Greening & Co.)

"Quoth he 'the man hath penance done,
And penance more will do'"

COLERIDGE, The Ancient Mariner.

(Mrs. A. Morton Smith, Chinwangteco, N. China)

THE ENDLESS JOURNEY — BY NETTA SYRELL
(Chatto & Windus)

"I see thy steps the mighty Treadmill trace"

CHARLES LAMB, Ode to The Treadmill

(M. Brown, 233, W. Regent Street, Glasgow.)

III — So many apt quotations from Browning, applicable to Woman's Suffrage and the Coal Strike, have been received, that it has been very difficult to arrive at a decision. We have divided this Prize, and award Two New Books to Miss G. ROBINSON, of 46, Oxford Street, Cardiff, and Two New Books to Miss ANNIE C. REAY, of Langley House, Canterbury, for the following :

THE COAL STRIKE

"This ordeal passed,
The value of my labour's ascertained"

Paracelsus.

(Miss G. Robinson.)

THE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

"May they or mayn't they?"

All I want's the thing settled for ever one way."

Fra Lippo Lippi.

(Miss Annie C. Reay)

IV. THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr G. M. Ellwood, of Abbey Park Road, Grimsby, for the following :

FLEMINGTON — BY VIOLET JACOB (John Murray.)

This tale of the '45 is no ordinary romantic novel, for it boasts neither love-interest nor heroine. But the character-drawing is excellent, and the hero's struggle to be true both to his friend and his cause is told throughout with a restraint which makes such scenes as Flemington's death, and Logic's reception of the news, all the more vivid. Again, when Logic tells his story, we see plainly the old Dutch house and Diane's face among the flaming tulips. The writing is unusually good all through, and the plot is well worked out to its tragic conclusion.

Other good reviews received are :

WHAT MAY WE READ?

BY CHARLES WALDSTEIN.

(Smith, Elder & Co.)

The most misleading thing about this book is its title. We imagine we are to have an essay on "modern fiction," telling us what books are suitable for our reading. Nothing of the sort. The book is a delightful novel; as the author says, "a conversation story" in which the hero and heroine indulge in some rather erudite discourses on literature, art, music, and other things.

Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey.

Showing Browning's tomb in the foreground

Through the lips of his characters, Mr. Waldstein does give some very valuable criticisms on books, but we soon lose ourselves in the interests of the tale, for Ruth and George are charming

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath.)

DEAD MEN'S BELLS BY FREDERICK NIVEN.
(Martin Secker)

In this romance of eighteenth century Scotland Scotland in the days of the '45—Mr. Niven has caught in masterly fashion the atmosphere of the period. The opening chapters, which tell of the home life at Wester Mearns and its unsympathetic women-folk, are written with an insight and distinction of style which make them altogether convincing. Natural scenery in the Highlands, and a storm at sea Mr. Niven describes with rare feeling while his characters take on a curious, indefinable reality as he delineates them. Uncle Walter, Mr. Wyhe, and delightful cousin Effie are creations we shall not easily forget

(John F. Harris, St. John's College, Cambridge.)

JOSEPH IN JEOPARDY BY FRANK DANBY.
(Methuen)

A brilliant novel of modern society, displaying its weakness, but pointing a moral. The Joseph, whose real name is Passiful, marries a woman older than himself, insignificant, without style or marked attractiveness, but conscientious and loyal. His allegiance is shaken by a woman of high rank and great charm, and it is the portrayed contrast of these two women that forms the motive of the novel. It takes the reader as long as the hero to realise the superiority of his wife over her rival. The successful tradesman and his ill-bred, concerted daughter-in-law are unpleasant but amusing characters

(Miss B. O. Anderson, 11, Lonsdale Road, Scarborough.)

DICKIE DILVER BY G. B. BURGIN. (Hutchinson)

When Mr. Burgin is back in the Canadian wilds he is always at his best. "Dickie Dilver" is as fresh as a breeze from the Ottawa Valley—as vigorous as the crude life which is lived out among its woods. The tale moves perpetually from surprise to surprise and keeps its reader's expectation from start to finish. Mr. Burgin has adorned his story with one of the most delightful dogs in fiction. He must be difficult to satisfy who does not find pleasure in this human and altogether unaffected tale of the natural world in the Far West

(M. A. Newman, The Old White House, Badingham, Suffolk.)

We highly commend also the reviews sent in by Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), C. G. Taylor (Heswall), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), H. K. Ormerod (Airdrie), Edna Smallwood (Highbury), Miss L. Mugford (Dartford), Miss E. Rippon (Hull), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Winifred Crone (Liverpool), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Lottie Hoskins (Birmingham), Constance V. Kerr (Berkhamstead), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), A. H. M. Sayers (Sheffield), Geraldine P. Gallwey (Thirsk), Irene Harrison (Bristol), Miss A. G. M. Sopwith (Handsworth), James A. Richards (Tenby), Miss N. Coppinger (Wimbledon), Ernest E. Reynolds (Clapham), Fred E. Bolt (Anerley), Margery Wilkins (Uttoxeter), Miss F. Carter Squire (ShIPLEY), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Miss E. Moore (Liverpool), I. Swinscow (Tunbridge Wells), Florence Snelling (Sidcup), Alexander McGill, Junior (Glasgow), Ellis M. Brown (Glasgow), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), J. Hardman (Preston), H. M. Creswell Payne (St Austell), Beatrice Terry (London, S.W.).

V. THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Mr. J. W. MORE, Highfield, Dumoon, Argvllshire.

New Books.

BROWNING'S EARLY WORK.*

Professor Lounsbury, the learned Professor Emeritus of English in Yale University, has had a long and honourable career, and among his considerable services to English literature are his studies of Shakespeare and Chaucer. America has been generous in its recognition of Browning's poetry: in a wide sense it acknowledged the originality and peculiar powers of his works while they were still overshadowed in this country by the great fame of his wife. Excellent editions of his poems, and not a few useful hand-books have emanated from America, while undoubtedly the best biography of the poet is that of the late W. Hall Griffin, who was himself an American by parentage. Although Browning's reputation gained much by American appreciation, it has suffered more than a little through misplaced enthusiasm. It is not, therefore, very extraordinary that America should produce this reactionary work, for Professor Lounsbury's new book is nothing less. It is made up of four lectures on "The Early Literary Career of Robert Browning" in which the author describes the development of the poet's powers and devotes considerable attention to the attitude of the Press and public at that period. But if the Professor is not entirely sympathetic, he is on the other hand not unfriendly:

* "The Early Literary Career of Robert Browning." By T. R. Lounsbury, LL.D., L.H.D. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

his purpose is to winnow the chaff from the grain, a salutary operation on the whole. Without agreeing with all his conclusions, it must be conceded that his method of criticising Browning's poetry, and especially his dramas, is acute and generally sound. Professor Lounsbury's book deserves the attention of all students and admirers of Browning's works; drastic as it is, it is unlikely to prove injurious to the poet's reputation.

Few more interesting subjects can be conceived than Browning's early history; and Professor Lounsbury has wisely restricted his studies to this period of the poet's life. It is the early life that counts (and unhappily it is often all that he has to count); after thirty years comes the prose, though many poets go on through the dreary forties, writing prosy poetry when they would be better employed on their reminiscences. Browning at seventy odd years recognised the futility of the aged poet when he wrote in his last volume:

"The Poet's age is sad: for why?
In youth, the natural world could show
No common object but his eye
At once involved in alien glow—
His own soul's iris-bow.

"And now a flower is just a flower:
Man, bird, beast are but beast, bird, man—
Simply themselves, uncinct by dower
Of dyes which, when life's day began
Round each in glory ran."

Browning's father was no ordinary man, but his method of training his precocious son was calculated to turn him out a prig; as in the case of most men of genius he would have benefited by a public school training. As it was the elder Browning's library of curious out of the way books formed the mental pabulum upon which Robert the younger was brought up. Some stress has been laid on the fact that it was strange the elder Browning should have possessed these uncommon books, but it is surely quite as strange that the young poet should have been attracted to such an odd collection, and have browsed on it with so much good result. Like most original poets, Browning only gained recognition after successive periods of neglect, ridicule and opposition. Except to a small band of staunch admirers (including the Pre-Raphaelite brothers) to whom Browning's poetry meant a good deal, he was far too many years unknown to that world-wide public that paid tribute to his wife. He was once described by an early acquaintance as holding most of his contemporaries in little esteem. This attitude, which is certainly noticeable in his correspondence with his future wife, was a sign of the self-confidence evident in his poetry. Yet with this self-satisfaction was added a great sensitiveness to criticism. He would not enter into competition with anyone, he refrained from writing sonnets, for instance, apparently because his wife wrote them with such ease and grace. As a rule neither the subjects nor the treatment of Browning's poems were popular. Professor Lounsbury of course acknowledges the beauty of the shorter Dramatic Romances and Lyrics, of "Paracelsus," "Pippa Passes," and "A Soul's Tragedy," but he cannot disguise his dislike for the more rugged works, and he tells some of the old stories about Browning's obscurities, notably the one of Douglas Jerrold, who after an illness feared that he had become an idiot because having picked up "Sordello" he could not understand a word of it. Browning himself was fond of repeating a remark of Wordsworth's about his marriage to Miss Barrett. "I hope," said the veteran poet, "that these young people will make themselves intelligible to each other, for neither of them will ever be intelligible to anybody else."

When Browning was staying with Jowett at Oxford for Commemoration in 1887, the caustic old Master of Balliol wrote: "He is a very extraordinary man, very generous and truthful, and quite incapable of correcting his literary faults, which at first sprang from carelessness and an uncritical habit, and now are born and bred in him. He has no form, or has it only by accident when the subject is limited. His thought and feeling and knowledge are generally out of all proportion to his powers of expression."

ROGER INGPEN

A POET'S CHILDREN.*

The reader's sympathy is aroused by the announcement that the author of this book was prevented by the hand of death from giving to it the final revision usually needed and received. But no revision would have altered its main characteristic, which is not so much an account of a remarkable man and a remarkable woman as a study in their heredity. Hartley and Sara were both the children of a man whom good judges held to be possessed of one of the finest intellects the world has seen. Mrs. Towle's book is well-written, but as a biography of Hartley Coleridge it does not surpass the frank and yet tender

* "A Poet's Children: Hartley and Sara Coleridge." By Eleanor A. Towle. 19s. 6d. net. (Methuen.)

Hartley Coleridge.
Aged 10.

From an engraving by W. Holl, after the drawing by Sir D. Wilkie.
From "A Poet's Children," by Eleanor A. Towle. (Methuen.)

memoir written by his brother, nor is this account of Sara better than that given by her daughter. And the omission of Derwent leaves the book imperfect as a study of the Coleridgean offspring. The pleasure of the reader is much enhanced by the capital illustrations, including two portraits of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, two of Hartley, two of Sara, two of Herbert, and one each of Southey and Wordsworth.

Notwithstanding the unhappy relations of husband and wife, they both aroused in their children the warmest affection and esteem. It was one thing they had in common whilst there were many in which they differed. Hartley was as unsuccessful in the battle of life as his father, and if Opium wrecked S. T. C., Alcohol wrecked Hartley. Both were afflicted by a paralysis of the will which prevents the victim from following that which his intellect clearly points out as the path of duty. The father had the agony of seeing his beloved son on the same fatal rocks where the happiness of his own life had been wrecked. Hartley's was the breaking to pieces of a trim frigate, but the wreck of S. T. C. was that of a mighty man-of-war, capable in its strength of withstanding alone a hostile fleet. It cannot be said that they resembled each other in their gifts. Hartley, in his precocious childhood, seems to have had a turn for metaphysics, but in his writings he is nearer to Charles Lamb than to S. T. C. It would be idle to compare their poetic gifts, so immeasurably superior are those of the father, but it is curious to note that Hartley is at his best in the sonnet—a form in which the father did not excel. There was a peculiarity in which Hartley's case differed from many other of the victims of intemperance. Whatever baneful influence alcohol may have had upon his material prospects, or upon his physique or mental activity, it brought about no moral degeneration. He was not brutalized, but remained throughout the same peaceful, lovable man, liked and pitied by all who knew him. It is open to doubt whether if Hartley had shared the class prejudices that then dominated Oxford, his intemperance would have involved the loss of his Fellowship.

Whilst Hartley, the eldest child, was a Bohemian in spirit, Sara, the youngest, never wandered beyond conventional limits. Brought up under the influence of her mother and of Southey, she had keener philosophical powers than either of her brothers, but her verses do not count for much, except the lyrics in her prose-poem of "Phantasmion." She made a happy marriage, and in her widowhood devoted herself unstintingly to the care of her invalid mother. It is the custom to regard Sara Fricker as a commonplace person devoid of intellectual sympathy, and only eager to see her husband's brilliant gifts coined into guineas. Yet it cannot be said that she made a mercenary marriage, for the failure of the Pantisocracy arose from the inability of the young men to raise by their united efforts £150 for the expenses of the emigration scheme. So far from being uneducated, she was able to teach her daughter Italian, if Mrs. Towle's statement is correct. On the other hand, the reproach so often made that S. T. C. callously imposed the burden of supporting his wife and children on Southey cannot be justified. The whole of Coleridge's permanent income was devoted to their use, and there were certainly families in the Lake district who were thought to be "passing rich" on £150 a year. Nor was this his only contribution to their welfare. True, a father's duties are not confined to £ s. d., but this charge of pecuniary neglect is baseless.

Derwent Coleridge does not enter into Mrs. Towle's scheme. This is to be regretted, for he stood in great contrast to his father. He had a successful and useful career in connection with the Anglican Church, and his contentment therewith perhaps made him less ready for literary adventures. Yet his biography of Hartley is an excellent work for its frank truthfulness concerning the brother whom he loved so deeply. That he had something of the family gift for verse we have the testimony of his son Ernest Hartley Coleridge:

"Father, thy father was a poet! Dew
Of Heaven was shed on him:
Thou, and thy brother and thy sister grew
By Hippocrene. Ye lipped its brim.
"Thy friends were poets. In thy mindful ears
What melodies must ring!
Nor didst thou fail in battle with thy peers,
When thou didst venture forth to sing."

In what way do the poet's children illustrate the influence of heredity? Mrs. Towle's doctrine is thus expressed on page 10:

"For no greater testimony could be given to the mysterious force of heredity, as independent of personal intercourse or conscious influence, than that afforded by the prepossessions and dispositions of Hartley, Samuel Taylor Coleridge's eldest son, and Sara, his youngest child and only daughter."

Let us confront this with Hartley Coleridge's own dictum:

"Genius is certainly not hereditary, though a certain degree of talent sometimes descends—oftener in the female than in the male. Scribbling is very infectious, and authors have a habit of warning their sons against the trade, which is most wise."

What is the truth?

Samuel Taylor Coleridge stood on a mountain height of philosophy and poetry to which none of his descendants have attained. If Hartley shared his ethical infirmities, Sara and Derwent were conspicuously free from them. All his children had a certain poetic gift and the daughter had a keen and philosophical spirit. But neither in poetry nor in philosophy did they reach within measurable distance of their father's greatness. Surely these data are too vague and inconclusive to be made the foundation or even the illustration of a scientific theory. If we extend our survey to include all the descendants of the Rev. John Coleridge we find many instances of talent and of success in life, but there is only one genius, S. T. C., and he, from a worldly point of view, was the least successful of all this remarkable tribe.

WILLIAM E. A. AXON.

WITTY DEGENERATION OF THE HEART.*

"Witty degeneration of the heart" was the diagnosis of a certain distinguished sufferer's complaint. The symptoms are the same in the case of the author of "Little Incidents," but they appear, at first sight, to be complicated by literary asthma. This, however, is deceptive. It is not because he is short of breath that he blows you a bubble which breaks, almost as it leaves the bowl, but because he is too cunning an artist not to know the exact moment when the creation of his fancy is complete, and so at its best. That is the moment he chooses to cast his frail craft adrift. It is art, not breathlessness, which accounts for the brevity of these sketches, and that he has staying power is abundantly proved by the longest stories in the volume, "The Lone Road," and "A Bearer of Burdens."

And, just as in literature (paradoxically as compared with life) "long windedness" is to be deplored, rather than to be desired—so also, in literature, "witty degeneration of the heart" is a symptom, not of sickness, but of health and sanity. It means that though sentiment of the right sort (let sneerers say what they will) is not wanting, the head has the wit to keep sentiment and the heart out of sight. I must not be supposed to accuse the author of "Little Incidents" of assuming a pose, when I say that he has a certain air of languid indifference and detachment, as if he did not care the swing of an eyeglass about it all, and half wonders why on earth he troubled himself to write. None the less, I suspect him of having a heart, and in the right place. I suspect him, even, of warming kindly in heart to the very mortals whose follies and failings he appears to regard with bored and semi-cynical surprise.

That he has a "style" of his own, and writes always with humour, originality, and distinction, is not to be denied. Best of all, he does not labour, or very rarely, to attain a laugh by mechanically-contrived and so-called "comic" situations or scenes. His humour is fresh, natural, whimsical, spontaneous. It is the salt with which he seasons the various and varying dishes of life, and he is as ready to laugh at himself as at the world in general, or at, as well as with, his reader.

Here may I turn aside to say how and when I first saw the name of the author of "Little Incidents" in print? A year or so ago, I chanced to read, in the British Weekly, a crisply-told, humorously-told short story, half banter, half biting social satire, but with a suspicion of "seriousness," and of what I have called "sentiment of the right sort," cunningly concealed beneath both satire and banter. It was signed "Frederick Watson," but, like the man in the play, who, when told that another man's name was "Smith," replied "That conveys absolutely nothing to my mind," I was no wiser in regard to the identity of the author. Yet, just as we are sometimes perplexed by seeing, upon the face of a stranger, a resemblance we cannot fix, so in reading the story, I found myself haunted, not by a family likeness, but by some far-away and fitting reminder—whether in the personality of the writer, or in his phrasing I could not say—of someone I had known but could not recall. Inquiring more closely—for my interest and my curiosity were aroused—I discovered the writer of the story to be the son of the late Rev. Dr. Watson ("Ian Maclaren"), and I knew at once that it was of the father I was vaguely reminded. Not that Mr. Frederick Watson's work has the least resemblance to his father's, or to that of any other writer. It has something in common with the work of Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. Clarence Rook, and Mr. Lewis Hind, but with the exception of the story "A Master of Deception," which, in subject and in style, as well as in title, recalls the inimitable stories of Mr. W. W. Jacobs, it resembles the work of no other writer. Much of Mr. Frederick Watson's work does not even resemble other work by Mr. Frederick Watson. "The Egg," for

* "Little Incidents" By Frederick Watson. 2s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Photo reproduced by permission of Messrs. Meddington, Ltd

Mr. Frederick Watson.

instance, is sheer farce and sheer fooling. The author, his tongue in his cheek, is engaged throughout in pulling the leg of the reader, who is smiling broadly meanwhile, pleased and happy as a scratched dog. "A Bearer of Burdens," on the other hand, has pathos in plenty and even a hint of tragedy. Writing of his friend, Bret Harte, Mr. Watts-Dunton once said: "It is very difficult, in a short story, to secure the freedom and flexibility of movement which belong to nature the last perfection of imaginative Art." Short as is "A Bearer of Burdens," Mr. Watson's picture of Martha Turnbull has all the freedom and flexibility of nature of which Mr. Watts-Dunton speaks, and so is, in every way, a success in miniature—of imaginative art. I think it a mistake on Mr. Watson's part to have included two stories, "The Imperialist," and "A Theory of Tails," separated, the one from the other, by only five pages, in which the plot, or motif is exactly the same. In each tale an insinuating and insidious stranger beguiles the narrator into a casual conversation from which much amusement is derived, until it is discovered that the stranger has abstracted and disappeared with the other's watch. "A Theory of Tails" appeared originally in Punch, from which others of the contents of "Little Incidents" are reprinted—is a fancy of infinite drollery, and I could more easily have forgiven the author had I found, at the end of the story, that my own watch was missing, than I can for thus repeating and parodying, and in fact spoiling what he has done so imitatively and so well. "Make a success—and run away from it" is a maxim which both authors and publishers would do well to bear in mind. That Mr. Watson has made a success with his first book is evident, and I am so far inconsistent as to go back on the maxim which I have thus learnedly laid down, and to express the hope that he will follow up his first success by another upon similar lines. The literary fare he has provided is for the most part of the lightest, and diners, in search of something solid, must look elsewhere for what they require. His stories suggest at least two culinary comparisons—hors d'œuvres, to put an edge on appetite, or savouries to tickle a tired and sated palate. It is true that in the middle of the menu we are served with something very different, in the shape of the four stories, gathered together under the sub-title of "Backwaters," and here the smile suddenly leaves his lips; and eyes, grave and serious as his father's, look out at us as we read. Recalling these four stories, we realise that we may yet see the name of Frederick Watson on the title page of a book worthy to stand, side by side, with those of "Ian Maclaren."

Meanwhile, to return to our culinary comparison, we are grateful for the dainty and appetising "snacks" which his son has set before us. They are served throughout with the humour—the dry, not the cloying and sweet brand—which is the champagne of life, and we rise from the table, having left no "course" unenjoyed, and hungry for the time when Mr. Watson shall play host to us again.

COULSON KERNAHAN.

PICK AND SHOVEL.*

The hope expressed in a previous number of THE BOOKMAN that Mr. MacGill's next volume of poems might be still better than his first, is amply satisfied by "Songs of a Navvy." The little book is not printed upon fine paper, nor is it garbed in purple and gold, but the plainness of its exterior is compensated for by the beauty of its contents. Typical of the many moods these songs represent are the many metres in which they are sung. Mingled with much that is terrible and even repulsive, at least for the supersensitive, are several lovely lyrics, full of unaffected admiration for nature. "To one who has been long in city pent," Mr. MacGill's poems of country life appeal with a refreshing calm, when he looks on nature and her ways "every prospect pleases and only man (and his works) is vile." In such pieces as "The Valley," with its gush of lummous language, or "A Spring Idyll," in a difficult metre managed with masterly skill, all is sweetness and content. Also, in songs of domestic life, his heart is true to home, and his pathos unforced. In "Going Home," boyish frankness and longings for the old familiar faces are affectingly portrayed:—

"So I'll hie me back to Glenties when the harvest comes again,
And the kine are in the pasture and the berries in the lane,
Then they'll give me such a welcome that my heart will leap with joy,
When a father and a mother welcome back their wayward boy.
So I'm going back to Glenties when the autumn shadows fall
And the harvest home is cheery in my dear old Donegal."

A charming portrayal of youthful longings in wanderjahre is "Roaming," with its rich language and thoughtful verse. Like all its author's work it is free from attenuated ideas and senseless verbiage.

These simple songs, however, do not form the main portion of Mr. MacGill's collection. His general work, such as "The House of Rest," is of a more serious and deeper import. This poem is a fine piece of preaching, although the effect of its grand lines is weakened by the long waits between the rhymes, thus destroying the anticipated assonance. A short quotation will show this defect, as well as the psalm-like solemnity of the poem:

"I saw the House of Toil, and there the people died for lack of bread,
There gnawing hunger kept her rule relentless o'er the battered roof,
And in the House of Love they wept for spoken words and words unsaid
I gripped my staff in mute despair and firmly kept myself aloof."

"The Old Men" is another poem to which a religious tone is imparted, not only by the gravity of its verse, but the solemnity of the thought embodied in it. It is powerfully written and might well be taken as the production of an old man, saddened by the results of senility:

"For we are the useless old men, wrinkled and bent and gray,
With the things we have done behind us, before us the lampless way,
We are the useless old men, with faltering, failing breath,
With a stake in the great Hereafter, sealed by the hand of Death."

A weird Poésque poem is "The Departed," but the too apparent artificiality of the metre lessens the glamour of the work, whilst some of the ideas are far from beautiful. The world does not want a repetition of "The Conqueror Worm," nor any more "Fleurs du Mal." Quite another key is struck in "The Waters," where the personification of human passion by inanimate objects is suggested by verse of great virility. The description of the pent-up rage of the waters when the dam gives way, and they burst forth, "bearing in braggart glee their freight of unshriven dead," is grandiose. We seem to feel the maddening gallop of the unchained flood as it breaks forth against the puny men who have striven to curb its power. An equally noble poem, but of totally different character, is "Longings," in which there are some notable lines. It is really wonderful how well Mr. MacGill has managed to condense so many fine ideas into these short poems; line after line rolls on, each filled with thought, without any exhaustion, and without any lowering of the standard of excellence, for, although some lines are necessarily better than others, none is inept or inefficient.

* "Songs of a Navvy." By Patrick MacGill. 1s. (P. MacGill, 4, Cloisters, Windsor.)

The most characteristic portion of Mr. MacGill's book is that devoted to Navvies' songs proper, in which he sings of sin, sorrow, and suffering, of misery, despair and death. His is not the experience of a poet born in a golden clime, nor is he a poet who "works without a conscience or an aim." Some of these poems engender a feeling akin to despair, suggesting, as they do, that after all his toils of existence man may be merely manure for the earth; but born to labour, die and fructify the soil, as in "Played Out":

"He lived like a brute, as the navvies live, and went as the cattle go,
No one to sorrow and no one to thrive, for heaven ordained it so—
He handed his cheek to the shadow in black, and went to the misty lands,
Never a mortal to close his eyes or a woman to cross his hands."

When Mr. MacGill dons his navy garb and takes his companion shovel in hand, to tell of death in desolate ditches, or of hopeless mortals in foodless homes, something terrible may be looked for, for then he wields a stylus of steel and makes use of ink of vitriolic power. The condensed irony of his style is exemplified by the "Breakdown Squad," wherein the horrors of a railway smash cause a rush for the papers, and

"The publishers say in their usual way, Business is doing well."

And by "Run Down," where the commonplaceness or sudden death is suggested:

"The gaffer spoke through the 'phone, 'Platelayer Seventy-one,
Got killed to-day on the six-foot way
By a goods on the city run."

Amongst the most noteworthy poems in the collection should be included "The Pioneer," a truly original production, and "The Song of the Drainer," which only inexorable want of space prevents the quotation of. "Padding It" has a swing and a ring which should justify its place beside certain of Browning's most popular lyrics. "Back from Kinlochleven" is a worthy sequel to it. Mr. MacGill has a marvellous facility for rhyme, and his rhythm is generally impeccable, but it may be suggested that he is wasting his powers over "Geological Nightmares," and "Conger Eel" lays. Such feats of versification are more akin to verbal acrobatics than poetic aspiration. The effect of the latter piece is discounted by its too apparent artificiality: "Apt alliteration's artful aid" is often valuable, but it can be carried too far: "The silent, sibilant, sombre, sinuous, stealthy conger eel," is not only contradictory but ludicrous. Other things than such metrical experiments are to be expected now from Mr. MacGill, for he is a true poet, and has written poems which will endure. There is vitality in his verse; his work will last long after the emasculated phrasings of boudoir bards have perished on the dustheap. Up till now his masterpiece is, probably, "The Song of the Shovel," and for a suitable parallel, Shirley's "Death Final Conquest," must be referred to. "L'Envoi—to my Pick and Shovel" is no unworthy finale to a work of real genius.

JOHN H. INGRAM

THREE CHILDREN OF ANTÆUS.*

One is a Presbyterian, two are Anglicans, and of the two one is a Canon, the other a Socialist. But all three are wrestling with the modern spirit of disbelief, and all three

* "The Renaissance of Faith." By Richard Roberts. 6s. (Cassell & Co.)

"The Plain Man's Creed." By E. C. Owen. 2s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

"By-ways of Belief." By Conrad Noel. 5s. (Frank Palmer.)

gain vitality from their contact with the plain earth of practical life. Apologetic is rapidly losing its reputation for being abstract and irrelevant, if these three books are to be taken as representative of the churches to which their authors belong. Mr. Roberts and Mr. Noel have a journalist's eye for what is actually going on in the streets. Canon Owen, by his very title, shows that he too is alive to the situation, as it has come under his notice.

The Canon's little book is a good-tempered plea that Christianity is still accessible. He writes for those who are puzzled and disturbed by modern science and criticism. If he does not take them very far, he certainly eschews the introduction of "Churchy" notions, and his arguments are as reasonable as that elusive personage, "the plain man," will probably demand. Mr. Noel's range is much wider than his fellow-Churchman's. He marches up and down the byways of Christian science, teetotalism, sabbatarianism, theosophy, and eight other modern vagaries, with words of good-humoured remonstrance, appreciating the motives of the wayfarers, criticising pretty sharply their aberrations, and reiterating the conclusion that there is one highway, the "Catholic Faith." Not that Mr. Noel is satisfied with his own church's presentation of Catholicism. On the contrary, a delightfully mixed metaphor, he observes that until the heritage of the Catholic Faith is fully appreciated "these byways of belief remain as thorns in our side." His closing chapter is a brief exposition of the Apostles' Creed as the Highway to Zion. But he is more entertaining when he is making caustic observations upon the byways, or even finding some reasons for the lamentable fact of their existence. "The tame and lifeless thing men now call Christianity leads not only bad men, but good men, to revolt. The Catholic Faith preached in all its reasonableness will draw all men unto it, or at least all men of goodwill. Nowadays, the Faith is preached in so distorted a form as to drive the sheep from the fold and keep the goats placidly browsing inside."

Mr. Roberts has not Mr. Noel's brisk style, but he has thought and vision as the other two have not, and his fine volume, with its obvious indebtedness to Lucken, touches the problem nearer the roots. It is an analysis and survey of the present situation, with a forecast of social and religious reconstruction upon Christian lines. Work of this kind is apt to be discursive. A quick-witted, intense nature finds some enjoyment in rapidly characterising its environment, or in flashing the searchlight of criticism upon successive phases of modern civilisation. Mr. Roberts covers a large amount of ground in this book. He covers it eagerly and keenly, but the effect would have been deeper if his pages had been more concentrated. As it is, "The Renaissance of Faith" is the work of a preacher who, by instinct and training, has realised that there are possibilities for Christianity under the beaten surface of the conventional order. He, too, is a child of Antæus in this, that he sees it is no use to discuss subjects like the existence of God before one has come to terms with the palpable facts of human life in which God is revealed.

Two words of literary criticism in closing. Educated apologists might learn to spell Father Tyrrell's name correctly. And if they are bent upon giving us revised versions of our religion, they might at least leave us the text of Wordsworth as the poet left it.

JAMES MOFFATT.

THE IRISH RENAISSANCE.*

Mr. Ryan's book should serve as flame to the tinder of Gaelic aspiration. To the Gael it will recall certain well-known lines of Blake, the spirit of which he will render thus:

"I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In Ireland's green and pleasant land."

In form just the story of the "Irish Peasant" and the

* "The Pope's Green Island." By W. P. Ryan. 5s. net. (James Nisbet.)

"Irish Nation," as edited by Mr. Ryan, the work is in content infinitely more. It is the story of the birth-throes of the Irish Renaissance; its moral, that the regeneration of Ireland must come from within not from without; and its record of the extent and character of the new movement will be fresh and thought-provoking to the average English reader. Mr. Ryan makes it plain from the outset that there are other Irelands than the "Pope's Green Isle," that there is a Catholicism that is distinct from Vaticanism, and a difference between the meaning of the terms anti-Catholic and anti-clerical, politics and nationality, flowery phrase-making and serious thinking. What is known as "the religious difficulty in Ireland" arises, he points out, not so much from the clash of Catholicism and Protestantism, as from the very mixed Irish Catholic world itself. Loosely one may describe Mr. Ryan's point of view as Modernist, with a leaning to esoteric Buddhism. He is opposed to anything in the nature of formalism. One reflects that formalism preceded the Italian Renaissance. To the Irish Party at Westminster he is piquantly tolerant. He admits that, whatever one may think of Home Rule, the working or waiting for it means that several urgent things are "held up" or saved from being tackled in Ireland itself. He is tempted to think that the most brilliant and mordant touch of English irony is not in English literature but in English government and life—"getting Rome to try to 'keep us good' on the one hand, and, on the other, putting the priest in pride of place over our schools and the teachers of our youth, and then inveighing against Rome rule, and calling us a priest-ridden people." His indictment of the conservative section of clericalism is summed up when he says that "generally speaking, official Maynooth . . . wants to go on believing that Ireland consists, and will always consist, of an incurious Catholicism headed by a professional Catholicism," and he pictures it, in its impassioned defence of worldly property, bidding the poor be content with the prospect of heaven in the next world, "forgetting or ignoring the great fact that the Catholic ideal is collectivist, not individualistic as the word is usually understood."

Mr. Ryan's references to the effect of the temporal ambitions of Rome on Anglo-Irish relations is acutely critical. He is severe too on the clerical ideas about women, ideas which have induced the priests to drive women into "social and mental concentration camps", whip in hand, to enter private houses and disperse social parties, to challenge engaged and even married couples, and in other ways to make life so wretched and dull that emigration seemed the only way out. Co-operation and the land question are dealt with at some length. There are, Mr. Ryan declares, thousands of acres of wild moorland in Connemara alone which could be reclaimed and made happy home haunts. In connection with Mr. Pearse's educational experiments at Rathmines and Rathfarnham we are reminded that Mr. Pearse's philosophy was practised by the founders of the Gaelic system two thousand years ago, by men whose very names for "education" and "teacher" and "pupil" show that they had gripped the heart of the educational problem. The word for "education" among the old Gael was the same as for "fostering", the teacher was a "fosterer", and the pupil was a "foster child." With a keen love of folk-lore, Mr. Ryan has no sympathy with the folk-lore system of the Maynooth school; and against the commonly accepted teaching of many folk-lorists he sets the facts of archaeology. Not for him the notion of a rude and primitive primeval world of crude and untutored fancies, and the gradual ascent of man from barbarism to what we know him in the fragment of earth-life we call history. Mr. Ryan's enthusiasm and idealism are infectious as they are reasoned and practical. From petty social cliquism, which the Gaelic League has done so much to discountenance, he looks abroad over the whole face of nature and reminds us that [we are all en route. His book deserves wide and careful reading; apart from the direct objects it has been written to serve, it is intellectually stimulating in a very high degree.

PROFESSOR STUART'S REMINISCENCES.*

Of late Professor James Stuart has not bulked largely in the public eye. Five years ago he retired from membership of the London County Council, and his unsuccessful attempt made in the 1910 election to retain his former seat in Parliament, following hard as it did on his being sworn of His Majesty's Privy Council, may perhaps be taken to mark the right honourable gentleman's definite retirement from active participation in public life. If this be so—and we should be sorry to come to the conclusion—no slight compensation will be afforded all those who have known and admired Professor Stuart's long and eminent services to social and educational reform by the publication of a volume of his "Reminiscences," a volume which we may trust is only the first of a series, for its author wishes it to be distinctly understood that his work is in no sense an autobiography. To the man under forty, James Stuart will be merely a name, a name of note certainly, but one difficult to place. Only those indeed who remember Gladstone's return to power in 1880 can describe from actual experience Professor Stuart's most honourable record and can tell how he was the pioneer of University Extension Lectures at Cambridge, how strenuously he assisted Miss Josephine Butler and Sir James Stansfeld in procuring the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act, and how, when the Liberal Party was at the nadir of its fortunes, he helped to crush the forces of reaction, by founding The Star and The Morning Leader. Strangely enough, Mr. Stuart says little about the famous crusade for "social purity"—to give the movement its prudish and rather absurd name—nor are his

* "Reminiscences." By James Stuart 10s. 6d. net (Cassell & Co.)

Painted in 1891.

James Stuart.

From an unfinished oil painting by Sir Hubert von Herkomer, R.A.
From "Reminiscences of James Stuart." (Cassell.)

disclosures about The Star and The Morning Leader very illuminating. But he devotes considerable space to a chronicle of his childhood and schooldays—a chronicle we must honestly describe as very small beer indeed; and it is only when he proceeds to the account of his life at Cambridge that the narrative gets really interesting. From this point onwards the Professor's "Reminiscences" are quite delightful, full of interesting comments on men and movements, and of amusing stories of famous personages. Gladstone, Ruskin, Tennyson, Stevenson, Browning, Blackie, and Francis Newman, all figure in these anecdotes, and Mr. Stuart tells us that it was at one of the meetings held at Trinity College, Cambridge, for making new statutes, that Thompson, the famous Master, made the inimitable mot "We are none of us infallible, not even the youngest," and that the remark was addressed to Gerald Balfour, then one of the most radical of reformers. How far the former Professor of Mechanism and of Applied Mechanics is from regarding himself as infallible may be gathered from a frank confession which he makes in the final chapter of his recollections:—

"Of poetry I have been an omnivorous reader. Byron seems to me the best modern English poet. . . . Shelley stands very high in my estimation. I like Scott's poems, which have a great swing about them, but perhaps it is more because of their character as romances than poems that they recommend themselves to me. All the ballads about Prince Charlie have come down as a possession from my earliest youth. . . . I like Rider Haggard's books. There are few writers who have more gorgeous imagination. I not infrequently meet him, and I have found his interests very wide. And in quite recent times I do not think any story-teller has given me more pleasure than W. W. Jacobs."

Here again is an interesting admission which no one will think worse of Mr. Stuart for making:—

"Speaking of education in Scotland, it is a curious fact that, however good it may be, it has never been able to instruct the Scottish people as to how to use the words 'shall' and 'will'. In my own case I have had the advantage of tuition at the hands of many of the most eminent professors and tutors, and have passed through two universities . . . and yet, in spite of it all, I find myself totally unable to decide in any instance that presents the slightest doubt whether 'will' or 'shall' should be used."

A PSYCHOLOGICAL NOVEL.*

It is not often that a reviewer can whole-heartedly endorse the encomium bestowed by a publishing house upon a work that bears its imprint; but when Messrs. Mills & Boon, in their circular letter to the Press sent out with the review copies of Mr. Hugh Walpole's latest novel, state that the author's "Mr. Perrin and Mr. Traill" "was acknowledged to be one of the finest fiction efforts of 1911 from the literary and artistic point of view," they are but echoing a remark made in many quarters by those well qualified to express an opinion on the subject. "Mr. Perrin and Mr. Traill" was a work that placed Mr. Walpole in the enviable position of being one of the small body of novelists whose work is awaited with keen interest by the more intelligent class of readers. It had the great gift of freshness. There have been tales innumerable of school life, but they have been usually of the boys and for boys. In "Mr. Perrin and Mr. Traill" we have the psychology of the master's common room, and the masters and their wives depicted with rare skill. It was a book to read: it is a book for those who have read it to re-read.

In "The Prelude to Adventure," Mr. Walpole takes us to the University, and successfully envelopes us in the atmosphere. We have all types of undergraduates, from the football blue to the religious devotee, from the brutal amorist to the man who seems to have been born to be "ragged." When the curtain ascends, Olva Dune, a young man of Spanish descent, is looking down upon the body of a man whom he has killed with a single blow. He had no intention to kill, and if he had gone to the police-station and told his story, his troubles would soon have been over. As, however, there was no witness to the fact that he and his brother-undergraduate had been together in the wood, he yielded to the temptation to hold his tongue. The dead man had kept queer company, and it was thought that he had met his death at the hands of one of these. No suspicion fell on Dune, but though he felt no remorse for having put an end to the life of the other, who was an evil fellow, he felt that he should have made confession of his act. He realised that he was behaving in a cowardly way in concealing what he had done, and this preyed upon his mind so severely that, at last, almost unconscious of what he was saying, so overwrought was he, he blurted forth his secret to a weak-minded invertebrate creature, the last person in the world to be burdened with such a secret. How presently one man, the man whose sister Dune loved, forced him into a confession, need not here be told in detail. In the end Dune decided he must go forth into the world to work out his redemption, and in the following words told his reasons to the girl to whom he was engaged:

"There is no explanation (of why I must go) except that by what I did in Sannet Wood that afternoon I put myself out of touch with human society until I had done something for human society. God has been telling me for many days that I owe a debt. I have tried to avoid paying that debt. I tried to escape Him because I knew that He demanded that I must pay my debt before I could come to you. I see this as clearly as I saw yesterday the high white clouds above the football field. God now is as real to me as you are. It is as though for the rest of my life I must live in a house with two persons. We cannot all live together until certain conditions are granted. I go to make those conditions possible. Because I have broken the law I am an outlaw. I am compelled to win my way back to citizenship again. God will show me . . . God does exist. I must work out His orders, then I will come back to you."

Whether, as Dune's fiancée assured him, he was suffering from over-wrought nerves, or whether he saw the visions which guided him in his conduct, the reader, according to his convictions, must settle for himself. Whichever conclusion is reached, there is no doubt that the book is alive, the characters real, the setting admirable. Having had "The Prelude to Adventure," we can but hope that Mr. Walpole will continue his interesting psychological study by setting forth "The Adventure" itself.

LEWIS MELVILLE.

TRAVELS ROUND LONDON.*

One might imagine that the picturesque possibilities of the Home Counties had been explored, exploited, and written-out tunes without number, that all the silent verdures of hillsides, and the hidden fastnesses of woods, were long ago desecrated, and that the footpaths had become "faded foot-paths," like those in Richard Jefferies' immortal reverie. But a brief acquaintance with "Pathfinder" will joyfully convince one to the contrary. Whether he alone, of many pedestrians, has succeeded in investing well-worn ways with a glamour of new loveliness,—or whether he alone, of many would-be guide-book writers, has broken away from the dull records of conventional topography, and set forth his golden discoveries after a fashion so delightful, so simple, and so enthralling, as might allure all men to follow in his steps—it were hard to say. But it would be very much harder to name anyone who has succeeded so emphatically as "Pathfinder." He contrives to rehabilitate the trodden ways with "the freshness of the early world," and to convey some of his own freshness and enthusiasm to the most jaded and city-weary reader. These charming and exhilarating little volumes, brim-full of explicit detail and implicit happiness, proffer advice and assistance of every kind for him who would "jog on the foot-path way," whether in Kent, Surrey, Middlesex, Essex, Herts, or Bucks. Plenty of maps are provided by "Pathfinder," and the minutest of directions for every route, so that "wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." He gives you such simple notes as shall ensure the comfort and simplification of a

* "The Prelude to Adventure." By Hugh Walpole. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

* "Afoot Round London." By "Pathfinder." 2s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

fourteen-or-fifteen-mile country walk. Claims of the inner man are not forgotten: you need never find yourself marooned upon some lonely down, when you know it to be lunch-time or tea-time by other signs than those of the clock. For "Pathfinder" benevolently indicates inns and village hostelries, and arranges your steps so as to fall timely in their neighbourhood. He is no blind guide, moreover, regarding the peculiar idiosyncrasy of the district to be traversed, but—as a genial and human comrade—bids you be aware, in a word or two, of its historical values and local quaintnesses. And he solaces any contretemps of the journey with [in his own words], "such random philosophy and open-air happenings as there is room for." The very titles of his chapters are in themselves suggestive and inspiring, so that, with the summer opening illimitable vistas before you, the very flute of Pan rings out from "Pathfinder's" pages, and calls you to follow him, "All among the Chilterns," "By Pack-horse Track to Shere," "Between two Forests," in Essex, or wandering along "The Pilgrims' Way" in the royal weeks between May time and hay-time. In short, whether as guides, philosophers, or friends, we have never come across more delightful itineraries than these two volumes of "Afoot round London," and upon them lies the benediction of that Japanese deity, ever-to-be-adored—the god who presides over field-paths.

MAY BYRON.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHY.*

The Cambridge Professor of Moral Philosophy has just put out, in Mr. Dent's "Channels of English Literature" series, a summary review of British philosophy, which should prove extremely useful. His aim, so far as I understand it, is not to compile a complete consecutive short history—though I think that as a fact he has done so, but rather to "trace the chief stages in the development" through a study of the leading representatives of each. He succeeds in producing a most clear impression of the consecutive life history of English Thought as of a veritable organism. This unity of the treatise is due not so much to comprehensive generalisation as to its carefully mapped-out arrangement.

The various philosophies do not here concern us; only the author's treatment. It is in the first place, expert: Professor Seth seems equally familiar with every part of the field. And he is as conscientious as laborious—unfortunately. True to his task as expositor, he too rarely for our liking intrudes his own opinion. His attitude to the different schools may be eclectic or purely external, but it he has a bias he has suppressed it. Even in his concluding chapter on "Present Tendencies," he remains as inscrutable. His comments are often peculiarly suggestive. Time and Space—those tyrants of reviewers as of metaphysicians—alone preclude my quoting some specimens. The treatment of both the Mills seems singularly happy. Bacon receives full justice, but no more, the popular errors and exaggerations, which only tend to deform Bacon's real greatness receiving no quarter. More, I think, might have been said in praise of the "Theory of Moral Sentiments," though Leslie Stephen's strange depreciation is justly refuted.

One more feature calls for notice, the excellent criticisms, or more often retorts to criticism, on the literary merits of certain philosophers. More than once the Professor simply selects with nice taste a quotation or two in defence. Thus to show what Locke—voted dull by the dull—could do when he chose, the exquisite passage on memory is given; the last sentence reads like Jeremy Taylor at his moments of highest inspiration. I confess to have found Professor Seth's own style sometimes obscure. Each sentence is plain enough, but the logical concatenation of the sentences is not indicated clearly enough—this is of course only the besetting snare of all who have more Matter than Space. In fine the book has many merits of which the most meritorious are its impartiality and its thoroughness.

By a coincidence at the same moment appears another work dealing with part of the same subject, but with a different purpose. Mr. St. George Stock, who, before he moved from Oxford to Birmingham, as Reader in Greek, had done much editing, notably on Caesar and Plato, and had issued at least two short original philosophical tracts—which I shall now certainly try to get hold of—has just added another under the really appropriate title of "English Thought for English Thinkers." The "English Thought" has surprised and captivated me—the English quite as much as the Thought. It includes a close analysis of the philosophies of Locke, Berkeley and Hume, regarded as Idealists, and it is consoling to find Professor Seth coinciding in several doubtful points. But Mr. Stock's aim is not mere exposition of other thinkers. It is constructive and propagandist. He has a metaphysic of his own. "Our little systems have their day," says the poet—so has every dog—but when Mr. Stock's "ceases to be," may another as mercifully intelligible succeed. And as modest. The reconciliation of Idealism and Materialism! many an honourable Brutus would say he was ambitious—till he read him. But the theory is advanced quite tentatively as a modus vivendi, a reasonable working hypothesis on which both schools may agree. Both, that is all, for, as he well urges, there are but two. The philosopher can either direct his gaze outside himself; then Matter must obsess him—whatever fine reservations and distinctions he makes, he is a Materialist; or he may look inside himself for the solution of the problems and mysteries, then he is an Idealist. Till recent days all our own great philosophers adopted, and more or less adhered to the introspective method, and therefore Hume, who of course stands for Empiricism and Scepticism, was as Idealistic as Berkeley in one respect less, but in another more. The Philosophy of Consciousness devised by Descartes was worked out almost entirely on English soil, and few thinkers, even the stoutest Utilitarians have avoided the national bias. Now each method, the Introspective and the Extraspective with their results, are alike intelligible. All the confusion has sprung from not keeping strictly to one method. Said a small gull—a Materialist grappling with the problem of Identity. "Please, Sir, which is Louis Philippe and which is Louis Napoleon?" "Which you like, my little dear," replied the Idealist waxwork-showman. "You pays your money and you takes your choice." But, suggests Mr. Stock, shrewdly if not very logically, of two groups equally intelligent and learned, one cannot be all right and the other all wrong. The chances are they are both partly right. Can we not then reconcile them on some common basis, and, upon that neutral ground build our beliefs. Thus, therefore, he tries to do.

His very luminous and, even to outsiders, entertaining analysis of the three Idealists, by which he fortifies his position, deserves, but cannot here receive, detailed description. Many of his points are as original as acute. For instance (pp. 83, 84), theological bias, or rather instinctive piety was really what led Berkeley to recoil from Matter as being a barrier between God and the Soul, and to deny Space as a humanly invented rival of Deity. The other cause which the author suggests for Berkeley's modification of Locke's system, is his curious attempt to think without language. Hence his Sensationalism—nothing was real that could not be represented by a sense image. The general idea of a triangle was impossible, because every image of it must be either equilateral, isosceles or scalene. Further, it was just the contrary bias in Hume which caused him to turn the tables on the Bishop by denying the reality of Spirit, because we have no sense-image of it. The philosophy of each was deeply tinged with his own personal disposition—the suave humanity of the one, the earnest piety of the other. Mr. Stock does not go an inch too far. There can, indeed, be no doubt that, when halting between two opinions, Berkeley invariably chose the one which in his view was more to the honour of God. His exquisite mind was religious rather than theological, like St. Augustine's. Indeed, his doctrine

* "English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy." By Professor James Seth, M.A. 5s. (J. M. Dent.)

"English Thought for English Thinkers." By St. George Stock, M.A. 3s. 6d. (Constable)

that Spirit is the only efficient cause coincides strangely, if it be not derived directly from that of the Father—" jan vero causæ voluntariæ, aut Dei sunt, aut angelorum, aut hominum, aut quorumque animalium." (Civ. Dei. v. 9). To Berkeley, by the way, these same forms of Spirit (adding Devils, which after all are but evil Angels) are the sole realities in the universe. The chapter on Hume is equally interesting, especially in the dexterity by which Locke and Berkeley are marshalled to retaliate upon their ruthless enemy. Not all the author's arguments are equally sound, and here and there certain remarks—but mostly incidental—on scientific points seemed hardly those of an expert. But the three philosophies have been studied with industry, dissected with skill, and their essence reproduced and criticised not only with honesty and acumen, but with positive charm.

For were Mr. Stock's opinions but March madness they would attract by their happy presentation. His style is not perfect; it is not magical, nor splendid, nor nicely polished, but all the same it does recall the sages of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries—neither pedagogues nor professors, but men of the world, of breeding, of culture, of leisure, of assured position and so of fearless independence and conscious authority—by its unaffected simplicity, its vigour and a lucidity both natural and studied. If a gift it has been matured by Greek training, just as his English Thought is really based on Greek thought, not German, nor even Hottentot. If the average gentle reader who has once opened with hope and hastily shut with rage and horror the tomes of our Kantian and Hegelian hierophants, will but give an evening to this modest book, he will find that metaphysicians are not really, as he suspected, in the pay of a gang of greedy alienists.

On Mr. Stock's system I will not expatiate. Though he sums it up in a nut-shell, it can only be judged fairly by studying the whole book. The very thought of a Philosophy of Common Sense is horrid profanity in the eyes of the Jargoners and Mystery-mongers, and they will certainly flout the predication of the reality of Time and Space, by which the reconciliation is effected. To these noble sportsmen—for as sportsmen I regard and admire them—Time and Space are simply occult sporting terms reserved for their own use, not to be postulated as realities by outsiders. Though its author makes out a good case for it, I confess that I stumble at this openly-avowed "believing where we cannot prove," though of course we all secretly feel that Time is a bigger reality than time-tables, and Space than a tape measure. After all, the author but follows Plato in asserting that the objects of thought (νοητά) are more real than those of sense (αἰσθητά). And these postulates once granted the way is cleared for the "Creed of Common Sense," so forcibly and eloquently expounded in the Conclusion. Which Creed does in a rough and unsymmetrical yet practical manner reconcile not only Materialism and Idealism, but Philosophy and Religion.

Y. Y.

A BATCH OF NOVELS.*

Of my batch of seven, the quadrivium is certainly to be classed as romance. We all love a good romance, and anyone who confesses to this can find what he wants in "Captain Quadring,"¹ who is a really vivid and arresting person, with a bitter history and a breathless career. The scene is in Australia, at a convict quarry, and the redoubtable Captain is an overseer who by his indomitable courage quells the incessant mutiny of those worse than damned souls. The strong, resolute brothers and their terrible feud, the solution of their quarrel in final peace, the young woman who is drawn into their lives, the feeling of the convict quarry, the brooding atmosphere of hate and wickedness, the characters of the men, the Colonial life of the period, are conveyed to the reader in an unusually realistic way, and, sombre as the tale is, it claims the reader's attention from beginning to end.

¹ "Captain Quadring." By William Hay. 6s. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

In "The Shadow of Power,"² Mr. Bertram has given us a promising first book, the result of a careful study of Spanish dealings with Holland under Alva. We have the Spanish noble as governor in the Dutch town, his love affair and his troubles, intrigues against the priest, the Inquisition, accusations of heresy and witchcraft, a dramatic marriage, a dramatic desertion of Spain by the hero, who turns to William of Orange, and governs Gouda for Holland as he had governed Gertruydenberg for Spain, and after much trouble finds happiness at last. Mr. Bertram's story halts sometimes in its determination to be restrained, and when it seems to have knit itself together into one it dissolves and takes another shape, but it is a notable attempt, and one feels that the author will do better things if he cares to try.

Neither can I altogether commend Mr. Christopher Stone for his Ruritanian story, "The Shoe of a Horse."³ Mr. Anthony Hope did this kind of romance so well that it is a pity to find so much ingenuity expended on doing the same thing not so well. A young Englishman of parts and breeding finds himself in "Paria," a country tucked away somewhere in Central Europe. He has gone for the shooting, and gets it in a revolution. And there is a girl who is the rightful Queen, and, of course, they fall in love. And—as happens in these romances—they turn their backs on duty and sovereignty and marry. Mr. Hope escaped that pitfall, but his followers tumble in every time. They must provide the happy ending. Jack must have Jill so that all may go well. And the English hero is a peer, and all through the book is a careless take-it-for-grantedness that the young Englishman—especially when titled—is the salt of all the earth, and is so regarded by the less favoured inhabitants of other lands. Yet the book is written with an admirable ease and fluency—quite a good essay in the manner of Mr. Anthony Hope.

Neither, again, can I wholly commend Mr. Frederick Niven's "Dead Men's Bells."⁴ For had there been no Robert Louis Stevenson, nay more, had there been no "Kidnapped" I doubt if we should have had this volume, or at any rate it would have worn another shape. There is little story, and what there is wanders into nothingness. A young man is sent home from Glasgow University, finds scanty welcome from his sister, seeks his fortune in a ship going to America, is run down in a storm and clammers on the other ship—a pirate, and with a comrade leads the pirate crew on an itinerary through the Western Highlands until they get rid of them. Now the details are excellent, some of the description is hard to forget, Wylie is almost a creation, though far behind Alan Breck, and the power and manner of this book place it easily first of my four romances as a piece of writing and in promise. But to make a romance that lives you must have a story, and here is no story. The finest part of all is the opening, describing the life at the farm, and the dour, stiff-hearted, unforgiving sister, a sketch that is not easily paralleled. But in spite of fine perception, good description, and vivid writing "Dead Men's Bells," remains an unsatisfactory book. It is full of promise, but Mr. Niven has already given us better things.

So much for my quadrivium; now for the trivium. Here I have three books not of past centuries, but of the living to-day. The "White Shrine"⁵ has a touch of "Bohemia." A girl who at eighteen wrote a wonderful fine novel, comes to live in London and meets a man who is a thorough cad and blackguard, who makes "platonic" love to her, borrows her money, and drives her to write a villainous book under a pseudonym, in order to get money for him. He is checkmated in the end by the strong, still hero from the Wild West or thereabouts who marries the girl—the "white shrine" of whose mind has not really been polluted after all! There is some interesting characterization and some clever writing in this book, but it cannot compete in realism or interest with Frank Danby's new novel, "Joseph in Jeopardy,"⁶ whose title is a sad blunder; it recalls the

² "The Shadow of Power." By Paul Bertram. 6s. (John Lane.)—³ "The Shoe of a Horse." By Christopher Stone. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)—⁴ "Dead Men's Bells." By Frederick Niven. 6s. (Martin Secker.)—⁵ "The White Shrine." By G. Villiers-Stuart. 6s. (Melrose.)—⁶ "Joseph in Jeopardy." By Frank Danby. (Methuen.)

Biblical tale, and vulgarizes the book at the outset. A magnificent young man, a picture dealer in Bond Street and a county cricketer, wealthy, noble in heart and instinct, married to a commonplace girl of vulgar family, meets and is fascinated by a beautiful widow, Lady Diana Wayne, who stoops to this Adonis of Lord's. Dennis remains faithful to Mabel through thick and thin. The book is sure of a very large public, who will probably wonder, as I did, how Mabel, who was so very colourless and disagreeably unattractive at the beginning of the book, not merely manages to keep her husband faithful (though she really had nothing to do with that, only his own Josephry availed) but also towards the end of the book suddenly appears a capable delightful woman, with no reasons annexed. Surely there must have been some sign of change. The portraits of Amos Juxton, the wealthy grocer, his son Ted, and Ted's wife, Fanny, of Cosmo Merritt, the villain of the piece, are interesting and alive. Dennis is carefully composed, but one would be more sympathetic with him if he was a little more of a lover, or if he had not been labelled "Joseph in Jeopardy" on the title page. In my school days tinned herrings-in-tomato sauce were contemptuously known as "whales-in jeopardy," and I think Dennis was more of a herring than a whale. But Frank Danby is to be congratulated on a very brilliant book, her most serious if not her most obviously striking work, and it is refreshing to find a hero who remains true to his wife in spite of a real love set elsewhere and with answering love, not for any exotic and perverse reasons, but for the good simple honourable reason that he had vowed a vow. Nowadays the contention in novels seems to be that in marriage the solemn promise is to be kept just as long as it is agreeable, and broken the moment its keeping becomes at all a matter of hardship. Surely a poor and degrading point of view, and I am heartily glad to find Frank Danby so ably defending fidelity in marriage, taking her stand on the old virtue and validity of a promise, and showing that in fidelity to his vow the hero found comfort and truer happiness and in the end love where no love had been. Whether this would be the end of a loveless marriage observed scrupulously in every point of the spirit of marriage is a debatable question, yet many wise men have thought with Frank Danby, though few would advise the initial experiment.

In "Esther" Miss Agnes E. Jacobb has propounded and worked out with exquisite skill another problem of married life, and for fidelity to nature, insight into certain feelings and aspects of life, for intensity, for adequate writing, for pregnant, meaning phrasing, and for the shaping and balance of the story, as well as the logical development of the plot, I am inclined to think that "Esther" is the most finished and worthy of my seven novels, though lacking the scope and brilliancy of "Joseph."

F. M. A.

ST. CLARE AND HER ORDER.*

From a literary point of view one of the first things to attract attention in this volume is the statement that Canon Knox Little has written a Life of Francis of Assisi in which he never even mentions Clare. Yet the two names are almost inseparable. Francis had found his vocation only for about three years when, in the Lent of 1212, Clare came to him in the Church of San Giorgio. Shortly after midnight of Palm Sunday Chiara Scifi "was dead to the world." Says her biographer: "She persevered in that life of poverty, penance, and prayer for over forty years, and princesses and peasants alike joined her in it. Thousands of women continued all down the ages to embrace this extraordinary life; there are over ten thousand still living

St. Clare.

(Simon Mennin)

From "St. Clare and her Order" (Mills & Boon.)

it in this twentieth century." And it is remarked that "it has been so in the material as well as in the spiritual life, that the man and the woman were needed for the development of the ideal. Witness Pericles and Aspasia, Augustine and Monica, Socrates and Diotima, Jerome and Paula, Benedict and Scholastica, Francis and Clare." The first settlement of Clares in England was made from France at the end of the thirteenth century. The number to-day is variously given, but a tabular statement in the present volume shows that the houses and inmates in Great Britain on January 1st were as follows: England, 9 and 228; Scotland, 1 and 14; Ireland, 9 and 277. The work, which is illustrated, after giving a careful account of Clare's renunciation and the early history of the Order named after her, deals with its Rule, special phases of its history in various parts of the world, some of its more notable members, and certain convents of note. There is one chapter which will appeal especially to our readers, that on "Poesy and Poverty." It contains this quotation from the late Professor James of Harvard: "It is certain that the prevalent fear of poverty among the educated classes is the worst moral disease from which our civilisation suffers."

OLD IRISH LIFE.*

"Old Irish Life," by J. M. Callwell, is virtually the history of the great Martin family of Galway and Connemara and of their associates and environment. The

* "Old Irish Life." By J. M. Callwell 10s. net (Blackwood.)

* "Esther." By Agnes E. Jacobb 6s. (Heinemann.)

* "St. Clare and Her Order" Edited by the Author of "The Enclosed Nun" 7s. 6d. net. (Mills & Boon.)

Martins were one of the fourteen Anglo-Norman tribes who, as merchant princes, ruled over Galway for many centuries. "As proud as a Galway merchant" was a well-known proverb in the sixteenth century, and they had something to be proud of, since they were not merely rich and prosperous merchants but good fighting men, as well they had need to be, since they had to defend themselves constantly against the fierce Clansmen of the O'Flaherties, of whose lands they gradually possessed themselves. But like the other Anglo-Norman families they became more Irish than the Irish themselves, and so fell under the curse of Cromwell, whose soldiers pillaged and burnt as much of it as they could. Even after this Henry Cromwell, Lord Deputy, described it as "a town of many noble buildings, most of them of marble, and that for situation, voisenagè and commerce which it had with Spain, the Strayts, West Indies and other places, noe town or port in the three nations (London excepted) was more considerable." So great was the commercial intercourse between the town and Spain that Tacitus describes Ireland as situated midway between Spain and Britain. This connexion was developed by the Anglo-Norman merchants until, in the sixteenth century, they became great landowners as well. Like many others, the Martins escaped the rigours of the Penal Laws by conforming, but they never ceased to be Irish. Perhaps the most remarkable member of a remarkable family was Richard Martin who was Member for Galway at the time of the Union, and afterwards in the British House of Commons introduced the first Bill for the Protection of Animals. He was thereafter known as "Humanity Dick." He was a famous duellist a man of lavish hospitality, and despite his enormous estate in continual monetary difficulties. When asked if the King's Writ did not run in Connemara, he answered. "Egad, it does, as fast as any greyhound if any of my good fellows are after it."

Apropos of the methods of converting the "natives," the author tells the following story of an acquaintance

This lady dismissed all her Roman Catholic servants and imported English Protestants, from the butler to the scullery-maid. There only remained the page-boy, whom she summoned to her presence.

"Patsy," she said, "you're a Protestant from this out"

Patsy, however, lifted up an unexpected voice of protest

"Plaze, yer ladyship, I'd do anything ye bid me savin' that."

Her ladyship remained unmoved.

"William," she said to the butler, "take Patsy away and reason with him. Bring him back in two days"

The butler, it is to be feared, was not a skilled controversialist; at least, his arguments failed to convince Patsy, who at the end of the two days still remained obdurate

"No, yer ladyship. I'll niver turn," he declared, tearfully

"Williams," said his mistress imperturbably, "take Patsy away, and put him to bed. He's not to get up till he's a Protestant."

Patsy held out manfully for a week, and then his resolution failed, and he sent a message from under his bed-clothes that he was now a Protestant, whereupon he was allowed to don his buttoned array and to resume his place in the household.

Of the famous tribes of Galway, all were represented in "Ye Citie of Ye Tribes" until a few weeks ago, when the last representative of the Skerretts was removed by death.

There is no lack of racy stories in the volume, many of them, it is true, old friends, but we are grateful to the author for a most entertaining book, which has the additional interest of linking up the past with the present, at a time when a new epoch in the history of the country is dawning.

H. A. HINKSON.

THE TRUE TRAVELLER.*

Mr. W. H. Davies' new book of prose looks, at first sight, very much like "Beggars." It consists of twenty-three short chapters, describing some of the author's adventures

* "The True Traveller." By W. H. Davies. 6s. (Duckworth.)

in lodging-houses and on the roads of England and America; and some of these are to be matched in "Beggars." There is no need here to praise them. Some would be amusing or surprising, all interesting, whoever related them: Mr. Davies' limpid English and unspoilt outlook makes of each one a masterpiece of this kind. Even when they are not wholly new to Mr. Davies' readers, and are very slender in substance, that limpidity is itself a sufficient pleasure, so uncommon is it. But "The True Traveller" is more than a mechanical response to the demand for further reminiscences. We here meet, for the first time, some of the women of the road and the mean street. Evidently Mr. Davies had not introduced them before, lest they should contaminate the respectable reader. Success has given him confidence. He now knows that many respectable people are delighted to know what the rest are doing. They ought to be delighted with this volume, unless they have been corrupted by morals and melodrama. Mr. Davies knows nothing about either: I do not say that he has not heard of them. He has not done violence to his native modesty by these new revelations. He preserves the old mixture of decorum and real naïveté even while he is taking us up the strangest staircases. No doubt this is small beer compared with what he could, and probably some day will, brew. Yet I doubt if he will ever do anything better than "Mad Kitty," the story told by a barman about a "courtesan," to use Mr. Davies' decorous and even ceremonious term. She was "childishly wild and full of life," but whispered to her companion to be quiet in going upstairs to her lodgings, because there was a boy lying dead in the next room. "Later in the night," she tells the story. The boy was the landlady's child, and seven years old. Kitty had been very fond of him, and he of her; but when a neighbour near had a baby she grew fond of the newcomer, which made the boy jealous. In fact, she deliberately teased the boy to make him jealous. Once he threatened to kill himself with a knife, but Kitty took it away; once with a rope, but his mother saved him. In the end he found a bottle of poison and used it successfully, and he lay dead in the next room while Kitty was telling his story to the barman

"I could not sleep," says the barman, "for thinking of the strange things I had heard. I knew that these courtesans were very fond of children, and made every effort to win their love. That is the reason why they are never scorned by respectable mothers who are very poor. A respectable mother, who is very poor, is not ashamed to be seen with one of these courtesans, for she knows that cakes or sweets, aye, sometimes clothes or boots, will be bought for the children, which she cannot afford to pay for herself. A courtesan will be her most faithful and practical friend, if she will allow it. While I was thinking of this I heard Mad Kitty say distinctly in her sleep: 'Jealous because I made much of the baby. Poor little devil.' That was my experience with Mad Kitty the first time I met her"

This story is a finished short story, hardly longer than one of Mr. Davies' poems. Some of the other chapters contain equally finished stories, some consist of odds and ends of reminiscences, like that relating to the time just after the World's Fair in Chicago, when there were thousands of men out of work. "Do you want a bowl of the best soup in the city?" a man asked Mr. Davies, and he went, for he had become a connoisseur in free soup.

"After we had finished our soup," he concludes, "and were leaving, I asked Sullivan what kind of house it was, with so many well-dressed women there, each of a beauty peculiar to herself.

"'It is a sporting house,' he answered. 'How do you like the soup?'

"'Very much,' I returned.

"'You can always rely on girls of that kind to do something good and substantial for the poor,' he said. 'They do not make the soup cold with hymns and prayers. I am glad you enjoyed it.'"

The double revelation in this book is remarkable—the conscious revelation of out-of-the-way or hushed-up things, and the unconscious revelation of a temperament having that simplicity which is so far from morality and yet is apparently superior in the same field.

EDWARD THOMAS.

DOSTOIEVSKY.*

There is, just now, a kind of sudden interest in Dostoevsky. A popular drama based upon "Crime and Punishment" has recently made the least literary of play-goers acquainted with his name. Mr. Rhys's wide-cast net has dragged two volumes of him into "Everyman"; Mr. Heinemann promises a new set in English from the pen of Mrs. Garnett, the inspired translator of Turgenev, and now here is a big volume all about his life and works. A change, this wealth of opportunity, from the days when he swam like a new planet into the convalescence that followed my first acquaintance with influenza—those exiguous days when I had to eke out the few Vizetelly volumes with French translations of the others!

It was to be expected that Mr. J. A. T. Lloyd would add to his pleasant studies of Tolstoy and Turgenev some consideration of the third and, to Englishmen, the least known person of Russia's literary trinity. He deals, at first sight, unequal justice in the matter of space, as Dostoevsky gets a whole three hundred pages to himself while the other two have to share a volume between them, but there would be no valid objection to this—sufficient defence being found in the comparative unfamiliarity of the subject—were it not that Mr. Lloyd exhibits some inexpertness in the handling of a long monograph. His dozen chapters have different titles, but they all say pretty much the same sort of thing, with the result that a careful reader begins to suffer from an uneasy conviction that he is always losing his place and reading pages that he has been over several times already. And, further, it cannot be said (completing here the tale of objections) that Mr. Lloyd is invariably an attractive writer. He struggles quite violently at times to avoid saying a plain thing in a plain manner and to achieve some elaborately literary form of utterance. Now this is not the way to write well. Literature is never literary. The man who tries to write in style will generally be as successful as the housemaid who tries to dress in the fashion; that is to say (leaving these irrelevant generalities), he will perpetrate sentences like this of Mr. Lloyd's:

"Thackeray himself is perpetually haunted by the forgnette of the English county family in his telescopic sweep of the cosmos."

Or like this:

"Hats and boots seem to have haunted for decades the sombre psychologist who was to sound the deepest plummets of the human soul."

Or like this:

"Then comes a night of horror, after which he shoots himself like a dog."

I assure Mr. Lloyd that if I seem to dwell upon these defects, it is not out of malice or ill-humour, but because I believe them to be weaknesses that he will be glad to avoid in his future work. I adjure him to cultivate plainness and order. His general formlessness and his particular formalism are very tiresome, and seriously detract from his good qualities—his interest in his work, his earnestness of intention, and his tactful choice of the topics that please and enlighten his readers.

Dostoevsky is the poet of the lower depths. His creatures are the paupers, the criminals, and the abnormals—the world's subtermen, not its supermen. He has been called the novelist of pity, but the phrase must be used with discrimination. He was not a sentimentalist. He had the artist's pity, the pitiless pity that finds beauty in the outcast and forlorn; but he never commits the common fallacy in pathos that invests the object with the emotions of the observer. It is the dreadful paradox of Dostoevsky's sufferers that frequently they do not suffer. They are horribly acquiescent in their fate, and their message, the more moving because it is mute, is that this is what man can make of man when the heart is hard and the affections fixed on things below. Like all original artists he shows us the unexpected—the intelligence of the imbecile, the honour of the thief, the kindness of the murderer, and the purity of the prostitute, and all this without any lapse into dissertation or resort to verbal dialectic. Dostoevsky was an artist, not a mere preacher—I say "mere" because though every work of art has its message, every message is not a work of art. The bitter lot that made Dostoevsky companion of the condemned saved him, as, of course, did his own Russian, inwestern character, from the moral and artistic blunder of believing that humanity can be sorted into two classes of good and bad. We are not so simple as that. Our souls as well as our bodies are fearfully, wonderfully made.

"We are creatures of splendour and flame,
Of shuddering also and tears,
Magnificent out of the dust we came,
And abject from the spheres."

It is not surprising that this novelist of pity was also a revolutionist, a spiritual revolutionist, believing, as all true revolutionists do, that external changes are meaningless and useless without a change of heart as well. Some day we shall recognize that a practical belief in justification by faith rather than by works is the way of social salvation, though such a belief will not at any time absolve us from efforts of reconstruction and amelioration. Here is Dostoevsky's own confession of faith.

"I never could understand the reason why one-tenth part of our people should be cultured, and the other nine-tenths must serve as the material support of the minority and themselves remain in ignorance. I do not want to think or to live with any other belief than that our ninety millions of people (and those who shall be born after us) will all be some day cultured, humanised and happy."

And in particular, it may be added, he opposed that inevitable ally of ignorance, the Censorship. It is plain, then, that Dostoevsky was one of those culpable persons who will not let men rest in their pleasant circumstances of poverty and misery. He preached discontent. He was, in short, an agitator, and so (as really respectable people have recently been telling us) he deserved to be imprisoned or shot. The Russian Government, always the practical exponent of ideas that the very respectable classes here are content to express more feebly in words (though we are beginning to show signs of Russian firmness just now), evidently thought that Dostoevsky deserved to be both imprisoned and shot, for, having kept him in close confinement for eight months, it sentenced him, and nineteen other malefactors who had also preached discontent with the blessed and unimprovable present, to immediate execution.

"Under strong escort I was led out into the yard, where nineteen of my companions were waiting. It was seven o'clock in the morning. We were put into carriages four in each, accompanied by a soldier. 'Where are we going?' we asked. 'I must not tell you,' the soldier replied. And as the carriage windows were covered with ice we could see nothing outside. At last we reached Semyonovskiy Square. In the middle of it a scaffold was raised up to which we were led and ranged in two lines. . . . A sheriff appeared on the scaffold and read out our sentence of death; it was to be executed immediately. Twenty times the fatal words were repeated. 'Sentenced to be shot!' and so indelibly were the words graven into my memory that for years afterwards I would wake in the middle of the night fancying I heard them. . . . At this moment the sun broke through the clouds, and I thought, 'It is impossible; they can't mean to kill us!' and I whispered these words to my nearest companions; but instead of answering, he only pointed to a line of coffins that stood near the scaffold, covered with a large cloth. . . . All hope vanished in an instant, and I expected to be shot in a few minutes; . . . Petrachevski and two others were already tied to the poles and had their heads covered with a kind of bag, and the soldiers stood ready to fire. I thought I might have five minutes to live, and awful those moments were. I kept staring at a church with a gilt dome, which reflected the sunbeams, and I suddenly felt as if these beams came from the region where I was myself to be in a few moments."

Their sentence, however, was changed at the eleventh hour to penal servitude. They had waited half clad for twenty minutes of a Russian winter morning. One went mad with terror, one got inflammation of the lungs and died of consumption, others had ears and feet frostbitten.

On Christmas Day, 1849, Fedor Mikhailovitch Dostoevsky, man of genius, aged twenty-eight, guilty of having loved his fellow-men, began his journey to Siberia. What a world!

GEORGE SAMPSON.

* "A Great Russian Realist." By J. A. T. Lloyd. 10s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul & Co.).

A NEW LIFE OF ST. FRANCIS.*

The Bourbons, according to Balzac, were the true preservers of Christianity in France; they never betrayed, said their enthusiastic admirer, the trust which confided Christianity to them. Christianity in France and in Italy has had some strange defenders, royal and ecclesiastical, but no one would deny that Francis of Assisi deserved the certificate which the Bourbons received from the misguided novelist of last century. Francis preserved Christianity when it was endangered within his own church, and preserved it by re-kindling the apostolic spirit of devotion to Christ. This is the perennial interest of the man, even for those whose devotion takes other forms. There are epochs when Christianity is preserved by being re-interpreted, in terms of practical life as well as of dogma. Such interpretations require a strong personality, and Francis, by his sheer genius for Christianity, initiated a movement which worked far beyond the limits of the Franciscan order.

Franciscan literature of late has assumed unwieldy proportions. The higher criticism of the sources alone is almost as bewildering as that of the gospels. In opening a new biography, the reader's first interest is to place the writer, to find out where he stands between Tammassio and Hampe on the one side, and Gotz and Thode on the other. Jørgensen is with the latter. In a succinct appendix he gives reasons for preferring the conservative view of the sources. On one point he offers a conjecture, viz., that the bisection of the 'Three Brothers' Legend reflects an original division. "If the first part reminds us of a regularly arranged legend, the second part supplies precisely the flowers, the flores which the Brothers promised to pluck from the fields of their memory. It is likely that the second part of the 'Three Brothers' Legend originally, or in very early manuscripts, bore the title we know in some Franciscan manuscripts, now injured by fire: Flores beati Francis et sociorum ejus." There is something to be said for this hypothesis; Muzio's copy has no such division, it is true, but that manuscript possibly obliterated this feature of the original.

Although one may disagree with Jørgensen's critical results, however, his candour and accuracy inspire a measure of confidence. The biography of the saint is written from a definitely Roman Catholic point of view, but it is on the lines of historical research, and, while the translation limps here and there, it reads well. Sabatier's account of the saint differs from Jørgensen's materially. Still, the spell of Francis is upon all his biographers and critics, and there was room in English for this sympathetic, penetrating study from Denmark. It has been plainly a work of long research, but the balance of the narrative, and the easy mastery of the materials, prove that it has come from the pen of a writer who has striven to do more than print the contents of his note-books. For those who wish to read their Francis in the light of recent research, and who are unable to consult many authorities, this volume may be recommended as an excellent guide to the present position of the higher criticism upon the subject. It is not final. But it is far-minded, and interesting without being viewy. The third book, especially, with its treatment of the foreign missions, and the differences inside the Order, shows the Danish scholar at his best. The chapter on the Portuncula Indulgence is a proof that the writer is sensible of the responsibilities which attach to an historical scholar who aims at being more than a mere eulogist.

J. M.

* "Saint Francis of Assisi." A Biography. By Johannes Jørgensen. Translated from the Danish with the author's sanction by T. O'Connor Sloane, Ph.D. 12s. 6d. net. (Longmans, Green & Co.).

VERSE OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.¹

The collected edition of Fiona Macleod's works is to be followed by a series of selections from the writings of William Sharp. The first volume contains poetry, most of which was written before he had commenced his curious double career. Apart from their intrinsic merit, these verses are interesting in showing how deliberate an assumption was Sharp's second and feminine self. He appears to have had the power of taking up personalities at will, and Mrs. Sharp refers in her introduction to The Pagan Review, "the first and only number of a projected monthly review edited by 'W. H. Brooks'—of which William Sharp wrote every word from cover to cover, under the pseudonyms of the Editor and the seven contributors." Such a feat shows extreme versatility, but it also seems to argue some lack of individuality in the man who was capable of it. This argument is supported by the poems.

¹ "Poems." By William Sharp. Selected and arranged by Mrs. William Sharp. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

Sharp wrote in the Preraphaelite tradition, which had developed the externalities of poetry at the expense of its spirit. Rossetti and Morris, however, had vivid personalities which informed their work and shone through their incrustations of jewelled archaism. Swinburne, though far less individual, had a wealth of verbal music at command, which stifled criticism on any but irrelevant grounds. In lesser men, however, the radical defects of the school became apparent. Sharp was probably one of the most accomplished of the disciples of the Preraphaelites. This volume is full of admirable verse, delicate melodies and chosen diction. If poetry is to be descriptive and pictorial, this is very good poetry indeed.

But both instinct and experience tell us that poetry should be something else; that to write verse for the sake of writing verse, as Sharp did, is not enough. Poetry must be felt. It must be personal and passionate. It must be real.

Awakening to this fact killed Preraphaelitism, just as in France it killed the tradition of the Parnasse. Poets began to search for reality, either within themselves, like Mr. Yeats; or without, like Henley and Davidson; or both, like Mr. Arthur Symonds. Consequently, in the last decade of the last century, we had a mass of poetry, which, when time has sorted it out, will probably show more bravely in comparison with the Victorian giants than grudging contemporaries have admitted. There was much that was ephemeral in that poetry of yesterday much written merely épater le bourgeois, but it had a fine relish for life.

We do not wish épater le bourgeois nowadays. A new element has got into poetry, which has no business there—conscience. Poetry should be a symptom of an excess of life, and when vitality is high conscience is never much in evidence. Nevertheless, it was bound to come. It had got into fiction and into the theatre. Poetry could scarcely remain immune. When one begins to look into realities, one is sure to see ugly things. The strong artist, generous in his strength, pities. The weak artist gives up reality in disgust and solaces himself in poetic conventions. The conscientious artist, the typical product of to-day, is worried. The most striking examples of the poetry of worry are the two powerful poems recently contributed to the English Review by Mr. John Maschfield.

Another poet of this order is Mr. Wilfred Wilson Gibson. He has written much romantic verse,

"Till, dazzled by the drowsy glare,
I shut my eyes to heat and light;
And saw, in sudden night,
Crouched in the dripping dark,
With steaming shoulders stark
The man who hews the coal to feed my fire."

From this vision Mr. Gibson has striven to fashion a new poetry, a poetry dealing objectively, in absolute simplicity and without sentimentality, with the lives of the humble. One series of slender volumes, "Daily Bread," is already complete. Another commences.² As an experiment—in how far poetry can retain its conventions and yet be perfectly realistic—these stories, and the little play written for the Pilgrim Players,³ are interesting. Nor is the experiment by any means unsuccessful. Mr. Gibson's sincerity and purpose are of the highest. It is not his fault that he lives in a sick age.

² "Fires." Book I. By Wilfred Wilson Gibson. 1s. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

³ "Womenkind." By Wilfred Wilson Gibson. 6d. net. (Nutt.)

Conscience, again, has inspired Mr. Eden Phillpotts's dramatic monologue, "The Iscariot,"⁴ It is characteristic of the time that a distinguished novelist should take the classic example of conscience as the theme of his first serious effort in verse. Mr. Phillpotts's conception of Judas is interesting, though his delineation of the character is, like Mr. Brangwyn's frontispiece, a little blurred. His blank verse is well-knit, reminding one of John Davidson's, and the poem has some striking passages. Yet it gives one the impression of having been written to fulfil a duty rather than a desire.

That is not the case with Miss Ethel Talbot.⁵ Here, at least, is the real thing. Her poetry is not great, and it is full of echoes. But it is felt, personal. Like most of the best of the moderns, she has felt the spell of London's moods. She has even boldly challenged comparison with Henley by writing of the city in vers libre. Her themes are modern -- she has the Tube, for instance, which is more than Henley had -- but she rings the changes on the few old emotions which, after all, are the soul of all enduring lyric. The best thing in the book, perhaps, is "From the Egyptian Room."

"A thousand years we feasted with the dead,
Night after night we saw the watch-fires lit
To cleave the dark with yellow flame and red --
And never a man of men had word of it

"Man rises from us out silence and our sleep,
Man mocks our evil and our good denies
We, in the sombre treasure house they keep,
Gaze on tithity with amber eyes

"The little busy people that live now,
Their white arms have no strength, they are not wise,
But the old hate is graven on their brow,
And the old passion riots in their eyes

"The eternal dream lives in their hearts again,
They cherish yet the old elusive bliss,
Through the sad streets, under the London ram,
As once we dreamed in Heliopolis "

Over and over again, as here, an old thought justifies its re-statement. "London Windows" is a book which one is more likely to take up again than "Fires" or "The Iscariot" or Sharp's Poems.

Mr. Brett-Smith's "Poems of the North"⁶ are more scholarly and less buoyant than Miss Talbot's. Perhaps, they show greater possibilities of future development. Anyway, there are things in the book which it is worth while to read.

If England is to cease producing great poetry (which is very far from certain), she will presumably hand on the torch to her daughters. But if the colonies have received it, they have not so far succeeded in kindling it into a clear flame. "A Century of New Zealand's Praise"⁷ is probably typical of the verse which will come from overseas for some time yet. But though these sonnets are not transcendent poetry, they are good of their kind. They tell of the history, the country, the nature and sport, the industries and worthies of New Zealand, in verse which is often pleasing. And they have the good emotion of patriotism. They may be crude, but that is a fault of a youth, and a far more hopeful sign than if they were to show qualities imported from more elderly literatures.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

VILLAGE LIFE.*

Mr. Bourne has a wonderful faculty for penetrating behind the veil which conceals the lives of the poor. Partly no doubt it is an intense sympathy which makes him realise their circumstances and know much more about

* "The Iscariot." By Eden Phillpotts. 3s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

* "London Windows." By Ethel Talbot. 2s. 6d. net. (Stephen Swift.)

* "Poems of the North." By H. F. Brett Brett-Smith. 2s. 6d. net. (Blackwell & Fisher Unwin.)

* "A Century of New Zealand's Praise." By Arnold Wall. (Simpson & Williams, Christchurch, N.Z.).

* "Change in the Village." By George Bourne. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

them than they know themselves, but he evidently possesses also an extraordinarily keen faculty for analysis and deduction, which makes every event pregnant with meaning for him.

So it comes about that he has given us a document here of vital importance, one which no historian can afford to neglect. He has in fact written the history of the English Countryside for the last twenty years. For though his village is peculiar and not a typical village, though it begins by being a very irregular congregation of crofters and ends by being a mere fringe on the outskirts of a fashionable suburb, a fate, we are thankful to say, that befalls but few of our village communities, still the changes he notes are repeated throughout the country in a minor degree, differing only in quantity not in quality.

It is not a pleasant picture he draws. The old days are gone when the villager lived a semi-independent life, hay-making, thatching, harvesting, turf cutting, hop-picking and what not, with the village common always to fall back upon for the support of his pig, cow or geese. Then his day's work was his day's pleasure. It was full of variety. It was work for his fellows, for himself, or for a farmer scarcely distinguishable from his own class. It was work bound up into the life and prosperity of the village. He took an interest and pride in it. Now all that is changed. The common is enclosed. Instead of doing a multiplicity of odd jobs connected with the land, and carried on amid the old familiar sights and sounds of nature, he works in the garden of the villa resident, an inhabitant of a totally different sphere, or he drives a coal cart. So too with the women. They baked their loaves, cured their bacon, cut their own turf, all duties related to their husbands' work and harmonising with the general industry of their people. Now, like their husbands, they are wage earners in Egypt, toiling in the stranger's house. Instead of the old happy-go-lucky existence, free generally from care, full generally of good feeling and co-operation, has come for both husband and wife the life of intermittent wage-earning, of deadly competition with other men and women for jobs. The friendly farmer has given place to the distant and disdainful villa resident.

The very law seems harder and harsher. Everything is enclosed. The old paths are trodden with fear. The very pig is ostracised. One by one cottages are demolished to make room for villas. The old rich contentment has disappeared. Some compensations are provided by the increasing hold of the church, the larger outlook given by the newspaper, the interest of politics. But we feel with Mr. Bourne that there has passed, not exactly a glory, but a pleasant healthy state of existence from the earth. He stirs our sympathies to their depths.

HERE AND HEREAFTER *

Whatever subject Mr. Edward Carpenter discusses, he is bound to say something fairly startling and unexpected. For he turns the light of an original and yet extremely receptive mind on the matter, and in this illumination the oldest and commonest happenings to mankind, "the old sweet uses of existence," are seen to be as interesting in the twentieth century as they were ten thousand years ago. This "Drama of Love and Death" is complementary to the author's "Art of Creation," and "Love's Coming of Age," and while it is characteristically and joyously frank and outspoken on these sacred and universal mysteries, and contains many a fine thought and beautiful suggestion, it is, let us say it at once and in all honesty, by no means Edward Carpenter at his best. We miss the force and humour that prevailed in "England's Ideal" and "Civilisation its Cause and Cure," and the genius that inspired that really great book of poems "Towards Democracy" has not, one would say, been invoked for the present volume. Over and over in this "Study of Human Evolution and Transfiguration" we are called upon to consider what Professors Geddes and Thomson have said, and to listen to the words of Dr. Oscar Hertwig, Dr. Havelock Ellis, and other notable persons. The frequent reference to the opinions and conclusions of scientific writers in footnotes, and in the text, is apt to be tiresome in a work by no means exclusively scientific. The bringing in of Ovid, and the allusion to him as "a gay dog," jar the reader (as well drag in Paul de Koch). "The love affairs of the Protozoa" doubtless have their place in the Drama of Love, and Mr. Carpenter indeed compels an interest in these remote proceedings, but when it comes to Mr. W. T. Stead's "psychic phenomena" and "Katie King" and her numerous manifestations, and the whole bag of tricks of Mr. Sludge, the medium, the Drama of Death becomes, to us, the merest penny gaff, a melodrama infinitely less entertaining than the performances of Mr. Maskelyne, and inextricably mixed up with fraud, and the perversion of high spiritual gifts to avarice and animal cunning. This acceptance by Mr. Edward Carpenter of the doctrines of Spiritism may account for the amiable but quite unjust, scorn of Christianity displayed in this book. Accepting the "miracles" of the spiritist seance, he ignores the fact that the Christian Church from the beginning has always believed in the resurrection of the dead, and that Roman Catholics in all ages have accepted and enjoyed "miracles" far more wonderful and stupendous than any of the performances of American Spiritualist mediums. As for the "Art of Dying"—it has been the art of arts to countless Christians, and a whole Christian literature exists on the subject. Mr. Carpenter condemns "sky-pilots" for "mumbling over ancient creeds," and yet cheerfully refers us to the Upanishads which are not exactly modern. Why, revolting against the materialist conclusions of nineteenth-century science, and turning to a life of resurrection, is it necessary to belittle and misrepresent the Christian beliefs that have endured since that first Easter at Jerusalem? If we have not done justice to the many passages that must charm all readers of this "Drama of Love and Death," the author has no one but himself to blame. He provokes the hostility even of those who, like the present writer, have known and admired the work of the author of "Towards Democracy" for the past twenty-five years, and have not suddenly woke up to the knowledge that Edward Carpenter is one of the few men of real literary genius alive in England to-day.

* "The Drama of Love and Death: A Study of Human Evolution and Transfiguration." By Edward Carpenter. 5s. net. (George Allen.)

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

LOVE IN LONDON.*

The one regard in which this novel surpasses any other that Mr. Oliver Onions has written is in the elaborate cunning of its plot. Mr. Onions always writes with distinction; his style, if at times a little too deliberate, too restrained to give adequate play to the passion it carries, has its own charm; and he has the ripe, tolerant knowledge of humanity and the skill in presenting character without which no novelist can tell a story that will count as literature. All these qualities go to the building up of "In Accordance with the Evidence" and in addition there is the carefully planned, closely woven, subtly developed narrative of how Jeffries, the big, ungainly, plodding city clerk for whom women possessed no attraction grew to love one girl, Evie Soames, with a terrible, secret passion in which every thought of self and all consideration for any happiness but hers is utterly consumed. He can pretend to make love to the pathetically plain and unloved Kitty Windus, never meaning to marry her or caring, except momentarily, how deeply he must hurt and humiliate her at last, his one consideration being that in affecting an engagement with her he is able to be more constantly near to Evie, better able to have news of her and watch over her. When he finds that Evie loves his shallow, dissipated, conceited, handsome junior, Archie Merridew, after a great inward struggle, he can force himself to stand aside and surrender her till, being Archie's close friend and so much in his confidence as to hear of all his amorous adventures, he learns of one horrible reason why Archie should never marry and resolves that, at all events, for her own sake, he shall not marry Evie.

* "In Accordance with the Evidence." By Oliver Onions, es. (Martin Secker.)

So fixed is he in this resolve that when he has appealed to Archie and warned him and his warnings have been laughed to scorn, he calmly and dispassionately makes up his mind that he will put an end to Archie's life, but he will do it in such a fashion that he himself shall not have to suffer for performing what he sees to be an act of entirely righteous sacrifice. Then you see how from the beginning of the story circumstances have played into his hand so as to make this grim end possible. That may be a weakness in the plot—that clever over-elaboration, but it undeniably and ingeniously paves the way to a tragically impressive and powerful close. Not a pleasant story, perhaps, in certain of its aspects, but a story that grips you by its imaginative force and sincerity. The minute, intimate study of Jeffries' character is masterly; the whole inner and narrow, squalid outer life of the man are laid bare to you; in the miserable loneliness and sordidness of his cheap lodgings, in the dull, mechanical, oppressed, underpaid circumstances of his everyday office life, in the rare moments when his soul awakens, when his finer emotions are touched and the drugging commercial machine becomes a sentient, dreadfully human creature—in all his few changing moods and conditions he appeals curiously to your sympathies, so that neither his crime, nor his evasion of justice, nor his after immunity from any fret of remorse, nor even his winning at length the crowning happiness he had seemed to have lost beyond hope, shocks your sense of what is fit and right or leaves you otherwise than satisfied. That is Mr. Oliver Onions' greatest triumph. You may easily find pleasanter books among the new novels, but you will not easily find a more arresting or a more brilliantly written one than this.

A.

THE PLAYWRIGHT.*

The most perplexing element about this book is the almost distressingly calm way in which Mr. Archer turns aside to the Drama that intends greatly and the Drama that intends no more than a ready commercial success. There are degrees of difference in the latter as in the former, but to confuse the two planes of being is surely to perpetuate one of the most fruitful causes of artistic misunderstanding during the latter half of the past century. It is from this generation that Mr. Archer comes; and he may likely enough be a little amused at a new race that is perhaps impatient of control, or unduly anxious to re-try the oracles. There are few plays he has not seen during his lengthy experience, and there are not many of them that are not made to serve some lesson in these pages. Perhaps it is owing to this that one may say of him that "his Minerva is born in panoply," and perhaps the fact is derived, as "Saint Charles" unkindly suggested, from a national instinct.

Some of us have wildly believed, and even still continue wildly to believe, that Drama has an artistic revival before it that shall be born of, and continue in, adventure, maybe even rank heresy. We have even thought the aim will be very great, and the adventure correspondingly heretical. It is to such that Mr. Archer comes, replete in knowledge of all past dramatic attainments; and it is part of the nature of the case that his edicts are chiefly prohibitions. To take an example (and, as Mr. Archer will at once admit, a not unadventurous example), he is, save for one or two possible exceptions that he admits, ruthless in ruling out the possibility of soliloquies. I have in one or two places endeavoured to show that a man speaking aloud to himself when overwrought with pain or joy, is no very rare event in real life, and that an audience is willing to attest that fact when given on the stage if only it be aptly given. I have even tried to say that the chief difficulty of its presentation is a matter of stage management; that, for example, the over-refinement of a modern drawing-room and a lack of depth in the stage picture, are insuperable barriers, one suggesting a highly artificial manner of life and the other frustrating that deep entry and walk across the stage, that provide so easy an opportunity for soliloquy. Apart from this, however, is it not possible to say that Drama cannot again be great until it be very heavily charged, and even overwrought with emotional strength? And is it not then that men break into passionate soliloquy? If that be so, then, it it be or be not used, the possibility of soliloquy becomes the fact of greatness in Drama. The Aside, as Mr. Archer himself is careful to point out, is a different matter. There the prohibition maintains, because it violates probability.

* "Play-Making: A Manual of Craftsmanship." By William Archer. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

Another of his prohibitions is the use of verse in Drama except when it be Lyric Drama. It is difficult altogether to understand him (which is a very rare thing to have to say of Mr. Archer), for a play cannot be all lyric. There are bound to be non-lyric movements, and yet he deprecates, in another unhappy prohibition, the alternation of prose and verse! It is all a question of the prose or verse that is used, one may say, but it is a very considerable fact to have kept alive any faith at all in the possibility of poetic drama, after having traversed the wilderness of very prose drama that he has trodden.

I have taken these two examples, because they have seemed to me typical of Mr. Archer's attitude. He is careful to say twice or thrice over in the course of his book that new workmen in Drama bring their new modes and laws. But these sentences stand out as precautionary asides. On the whole the temper of his attitude seems to be against adventure, and the breaking of new boundaries. Very completely and adequately he sums up the past, and stands facing the future entrenched in its achievement. There can be no objection to that if he would take all the past, and not only the unhappy latter end of the nineteenth century, with its moment of momentum in the early days of the twentieth. Surely so clear a mind as his does not mean to infer that the nineteenth century is better than the fifteenth or sixteenth just because nineteen is later in the order of numerals than fifteen or sixteen!

In this summing-up the amount of ground that he covers is wonderful. From the beginning of a play to its end he fills movement by movement with precept and illustration, so that it is impossible to read the book without becoming aware of all the difficulties that face the dramatic craftsman and the various answers to them that have been made. And all Mr. Archer's clear thinking is employed in this task. When first I looked through the book, my inclination was at once to read the chapter entitled "Character and Psychology," for that clearly is the centre of all things in Drama. I resisted the temptation, and read steadily through, taking it in its course. Yet the instinct was right, for not only is the subject the centre of all things, but Mr. Archer's treatment of it raises it easily to the most important chapter in the book.

He sets himself at the outset to answer the "frequent critical complaint that in such-and-such a character there is 'no development.' That it remains the same throughout a play; or (so the reproach is sometimes worded) that it is not a character but an invariable attitude." How important this is needs no saying. It was seen, for example, in the recent presentation at The Little Theatre of Tchekof's "Seagull." There three characters were sucked up into the action, formed part of it, indeed, and so could not maintain "an invariable attitude"—to accept for a moment the words whose meaning Mr. Archer examines. These were Treplef, Nina and Trijorin; and they all failed to convince. There were three who had no part in the action; from whom, therefore, no development was expected. These were Sorin, Shamrayef and Dorn—if not indeed, Masha also; and these were clearly recognisable from start to end. The very fact that when Tchekof had to call up a character into some function in the action he lost him or her, is a considerable confession of failure on his part; but wherein does the failure consist? It is in his answer to this, and the other questions lying round and about it that Mr. Archer makes a real and permanent contribution to clear thinking. There is not the space at my disposal either to give it or the gist of it (if, indeed, the treatment did not demand a quite separate attention); but it is certain that it should not only prove explicit but provide moreover a considerable incentive to exploration into the half lit ramifying passages in the subliminal vaults of Being.

DARRELL FIGGIS

ABOUT SHAKESPEARE *

If so brilliant and magnificent a function as last year's Shakespeare Ball was to leave us any souvenir at all, it was bound to be such a souvenir as, for amplitude and artistic beauty, had rarely or never been devised before; and this handsome volume, clothed in vellum and gold and finished with dainty ribbon fastenings, edited by Mrs. Cornwallis West, enriched with colour plates, drawings, photogravures, and with literary contributions from some of our most famous living authors, is the very model of

* "The Shakespeare Memorial Souvenir of the Shakespeare Ball." Edited by Mrs. George Cornwallis West. 5 guineas net. (F. Warne & Co.)

Miss Eleanor Balfour as Mistress Jane Willoughby.

(Reproduced upon a reduced scale from "The Shakespeare Memorial Souvenir of the Shakespeare Ball," by permission of Messrs. F. Warne & Co., Ltd.)

what such a souvenir should be, and in every way worthy of the memorable occasion that it commemorates.

There is a delightfully flippant, farcical article by Mr. Bernard Shaw, in which the bust of Shakespeare discusses Othello, Iago, Lady Macbeth and other of his characters with a glorious impertinence, throwing in a shrewd and illuminating criticism or suggestion here and there by the way. Mr. Chesterton writes on the Shakespeare Ball, as one who was not there, in his gayest, most fantastic humour; and other entertaining essays on some aspect of the same function are supplied by Mr. Lewis Hind, Mr. Comyns Carr, Mr. Hamilton Fyfe; there is a charming essay on "Masques and Routes" by Mr. Anthony Hope, and an admirable discussion of the Shakespeare Tercentenary by the Earl Lytton. In addition to the fifty coloured plates, drawings, and photogravures of beautiful society ladies dressed in Shakespearean parts, there are over fifty sketches and photographs of the principal characters in the Quadrilles, a complete list of guests at the Ball, a programme of the Procession and Quadrilles making the whole publication absolutely complete. One can only congratulate Lady Cornwallis West and her publishers on the care and thoroughness with which they have arranged and produced this splendid and unique memento of a unique occasion.

Novel Notes.

FELIX CHRISTIE. By Peggy Webling. 6s. (Methuen.)

The opening scene of "Felix Christie," Miss Peggy Webling's new romance, gives us a refreshing humorous sketch of a "harvest-home" in Ontario, at which Professor Wiggins and Felix constituted the orchestra. Presently Felix is drawn to London to seek his fortune as a violinist, and his career henceforth yields a closely woven and deeply interesting story of failure and success and disillusionment and love. A weakness in his arm frustrates his first ambition, but Felix, nothing daunted, turns to literature, and compels success. The bare plot is simple, and its recital would do injustice to the book, the merits of which consist in its quietly humorous and subtle characterisation. The infatuation is admirably portrayed in Felix's relations with Miss Pearl Henning, who plits him in favour of Gambol, the hairdresser. Our quarrel with the plot would be the too infrequent appearances of Ettie Boscombe, whose picture adorns the cover, and to whom the hero is eagerly returning on the last page of the story. Her charms are made matter of inference rather than of description; and we surmise that Miss Webling has been very naturally tempted to give larger portraits of her humorous types, at which she is so good that we found ourselves wishing that her book had been unmixed comedy. In other words, that is to say, when clean mirth is such a rare element in our fiction we should have been glad of a whole novel written on the high comic level of Miss Webling's description of how Mrs. Christie restored the appetite of Mrs. Boscombe.

A DAUGHTER OF THE RICH. By Mary E. Waller. 6s. (Melrose.)

Whoever has enjoyed to its full the fascinating spell of "The Wood Carver of 'Ilympus'" must confess to a reluctant feeling of disappointment with the author's new novel "A Daughter of the Rich." True, here and there in its pages, we savour the same mountain freshness which made the earlier novel such appetising fare, and the same kindly spirit, the same simple faith and cheery good-natured philosophy lend warmth and colour to the story. But the action, or rather the inaction, of the novel fails to sustain interest, the tale gathers no momentum; it is a patchwork of clever character studies sewn together in a somewhat obvious manner. However, every lover of typical New England folk will be grateful for the delightful pictures Miss Waller gives of "The Lost Nation"—the local nickname for the four families who dwell on Mount Hunger.

It is with the daily life, the pranks and precocities, the loves and heartburnings, of one of these families, the Blossoms, that the story is mainly concerned. The Blossom children, March and Rose, and the twins, Budd and Cherry, are as breezy and wholesome a bunch as any parent could desire, and with the help of Chi, their hired man, they provide a carnival of fun. Into the bosom of this boisterous household there comes by the doctor's orders "a daughter of the rich," Hazel Clyde, a child of thirteen, the sickly product of an artificial, hot-house, feather-bed existence. The transformation is complete; we see Hazel blossom into a radiant specimen of girlhood, and we are thoroughly at one with dear old Chi when he mutters to himself: "George Washin'ton! How she manages to creep into the softest corner of a man's heart, I don't know. I expect it's those great eyes of hers, 'n' that voice just like a brook winnerin' 'n' gurglin' over its stones in August. . . ."

THE BRIDE OF LOVE. By Kate Horn. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

Mrs. Horn writes with fluency and with great good spirits. Her new story, however, is so slight that it does not equal in interest those earlier novels by which she became popular. That Stair Mortimer, Lord Overdene, should be jilted on his wedding-day, and that his runaway bride's marriage with a chauffeur should be followed instantly by the tragic death of her husband, is an interesting situation; but it only serves to set Stair Mortimer free for the one great love of his lifetime—his love for Psyche Lemaire, a beautiful but rather silly girl. The plot to deprive Stair of his title is so half-hearted that it is not convincing; and the book's chief interest lies in the character of Miss Juliana, who very frankly admits that she is supposed to be like David Copperfield's aunt. This is undoubtedly the case, but, although she swears prodigiously, Miss Juliana is as gruff and tender-hearted as any maiden-lady with sorrowful memories of love should be expected to be. Readers who agree with us in thinking Miss Juliana the most interesting character in "The Bride of Love" will be gratified at leaving her a prospective Vicountesse.

LORD OF IRONGRAY. By B. Harris-Burland. 6s. (Greening.)

A vendetta in an English nobleman's house is the exciting subject of Mr. Harris-Burland's new story, which will presently be described by many pens as a "thrilling romance." Matrimony was the means of rousing the latent energies and ambitions of Jack Orlebar; but over his new happiness rested the cloud of his past vagabondage in Polynesia. By a fine series of coincidences the secret of his earlier marriage became known to the vicar's daughter who had hoped to marry him, and also, before long, to a gang of blackmailers. A Polynesian exhibition in London, dramatically brought Orlebar face to face with his half-caste son, Rikaro; and Orlebar, daring everything to conceal his secret from his wife, connived at the attempted death of the boy. By a nice piece of dramatic irony his sordid intrigue to save the family honour from the disgrace of a half-caste heir, was little to the purpose, for his indiscretions had been exactly anticipated by his uncle, the real heir, whose death at sea had been wrongly presumed. Mr. Harris-Burland's plot, however, defies compression; moonlight murders, tragedies in a disused pit, impersonations, buccaneering, detective subtlety—these are some of the ingredients which the author dispenses with a lavish hand, and blends into a rattling good story. There is a love-story in the book, too, and the final solution is brought about by a supreme self-sacrifice.

FOR THE QUEEN. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (Ward, Lock.)

"There are only four letters and a ring. But with them goes—the honour of a queen." The theme is no younger than Edgar Allan Poe, but Mr. Oppenheim "cuts" the philosophy, dispenses with commentary, and concentrates his skill on the multiplication of the difficulties with which the reader is confronted. The issue involves a tragedy and the flight of a beautiful agent of police, the active agent in the tragedy, to a convent at Highgate—which seems rather hard on the convent. So much for the tale that gives its title to the book. And when so much that passes for fiction is but mere special pleading or pamphleteering, the reader who wants to be amused during an idle hour must be grateful to Mr. Oppenheim for this as for many another "opiate for ennui." "For the Queen" is clever, but hardly the best of the fifteen short stories of which it forms one. "The Ambassador's Dilemma" deals ingeniously with a purloined despatch. "In an Oxfordshire Lane" tells how a runaway match followed by parental hatred is at length blessed with happiness and content, and introduces us to a strolling player, Dick Andrews, of whom one would not be sorry to hear again. In "Lenore" a chivalrous young Guardsman comes to the aid of beauty in distress, and discovers in a pretty music teacher his lost cousin. These are well above the normal level of such literary fare. "A Sprig of Heather" is another excellent story, with at least one good sentiment in it: "To be past the age of dreams is to stand upon the threshold of death—the death of mediocre content, or mortally wounded sensibility." Altogether a capital example of Mr. Oppenheim in his lighter mood.

A FAERY-LAND FORLORN. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

This pathetic little story differs markedly from others which have been told by Mrs. Penrose, yet it is as readable as any of them, and it has a very pleasant Irish setting. Mrs. Penrose does not believe in conventional happy endings, but in "A Faery-Land Forlorn" she seeks to show that sorrow is not without its recompenses, and this endeavour saves the book from being a mere record of unhappiness, although it is true that the aims of the chief characters are paralysed by strange happenings beyond their control. Frenzied by financial ruin, Terence Donovan's father killed the father of Evelyn Eyre, just after the two young people had become engaged. Evelyn, horrified and innocent, clung for sympathy to Terence, never imagining that their love would be less sweet because of the tragedy. Terence, whose father was the criminal, saw that the sense of blood guiltiness would always be between Evelyn and himself, so, very scrupulously, he decided that they must part, thus completing the destruction of their happiness. To fulfil his resolve, Terence went away, and, years later, married another woman. But he returned to Ireland to die, and bequeathed his child to Evelyn as a legacy of love. His wife was surely too complaisant regarding the unconditional disposal of her child; but Mrs. Penrose reconciles us to Mrs. Donovan's unusual indifference, for she makes her properly heartless. And, as Evelyn always wanted a fairy child, she found in this one the only kind of earthly happiness that remained to her, so perhaps Mrs. Penrose means to suggest that happiness, after all, lies only in sacrifice.

EBB AND FLOW. By Mrs. Irwin Smart. 6s. (Routledge.)

"There is a tide within the human soul
Of constant ebb and flow, a force which seems
As wide, as restless, and beyond control
As yonder sea . . ."

Mrs. Irwin Smart quotes three verses of this poem of the tides, and her story illustrates, with decided power, the ebb and flow in a girl's heart and life. Seven chapters at the beginning of the book introduce us to a farm-house in Scotland, a house where death has come and taken the wife and mother, and left the grave devoted husband and the little girl just old enough to grieve and remember. To the old farm, in time, come Aunt Maria and her own children, to "look after" little Nancy Ironside, the motherless child, and then Nancy's more hideous troubles begin. In its quiet, simple, rather old-fashioned style, this portion of the book is perhaps the best. It reveals the hungry heart of the little girl, her passion, and her inner life; it shows her in the midst of uncongenial natures, harshness, meanness, yet with her own secret joys and comforts. The child is flesh and blood, and her silent father, her self-seeking aunt, her harsh brother, and sneaking cousins are, also, living, breathing beings round about her. The book changes and becomes more modern in the later sections, while still keeping very consistently to the early promise of Nancy's character. A great love had come into her life on her return from school—an impossible love, and when worldly, Frenchified "Aunt Polly," Madame Du Pré, whisks her off to London, Nancy is glad to go, and leave behind her the more poignant reminders of her pain. In the new English life the girl is adaptable, but through all the changes we trace her own individuality, and we feel that the wild, all-pervading first-love is not dead, only penned back in her heart. Other lovers come, and other troubles, and in the inexplicable manner which is so absolutely true to life, Nancy marries the wrong man. Ebb and flow, ebb and flow, Mrs. Smart has made a tender, poignant story of Nancy Ironside's life, from babyhood to reconciliation.

SHARROW. By Baroness Von Hutten. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Intentionally or otherwise, the Baroness von Hutten seems to have put her finger on the main reason why the power of our aristocracy is nowadays so evidently ossifying. Our old nobility is too contented to sit down in state and look proudly to its past instead of to its future; as a consequence it is beginning to appear as dowdy and as obsolete as a woman does when she moves among up-to-date fashions wearing a last season's hat and gown. The Sharrows are a very ancient family indeed, and have lived for many generations in an ancient and beautiful house for which they have a quite inordinate pride and affection. Old Lord Sharrow, who never seems to have done anything worth doing, finds himself nearing the end of his days, and having no son of his own, he interests himself in his great-nephews, one of whom is his heir. He is less attracted to this fortunate youth than to the red-headed, ugly young Sandy Sharrow, who so strikingly resembles himself in appearance and in the wildness and almost primitive savagery of his disposition, and who would rightfully succeed him, only that by some mischance Sandy's grandfather's marriage turned out to be illegal. Sandy, too, has what his luckier cousin lacks, a fervent and instinctive love for the storied old house of his ancestors, and it is in accordance with the fitness of things that as a result of his regard for the place and his fondness for searching about in its odd corners, and among its dusty relics, he unconsciously brings to light certain documents that, later, when he is living, disgraced and outcast in Paris, establish the legality of his grandfather's marriage, and, after all, make him, more even to old Lord Sharrow's satisfaction than his own, the true heir to the ancestral title and estates. Meanwhile, he has passed through lurid years of disappointed love and reckless dissipation. He returns home to take up the honours and duties that his aged great-uncle is just laying down. "Love the house," old Sharrow urges him, as he is dying, and Sandy promises that he will. He will not marry, at first because he means to let the younger brother whom he loves succeed him, but his brother dying, he marries his third and truest love, anxious to have an heir to whom he may transmit his greatness, and before the end of the story his hope is fulfilled. He has no other ambition, no desire to do anything that shall justify him in his position as one of the heads of the nation; no conception of any duty beyond loving and maintaining the ancient family residence and begetting a son to occupy it after he has done with it. But this subtle irony is only an undercurrent in a well-contrived story that is full of incident and, though it has its melodramatic moments, is plausibly and brilliantly written. The characterisation throughout is remarkably good.

The Baroness von Hutten.

A LONG SHADOW. By Gwendolen Pryce. 6s. (Cassell.)

The old proverb which gives the title to the book, runs: "A little man may cast a long shadow." It is a happily chosen title for a novel that deals with a tragedy of temperament. "There was weakness in all the lines and proportions of his (Percy Brandon's) face, but most of all in his mouth and chin, and, as if he knew it, he frequently held the lower part of his face between his thumb and forefinger, so that these features were hidden behind his hand." In a paroxysm of rage Brandon, a London clerk on a cycling holiday in Wales, rode over a child. Left a fortune, he was drawn back to the spot by a strange magnetism, and found that his little victim had lived, a hopeless cripple. It was his fate to fall in love with her benefactress, and his Nemesis was to come in his inability to confess to his betrothed his identity with the man whom she denounced as a ruffian and murderer. The improbability of the story is in his remaining in the place when he knew that his secret had been discovered by an enemy willing to blackmail him. The way of escape for poor Brandon, whose faults were only negative, was hard. Miss Pryce provides an ingenious, if somewhat cynical solution, in an act of suicide that is capable of being construed as heroism. Thus it came about that Anabella Powell, in a passion of regret for some passing mistrust of her supposed hero, erected a monument to his memory, "to front the sea and the sun with the lie upon its face." The lie ran: "Sacred to the memory of Percy Brown Brandon, who died to save a child's life, on the 24th of July, 189-. Aged 38. 'He that loseth his life shall find it.'" A powerful novel on a drab theme.

INNOCENCE IN THE WILDERNESS. By Theodosia Lloyd. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)

Miss Lloyd begins her story where Trollope did his best work, in an English cathedral town, but she shifts her two main characters to London, where one becomes a journalist, and the other works with the lady who jilts the said journalist. Howard Brook and Eve Latham eventually mate. Innocence is not left entirely forlorn in the wilderness of metropolitan life. But the interest of the story is not in their relations so much as in the contrast of types. Miss Lloyd's work is evidently prentice-work. She leaves several characters half-sketched, and fails to make the most of the difficult situation between Howard and his prim, clerical home. At the same time, the clash of temperaments is drawn with some penetration. The youthful affectations of the University man, the provincial atmosphere of the clerical set, the bourgeois suburban ways of Eve's cousins, and the journalistic manners of Brook and his set, are played off against one another with good effect. Miss Lloyd has some power of description, and she knows one or two types of women. Her novel suffers, however, from over-crowding, and the good scenes do not make up a satisfactory plot. There is promise in this book. It repays reading, and the authoress will do stronger work yet.

A DERELICT EMPIRE. By Mark Time. 6s. (William Blackwood & Sons.)

The author dedicates this "fantasy," as he calls it, to the British Elector, in the hope that ten years hence the assumptions from which it starts may still be wholly imaginary. Having thus said "Heaven forbid!" he proceeds to give us a picture of England under a Socialist and Syndicalist government with Mr. Swinton Mountchapel as premier. Among other enormities, the House of Lords has been abolished; Home Rule granted to Ireland; the suffrage extended to all adults of both sexes; and old age pensions granted to all applicants over fifty years of age. Moreover—and this is the starting point of the story—this revolutionary government has decided to evacuate India and entirely emancipate this great dependency from British control. In the opinion of the officers of the Siwana Horse, an Indian cavalry regiment, the result of this fateful decision will be wide-spread anarchy and the possible appearance on the scene of the Germans, the Russians, or the Japanese, not to mention complications with the Amir and the Nizam. "I imagine," says Captain Wardlaw, "that a great deal will depend on whether India can produce a man capable of mastering the situation. If such a man should come to the front and succeed in making himself obeyed by the army, he might found a new empire." And the story describes how Captain Wardlaw himself steps into the breach and performs this stupendous task; and so well does he acquit himself that when he is on the point of leaving India rather than acknowledge personally the suzerainty of the Kaiser, the German Emperor sends an urgent wire waiving his claim to overlordship on the ground that "India cannot spare you." The story is especially interesting as giving what purports to be the attitude of the average civil and military official in India towards this grave problem of national emancipation. It is essentially a tale of the army, and to those interested in the intricate game of war it will probably make its strongest appeal.

HERSELF. By Ethel Sidgwick. 6s. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Miss Sidgwick has a taking way with her, and writes with charm and distinction. Excellent are the scenes at Madame Barriere's school for girls at Versailles, at Farover, the home of those complacent objectionables, the Escreets, and at the village concert—with Mr. Finch, the curate, performing. "You see, he has to keep order with the boys as well, sir, and with his black face, it's difficult." So it was. And difficult it was also for Patrick, and difficult Patrick made it for Harriet Clench and Geoffrey Horn. The pathos of Patrick's life, and the pity of it! See him outside the highly respectable Farover house where Harriet sat alone and "sang without tears, for her suffering was too deep-seated for that." "He leant against the house-wall in the rain, having crept round into the garden, near where shafts of light from the drawing-room lay out upon the lawn. He was a stray dog, come begging again because he could not keep away. . . . She had told him not to come, he could not imagine why; but, forbidden or not, he had been drawn along the roads again, through the cold drizzle, to the spots he knew she haunted." Oh, eminently "collectable" was Patrick and marked to be collected by death. But Harriet Clench lives through the bad days and far away—west of the west—in Donegal, Mr. Horn "tells" her between the tides "where once a saint bathed his feet, and left behind him a healing holy well." And the wise reader will find the whole story in "Herself," and will also learn of the great Dr. Gudgeon, of Bertha Lindt, the musician, and of Ann Maskery, and other persons "collectable" and otherwise, in a novel so markedly above the average, and so good to read.

RUTH OF THE ROWLDRICH. By Mrs. Stanley Wrench. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Must a woman of genius forego husband and home and all the claims of love in order to give that genius full expression? Ruth Leigh, the heroine of Mrs. Wrench's new novel, awakens slowly and painfully to the knowledge that her brains and faculties will never have a chance to blossom into fulfilment, if she settles down as the wife of her long-time playmate and lover, David Miller, a sturdy, large-hearted son of the soil. Wondering what the future holds in store for her, the fancy seizes her one midsummer's eve to test the truth of a local legend, and at nightfall she makes her way barefooted to the mystic group of Rowldrich stones, a kind of miniature Stonehenge: and there, as luck will have it, Ruth meets a young artist, philanderer, and dreamer, whose influence sends her to London, to that great world of adventure, Fleet Street. Many types of men and women she meets here, and her heart stirs to new sensations, but always in the background waits the faithful figure of David Miller. Ruth's first book is a great success—every fibre of her being she has put into it; her second, however, is a failure, and in the end she is glad to exchange the obsession of an all-consuming ambition for the peace and happiness of a home with David. Such in brief is the ambit of this interesting novel, which is remarkable for the intimate analysis it gives of the conflicting elements in the character of a woman of Ruth's type.

DICKY DILVER. By G. B. Burgin. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Dough, the dog in "Dickie Dilver" deserves a place of honour beside Old Man's famous mule, Miss Wilks. But Dough, after all, plays only a minor part in the working out of a capital story. Dicky himself, the charming Miss Smith, and the mysterious, handsome Indian squaw whom Dicky carries to his cabin, half dead with exhaustion, out of the wild heart of a night of storm—these are the leading characters in one of the lightest, most amusing, and most interesting romances Mr. Burgin has ever written. The egregious Miss Perkins, the autocratic, meddling local journalist, with her brazen attempts to blackmail Dicky, and her somewhat melodramatic kidnapping of the beautiful squaw, who proves to be no squaw at all, but well, there is no justification for our revealing a secret that Mr. Burgin very resolutely and adroitly conceals until the right time has come for letting it out. The scene is laid at Four Corners, in Canada, again. The characters are sketched with swift, skilful and humorous touches, and the whole story of love and jealousy and hatred and vengeful intrigue has the right romantic setting, is narrated easily and pleasantly, and is by turns idyllic, farcical, picturesquely descriptive, and generally alive with incident and adventure. If you want to get away from the vexed problems of the hour and forget them all in a breezy, entertaining story that is a story and nothing else, you cannot do better than possess yourself at once of "Dickie Dilver."

Bookman's Table.

LONDON STORIES. Being a Collection of the Lives and Adventures of Londoners in all Ages. Edited by JOHN O'LODON. Vol. I. 6s. net. (L. C. & E. C. JACK.)

Everyone knows that John o' London (otherwise Mr. Wilfrid Whitten) is one of the first among living authorities on all that relates to the history of the great city from which he takes his name; and from the stores of his knowledge on this inexhaustible subject he has lately been bringing together the stories that go to the making of this fascinating book. He has not aimed, as he says in his preface, to produce any formal history or topography, but to dip into that romance of London's past and compile a miscellany of the infinitely varied tales that are its memories of yesterday and the years that are gone. The stories are not arranged in order of date nor in any sequence at all, and this seems to add to their freshness by evading even a semblance of monotony. From an excellent article on the Street Cries of London, you pass to a history of Child's Bank, gossip about Dr. Donne's Monument, about the death of Lord Bacon, the popularity of that doggerel song "Pop goes the Weasel," to the story of George Barnwell's crime, of the Duke of Wellington's duel, of the Gordon Riots, of the Whistling Oyster, the Bailiff's Daughter of Islington, and a hundred and fifty or so others concerning quaint, rascally, heroic, or some way famous London characters, customs and events. Mr. Whitten has been assisted by a staff of competent contributors, and the book is cleverly illustrated by Mr. George Morrow and other well-known artists. "London Stories" is still continuing its appearance in fortnightly sections, and we congratulate editor and publishers on its having grown to a sufficient number of parts to bind up into so large and so peculiarly interesting a book as this first volume is.

ANIMA CELTICA. By Reginald C. Hine. 2s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

"Anima Celtica" is a most kindly appreciation of the Celt, and of the Irishman in particular. It is not in the least ethnological, but a rhapsody, with many examples, about "the delicate grace, the mystery and the strangeness of beauty that he hidden from the common view in the soul of the Celt—the Anima Celtica." Many will feel that, whether he deserves it or not, the Celt has been sufficiently praised during these last thirty or forty years, and that in mere encomium little remained to be done. Certainly Mr. Hine, with all his enthusiasm and scrupulous writing, has not done thus little, but has rather written an elegant exercise in a well known theme. It is full of this kind of thing. "It was their bitterness of soul sorrow which gave the chief impulse to their song, and drove them to that deep communion with Madonna Natura which is reflected in all their literary work. It has been with them as it was with the other nations before their time. Out of the ruins of a memorable past there has sprung the creative flower of beauty: fate has given them gifts of fairer kind than those she took away. The glory of its youth was passed too soon from Ireland: the people once so strong have gone down early to their grave. Yet their spirit lingers like an everlasting enchantment about the hills and valleys of their beloved country: and the glory that they lost is but added to the earth. . . ." If Mr. Hine had not been so carried away he would have cut out "Madonna Natura" and "creative flower," at any rate. But criticism should "tread lightly, because it treads on a heart" in dealing with this slender floral book, made up of so much fine sentiment and fine quotations from Messrs. Douglas Hyde, Arthur Symonds, W. B. Yeats, Swinburne, Wilde, Thomas Hardy, Lionel Johnson, William Sharp, R. H. Horne, Clarence Mangin, A.E., Thomas Traherne, and others.

Mr. G. B. Burgin.

From a photograph taken in Switzerland.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A WORKING WOMAN.

By Adelheid Popp. 3s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

"If every rich and contented woman in the land would but read it, how wise she would become," said the late Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald when she first read Adelheid Popp's "Autobiography of a Working Woman" in its original German; and one of the last acts of her life was to arrange for its publication in England. The preface she was to have written in the English edition is penned by her husband, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P.; the volume also contains August Bebel's preface to the German edition. It is a powerful book, intensely human and convincing, untold its narrative in a simple, downright manner. The story shows us a little girl who has to struggle for every bit of bread she eats—a young woman with tremendous odds against her, who has never had a fair chance to live—and finally we see the woman who is reaping the results of her years of self-culture and unfailing courage. Frau Popp wrote because she says "I recognised in my lot that of hundreds and thousands of the women and girls of the working class, because I saw great social phenomena at work in what surrounded me and brought me into difficult situations." This is a book that cannot be too widely read, and the sooner the unenlightened in those great social problems that it deals with are startled by the revelations it contains for them, the better it will be for the world.

THE COMEDY OF CATHERINE THE GREAT. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. With 6 Portraits. 15s net. (Nash.)

Mr. Gribble is one of the most attractive of writers of the more piquant kind of biography. His work is always readable and illuminating almost as often. There are occasions, perhaps, when the author shows his hand too obviously, as in the following passage, but Mr. Gribble does not miss his effect. "The Grand Equerry, Narishkin," he tells us, "was a lower comedian than Potemkin, and without his brains, but there was no courtier whose company Catherine found more agreeable. His chief feat during the excursion under review was to spin a top on the table at which the royal party was sitting. It was a top as big as a man's head, and it contained an explosive. It burst, and the fragments flew into the faces of the diplomatists who were admiring it. If we could imagine the late Dan Leno, in the reign of the late Queen Victoria, playing such a practical joke at the expense of the late Lord Salisbury, at Osborne or Balmoral, the analogy would help us." Catherine the Great forms an admirable subject for Mr. Gribble. Possibly he does not give the reader much idea as to why she was styled "the Great," but he does endow her with life. She is presented to us here as a very human and very charming woman, not as "the Messalina of the North." "The truth is that Catherine was a woman not only of exceptional ability but also of exceptional charm; and that, if she had to be placed on her defence before a jury of matrons commissioned to judge her by modern moral standards, she would be able to plead, in the language of the criminals who are only criminal through circumstance, that she "had never had a chance." The reader will find much to amuse and interest in this admirable piece of work.

WILLIAM JAMES. By Emile Boutroux. Translated by Archibald and Barbara Henderson. 3s 6d. net. (Longmans.)

This small book is both an interpretation and a defence of the philosophy of William James. It is interesting, with the lucidity that is usual in French philosophy and science, and has the charm that belongs to the writing of an enthusiastic disciple; the translation is very well done, and reads like an original work. In many cases the actual lives of men are best written in their works, but in some men the personality is a real help to the understanding of that work. This is conspicuously so in the case of William James, his life was a working out of his philosophy, and his personality added much to the charm and the persuasiveness of his teaching. We hope therefore (with Mons. Boutroux) that his brother may be induced to compile his biography, for though the two brothers worked in quite different fields, their intellectual and moral outlook is very closely akin. Amongst philosophers, the man, William James, arouses much the same kind of affection that is felt for Charles Lamb amongst men of letters. The book contains seven chapters, and includes a very brief sketch of the life and personality, and an attempt to sum up his whole trend of thought from the volume which unfortunately remains a mere fragment called "Some Problems of Philosophy." Mr. James, as a philosopher, was profoundly interested in and had a great respect for religion; he held, too, quite definite religious beliefs. His largest and chief book, the "Principles of Psychology" (1890), though in reality not an easy book to fully understand, can be read with pleasure and profit by any intelligent person. Mons. Boutroux says that it is "a rigorously scientific work in form, as well as in substance, in a very real way envisaging psychology as a natural science, and at the same time very easy-going in traversing the precise and subtle subjects involved, very lively, very elegant, very captivating, agreeable and invigorating reading for a man of the world, no less than an indispensable working instrument for the specialist." Like Frederick Myers, Henry Sidgwick and others, William James was an ardent student of Psychical Research, and hoped through that for a philosophical basis for religious belief, and was fully convinced that religious experiences are often based on actual fact. The chapter on Religious Psychology is the least satisfactory in the volume, but it ought to tempt those who have not already read "Varieties of Religious Experience, a Study in Human Nature," to take up that book which appeals equally to the devout and philosophic reader. The most important chapter is that on Pragmatism, for though James was not the first to use that word, nor to expound the doctrines which are connoted by it, yet quite fairly his place amongst philosophers is based upon the fact that he was practically the founder of Pragmatism, which Mr. Bertrand Russell describes as "a genuinely new philosophy and singularly well adapted to the predominant intellectual temper of our time." It would be absurd in a short review of a book which is itself nothing more than a populariser of a system of philosophy to attempt an exposition of Pragmatism; a slight hint may be gathered from James' own words, "the true is the name of whatever proves itself to be good in the way of belief, and good, too, for definite assignable reasons." Mons. Boutroux's chapter will prove a help to those who want to understand this philosophy, and may be taken as an introduction to William James' two volumes which deal specifically with it, "Pragmatism" and the "Meaning of Truth." The more serious student will do well to read the trenchant criticisms which Mr. Bertrand Russell has issued in his volume "Philosophical Essays" to weigh the matter well, and to make up his own mind.

COLOUR MUSIC. THE ART OF MOBILE COLOUR. By A. Wallace Rimington 6s (Hutchinson.)

Amongst those who have been workers in the various arts, there has been current for centuries a fable relating to a machine from which, by playing on a keyboard, one evoked, not music, but changing colours. It appears that this is no longer a myth; Mr. Wallace Rimington has devised and erected in his studio what he terms a Colour Organ. An octave of the keys has been made to correspond with the entire octave of the spectrum, starting from the red at the middle C and running up by "semi-tones" to the violet on the B above. On depressing any of the keys, the corresponding colour is projected upon a screen.

Globe-Wernicke

'Elastic' Bookcases and Roll-Top Desks

IF you are thinking of buying a new Bookcase, don't buy one of the fixed size kind. A fixed size Bookcase is seldom the right size. It may suffice for a time, but, sooner or later, it will prove too small for the books you possess. Again, you may be moving into a new house where a different size or shape of Bookcase may be necessary. It matters not—if you own a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase.

The G. W. "Elastic" Bookcase is built up of Units. You can buy just the number of Units you need, and build them up just in the way you please—vertically or horizontally. If in a year's time you want more book accommodation you merely add one or more Units, and if at any time you move into a new house, it is a simple matter to take the Units apart and re-arrange them to suit the space available. The Units interlock, and at every stage you have a complete Bookcase.

Our special Booklet, No. 18 B, gives full particulars. It is sent to any address on request.

Style
No. 1031

A G. W. Roll Top Desk costs but a few pounds, yet it gives a life time's service and is an everyday convenience. When called away hurriedly, for instance, your MSS and other private papers can be left undisturbed simply by pulling down the roll cover, which locks the entire desk automatically.

At the Globe-Wernicke Showrooms you can see over Fifty Styles of Roll Top Desks—all substantially built, correctly designed, and moderately priced. The illustration shows a low Roll Top Desk. This Desk can be used as a table when closed. It has extension slides over pedestal drawers, all of which are dovetailed front and back, and is fitted with movable partitions. The lower right-hand drawer is of double depth and will accommodate large books. Panelled ends and back. Framed-up writing beds. Drawing down the roll cover locks the entire desk automatically, except centre drawer. Made in Quartered Oak. Can be taken apart to go through very narrow doors or stairways.

Catalogue No. 18 D gives full particulars. Why not write for a copy?

PACKING FREE. Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London.

82, Victoria Street, S.W.

98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

It will thus be seen that it is possible to play on this instrument in colour (with certain very rigid limitations) as on an ordinary organ one plays in sound. The analogy between sound and colour is by no means complete, and with all his hopes of founding a new art of mobile colour, the author has to admit this. In the first place there is only one octave in colour visible to the human eye, whereas the human ear can detect as many as a dozen octaves of sound.

The arrangement outlined above is therefore purely arbitrary, and is not based, as is the art of music, on a physiological attribute of the human organism. Secondly, if the whole octave of the keys be depressed simultaneously on the colour instrument, clean white light is obtained, but on the musical instrument nothing so cleanly, but a displeasing noise not even of barbaric richness. In other words, the capacity of harmony and discord is essentially different in the two cases. In the third place it is inconceivable that music should have retained its hold upon civilised man had it not been for the development of what is known as "musical form"—that is to say, the presenting of themes or tunes in a definite order and relation, as in a Sonata. A mere presentation in a certain order of colours on a screen, be they never so well-contrasted and pleasurable, cannot be imagined as affording the same sense of definite structure without which no art can hope to live. Nor is it by any means clear how such a structure could be evolved in what the author terms "colour music." It is, of course, impossible to judge of the effect produced without having seen a demonstration, but there are many other difficulties besides those hinted at above, which incline the critic to place Mr. Rington's experiments in the category of interesting experiments, and nothing more. The book is well illustrated with photographs, and has introductory notes by Sir Hubert von Herkomer and Dr. W. Brown.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. GREENING & CO.

In the reviewing of current fiction, humour is certainly the surest passport to leniency. And in a new writer that merit will not be entirely discounted by some rather obvious echoes, by an occasional forced note, and even by some deviations into flippancy. We have assumed and have but little doubt that The Joys of Jones, by Fred Gillett (6s.) is the work of a new author; but along with certain marks of inexperience, it is fair to add at once that the book has some excellent characterisation and, best of all, the insight that comes of sympathy. The simple plot describes the furlough of a poor, broken-down city clerk, who dreams dreams and undergoes many strange experiences in the new environment of a Norfolk farm. The dominant note of the book is undoubtedly pathos, and the picture of Jones, the underpaid drudge of the Limbo Street office, is one that the reader will not easily forget. If we are right in taking this to be Mr. Gillett's first novel, we can only add that we shall look forward with considerable interest and expectancy to the appearance of his second.

The knowing novel-reader can infer a good deal from the names of the dramatis personæ. Such a name as Leopold Duval seem to connote a man with a lurid past, an eventful present, and a romantic future. The hero of Mr. Rathmell Wilson's new novel, Crimson Wings (6s.), lives up to his name. His marriage had ended disastrously, and the story is concerned with the tangle of his love for Millie Gardiner and the existence of his lunatic wife. The author writes up to the dictum he quotes from Sir Arthur Conan Doyle that the "holding people together (by marriage) who loathe each other, who contaminate and degrade each other's lives . . . is a most monstrous proposition." Millie's only legal happiness can come by waiting for a dead woman's shoes. Mr. Wilson had, therefore, only one means of obtaining his happy ending, but by an ingenious variation on an old theme, he has contrived to reward the virtuous and to ennoble the fallen. It is the praise he would like to say that he has written a good old-fashioned story. He looks back wistfully to the happier England of twenty years ago, and he describes his own book as "a novel for those who love yesterday."

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO.

A boy's escapade, brought against him twenty years later, and within two days of his wedding, was the undoing of James Franks, Mr. Arthur Applin's hero in Her Sacrifice (6s.). It tore him from the girl he loved passionately, and sent him to the arms of a girl he did not love at all. To tell the truth we feel this early part of the book to be somewhat unconvincing, and the heroine's first sacrifice strikes us as being unnecessarily quixotic. The situation, however, leads on to a thoroughly sensational story, which develops along thrilling lines with unexpected happenings. A deformed brother of the beautiful heroine, out of his love for his sister, plays a sinister part, but, desperate as are his methods, he brings about the results most desired by Mr. Applin's readers, for he provides "breathless moments," and his actions, dread though they are, lead on to wedding-bells.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

The Relentless Current, M. E. Charlesworth's novel (6s.), is the relentless current of electrocution. But tragic as the story is in many of its chapters, there is but a paragraph which deals actually with the fatal chair. The story is of a man, Jack Morris, who is wrongfully accused of a murder just at the time when, after long waiting, he has written home to the girl he loves to ask her to marry him. The girl, although her love is not so great as his, crosses the ocean to go to him in his trouble, and marries him while he is under sentence of death. The tale is well and vividly told; the days of hope and dread are lived through with impressive distinctness, yet not with an overstraining of the horrors. The accused man, unlike the hero of most such stories, is not saved. But we are glad to assure readers that the end (of the book) is a happy one.

THE J. P. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY.

The heroine of Mr. John Reed Scott's novel has enormous wealth in Her Own Right (6s.). And the man who loves her loses his own wealth at the beginning of the book, and goes away out of her life. This might be an extremely tute situation, but Mr. Scott, who, out of his mercy, spares to his hero a few thousand dollars and a house "on the Eastern Shore," proceeds to tighten up a thrilling little plot under the surface of ordinary, everyday life, and the hero is by no means left to wear out his days in weariness and regret. There is a hidden treasure lurking in these pages, literally and metaphorically; there are exciting situations, including piracy and abduction; and the end is satisfactory. Mr. Scott strikes us as being just a little amateurish when he gives opinions—as on the subject of nouveaux riches and aristocrats—but his story is told with quick interest and American vivacity.

MR. HAM-SMITH.

Lovers of "Phra The Phœnician" and such stories of a romantic far past, will probably enjoy The Temple of Dreams by Mr. Paul Bold (6s.). It is a story within a story, told by a bachelor of thirty-five, "an archaeologist who had attained some reputation," who was visiting Peru to examine pre-historic remains. By chance he comes upon "the last descendants of the Great Hatun-Runas," and renders them a great service; after which they make him one of themselves and promise to show him the city of Tiahuanaco as it originally was—a decidedly interesting favour to an archaeologist. In twenty-four hours the archaeologist accumulates sufficient knowledge and experience to last him a lifetime, and for ever after his life is bound up with the descendants of the Great Hatun-Runas. The bachelor of thirty-five is not a bachelor when we leave him at the end of the book.

MESSRS. CASSELL.

"Lots of home gardens are lovely now, but under a discerning gardener how much lovelier might they not be!" writes Mr. H. H. Thomas in his preface to The Garden at Home (6s. net), and he sets himself in his new book to show the amateur gardener how he makes the most and the best of his own home garden plot. He writes delightfully of "Garden Magic," of "Memory and Friendship Gardens," of "My Garden of Dreams," but underlying all his love of gardens is the severely practical knowledge of how to make them. He is the shrewdest, the most experienced and most entertaining of instructors, and we warmly recommend this latest book of his to every amateur who is trying to create the perfect suburban garden for himself. There are twelve beautiful colour plates, and nearly a hundred excellently reproduced half-tone illustrations.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

Mr. Thomas Alexander Fyfe has compiled an admirable Who's Who in Dickens (6s. net), which is, as he says, "a complete Dickens repertory in Dickens's own words"; that is, all the characters in Dickens's novels and stories, from the greatest down to the most insignificant, are described in the words of the author himself, and as a result, we have a dictionary that is not merely a collection of names, but a series of the vividest word portraits. Thus the book makes at once uncommonly interesting reading for all and sundry, and is an invaluable work of reference for writers and public speakers.

M. E. FRANCIS'S NEW STORY

"On such an auspicious occasion I venture to wish both her and 'Honesty' the best of good wishes." Punch. (HONESTY is M. E. FRANCIS'S 21st book.)

"Lovers of the country, and especially of the West Country, are accustomed to sit at the feet of 'M. E. Francis,' and 'Honesty' will not help them to abandon the habit. I, at any rate, can vouch for the fact that the atmosphere of this story banished the gloom of a most dreary day. The author reproduces the charm of the country spontaneously, she never forces the note, she does not strive after great effects. But the effects are here, because intimacy and a sense of style are here."—Punch.

"If anyone wants a tale dramatically and romantically written, 'Honesty' can be recommended. It is interesting and touching." Daily Mail.

"Honesty is just a sweet and pure cottage girl . . . Mrs. Francis gives not merely a pretty story, but a picture of real life such as will cause her public real pleasure, and stir the hope of more such tales to follow." Daily Telegraph.

HONESTY

By M. E. FRANCIS

Author of "The Tender Passion," etc. 6s.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each. post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s. each. cloth limp, 2s. 6d. each.

Antonina	The New Magdalen
Basil	The Frozen Deep
Hide and Seek	The Law and the Lady
The Woman in White	The Two Destinies
The Moonstone	The Haunted Hotel
Man and Wife	The Fallen Leaves
The Dead Secret	Jezebel's Daughter
After Dark	The Black Robe
The Queen of Hearts	Heart and Science
No Name	"I Say No"
My Miscellanies	A Rogue's Life
Armada	The Evil Genius
Poor Miss Finch	Little Novels
Miss or Mrs. ?	The Legacy of Cain
	Blind Love

Popular Editions, medium 8vo, 6d. each.

Antonina	The New Magdalen
The Moonstone	The Dead Secret
The Woman in White	Man and Wife
Armada	The Law and the Lady
The Haunted Hotel, &c.	Blind Love

The Woman in White. LARGE TYPE, FINE PAPER EDITION. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net. leather, gilt edges, 3s. net.

The Frozen Deep. LARGE TYPE EDITION. Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

Mr. LANE'S BOOKS

A TRAGEDY IN STONE AND OTHER PAPERS

By LORD REDESDALE. 7s. 6d. net.

THE HERALDS OF THE DAWN

By WILLIAM WATSON. 4s. 6d. net.

FOOTPRINTS of FAMOUS AMERICANS in PARIS

By J. J. CONWAY. With an Introduction by Mrs. JOHN LANE. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

MEMORIES OF JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER

By THOMAS R. WAY. With many Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF GUY DE MAUPASSANT

By his Valet, FRANÇOIS. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A COURT PAINTER

By H. JONES THADDEUS, R.H.A., &c. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

MENTAL DISCIPLINE & EDUCATIONAL VALUES

By W. H. HECK. 3s. 6d. net.

BEAUTY AND UGLINESS

By VERNON LEE & C. ANSTRUTHER-THOMSON. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

MARGARET OF FRANCE, Duchess of Savoy

By WINIFRED STEPHENS. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

JUNGLE FOLK. Indian Natural History Sketches

By DOUGLAS DEWAR. 10s. 6d. net.

THE BETTS OF WORTHAM, in Suffolk 1480-1905

By KATHARINE FRANCES DOUGHTY. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

NAPOLEON AND KING MURAT

By A. ESPITALIER. Translated by J. LEWIS MAY. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE ANARCHISTS: Their Faith and their Record

By E. A. VIZETELLY. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

OXFORD POEMS

By H. W. GARROD. 3s. 6d. net.

ABOUT ALGERIA

By C. THOMAS-STANFORD. With 32 Illustrations. 5s. net.

The OLD GARDENS of ITALY and How to Visit Them

By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

The Latest Fiction. 6s.

WINGS OF DESIRE

M. P. Willcocks

ELIZABETH IN RETREAT

Margaret Westrup

THE INDIAN LILY

Sudermann

THE SNAKE

F. Inglls Powell

BEGGARS AND SORNERS

Allan McAulay

THE KNIGHTLY YEARS

W. M. Ardagh

THE LAST RESORT

H. Prevost Battersby

POMANDER WALK

Louis N. Parker

THE BARMECIDE'S FEAST (3s. 6d. net) John Gore

The BODLEY HEAD, Vigo St., LONDON, W.

Macmillan's New Books

The Wessex Edition of the Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse.

With Prefaces and Notes. In 20 vols. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each. Printed from new type. Each volume will have a Frontispiece in Photogravure and Map. Two volumes issued monthly.

3. JUDE THE OBSCURE.

4. THE RETURN OF THE NATIVE.

The Sphere.—"The Macmillans may be congratulated upon the format of these books. . . . To have got each novel into one volume so light to hold and so beautifully printed is a veritable triumph of the book-maker's art."

Across Australia. By BALDWIN SPENCER, C.M.G., M.A., F.R.S., Professor of Biology in Melbourne University, and F. J. GILLEN, Special Magistrate and Sub-Protector of Aborigines, South Australia. With Coloured and other Illustrations. In 2 vols. 8vo. 21s. net. [Immediately]

France under Richelieu and Colbert.

By the late JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, M.B., F.R.C.P. New Edition. With an Introduction by A. J. GRANT, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Shortly]

The Kingdom of God. A Course of Four Lectures delivered at Cambridge during the Lent Term, 1912. By Rev WILLIAM TEMPLE, Headmaster of Repton. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"This book is worthy to stand by Mr. Temple's previous volumes, and increases our appreciation of his clear thought and power of vigorous exposition."

The Schools of Philosophy.

Edited by SIR HENRY JONES.

The Evolution of Educational Theory. By JOHN ADAMS, M.A., B.Sc., LL.D. 8vo. 10s. net.

*. Other volumes to follow.

A Lyttel Booke of Nonsense. By RANDALL DAVIES. Original modern "Limericks," Inspired and Illustrated by Mediæval Woodcuts. Fcap. 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVELS.

Pan's Garden. A Volume of Nature Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "The Centaur," etc. Illustrated by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Immediately]

The Sign. By Mrs. ROMILLY FEDDEN (Katharine Waldo Douglas). Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

A novel of art life, with the scenes laid in Brittany, and with three English artists as the principal characters.

The Touchstone of Fortune. By CHARLES MAJOR. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Daily News.—"Mr. Major assembles some excellent properties of conventional romance, and uses them with great skill."

Van Cleve. By MARY S. WATTS, Author of "Nathan Burke," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly]

The Charwoman's Daughter. By JAMES STEPHENS. Extra crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Punch.—"It is a very long time indeed since I read such a human satisfying book. Every page contains some happy phrase or illuminating piece of character drawing."

NEW TWO-SHILLING EDITION OF

The Novels of Maurice Hewlett.

With Frontispieces. In cloth binding. Crown 8vo. 2s. net each. Two volumes issued monthly.

7. NEW CANTERBURY TALES. 8. HALFWAY HOUSE.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

THE YOUNG NIETZSCHE.

By FRAU FOERSTER-NIETZSCHE. Translated by ANTHONY M. LUNOVIC. Demy 8vo. With Portraits. 15s. net.

Although several Lives of Nietzsche have already appeared, none could claim that quality of intimacy which makes this work by his sister so engrossing. Her life has been spent in devotion to him and his genius. She always stood far nearer to the great philosopher-poet than any other person, and she seems predestined for the task.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A GREAT LADY:

Being more Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne.

1831-1866. Edited by CH. NICOUILLAUD. In one vol. Demy 8vo. Photogravure Frontispiece. 10s. net.

"It is the most vivacious, most human and most interesting collection of memoirs which has been given to the world for a long time. There is not a page which should be missed."—Daily Telegraph.

Previously Published Uniform with the above.

THE MEMOIRS OF THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

Vol. I, 1771-1814. Vol. II, 1815-1840. Vol. III, 1820-1866. Each Volume demy 8vo. Photogravure Frontispiece 10s. net.

THE MONTESSORI METHOD.

The method of Scientific Pedagogy is applied to Child Education. By MARIA MONTESSORI. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Maria Montessori explains fully her system of training infants in this book. The outstanding feature of the Montessori method is the freedom of activity given to the children as compared with the Froebel system of grouping them.

ANIMAL LIFE IN AFRICA.

By Major J. STEVENSON HAMILTON. Foreword by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Illustrated, Maps, Plans, &c. Royal 8vo. 18s. net. "Vivid, graphic, withal scholarly . . . a book of unusual fascination."—Times.

THE LURE OF THE SEA.

Poems. By J. F. PATTERSON. Author of "Folk of the Soil," etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Those who have read Mr. Patterson's novels, and lately "My Vagabondage," will not be surprised to learn that a volume of poems has come from Mr. Patterson's pen. He shows in it all the deep feeling for the elemental emotions of life and nature that have characterised his earlier work.

MOODS, SONGS AND DOGGERELS.

By JOHN GALSWORTHY. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"Poetry of a high order, unspoilt by any alien imagination, undisturbed in its fine simple pathos."—Nation.

WILLIAM SHARP'S WRITINGS.

Edited by ELIZABETH A. SHARP. Uniform with the "Works of Fiona Macleod." To be completed in Five Volumes. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each. Now Ready. Vol. I. POEMS. Vol. II. STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS.

Vol. XII. THE COLLECTED WORKS OF IBSEN.

FROM IBSEN'S WORKSHOP.

Edited by WM. ARCHER. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THIRD AND REVISED EDITION.

INDIA UNDER CURZON AND AFTER.

By LOVAL FRASER. Royal 8vo. 16s. net.

With a long new Preface discussing the recent administrative changes.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE

Upton Sinclair

"A novel with many of the elements of greatness—in some ways better than anything Mr. Upton Sinclair has done . . . there are also superbly human touches and felicities of style and thought. It is a fine, distinguished, vital but unequal novel."—Observer.

"A powerful emotional novel . . . Mr. Sinclair has described the conflict of ideals and passions with energy and sincerity."—Daily News.

THE COST OF IT

Eleanor Mordaunt

"A strong and absorbing story . . . interesting from first to last."—Daily News. "Miss Mordaunt . . . shows certainly in this more serious effort gifts which should win her high consideration as a novelist."—Times.

PASSION FRUIT

E. C. Vivian

"May be warmly recommended to any reader in search of an interesting and intensely human story, peopled by life-like characters."—Sunday Times.

HE WHO PASSED

(To M. L. G.) Third Impression. Anon

"If authentic, poignant to tears, if not, marvellously well invented."—Daily Mail.

ESTHER

Agnes E. Jacomb

"A striking novel, full of quiet strength."—Morning Leader.

THE ADJUSTMENT

Marguerite Bryant

"Throughout fresh, sincere, and well-written and full of good studies."—Times.

"Endowed with thought, knowledge, sympathy, and literary quality that rise much above the average level of the fiction of the day."—Scotsman.

MARJORIE STEVENS

V. Taubman-Goldie

"This well-written novel mirrors nature with humorous tenderness and honesty, much charm and philosophy."—Sunday Times.

THE GREAT RUSSIAN NOVEL

THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV

By DOSTOEVSKY. 864 pp. 3s. 6d. net

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 249. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

JUNE, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 97

"THE BOOKMAN" GALLERY—

E. Temple Thurston 103

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 105

THE READER—

Wilkie Collins By A. COMPTON-
RICKETT 107
Heroes of Armageddon By WALTER SICHEL 115

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE
COMPETITIONS 118

The Centenary of John Forster.
By BERRIC TWEDE 123

NEW BOOKS—

Recent History. By THOMAS
SECCOMBE 125

John Galsworthy's Poems. By
A. St. J. ADCOCK 127
The People's Books By T. E.
PAGE 128
Victor Hugo. By F. G.
BELLAMY 129
Crispi 130
Individuality and Art By
DIXON SCOTT 131
Stirring Times By WALTER
JERROLD 132
Charles Lamb 133
"Human, Various" 133
Ghosts of the Wells 135
Rutherford and Son By
EDWARD THOMAS 136

NOVEL NOTES—

Queen of the Guarded Mounts
—The Night Land—The Golightlys—In the Vortex The Pen Dogs Views and Vagabonds—The City of Light—

The Common Touch—The Fly in the Ointment—A
Semi-Detached Marriage—
The Signal and Other Stories —War and the Woman—
Jacqueline of the Hut—Eve's
Second Husband—The Cost of It—The Department Store 136-140

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

Drake in California—The Masque of the Elements—On the Backwaters of the Nile—
Chiefs and Cities of Central Africa—The Setting Sun—
The Future of Poetry .. 140-141

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 142

NOTICES.

*All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.*

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

We are publishing on June 20th, as a "BOOKMAN EXTRA," a special Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir in connection with the Matinees that are to be given at the Haymarket Theatre on June 25th and 28th, in aid of the Fund that is being raised to clear off the debt on the Keats-Shelley house at Rome. Their Majesties the King and Queen and H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, have promised to be present at the Matinees. This Souvenir Number will be superbly produced, and will contain, in addition to numerous illustrations and portraits of the actors and actresses taking part in the performances, fully illustrated articles on Keats and Shelley by well known authors.

The July BOOKMAN will be a Miss M. E. Braddon Number and will contain a special, fully illustrated article on Miss Braddon (Mrs. John Maxwell) by Clive Holland. Other important articles in this Number will include "Stevenson Again," by Neil Munro; "In Forbidden China," by Mrs. Archibald Little; "Mr. William Watson and the Theatre," by Francis Bickley; "Last Essays of a Bookman," by W. H. Hudson; "Two Poets," by Edward Thomas; "With Napoleon at St. Helena," by Walford D. Green; "Goethe," by Henry Murray, etc., etc.

Wilkie Collins.

By courtesy of Messrs. Chatto & Windur.

Mr. Arthur Compton-Rickett is engaged on a study of the personality and work of William Morris that Messrs. Dent will publish shortly. The book will contain a good deal of hitherto unpublished

Photo by Miss Florence T. dunn, Westminster.

Mr. Redmond Howard, Nephew of Mr. John Redmond, M.P.

Mr. Howard is the author of "Home Rule," one of the new volumes in "The People's Books" Series, which Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack are publishing.

personalia, and should throw some new light on Morris both as a man and a poet. Mr. Rickett is also contributing a sketch on English Literature, in the nature of a primer, to Messrs. Jack's admirable "People's Book" series.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has written a new book, "The Land of the Blue Flower," which Messrs. Putnam are publishing.

Mr. John Murray announces what promises to be a very charming book by much the youngest of living authors. Miss Joan Nancy Maude is not yet four years of age, and is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Maude—Mrs. Maude being the delightful actress better known as Miss Nancy Price. The book is to be called "Behind the Nightlight," and consists of an account of animals little Miss Maude has met with and things she has seen, the whole taken down by her mother in the child's own language.

From the John Ouseley Music Company we have received four songs the first-fruits of a new enterprise in which Mr. John Ouseley, the publisher of books, is taking a leading share. Two of the songs,

"Love's Dream," and "Love's Evensong," are written by W. Burton Baldrey and set to music by Adelina de Lara and Harold Jenner, and both for the daintiness of their words and the charm and easy compass of their melodies should be sure of popular success. "Baby Boy," a delightful little lyric by H. Wynne, has a dainty and very attractive setting by Frederick Dale; and a gay and breezy ditty, "As I Went Down to Plymouth Town," is mated to an appropriately rousing tune, with a capital chorus, by J. Avilie Dix.

Mr. Heinemann is coming into the fashion and starting the publication of a series of sevenpenny novels. The first four volumes, which are to be out this month, will be Hall Caine's "The Bondman," "The Ebb Tide," by Stevenson and Lloyd Osborne; "The Call of the Wild," by Jack London, and Richard Harding Davis' "Soldiers of Fortune."

We are asked to mention that a testimonial is being raised for Mr. Richard Quittenton who now, in his seventy-ninth year, is in indifferent health and somewhat straitened circumstances. In the whose new novel "The Family Living" (John Murray) is reviewed on page 134.

Mr. E. Lazen Watson,

Mrs. Ambrose Harding.

A new author, whose novel, "The Dominant Chord," has been published by Mr. Werner Laurie.

deal of pleasure to some three generations of readers. Contributions should be sent to Mr. Nelson F. Henderson of Red Lion House, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

Messrs. Everett & Co. announce a cheap edition of "Charles Dickens as I knew him," by George Dolby, who was Dickens' manager on his reading tour through America.

Photo by Hill & Saunders.

Miss Ethel Sidgwick, whose new novel, "Herself," was lately published by Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

early 'eighties, when Stevenson's "Treasure Island," "Kidnapped," and "The Black Arrow" were appearing in Young Folks' Weekly Budget Mr. Quittenton, under his pen name of Roland Quiz, was probably the most popular writer of serials for that magazine, in which his well-known series of "Tim Pippin" stories made their appearance. It is believed that many of the boy-readers of those days, who were numbered among the admirers of Roland Quiz, will be glad to be associated with this testimonial to one whose work has given a great humour, and draws upon her own full and varied experiences for her pictures of life and character. The daughter of Isaac Ferguson, who went from Cavan to Canada, she married an Anglican clergyman, the Rev. Arthur Murphy, when she was nineteen, and entered upon a strenuous course of parish work in Western Ontario. Presently, she and her husband removed from Ontario to Manitoba, where Mr. Murphy engaged in agriculture and the timber industry, his wife actively assisting him, and at the same time pursuing her literary career, writing for the magazines and working as review editor of The Winnipeg Telegram. Always a lover of the open-air life and of hard work, Mrs. Murphy is at home in the saddle,

Mrs. Arthur Murphy,

whose new book, "Open Trails," is published by Messrs. Cassell.

Mrs. Arthur Murphy has followed her delightful collection of sketches of Canadian life, "Jancy Canuck," with a new book in something of the same vein, called "Open Trails," that Messrs. Cassell are publishing. She has the divine gift of is one of the officials of a Women's Curling Club, and last January became the first President of the Women's Canadian Club; moreover, she is qualified to manage a farm, a timber "limit," and a coal mine, underground workings and all; she has also had experience of hospital nursing, and is an enthusiastic collector of Canadian fossils. She is interested in everything that comes in her way, and with all her capacity for doing what is commonly regarded as masculine work, is the most womanly of women, large-minded and therefore large-hearted, and her keenly sympathetic humour is not, as one who knows her has it, made up of society epigrams, but is "the flashing, vigorous fun of a nature which has seen the stern trail of a new land, and yet rejoices in the brightness of 'wide spaces washed with the sun.' "

Sir Ronald Ross, K.C.B., F.R.S.

The recent placing of a commemorative tablet on the birthplace of Francis Thompson has moved Mr. John Thomson to write a book on "Francis Thompson, the Preston-born Poet," with notes on some of his works. The author has had valuable assistance from Mr. Meynell, Sir Alfred Hopkinson and the Rev. H. K. Mann, and the volume is to be published by Mr. Alfred Halewood, of Preston.

Mr. Richard Bagot, the well-known author and journalist, has long made his home in Italy, and, as one who has studied them from the inside, has written much on Italian life and character. Recently Mr. Bagot received at his residence in Tuscany a large gathering, representing all classes of the community and all branches of industry connected with the Province of Pisa, that came to thank him for his defence of the honour of the Italian Army and nation in the British Press and elsewhere. The municipalities of a large number of towns attended in official state, and nearly six thousand persons were present, including representatives of the clergy, the procession with its bands and banners being a mile and a half in length. Mr. Bagot was presented with a magnificently bound volume containing the text of an address composed by Professor Niccolai of the University of Pisa and many thousands of signatures, comprising those of soldiers lately returned from the war.

Sir Ronald Ross, whose new volume of poems we review elsewhere, was born in India three days after the commencement of the Indian Mutiny. His father, the late General Sir Campbell Clay Grant Ross, K.C.B., of the Indian Army, was then second in command of a Ghurka regiment, and it was only by chance that the Europeans in the station were saved from the mutineers. Sir Ronald's work in science, especially in connection with malaria, is well known; but he has made occasional excursions into literature. His two novels, "Child of Ocean," and "Spirit of Storm," were published years ago and are out of print. Recently Mr. John Murray published his little book of poems called "Philosophies," which contained verses written whilst he was at work on malaria in India, and it had a considerable sale. He printed privately a Christmas book of "Fables," and now Mr. Murray has published his latest volume of poems "The Setting Sun." It appeared anonymously, but Sir Ronald was suspected and has tacitly acknowledged its authorship.

Photo by Florence Vandamm.

Mr. Rathmell Wilson, whose new novel, "Crimson Wings," has just been published by Messrs. Greening. Mr. Wilson is a director of the Drama Society and recently created the name-part in that Society's production of Mr. Richard Le Gallienne's tragedy "Orestes."

Mr. T. Maskew Miller, of Capetown and Pretoria, is publishing immediately an important work on South African politics and history by Sir Edgar H. Walton, who was Treasurer in the Cape Ministry under the Jameson régime, and one of the delegates to the Convention which framed the Constitution of the Union of South Africa. The book is to be called "The Inner History of the National Convention," and will contain, by way of appendix, a detailed report and criticism by G. R. Hofmeyr (Clerk of the Union House of Assembly). The same publisher announces a new edition of "South African Snakes and their Venom," by F. W. Fitz Simons (Curator of the Port Elizabeth Museum), the first large edition of which was sold out within a few weeks of publication. Both books will be issued in this country by Messrs. Longmans.

The Ter-Centenary of Samuel Butler's birth was passed over very quietly last February. It would be interesting to know how many persons in the last three or four years have read Butler's "Hudibras"; probably not even so many as have read "Paradise Lost." Yet in its own day and for long after "Hudibras" was much the most popular of humorous poems; Pepys tells you that no book of his time was more thoroughly in the fashion; Charles II. delighted in quoting its witty and satirical couplets, and his courtiers made themselves equally familiar with it. Hazlitt calls it not only the greatest single production of wit of its period, but of this country; but like all books that deal largely in topical affairs it carried the seeds of death in it, and as soon as it became necessary that it should be copiously annotated in order that its allusions could

Photo by S. Wilson.

Strensham Church, Worcestershire, where Samuel Butler was baptised, February 3, 1612.

be understood and all its points appreciated the life began to pass out of it. Nevertheless, any reader with a working knowledge of seventeenth century history can read "Hudibras" understandingly and shut his eyes to the soul-wearying mass of foot-notes, and much of the wit and humour of it are as fresh and as irresistible now as ever, for they are not circumscribed by their applicability to passing lives and events but are as applicable to the weaknesses of common humanity in the twentieth no less than in the seventeenth century. Butler is one of the most learned as well as one of the most whimsical of our poets, and as a master of difficult and ingenious rhymes has never been surpassed.

There is plenty in him that is of universal, as distinguished from topical, concern. Have we not still amongst us Butler's over-learned sophist who "could distinguish and divide

A hair 'twixt south and south-west side,
On either which he would dispute,
Confute, change hands, and still confute!"

have we not still our dogmatists who

"prove their doctrine orthodox
By apostolic blows and knocks."

and how many of us are still eager to

"Compound for sins they are inclined to
By damning those they have no mind to!"

One could cite such things by the score, but in latter-day editions of "Hudibras" you find on every page more foot-notes than poetry, and no poem so heavily handicapped could hope to run far. If somebody would give us a new edition (including the posthumous poems that appeared in Butler's "Remains"—some of which are wittier and wiser than anything in "Hudibras") with all needless foot-notes omitted and the rest relegated to a very small appendix; then it would not be surprising if Samuel Butler recaptured some of his lost popularity.

Photo by S. Wilson.

Interior of Strensham Church,
Worcestershire.

The figures in panels of gallery are painted in bright colours and gilt.

Samuel Butler.

From the portrait by G. Soest.

Born at Strensham, in Worcestershire, in February, 1612, the son of a small farmer, he was educated at Worcester College, became clerk to a Justice of the Peace, then served as a sort of secretary first to the Earl of Kent, then to Sir Samuel Luke, and his experiences of Sir Samuel and his Puritan friends helped to inspire him with the great burlesque poem in which he ridiculed the Puritans and Puritanism of his generation. But Butler was no party-man; he satirised also the vices of Charles's Court, and probably this accounts for the fate to which he was left. Though Charles gloried in "Hudibras," and was fond of repeating its grotesque rhymes and laughing over its scathing indictment of his enemies, he gave the poet nothing but airy praise. Butler died in September, 1680, two years after the publication of the third part of "Hudibras," and would have died of starvation but for the friendly offices of Mr. Longueville, a Middle Temple benchet, who afterwards paid for his burial in the churchyard of St. Paul's, Covent Garden. No wonder Dryden, pressing desperately for arrears of his salary as Laureate, wrote to the King's Chamberlain: "It is enough for one age to have neglected Mr. Cowley and starved Mr. Butler"; and we are even indebted to "John Barber, Citizen of London," a generous admirer who has become nothing but a name, for erecting the stone to Butler's memory in Westminster Abbey, in 1721, "lest," as he says reproachfully at the close of a fitting and sympathetic inscription, "lest he who (when alive) was destitute of all things should (when dead) want likewise a monument." It takes nothing from the worthiness of John Barber's gift that Samuel Wesley celebrated the occasion with a caustic epigram:

"While Butler, needy wretch, was yet alive,
No generous patron would a dinner give:
See him, when starved to death and turned to dust,
Presented with a monumental bust.
The poet's fate is here in emblem shown,
He asked for bread, and he received a stone."

Hudibras and Ralpho in the Stocks.

From an illustration by Hogarth (1726).

We published last month a portrait of Mr. Seumas O'Sullivan, whose volume of "Poems" was recently issued by Messrs. Maunsel, but by an unaccountable error we described it as a portrait of Mr. James Stephens, author of "The Hill of Vision," also published by Messrs. Maunsel. Unfortunately, we cannot make full amends by giving an authentic portrait of Mr. Stephens, as he says he has none, and moreover is sure Mr. O'Sullivan's presentment will sell far more copies of his book than his own would. On the other hand, Mr. O'Sullivan assures us he is more than willing to lend his countenance to Mr. Stephens' poetry. In these circumstances, though we are very sorry to have erred, we are diffident as to where our apologies ought to go and trust Messrs. Maunsel will kindly accept them and so help us out of our difficulty.

Our plate portrait is from a photograph given by Wilkie Collins to Mr. A. P. Watt, who has kindly lent it to us for reproduction. The portrait on the cover is the copyright of Messrs. Elliott & Fry. For assistance with the other Wilkie Collins illustrations we are indebted to Mr. R. C. Lehmann, Mr. A. P. Watt, Messrs. Chatto & Windus and Messrs. W. Collins, Son & Co.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

E. TEMPLE THURSTON.

FOR all the later work which has come from the pen of Mr. Temple Thurston there has been a general charge of sentimentality. Critics who found fault with "Traffic" and "Sally Bishop" for their depressing realism, have been the first to exclaim that "The City of Beautiful Nonsense" and "The Greatest Wish in the World" were sentimental. But when a young man sets out to learn the secret difficulties of any art, I take it that he works neither for critics nor public, but for that conscience which is himself. It is both the chief fault and the highest virtue of Mr. Thurston that he is young, but there is that energy in him which works incessantly to learn. Thirteen books is no small record for a man of thirty-two, yet every one of those volumes has been compiled with a steady determination to master first one and then another of the numberless difficulties with which the art of novel writing is beset.

It is in this steady development that the work of Mr. Temple Thurston is so interesting to any who, as I, have watched every step he has taken, having regard for every progression and retrogression, in the firm belief that one of these days he would work his passage into his own. Possibly I have made this study of him in vain. Only time can tell that. But it is more than interesting to me now when I have been given to read in manuscript his new novel "The Antagonists," which is running through the pages of the Fortnightly Review, it is more than interesting to me to retrace the steps he has taken to this final achievement which comes more closely to the fulfilment of his purpose and the art of novel writing than any book he has yet done.

Appreciation is not praise, it is understanding. I am not writing this article in praise of Mr. Thurston, but because I believe I understand his methods—even his ambition in which, when once you know so much of a man, you have the very key to all he does.

"The Apple of Eden" which he wrote when he was seventeen and rewrote when he was twenty, was the work of one eager to speak all those thoughts—doubtless ill-considered—which come in a torrent to a boy when first he touches life. The effect of that book upon his mind, as I saw it, was not that which takes place in the minds of many authors with their first publication. Instead of finding that he knew something of the way to write, he discovered that he knew nothing and set out at once with all the enthusiasm of a young man, to learn. A point of view was not his consideration then; an attitude towards life was the last thing he considered. The attitude of mind expressed in all those early books until the publication of "Mirage" was such as circumstance was forcing upon him. Their pessimism, the black hopelessness of "Traffic" was only a phase through which it was inevitable that he must pass. The cultivation then of a point of view, he seems scarcely to have realised. His main object was to make for himself a style, a medium in which to express that new view of life of which no doubt he himself was the least expecting.

I know myself how assiduously and carefully he read and studied to acquire the thing he sought for, choosing, not those authors who are usually given as masters of the language, but such men as Sterne, even Carlyle, who might be said to have no style at all, and Meredith under whose influence undoubtedly he wrote "The Evolution of Katherine."

Strangely enough, through all this apprenticeship, he never achieved his object. It was not until his regard to life had changed, till the pendulum had swung from cheerless pessimism to outright optimism that he found a style of his own. "The City of Beautiful Nonsense" and "The Greatest Wish in the World" are apart and distinct in both style and language. Sometimes there is a stiltedness of phrase, not wholly unpleasant to the ear, for a moment obscure in its meaning, but ringing with a balance of sound that proves the carefulness of construction. He has told me that in the making of a sentence, he has carefully considered the choice of the words—dreamed or dreamt—to make the balance he desired. To the ordinary reader this may sound pedantic; but it is the fruit of such labour which makes poetry and rhythm in prose, and I know it is his belief that all prose is poetry not meant to be sung.

Photo by Florence Vandamm.

Mr. E. Temple Thurston.

The fancifulness of these two books which I have just mentioned was exactly the framework necessary for the style he was ready to make. There are passages in both of them, the description of Venice in the early morning in the "City of Beautiful Nonsense"; the description of Covent Garden with the carts laden with roses passing through the streets of dirty houses in the first light of a grey morning, which are more poetry than prose. And it was this quality which he had striven and determined to get into his style. The result of it all was a cry from the critics that it was sentimental, and this seems to have smarted in his mind. In the letter to Mr. Norman Forbes Robertson as a preface to his volume of essays—"The Patchwork Papers"—a form of self-defence which for myself I should always regret—he upholds his point of view.

"To see nothing but ugliness then," he writes, "or, as the modern school would have it, to see nothing but realism, is a form of mental suicide which, thank God, no longer appeals to me. For when every year I find the daffodils bringing up their glory of colour and beauty of line with unfailing perfection, I cannot but think that man, made in God's image, was meant to be still more beautiful in his thoughts and deeds even than they. Then surely what man was meant to be, must be the only true reality of what he is. All else happens to him. That is all."

This would be all very well were it to come into one of the essays, but written in the first person in a letter of introduction to the book, it jars upon one. A man's work is his only defence. There are many of these essays which, until the appearance of "The Antagonists" were immeasurably the best work he had done, and they alone would have exonerated Mr. Thurston from the charge of sentimentality. The essay called "Realism" is in itself an answer to those very critics and on that very subject. In fact there is a deep note of realism through them all, and yet not one line is ugly.

But now there comes "The Antagonists" to be published in book form, I believe, this Autumn. And here, if I am not mistaken, is the style and the realistic optimism which Mr. Temple Thurston has been striving for. It has all the simplicity of true poetry, all the colour, all the romance. The descriptions of the countryside—a glimpse of which he gave us in "The Flower of Gloster"—are all of them pictures which only a real observer and a lover of nature could have drawn; for this love of nature seems to be growing steadily in his work. It began in "The Patchwork Papers." It showed still more in "The Garden of Resurrection." Then came "The Flower of Gloster" and now this story in the heart of the Cotswold Hills. I may say nothing of the subject, for I have been given the privilege of reading the book before it is actually and completely in print. But as a study, not of one character, but of many, it shows more observation and understanding of life than he has ever promised before.

It has often been said of Mr. Thurston's work that he knows women well, but here, as well as of women, is a knowledge, close and intimate of men. A boy and his father stand out so clearly in this book that the female characters cannot overshadow them as they have done in others of his books. There are incidents, too, which might have been as ugly in their realism as any part of "Traffic" or "Sally Bishop," but they are written in such a way as makes them no less terrible than the everyday life through which we pass, year after year, without comment or disgust.

For now Mr. Thurston seems to have grasped that power of leaving to the imagination of his reader all those details which the realist he attacks in "The Patchwork Papers" dwells upon. Yet in this book—"The Antagonists"—there is no fault of omission. The whole life of the boy, Richard Furlong—his hero—is there, with all his development, sexual and mental, commencing from one striking incident with which the book begins.

A book cannot be really said to be written until it is published. The mind of the public, who are the truest and only critics, has not as yet put it in its place. And so my appreciation must stand as that of an unwritten book, but I believe my judgment is right when I say that in "The Antagonists" Mr. Thurston has taken the first step out of that school in which he has upon his own admission for so long been a pupil.

Into what class of life then as novelist he has passed, Time again can only prove. So much more than any author understands is his work dependent upon his private life, upon the influence under which he comes and the outlook he develops, that it would be impossible to forecast the future of any writer. For so young a man as Mr. Thurston, the future is there before him. He has all promise, no little achievement and may, when his eyes are cleared from those prejudices which are the first growth of enthusiasm, take his place amongst those writers one remembers.

A. M.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

June 1st to July 1st, 1912.

Messrs. G. Allen & Co. (Incorporating Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd., and Messrs. George Allen & Sons.)

- AVON, WILLIAM.—The Soul's Destiny, and Other Poems. 5s. net.
 BRYANT, T. HUGH.—The Churches of Suffolk, in County Churches Series. 2 vols. sold separately. 2s. 6d. net each.
 HIND, C. LEWIS.—Hercules Brabazon, and his Art. 24 Coloured Reproductions. Gilt top. 21s. net.
 PHYTHIAN, J. E.—The Art of Josef Israels. 40 Reproductions (8 Colou.) of his works. 15s. net.
 SCOTT, REV. MEIVILLE.—The Christian Covenant. 3s. 6d.
 WUNDT, PROF. WILHELM.—Outlines of Psychology. Translated by Rudolf Pintner, Ph.D. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd.

- BELLOC, HILAIRE.—The Green Overcoat. With Illustrations by G. K. Chesterton. 6s.

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

- ADAMS, MAURICE B., FRIBA.—Modern Cottage Architecture. Illustrated from Works of well known Architects. Second Edition, containing 83 full-page plates, and 54 text illustrations. 10s. net.
 RILEY, G. WOOLLISCROFT, R.F., A.R.C.A.—Modern Practical Design, dealing with Technique, Tools, and Practical Methods relating to Design and Craftsmanship. With 160 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 WALDRAM, PERCY J., F.S.I.—The Principles of Structural Mechanics treated without the use of Higher Mathematics. 368 pp., 200 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Glimpse. An Adventure of the Soul.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Helen with the High Hand. 2s. net.
 MALLOCK, W. H.—A Human Document. 2s. net.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. FRID.—The Grey Terrace. 6s.
 THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—The Apple of Eden. 2s.
 THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—Traffic. 2s. net.

Mr. W. B. Clive.

- ALLEN, F. BA.—Scott, "Marmion." 1s. 6d.
 DON, JOHN, M.A., B.Sc., and JAMIESON, HUGH, M.A., B.Sc.—Laboratory Test Cards (Physics and Chemistry). Three Sets, each 1s. net.
 FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Senior Geography for 1913. 2s. 6d.
 GOGGIN, S. F., M.A., and WATT, A. F., M.A.—Milton, "Comus." 1s.
 MARICHAL, F. P. R., Lect.-I., and GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—New Junior French Reader. 2s.
 PENN, L. L. M., M.A.—Caesar—Gaulle War. Book IV., Ch. XX. to Book V., Ch. XXIII. 1s.
 PENN, L. L. M., M.A.—Caesar—Gaulle War. Book V., Ch. XXV. to Ch. LVIII. 1s.
 RICHARDS, J. F., M.A.—Virgil—Aeneid VIII. 1s.
 SHEPHERD, J. W., B.Sc.—Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds. 4s. 6d.
 WEEKES, A. R., M.A., and FIELDEN, F. J., M.A.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It." 1s. 1d.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

- BURR, F. BONHAM.—The Strummings of a Lyre. 1s. net.
 WEBB, A. PELHAM.—Sonnets. 1s. net.
 WILLIAMS, HAROLD.—The Ballad of Two Great Cities. 1s. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- DE BOIGNE, MADAME.—Recollections of a Great Lady. Vol. 4. 10s. net.
 MONTESSORI, MADAME.—The Montessori Method. 7s. 6d. net.
 NIETZSCHE, FRAU FORSTER.—The Young Nietzsche. 15s. net.
 PATTERSON, J. E.—The Lure of the Sea. 5s. net.

Messrs. Herbert & Daniel.

- BREGY, KATHERINE.—The Poets' Chantry: (Essays on Richard Crashaw, Robert Southwell, William Habington, Aubrey de Vere, Gerard Hopkins, Coventry Patmore, Lionel Johnson, Francis Thompson, Alice Meynell.) (The Regent Library.) 3s. 6d.
 GASQUET, RT. REV. ARBOT, and BIRT, DOM NORBERT, O.S.B.—Handbook of Religious Orders. (Fully Illustrated.) 7s. 6d.
 HELM, W. H.—Charles Dickens. (The Regent Library.) Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.
 INGPEN, ROGER.—Shelley. (The Regent Library.) Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.
 MEYNELL, VIOLA.—George Eliot. (The Regent Library.) Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.
 SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET.—Jane Austen. (The Regent Library.) Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

- BRADDON, M. E.—During Her Majesty's Pleasure. 7d.
 COSTELLO, PIERRE.—A Sinner in Israel. 6d.
 FARJON, B. L.—The Betrayal of John Fordham. 6d.
 HORNUNG, E. W.—Pecavi. 7d.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Death Doctor. 6s.
 MARRIOTT, CHARLES.—The Intruding Angel. 7d.
 OLIPHANT, MRS.—Agnes. 7d.
 ROBIN, E. GALLIENNE.—Lucy—The Story of a Mother. 6s.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—Judged by Fate. 6d.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—Hester Trefusis. 6s.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—His One Love. 6d.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- BAILLIE-REYNOLDS, MRS.—The Supreme Test. 7d.
 BARNES-GRUNDY, MABEL.—Library on Her Own. 7d.
 BURGIN, G. B.—Varuck's Legacy. 6s.
 CROKER, B. M.—The Serpent's Tooth. 6s.
 EVERETT GREEN, EVELYN.—The Silver Axe. 7d.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH, and FRASER, HUGH.—The Queen's Pearl. 6s.
 GARVIE, CHARLES.—Reuben. 6d.
 HAMILTON, COSMO.—The Outpost of Humanity. 6s.
 HOPE, ANTHONY.—The Indiscretion of the Duchess. 7d.
 SINCLAIR, MAY.—The Helpmate. 6d.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Elizabeth Glen. 6d.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

- HAWKS, ELLISON.—Bees. ("Shown to the Children" Series). 2s. 6d. net.
 KIRKMAN, F. B. (Editor).—The British Bird Book. Section IX. Ordinary Edition, 10s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, 21s. net.
 KIRKMAN, F. B. (Editor).—The British Bird Book. Vol. III. Ordinary Edition, buckram, 46s. net; Edition de Luxe, half-morocco, gilt top, 84s. net.
 STEVENSON, THOMAS.—Chrysanthemums. ("Present-Day Gardening" Series). 1s. 6d. net.
 WHITTEN, WILFRED (Editor).—London Stones. Part XVI. 6d. net.
 WHITTEN, WILFRED (Editor).—London Stones. Vol. II. 6s. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

- ANDOM, R., and HODDER, R.—The Genial Rascal. 6d.
 MEADE, L. T.—The Necklace of Pomona. 6d.
 TULLOCH, MAJ.-GEN. SIR ALEXANDER BRUCE, K.C.B., C.M.G.—A Soldier's Safoing. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- BROWNE, COLONEL HAMILTON.—A Lost Legionary in South Africa. 12s. 6d. net.
 GAUNT, MARY.—Uncounted Cost. 1s. Edition.
 HARGRAVE, BASIL.—A Year's Gardening. 6s. net.
 MOORE, GEORGE.—Spring Day. 6s.
 WESTELL, W. PERCIVAL, F.L.S.—Wild Flowers in Their Home. Series. 1s. net.
 WHITE, CLAUDE GRAHAME, and HARPER, HARRY.—The Aeroplane in War. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

- ANSTEFY, F.—Voices Populi (reprinted from Punch). Second Series. With 25 Illustrations by Bernard Partridge. New Edition. 2s. net and 3s. net.
 BALY, E. C. C., F.I.C.—Spectroscopy. With 16 Illustrations. New Edition. 12s. 6d.
 BELLOWS, MAX.—A New German-English and English-German Dictionary. Proofs revised by Clarence Sherwood, Ph.D. (Berlin), and Wilhelm Johann Jagers, M.A. (Lond.). 6s. net.
 BRADLEY, CHARNOCK O., M.D., D.Sc., Principal of the Royal (Dick) Veterinary College, Edinburgh.—The Dissection of the Dog.
 BROOKS, E. F., B.Sc. (Lond.), A.M.I.E.E., and POYSER, A. W., M.A. (Trin. Coll. Dubl.).—Magnetism and Electricity. A Manual for Students in Advanced Classes.
 CALLENDER, GEOFFREY, BA.—The Life of Nelson.
 CARPENTER, S. C., M.A.—A Parson's Defence.
 CATHART, E. P., M.D.—The Physiology of Protein Metabolism.
 JAMES, WILLIAM.—Essays in Radical Empiricism.
 JOHNSON, GEORGE.—Toys and Toy Making.
 LANG, ANDREW, MA.—History of English Literature from Beowulf to Swinburne.
 MACKAIL, J. W.—The Life of William Morris. 2 Vols. With Frontispieces. New Edition. 45s. net and 6s. net.
 MELLOR, J. W., D.Sc.—Modern Inorganic Chemistry.
 MORLEY, ARTHUR, M.Sc., M.A., M.Ch.E., and INCHLEY, WILLIAM, B.Sc.—Laboratory Instruction Sheets in Elementary Applied Mechanics.
 MORRIS, WILLIAM.—News from Nowhere. Being Some Chapters from an Utopian Romance. New Edition. 2s. net and 3s. net.
 SILBURN, P. A., D.S.O.—The Evolution of Sea Power.
 THORPE, SIR EDWARD, C.B., L.I.D., F.R.S.—A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. Assisted by eminent contributors. Revised and Enlarged Edition in 5 Vols. Vol. II. With Illustrations. 45s. net.
 WEIR, JAMES.—The Energy System of Matter. A Deduction from Terrestrial Energy Phenomena.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

- ERSKINE, PAYNE.—The Mountain Girl. 6s.
 FORD'S History of Music. Illustrated.
 JANE, FRED. T.—Aircraft. 21s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- BICKNELL, ETHEL E.—Paris and Its Treasures. With Illustrations and Maps. 5s. net.
 CLEATHER, ALICE L., and CRUMP, BASIL.—Tannhauser and the Meistersingers of Nuremberg. With a Frontispiece. ("Wagner Music Dramas" Series.) 2s. 6d. net.
 HARPER, CHARLES G.—"The Autocar" Road-Book. In four volumes. With Maps. Each 7s. 6d. net. Vol. III.: East Anglia and East Midlands.
 LUCAS, E. V. (Edited by).—The Pocket Edition of the Works of Charles and Mary Lamb. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. Six volumes. 5s. each.
 IV.: Plays and Poems.
 MAETERLINCK, MAURICE.—Mary Magdalene. 1s. net.
 FERRIN, ALICE.—The Charm. 1s. net.
 PORTER, G. R. (First Compiled by). Edited by F. W. HIRST.—The Progress of the Nation. 21s. net.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. AND A. M.—The Car of Destiny. New Edition. 2s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

CORB, THOMAS.—The Voice of Bethia. 6s.
 GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—The Needlewoman. 1s. net.
 PAIN, BARRY.—Stories Without Tears. 6s.
 STODDARD, F. W.—Tramps Through Tyrol. 7s. 6d. net.
 TROUBRIDGE, LADY.—Body and Soul. 1s. net.
 WARWICK, ANNE.—The Unknown Woman. 6s.
 WYLIE, I. A. R.—Daughter of Brahma. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

CLAY, SIR ARTHUR, Bart.—Syndicalism and Labour: An Abridged and Cheaper Edition. 1s. net.
 GRAHAM, STEWART.—Where Socialism Failed: An Actual Experiment. With Illustrations and Map.
 HARRIS, F. R.—Life of Edward, First Earl of Sandwich, 1625-1672. 2 Vols. With Portraits and Illustrations.
 HOWARD, LELAND O., Ph.D.—The House Fly. With numerous Illustrations.
 HOWORTH, SIR HENRY H., K.C.I.E.—Gregory the Great. With Illustrations, Maps and Tables.
 KENNEDY, R. HON. LORD JUSTICE.—Plutus of Aristophanes. Translated into English Verse.
 LACEY, MISS MARY E.—With Dante in Modern Florence.
 MAUDE, JOAN (Described by)—Behind the Night-Light: The By-World of a Child of Three. Faithfully recorded by Nancy Price. With a Portrait of the Author.
 POLLEN, ANNE.—John Hungerford Pollen, 1820-1902. With 3 Coloured and numerous Half-Tone Illustrations.
 ROSS, H. C. Assisted by CROPPER, J. W.—Further Researches into Induced Cell-Reproduction and Cancer. Vol. II.
 SAUNDERS, KENNETH.—The Buddha's Way of Virtue ("Wisdom of the East" Series).
 TALMAGE, MRS.—Autobiography of T. de Witt Talmage, D.D. With Portraits.
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part XXI. 21s. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BADEN-POWELL, MISS, and SIR R.—The Official Handbook for Girl Guides. 1s. net.
 BEILOC, HILAIRE.—The Four Men. 2s. net.
 BROWN, DR. JOHN.—Letters of Dr. John Brown. 1s. net.
 CERVANTES.—Novelas Ejemplares. (Collection Española Nelson, in Spanish.) 1s. net.
 DE COULEVAIN, PIERRE.—Ève Victorieuse. (Collection Nelson, in French.) 1s. net.
 DEWEY, STODDARD.—Four French Adventurers. 2s. net.
 HARRADEN, BEATRICE.—Out of the Wreck I Rise. 2s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Dieu, La fin de Satan. (French.) 1s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Le Roi s'Amuse. (French.) 1s. net.
 KERR, MRS. GEORGE.—Paths of Social Progress. 2s. net.
 LEVY, ARTHUR.—La Vida Intima de Napoleon. (Collection Española Nelson, in Spanish.) 1s. net.
 MERIMEE, PROSPER.—Chronique du Règne de Charles IX. (Collection Nelson, in French.) 1s. net.
 PARKER, SIR GILBERT.—Donovan Pasha. 7d. net.
 VERNE, JULES.—Michael Strogoff. 6d. net.
 WELLS, H. G.—History of Mr. Polly. 7d. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co., Ltd.

ANDERSON, SIR ROBERT, K.C.B.—For the Honour of His Name. 2s. 6d.
 BARBER, H. VAUGHAN, M.D.—Tuberculin Treatment of Consumption. 6d. net.

Mr. David Nutt.

BROOKS, PROFESSOR F., M.A.—An Athenian Critic of Athenian Democracy. 1s. 6d. net.
 HAMILTON FYFE, H.—The Story of "The Miracle." With Photographs. Daintily bound in Illustrated Cover. 1s. 6d. net.
 J A P.—The Belfast Boy. 6s.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

WRIGHT, REV. T. H., Church of Scotland, Dresden. Author of "The Finger of God," and "The Shrine of Faith"—Christian Science: Its Teaching and Practice in the Light of Christianity. Paper Covers, 1s. net.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

FARR, FREDERICK, M.A.—The Prince (Judah).
 ELLIS, MRS. HAVELOCK.—The Lovers' Calendar. 5s. net.
 KING, CLIFFORD.—Poems.
 SAITO, IJUSHO. Translated from the German Edition by ELIZABETH LEE.—A History of Japan.
 STONE, J. HARRIS.—England's Riviera: A Topographical and Archaeological Guide to Land's End. 15s. net.
 WOOD, WALTER.—The Battleship: The Story of the Greatest Naval Weapon from the First Ship of the Line to the Present Day. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ALLINSON, A. R.—Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. 24s. net.
 ANDERSON, A. J.—The Tragedy of Sandro Botticelli. 10s. 6d. net.
 ANDOM, R.—Neighbours of Mine. 6s.
 HUSSELL, DOROTHEA.—The New Wood Nymph. 6s.
 CLEEVE, COLONEL FRED. J.—Divorce. 1s. net.
 COTES, MRS. EVERARD (SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN).—The Consort. 6s.
 D'AUVERGNE, EDMUND B.—Godoy, The Queen's Favourite. 16s. net.
 EVERETT-GREEN, E.—Galbraith of Wyndgates. 6s.
 FLOWERDEW, HERBERT.—The Villa Mystery. 6s.
 HERVEY, H. J. A.—Crimes of Indian Crime. 12s. 6d. net.
 MATHERS, HELEN.—Gay Lawries. 6d.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—House of Sunshine. 6d.
 SCULLEY, WM. C.—Ridge of the White Waters. 6s. net.
 SNOWDEN, J. KEIGHLEY.—Bright Shame. 6s.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Swelling of Jordan. 6s.
 WILLIS, W. N., and MRS. ARCHIBALD MACKIRDY (OLIVE CHRISTINE MALVERN).—White Slaves of the East. 5s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.

DAVIS, W. G., A.S.A.A.—Examination Notes on Municipal Accountancy. 1s. net.
 LAWFOORD-JONES, A. J.—Pitman's Guide to Candidates for His Majesty's Civil Service in Copying Manuscript, Orthography, Handwriting, etc. 2s. net.
 PASCOE, C. EYRE.—Dickens in Yorkshire. Illustrated in Colour, and Black and White. 1s. 6d. net.
 PAUL, HERBERT.—Famous Speeches. Second Series. 7s. 6d. net.
 TOVEY, PHILIP, A.C.C.S.—Prospectuses: How to Read and Understand Them. 1s. 6d. net.
 WORSFOLD, BASIL.—The Union of South Africa. (Pitman's "All Red" Series.) Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

"BADSWORTH"—The Principles of Auction Bridge: With the Latest Developments and the Laws of the Game. Third Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
 BANKS, ELEANOR.—Stenographer's Ready Reference.
 BLAKEMAN, A. NOEL.—Personal Recollections of the War of the Rebellion.
 CRUMPTON, M. NATALINE.—Leaflets from Italy. 6s. net.
 FAIRCHILD, ARTHUR H. R.—A View of Poetry: A Critical Study of its Nature and Value.
 HOLMES, JOHN HAYNES, D.D.—The Revolutionary Function of the Modern Church. 6s. net.
 KIMBALL, GUSTAVUS S.—Commercial Arithmetic. 6s. net.
 LLOYD, CARO.—Henry Demarest Lloyd: A Biography.
 MACNUTT, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS.—De Orbe Novo. The Eight Decades of Peter Martyr of Anghera.
 NILES, GRACE G.—The Hoosac Valley: Its Legends and its History.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

ABRAM, A. D.Sc., F.R.Hist.S.—English Life and Manners in the Later Middle Ages. From the Period of the Black Death to the end of Fifteenth Century. 6s. net.
 BRADLEY, CUTHBERT.—Fox-Hunting from Shire to Shire. A Companion to "Good Sport with some Famous Packs." 12s. 6d. net.
 LAU DAVIS, CYRIL F.—Telephotography. Illustrated. 1s. net.
 MAINWARING, COLONEL.—The Wast Drive Manual. 1s.
 PARKER, PHILIP A. M.—The Control of Water. For Power Irrigation and Water Supply Purposes.
 PATTERSON, J. G.—A "Zola" Dictionary. 8s. 6d. net.
 RAPAPORT, REV. S.—Tales and Maxims from the Talmud. Second Series. 5s. net.
 THOMPSON, H. STUART, F.L.S.—Sub Alpine Plants. Flowers of the Swiss Woods and Meadows. 7s. 6d.
 WALKER, ROWLAND.—The Treasure Gallion. A Tale of Sea Dog Days. 3s. 6d.
 WOOD, WALTER.—Thrilling Tales of Great Events. Retold from Survivors' Narratives. 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

MURDOCH, GLADYS.—Cotton is King. A Novel. 6s.

Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes.

BURY, DR. JUDSON S.—Diseases of the Nervous System. Plates, etc. 15s. net.
 CLEMISHA, W. H., M.A.—A History of Preston in Amounderness. 7s. 6d. net.
 DAWKINS, PROF. BOYD.—The Ancient Sources of the Endowments of the Church of England. 1d. pamphlet.
 SHAW, WM. B.—The Story of Presbyterianism in Wigan. 5s. net.
 WATERHOUSE, PAUL, M.A., and UNWIN, RAYMOND.—Old Towns and New Needs: The Town Extension Plan.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

BROWNING, ROBERT.—R. Browning's Works—Centenary Edition. Vol. II. With Introductions by Prof. Kewson. 10s. 6d. net.
 LEE, SIR SYDNEY (Edited by).—Dictionary of National Biography. (New Supplement, 1901-1911). Vol. I. 15s. net.
 WOLLASTON, A. F. R.—Pygmies and Papuans. 15s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—Barbara: A Novel. 6s.
 BONNEY, PROFESSOR T. G.—The Building of the Alps. 12s. 6d. net.
 BROWN, H. ROWLAND.—Butterflies and Moths at Home and Abroad. 7s. 6d. net.
 DAWSON, W. HARBUTT.—Social Insurance in Germany. 6s. net.
 GARNER, J. L.—Cæsar Borgia: A Study of the Renaissance. 12s. 6d. net.
 GORKY, MAXIM.—The Lower Depths. 2s. 6d. net.
 GOULDSBURY, CULLEN.—Songs out of Exile. 2s. 6d. net.
 HOBHOUSE, L. T.—The Labour Movement. (Revised Edition.) 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 MACGOWAN, W.—Men and Manners of Modern China. 12s. 6d. net.
 MIDDLETON, RICHARD.—Poems and Songs. 5s. net.
 MIDDLETON, RICHARD.—The Ghost Ship, and Other Stories. 5s. net.
 PERCIVAL, MACIVER.—Chats on Old Jewellery and Trinkets. 5s. net.
 PIM, FREDERIC W.—The Railways and the State. 5s. net.
 ROBERTSON, WILLIAM.—The Life and Times of John Bright. (Revised Edition.) 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

FOSTER, R. F.—Cab No. 44. 6s.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—The Missing Miss Randolph. 6s.
 MOBERLEY, L. G.—His Little Girl. 6s.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE A.—The Rose of Life. 6s.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

BRAUNS, DR. REINHARD.—The Mineral Kingdom. Translated, with Additions, by L. J. Spencer, M.A., F.G.S. With Coloured Plates. Parts XXI. and XXII. to be completed in 25 parts. 2s. net per part.
 DAVENPORT, CHARLES BÉNÉDICT.—Herodity in Relation to Eugenics. With Plates and Diagrams. 8s. 6d. net.
 FOX, FRANK, Author of "Ramparts of Empire," etc.—The Problems of the Pacific. With Map. 7s. 6d. net.
 GUPPY, H. B., M.B., F.R.S.E.—Studies in Seeds and Fruits. An Investigation with the Balance. 15s. net.
 HERFORD, REV. R. TRAVERS.—Pharisaism: Its Aims and Its Methods. (Crown Theological Library.) 5s. net.
 JOHNSTON, SIR MARY H., K.C.M.G., etc.—Views and Reviews from the Outlook of an Anthropologist. 3s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

WILKIE COLLINS.

BY ARTHUR COMPTON-RICKETT.

THE desire to make the flesh creep, is an aspiration not confined to Mr. Wardle's fat boy. From the time of that serio-comic mediævalist—Horace Walpole, "Monk" Lewis, unwearied practitioner in commonplace horrors, and Maturin, whose gruesome scenes are touched by genuine power, down to Edgar Allan Poe, who made of "bloodcurdling" a fine art, there has never been a lack of story-tellers anxious to give some fresh sensational turn to the story of incident. But until the advent of Wilkie Collins we had no writer of any marked ability who, eschewing the ordinary stage properties of romantic sensationalism, attempted to achieve these particular effects in a setting of contemporary life and manners. And the success of Collins is the more remarkable when we remember that it was made at a time when the psychological novel was in the first flush of its popularity.

This was the era of Spencer, Darwin, and Buckle, and of the critical, analytical spirit which so profoundly influenced Mid-Victorian Literature; when in 1858 Spencer's "Essays" rubbed shoulders with George Eliot's "Scenes of Clerical Life"; and when in 1861 there appeared the second volume of Buckle's "Civilisation"—and "Evan Harrington."

Meanwhile, in 1860, a story-teller in the other camp seems to have said to himself: "Science then is the magic password of the day: poetry is scientific; the character story is scientific; then I, standing for the story of incident, must make that scientific also—to keep up with the times. Very well, I will show them that you can get thrills, as well as analytical psychology, out of Science." And so Wilkie Collins gave us "The Woman in White," which a guileless public swallowed as a straightforward piece of sensational fiction; but which was, from one point of view, a nice point in mental pathology placed in a brave romantic setting. Soon afterwards he dressed up heredity in fantastic garb in "Armadale"; and, finally, put the finishing touch to his reputation by his famous mystery story, "The Moonstone," in which, after all, the entire tale hinges on the irregular action of a narcotic.

It is Science, Science all the way.

But Collins did more than romanticise Science: he informed his tales with all the logical precision of the scientific method. And a mystery story in his hands became as inevitable as a proposition in Euclid.

One reason then for Wilkie Collins' success as a story-teller of incident, lay in his appropriating the "time spirit" for romantic purposes. This, however, was only a temporary point in his favour. There are other considerations of more permanent weight to be considered. And in view of the disfavour into which he has fallen, it may be well to examine his credentials with some care. For, assuredly, Wilkie Collins is not a name to conjure with to-day.

Yet, despite the general neglect and detraction of Collins, his writings have won the admiration of such fine judges as Dickens, Thackeray, Charles Reade and Anthony Trollope, Walter Besant, George Meredith, Swinburne, Mr. Thomas Hardy, and Mr. Watts-Dunton.

Let us briefly survey the general trend of his fiction, and then note certain salient characteristics that give it distinctive value.

Unnoticed, save by a few, during the years of his apprenticeship to fiction, from the publication of his one (somewhat ponderous) historical romance, "Antonina," (1848) down to 1860, Collins leaped into sudden fame with the appearance of "The Woman in White." This is the book which kept Thackeray up all night, and excited Edward FitzGerald to the liveliest enthusiasm. It was followed in 1862 by "No Name," where the writer grips the interest of the reader by a story which has very little sensational matter, being chiefly concerned with the plucky and ultimately successful attempt of a young girl to reinstate the fortunes of her family.

Mr. Thomas Hardy tells me that he used to think "The Woman in White" and "No Name," the two best of Collins' novels.

"Armadale" (1866) was planned on more ambitious lines, and if lacking the irresistibility of "The Woman in White," and the brilliant workmanship of

To A. P. Watt

from his friend

Wilkie Collins

W. Collins

47 UNION SQUARE, N. Y.

Wilkie Collins.

From a photograph given by him to Mr. A. P. Watt, who has kindly lent it for reproduction.

"The Moonstone" (1868), has no small measure of that vivid imaginative quality that makes "The Moonstone" so notable a story.

In addition to these four remarkable novels, two volumes of short stories, "After Dark" and "The Queen of Hearts," stood already to his credit, and these contain work equal to his very best.

I recall the pleasure of a chat with Swinburne, a year or so before his death, about Wilkie Collins' work in general and "The Moonstone" in particular, and although I believe he rated "The Woman in White" more highly, delighting in Fosco and declaring Marion Halcombe to be a "glorious woman," his admiration for "The Moonstone" was considerable. "A wonderful story!" he said, and commented on the extraordinary skill with which the various narratives are taken up by different persons. He went on to talk about the rose-loving

Wilkie Collins.

A drawing by his father, William Collins, R.A.

Photographed by permission from the original in the possession of Mr. R. C. Ichmann.

Inspector Cuff as if he had been a personal friend, comparing him with another favourite character of his—Inspector Bucket. Each, he said, was excellent in his way, and yet Collins' character owed nothing at all to Dickens' vivid creation.

But the strain of maintaining the high reputation already achieved proved too much for the author. Always somewhat of an invalid, his health became worse, and the effort to interest is at times only too obvious. Unfortunately, also, his own philanthropic prepossessions led him into a type of story which ill-suited his talents. Humanitarianism fed the imagination of Dickens and broadened the boundaries of Reade's Art. But Collins, unlike Dickens, is least effective when he is discursive. And this growing inclination to show up some abuse, however admirable in the man, was of ill value to the story-teller; for he lacked the exuberant genius of the father of the Novelist.

William Collins, R.A.,

Dickens and the prehensile mind of Reade. The best of his later work is, after all, along the old lines. "The New Magdalen" was popular, certainly, both as a novel and as a play, not because of its plea for the regeneration of a fallen woman; but because it treated with dramatic

Wilkie Collins.

From the painting by Millais (in the National Portrait Gallery).

skill a story of personation. Who cares to remember that "Miss or Mrs." concerns itself with a legal point: it is sufficient that it is an ingeniously devised "Christmas Number." The hint of some unusual mystery in "The Law and the Lady" gives much of Collins' peculiar magic to the earlier chapters of that novel; but when we are dealing more particularly with the thesis of the story—the Scotch verdict of Non-Proven, our interest flags. On the other hand, where in "Jezebel's Daughter" he returns once again to his old métier, one feels directly how vastly more effective he is. And his last completed novel "The Legacy of Cain" (1888), though dull and mannered in parts, contains several scenes of remarkable power.

But even were we to put aside all the later work and 214

12, Harley Street, W.
8th May 1861

My dear Sir,

One line to log your memory.
The promised account of the Rambles (2 vols.)
has not reached me
yet.

Faithfully yours
Wilkie Collins

George Bentley Esq.

P.S. I have arranged with my law agent to put in our present edition of the Rambles in the fly-leaf of the Woman in White, in the last new edition. It comes in as a supplement to the announcement of my collected works.

Facsimile of Letter from Wilkie Collins to George Bentley, the publisher.

rest Collins' reputation upon some half-dozen of his early books, there is sufficient here to entitle him to a distinguished place among the novelists of the age.

Let us consider more closely the distinctive characteristics of Collins. The first to be noted is his technical dexterity as a story-teller.

Collins was as careful about the clarity of his stories as was Tennyson of his poems. He would have no scene, no character, that tended to blur the general effect. No novelist was more fastidious about the logical presentment of his tales than he. Despite the intricacy of many of his plots rarely indeed are there any loose ends or superfluous characters. There are numerous by-ways, but all lead back into the high road again. The complexities are legion, but they have the orderly

17, Hanover Terrace,
Regent's Park.

Here Wilkie Collins lived in the 'fifties.

disorder of an arabesque, not the confusion of a tangled skein.

This technical skill was not achieved in his earlier work. "Basil" is almost chaotic, despite its undisciplined power.

It is first apparent in "The Woman in White"; it reached its height in "The Moon-stone." "The Moon-stone" is a masterpiece of construction: from the impressive opening scene where the gem is shown in its splendid Eastern setting, through all the mazes of the 12, Harley Street,

Where Wilkie Collins lived in the 'sixties, and where Dickens and other famous authors of his day frequently visited him.

Wilkie Collins (1862).

From a pencil drawing (now in the British Museum) by R. Lehmann.

story, down to its final recapture by the Indians, there is not a scene which does not carry forward the tale, not a character that has not a part to play in the solution of the mystery. The parts fit in to one another and correlate with all the neatness of those picture puzzles that are the despair and delight of childhood.

No other English novelist can equal Collins in this respect. To find his Peer we must turn to Gaboriau and Du Boisgobey. And the author of "The Moonstone" proves superior to the creator of M. Lecocq in the manipulation of his characters. Perhaps no other quality of Collins as a writer excited more admiration among his brother craftsmen than this technical skill. Dickens (despite his amazingly wrong-headed estimate of "The Moonstone") was so impressed by it that the influence of Collins (for many years contributor to Household Words and All the Year Round) may be traced in all his later work from "Bleak House" to "Edwin Drood." Indeed, not only the methods of Collins, but little tricks of manner, can be detected in "Our Mutual Friend."

It is somewhat remarkable that while Collins, in common with most contemporary novelists, responded to the influence of Dickens, no other writer of the time so insistently modified Dickens' methods, as did his friend and sometime collaborator, Wilkie Collins. Collins' influence may be traced in two, at least, of Anthony Trollope's novels, and I should not be surprised to hear that "Felix Holt" and "Desperate Remedies" owe something to the author of "The Woman in White." But no contemporary could touch him in his own line. Yet, were his technical cleverness the only quality of Collins' work as a literary artist, one might still admire it, but rather after the fashion in which one admires an adroit juggler. Not only, however, is there much more than mechanical ingenuity in his work, but the technical excellence is the least considerable factor. And this leads me to the second point—his subtle sense of dramatic effect.

In common with two at least of his contemporaries, Dickens and Reade, Collins' conception of the novel was that of a written drama.

The essence of drama is conflict—a clash of opposing forces. Both Dickens and Reade painted this dynamic aspect of life, with strong, insistent colours, throwing into vivid contrast the high and low lights. In sheer descriptive power both novelists—though in somewhat different ways—were greatly superior to Collins.

Yet of the three, Collins yielded least to the tendency to confuse mere theatricalism with dramatic effect.

The secret of Collins' power lay not in mere description, but in suggestion. Despite the compelling interest which holds the reader of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," and "Armada," the briefest examination will show that this interest is due less to the vivid depiction of dramatic incidents, than to the artful suggestion of some impending fate.

"Don't leave me without a word."

From "The New Magdalen," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

As a matter of fact, both "The Woman in White" and "The Moonstone" are, for sensational stories, distinctly deficient in incidental interest. The burning of the vestry in the former, and the discovery of the murdered Ablewhite in the latter, are among the few genuine incidental thrills. And both of these occur at the close of the story. How different from the succession of stirring scenes in "Hard Cash" or "Foul Play."

Wilkie Collins excites us not by what he tells us, but by what he does not tell us. He creates an atmosphere of fateful drama, and then keeps us on the tip-toe of expectancy for the crisis which arrives, in most cases, quite late in the story—and occasionally, never at all! Thus his method is subtle and allusive, never simple and straight forward.

He sets his stage as carefully as Dumas, but not as a frame for vigorous melodrama. The hot summer evening; the timid fugitive figure of Anne Catherick; the sense of unrest in Mr. Fairleigh's home; the hints of some villainy behind the well-bred conventionality of the Baronet, grip the imagination as no mere violent sensationalism would do. For a story-teller who relies upon plot rather than on character for his interest, it is remarkable with what economy he husbands his sensational effects. With the ordinary stock in trade of the sensational writer he will have little to do.

Murder looms seldom in his stories; of fighting there is next to nothing; hair-breadth escapes interest him but slightly; and out of the way occurrences are few and far between. Eschewing these things on the one hand, and the psychological interest of the character novel on the other, it is surely a signal testimony to his power as a literary artist that he should hold us with such unmistakable enthrallment. He is a master of dramatic innuendo; the Sterne of sensationalism. He can thrill you more by the posting of a letter, than most of his school can by a lurid murder.

A third characteristic remains to be noted: the faculty for pictorial suggestion.

Wilkie Collins was the son of a painter—he exhibited in 1849 a landscape of his own at the Royal Academy, and always retained a fine critical appreciation of the painter's art. The mastery of the technique of more than one art usually leads the artist to borrow from a sister art in dealing with a specific art form. Thus many of Rossetti's poems are Pre-Raphaelite pictures painted in words. William Morris's verse has the spacious diffused beauty of his tapestries; and the architectural quality of Mr. Hardy's prose has often been noted.

It may be objected that every novelist with the sense of dramatic effect indulges in pictorial suggestion. In a sense, that is true, just as every novelist treats Nature as a stage-property. But there is a profound difference between the scenic effects of the ordinary novelist where, to quote Oscar Wilde's amusing gibe, the story-teller "lightens the evening sky into violent chromolithographic effects," for purposes of rhetorical flourish, and the scenic effects of a writer like Collins where scenic effects are no mere background but an integral part of the story. Thus the supernatural element in "Armada" revolves round a series of dream pictures; and even a sunset on the Norfolk Broads, and the slanting rain of a passing storm are organic elements in the plot. The most

Wilkie Collins.

"The Novelist who invented sensation," Nationality Fair for Feb. 4, 1875, by permission of the proprietors.

dramatic scene in "No Name," where the heroine, Magdalen, meditates suicide, is presented in pictorial form—and peculiarly vivid pictorial form.

"She removed the cork, and lifted the bottle to her mouth.

"At the first cold touch of the glass on her lips, her strong young life leapt up in her leaping blood, and fought with the whole frenzy of its loathing against the close terror of Death."

* * * * *

"Her cheeks flushed deep; her breath came thick and

"I shifted my hold to the back of his neck."

From "Basil," by Wilkie Collins.

fast. With the poison still in her hand, with the sense that she might faint in another moment, she made for the window, and threw back the curtain that covered it.

"The new day had risen. The broad grey dawn flowed in on her, over the quiet eastern sea.

"Frank cast the dice."

From "The Frozen Deep," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

"She saw the waters, heaving large and silent in the misty calm; she felt the fresh breath of the morning flutter cool on her face. Her strength returned; her mind cleared a little. . . . She resolved to end the struggle by setting her life or death on the hazard of a chance.

"Lucilla tries her sight."

From "Poor Miss Finch," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

"On what chance?"

"The sea showed it to her. Dimly distinguishable through the mist, she saw a little fleet of coasting vessels slowly drifting towards the house, all following the same direction with the favouring set of the tide. In half-an-hour—perhaps in less—the fleet would have passed her window. The hands of her watch pointed to four o'clock. She seated herself close at the side of the window, with her back towards the quarter from which the vessels were drifting down on her with the poison placed on the window-sill, and the watch on her lap. For one half-hour to come, she determined to wait there, and count the vessels as they went by. If, in that time, an even number passed her—the sign given should be a sign to live. If the uneven number prevailed—the end should be death.

"With that final resolution, she rested her head against the window, and waited for the ships to pass.

* * * * *

"Nineteen minutes; and five ships. Twenty minutes. Twenty-one, two, three—and no sixth vessel. Twenty-four, and the sixth came by. Twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and the next uneven number—the fatal seven—glided into view. Two minutes to the end of the half-hour. And seven ships.

"Twenty-nine, and nothing followed in the wake of the seventh ship. The minute-hand of the watch moved on half-way to thirty—and still the white heaving sea was a misty blank. Without moving her head from the window, she took the poison in one hand, and raised the watch in the other. As the quick seconds counted each other out, her eyes, as quick as they, looked from the watch to the sea, from the sea to the watch—looked for the last time at the sea—and saw the EIGHTH ship.

"She never moved; she never spoke. The death of thought, the death of feeling, seemed to have come to her already. She put back the poison mechanically on the ledge of the window; and watched, as in a dream, the ship gliding smoothly on its silent way—gliding till it melted dimly into shadow—gliding till it was lost in the mist.

Photo by Elliott & Fry

Wilkie Collins.

* * * * *

"Her eyes closed, and her head fell back. When the sense of life returned to her, the morning sun was warm on her face—the blue heaven looked down on her—and the sea was a sea of gold."

The crucial situation in that fine short story, "A Terribly Strange Bed," is lifted out of ordinary melodrama into artistic significance by the brooding intensity of its pictorial effects. What a masterly touch is the suggestion of those disappearing feathers!

Scarcely inferior in its visualizing power and pictorial quality is the eerie bedroom scene in the "Dream Woman." Collins made quite a speciality of his bedroom studies and of "night nerves." Many of his novels are nocturnes; and just as Hawthorne loved the "brown twilight" for the weaving of his fantasies, so did Collins seem to find in the lamplight and shadows plenary inspiration.

But whatever the subject, rarely does Collins fail to paint his scene without the telling economy of the genuine artist. This for instance from "The Woman in White":

"A white fog hung over the lake. The dense brown line of the trees on the opposite bank appeared above it like a dwarf forest floating in the sky. The sandy ground, shelving downwards from where we sat was lost mysteriously in the outward layers of the fog."

In quite another vein is this little etching of Castletown in the Isle of Man:

"In the central solitudes of the city, there was a squat grey building called 'the castle'; also a memorial pillar dedicated to one Governor Smelt, with a flat top for a statue, and no statue standing on it; also a barrack, holding the half company of soldiers allotted to the island, and exhibiting one spirit-broken sentry at its lonely door. The prevalent colour of the town was faint grey. The few shops

(Enter Phoebe)
Phoebe, Martin!
Martin, Phoebe here now!—It wanted but that to make the trial complete!
Phoebe, Martin, I have heard all.
Martin, (Aghast.) All?
Phoebe, All that passed between my father and you.—What is this dreadful secret that threatens to separate us?—Oh, Martin! are you really true to me still?
Martin, True in my heart of hearts—never truer, Phoebe, than at this moment.
Phoebe, Then trust me with the secret! Whatever it is, I will take all the risk of telling it to my father.
Martin, (Hide, and moving from her toward the table.) I can hear with it!—Soil her pure heart with that foul secret?—Oh, never! never!
Phoebe, You turn away! Won't you tell me?—Have you decided to tell my father? let me know that, at least—our time is short—in less than half an hour the boat will put off for shore.—Martin! all that we two have to hope for in this world is at stake. Have you decided?—Yes? or No?

Facsimile of a page of the manuscript of "The Lighthouse," by Wilkie Collins.

(In the Forster Collection, Victoria and Albert Museum.)

open were parted at frequent intervals by other shops closed and deserted in despair. The weary lounging of boatmen on shore was trebly weary here; the youth of the district smoked together in speechless depression under the lee of a dead wall; the ragged children said mechanically, 'Give us a penny,' and before the charitable hand could search the merciful pocket, lapsed away again in misanthropic doubt of the human nature they addressed."—(From "Armada")

The sketch is not unworthy of Dickens.

And undoubtedly, it was through this pictorial power that Collins was able to make so many of his characters vivid and striking—no easy matter in a form of fiction where the characters exist for the story, and not the story for the characters, as in the novels of Meredith and Hardy.

How clear cut and distinctive is the personality of Fosco. He is worthy of Thackeray's Art, and for cleverness and esprit deserves to rank with Becky Sharp. "Two of a trade never agree," otherwise one might have been tempted to mate them!

Nor was the Count an isolated success. Lydia Gwilt is a singularly fresh version of the adventuress, considering she was invented at a time when green-eyed Becky was all the rage. In depicting her as in less ambitious studies such as the old scoundrel, Captain Wragge, the unscrupulous mother in "Jezebel's Daughter," or the sinister embodiment of "The Dream Woman," the same avoidance of the conventional and obvious is observed by means of the vivid pictorial touch.

Critics complain of Collins' characters that they are mere embodiments of tricks and mannerisms. "They are recognisable chiefly by their externals," said one critic, "they have no inner life." Well, who demises of it? This must of necessity be so where characters exist for the story and not the story for the characters. In characterisation of this kind, how is it possible to give colour and form without the externalising process? The crucial point is not whether they are psychologically complete, but whether as they stand, they are alive.

On the whole, I should unhesitatingly say: Yes. The old House Steward with his touching confidence in "Robinson Crusoe," as a prophetic book, the brilliant sketches of the lawyers Pedgilt, the easy-going, genial,

Wilkie Collins.

After the painting by Rudolph Lehmann.
Photograph by special permission from the original in the possession of Mr. R. C. Lehmann.

though commonplace Allan Armada, Marion Halcombe and Magdalen Vanstone, are not easily forgotten. Dickens externalized, but few nowadays would deny vitality to his characterisations. Collins lacked, of course, the amazing inventiveness of his friend: but he had a good share of his power to actualize a character with a few touches. And, considering the complicated plots with which he dealt, the wonder is that he was able to touch so many figures into life and significance.

And here limitations of space remind me that this apologia for Collins must draw to a close. Sufficient has perhaps been said to draw attention to a writer of fiction greatly under-rated at the present day. At his best he had no small measure of Poe's power to kindle the emotions of horror and suspense. And if he lacked the supreme artistic eclecticism of Poe, neither had he that tendency to sear rather than stimulate the imagination of the reader. Despite his insistent interest in pathological types, there is a wholesome sanity about his outlook, and something of the man's own sensitive and kindly nature expresses itself in everything he wrote.

"He was," says Mr. Watts Dunt, who knew him very well, "the sweetest-tempered literary man I have ever met, without a spark of envy in his nature and modest to a degree."

Finally, let me add this notable tribute from our greatest living novelist to whom lately I addressed a query on the subject. Mr. Thomas Hardy, after a brief and pleasant reference to the man himself, writes thus: "He probably stands first, in England, as a constructor of novels of complicated action, that depend for their interest on the incidents themselves and not on character. Yet while he was writing he was scandalously ridiculed by the same critical papers that twenty years afterwards praised second rate imitations of his methods. . . ."

Certainly, not the least tribute to Collins' powers is to be found in the countless imitations his writings have evoked. One has only to compare the best contemporary work of this kind with the work of Collins, to realise that, whatever his limitations may have been, he was, along his own lines, a vital and original force in English fiction.

HEROES OF ARMAGEDDON.

BY WALTER SICHEL.

THIS title might well suit Pitt and Napoleon, for the Book of Revelation's divine battlefield, after the seventh vial was poured out, furnishes no inapt emblem of the later chapters in the Book of Revolution. And Armageddon is, if it may so be styled, the pet hobby of Professor Holland Rose. He surveys the ground from every standpoint, over and over again, minutely and exactly. He scrutinises the antagonists, nor does zeal outrun judgment, or colour over-disturb outline. He is eminently "sound," acting up to Lucian's advice in his "Way to write History" that the grandeur of a subject need not startle the hearer, and that, at times, it may be "best for the spirit to go a-horseback and the expression to run beside on foot, holding on to the saddle, so as not to be outstripped." In the subject there still is romance and poetry, though we have had the "Life of Napoleon," the "William Pitt and National Revival," the "William Pitt and the Great War"—each of them a new contribution, all most informing in their ways. And now we get his "Pitt and Napoleon: Essays and Letters" also compelling and informing. Its way, to be sure, is occasionally rather devious, for "British Rule in Corsica," though unique in its bearings both personal and political, offers a sidelight only on Armageddon. "Pitt and Relief of the Poor," too, interesting as it is respecting a problem from which Armageddon detained Pitt, applies with more point to modern junctures and the old experiment of a

* "Pitt and Napoleon: Essays and Letters." By Professor Holland Rose. 10s. 6d. net. (G. Bell & Sons.)

82, Wimpole Street,

Where Wilkie Collins died, 23rd Sept., 1889.

"minimum wage." In the main, however, much new light is shed, though Pitt is more illuminated than Napoleon, perhaps because more of unworn material is to hand, and also because, perhaps, Napoleon is so subtle and elusive. The thick volume divides itself into "Essays" and "Letters." Of the former, five concern Napoleon, while six deal with Pitt. Among the latter none are Napoleon's, though among the "Essays" one treats of England's arch-anti-Jacobin. Psychology is not Professor Rose's foible, and though Napoleon's temperament enters into "Did Napoleon intend to invade England" as in 1804, with every allowance for the colossal gambler's demoralising bluff, Professor Rose maintains that he did—it does not specially enter into "Napoleon's conception of the Battle of Waterloo," or even the interesting review of "General Marbot and his Memoirs," while "The True Significance of Trafalgar" can scarcely be held to involve temperament at all.

In the "Invasion" Essay, the author does find clues in one of the true Corsican's earliest pronouncements on the art of war: "He who stays in his entrenchments is beaten. Experience and Theory are at one on this point"; in his passion for taking the initiative in war; and in his dramatic mot to Latouche-Tréville: "Let us be masters of the Straits for six hours, and we shall be masters of the world." The episode of Napoleon's visit of triumph to Boulogne, ere Pitt's renewed activity and the unexpected coalition backing it had marred Bonaparte's plans is not very familiar. Professor Rose thus graphically depicts it: "... Along the street re-named 'Rue Impériale' were erected twelve triumphal arches, named after his chief victories; and further on was a portico leading to a Temple of Immortality. On reaching the quay an obelisk confronted him bearing an inscription which bade him vindicate the liberty of the seas, soon to be assured by the avenging thunderbolts flying forth from that estuary. . . . He urged the adoption of all possible measures for bringing up the flotilla from the Western ports, . . . and we may not unreasonably assign to the first part of this sojourn at or near Boulogne the order for the construction of the famous medal showing him as Hercules strangling a merman. The legend is as follows: 'Descente en Angleterre: trappée à Londres, 1804.' The fact that all possible copies of this medal were afterwards destroyed affords additional proof that he had at one time cherished the confident expectation of dictating terms of peace at London." The "Marbot" review, with its interesting analysis and exposure of the gasconades in the Memoirs, the disquisitions on Trafalgar, with the paradox that its influence was restricted to the Mediterranean, the very able summary of the tragedy of errors on one side and the coincidences of luck on the other, that would seem to have decided Waterloo, are unusual themes handled with insight and penetration. But the most living of these Napoleonicisms is the "Interview with Napoleon in Elba," reprinted from the rare account by Major Vivian of his conversations with the Emperor in the January of 1815. Scenes and words stand out with Boswellian distinctness, and the past rises from the dead in dramatic moments. Here is the chief actor's first appearance: "... We found him standing by the fire, at the further end of a room adjoining the ante-chamber, and into which he had come on being informed of our arrival. This room was about the size of that we had left, and was fitted up with old yellow furniture, brought, as we understood, from the palace of his sister at Piombino. On our entrance he advances towards us, and we took our stations with our backs against a table that stood between the windows. Whilst he was advancing he began the conversation: 'Quel uniforme est celui que vous portez?' 'Celui de la milice.' 'De quel Comté?' 'De Cornouailles.' 'C'est un pays bien montagneux?' 'Oui, assez.' 'De quel hauteur sont les montagnes, comme celles-ci?' ... " And then from the militia uniform (shade of Gibbon!) and these Cornish "mountains" the conversation springs off to the great continental roads which were the arteries of his system, to the Simplon and the Tessino Bridge, to the ramparts of Vienna and their substituted gardens at Frankfort, to the "Congress," to Blücher ("A brave man, but not a great general"), to the domineering instincts of the Canton of Berne ("There is no yoke so severe as that of a people"), to the Pope ("Who was always sacrificing his conscience to some miserable little piece of policy"), to the Americans who, being now

"une nation de marchands" wanted a ten years' war to give them "a noblesse" and make them a nation, to—wonder of wonders!—an alliance between England and France, which this miracle of an enemy declared ought to take place—"pourquoi pas? le monde est assez grand"—adding: "There was a man, Fox, who could have effected it, but unfortunately he is dead," to Naples and the "magnificent Lazzarone," to the Julian Alps—and the "low bow" with which this master of sentences, as of services, "retired."

About the master of Parliament and the incarnation of Great Britain there is much enlightenment, especially in the later letters. That Pitt was a great statesman and a commanding, a delivering presence no one can doubt. That he was deemed a great orator in a generation of greatness is certain, though it may be doubted whether his oratory was ever supreme, or whether one of his sentences ever told on the public as did Sheridan's (blamed in connection with its object) regarding the Quiberon disaster: "Englishmen, it is true, have not shed their blood, but the honour of England has bled at every pore." But that he was a brilliant letter-writer or in any way a literary genius may, despite Professor Rose's Ciceronian citations, be flatly denied. The citations from Pitt form the best evidence to the contrary. Polish, classical balance, lucidity, intellectual distinction are usually present. Calmness, too, is a characteristic, and we learn from a striking episode

"He stopped at the place he had fixed on."

From "Hide and Seek," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

"Sister Rose."

From "After Dark," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

(about Sir John Moore) in this volume how much Pitt disliked "the language of passion." Mentally he was a Grenville, nor did he ever resemble his father's less northern nature. He was self-complacent, as well as self-contained. Often, indeed, he inclined to platitude, as some of these letters attest, and many even of the speeches. His prim fluency (if the phrase may be pardoned) could be fatal, and it was Sheridan who once said of him that his brain was set in motion by the wagging of his tongue, as a clock is by the pendulum. Nor are his rhythms musical. Music is the soul of oratory, and this alone would justify scepticism anent his claims to the oratorical crown. Oratory should be the poetry of prose, or the prose of poetry. In Pitt it was neither; he lacked the sacred fire, and he was most deficient in imagination. His real afflatus was his patriotism, and character inspired that enthusiasm. In will and concentration dedicated to duty, in tenacity of action, he was superb. His best speeches are a fine character finely expressed, and he was always great on great occasions. The majesty was his, but not the graces, and we cannot but smile when Professor Rose instances a weak and ill-scanned couplet of tu-quoque as a specimen of "sprightly repartee" * and adduces an early and somewhat stilted rebuke to Burke as a proof that "he could vie with his opponent in wealth of imagination and grace of diction." † Not long before, he reproved the young Sheridan (an interlude which escapes these pages) and evoked the famous retort about the "angry boy," which stuck as only real wit can stick to the assailant all his life. As for the letter-writing, often interesting, always pertinent from the themes, it would be better, I submit, to say straight out, that from any literary standard Pitt was no letter-writer at all ‡. If he did not write poetically, however, none could write more practically than Pitt. There are admirable instances of his retorts both "courteous and crushing." And there is the very triumph of firmness combined with tact in the long epistle of November, 1794 (p. 230), in which the first Minister, in effect, disillusioned the King as to his favourite son's military talents. "Nobody has ever written down anyone an ass with greater gentleness, point and caution than Pitt" here writes down the Duke of York. And George the Third was a real power to be reckoned with. He was a King indeed, who advised, as well as consulted,

* Professor Rose, remarking that Pitt's sallies were reserved for his private circle, cites the following case of his giving "fancy the rein" in public:

Fox, in December, 1782, had ironically quoted against Pitt a rather poor distich:

"You've done a noble turn in nature's spite;

For though you think you're wrong, I'm sure you're right" which Pitt thus parodied:

"The praise he gives us in his nature's spite;

He wishes we were wrong, but clearly sees we're right." Would either of these be accepted now by the Editor of Punch?

† "I rise, therefore, to bring back the House to sobriety and seriousness, and to tell them that this is neither a fit time nor a proper subject for the exhibition of a gaudy fancy, or the wanton blandishments of theatrical enchantment. It is your duty and business to break the magician's wand, to dispel the cloud, beautiful as it is, which has been thrown over our heads, and to consider solemnly and gravely the very perilous situation of the country."

‡ The letters of his boyhood are rather pompous and priggish. Take this short sentence (p. 95) as an example: "Papa's annotation is inimitably charming." Among his later effusions is one to Bishop Tomline about Mr. Trimmer's and Mr. Lancaster's schemes for education, which is the acme of a style parodied by Dickens in the person of "Sir Barnet Skottles."

his Ministers. One of his sentences about the Ireland of 1785 will not be out of place now. Adverting to "a final settlement between the two Kingdoms," he writes: "... The justice of Ireland contributing to the general expense of the Empire, when by this measure (i.e., Pitt's Commercial Proposition) she is to be greatly enriched, and whatever she gains appears to be at the expense of Britain, cannot be denied." And on the Earl of Fitzwilliam's conduct in Ireland of 1795—an episode where Pitt has been here most ably vindicated and Fitzwilliam has been shown to have contradicted his previous knowledge of the Cabinet's decision—"I cannot conclude," says the monarch straight out, "without expressing that the subject is one beyond the decision of any Cabinet of Ministers." If the Constitution meant anything it always meant that there were limits, and notwithstanding his honest and narrow obstinacy, George understood those limits perfectly well. He might spell as imperfectly as he spoke, and often thought, he might (did he mind Hannah Lightfoot?) call Quakers "Quackers," but he was perfectly well aware when statesmanship left off and quackery began. The new letters here first presented comprise, too, some fascinating ones from Burke to Windham, at a time when the former was nearing the close of his life and, as he feared, of Great Britain's glory. In one of these he says of Jacobinism what may well be said of its great-grandchild, Socialism—though now with less moderation and fewer exceptions: "The body of the people is untainted in all ranks, and is by far the most sound in the humblest of all. But there is no rank or class into which the evil of Jacobinism has not penetrated, and that disseminated contagion is infinitely more mischievous than if it had seized upon the whole of any one description, for then the whole of some other would be enabled to act with union, energy, and vigour against it. . . . They will produce other Bills, the children not of their strength, but of their weakness, and will multiply like those feeble animals who increase in proportion to their insignificance."

From each syllable of Pitt's correspondence, from every trace of action here revealed and investigated—his native and uncompromising honesty of purpose; his inherited hatred of corruption, his robust, if sometimes timid, commonsense; his uncommon courage, emerge. There is no space here to illustrate the behind-scenes, instances which Professor Rose has unearthed in his hero's justification concerning both the recall of Fitzwilliam and the Quiberon Expedition. The latter discloses a real drama, rendered with a power on which Professor Rose is to be congratulated. The summary of the brief British rule in Corsica well deserves perusal, aptly characterising the pattern Whig, Elliot, Moore's nascent impulsiveness, and the crossed, calculating, ill-starred Paoli. Pitt does not figure at his best in these transactions; and throughout them as throughout the Fitzwilliam imbroglio, the Duke of Portland's obstinate and blundering coldness is manifest. Perhaps the best-written of all these essays, if we may be allowed to say so, is that on "Pitt and Relief of the Poor." A soul is put into the figures. Pitt believed that "trade, industry, and barter will always find their own level," yet in November, 1796—that year of distress—he brought forward a "Poor Bill" providing in certain cases for a small allowance for children whose father or widowed mother was entitled to poor relief, further empowering advances to buy a cow to maintain a family, enabling parish schools of industry to be founded with opportunities for employment, and for the conversion into such schools of the workhouses. More than all it contemplated the nucleus of an insurance scheme, supported partly by contributions and partly by the rates. The Speenhamland experiment of a minimum wage, and the "slipshod philanthropy," which Pitt "abetted" are also discussed, while John Harriott's scheme for Old Age Pensions will be new to most. Every one refusing to subscribe (though contribution was not compulsory) was to wear a badge with the word "Drone" upon it. Harriott evidently had some sense of humour.

Pitt among the philanthropists!—and he certainly had the abolition of slavery at heart—there was nothing that Pitt was not capable of mastering and adapting from emancipation to repression. And if his prosecutions were branded as tyranny, so much treason then stalked abroad that his action was provoked, largely welcomed, and frequently warranted. There are seasons when "freedom of speech" is incompatible with freedom itself, and for loyal freedom Pitt always stood.

Once let freedom escape from discipline and loyalty, and she becomes a robber of the road calling on thriit and order to stand and deliver; while the black mask of grand causes only adds hypocrisy to the felonies that disgrace her, and veils the guilt inseparable from her gaze

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JUNE, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

90, GLOUCESTER PLACE,
PORTMAN SQUARE, W.

1st January 1887

I desire that my friend
and literary representative,
Mr. A. P. Watt, of 2 Paternoster Square, may act as my literary executor, and that his advice may be accepted as representing my literary interests and wishes, in regard to the copyright of my books which may remain to be sold after my death, by my other executors.

W. Collins

Facsimile of letter attached to the will of Wilkie Collins.

Reproduced by permission of Mr. A. P. Watt, Collins' literary executor.

I. A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original sonnet.

II. A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

III. A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best pen-and-ink caricature of any well known living author.

IV. A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published novel. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.

V. A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR MAY.

1.—This Ballad Competition has met with an even larger response than last month's Lyric Competition, but the average merit of the poems sent in has not been so high. Some of the ballads are simply bad ; some start admirably but soon weaken and fall to pieces. After full and careful consideration we have decided to divide the PRIZE this month and are sending HALF A GUINEA to Mrs. H. SHARLAND, of 3, Overton Road, Bristol, and HALF A GUINEA to Mr. E. W. HIGGS, of 33, Thistlewaite Road, Clapton, N.E., for the following :

LEGEND OF THE FIRST ROSE

The fields dipped down from Bethlehem,
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
And there, in the low green sweep of them,
She stood like a frightened dove

The people howled for the sacrifice,
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
She had done great sin—she must pay the price,
Oh! shelter the trembling dove

And now for the stake and the kindling wood!
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
Alone in her close white garb she stood,
O fluttering heart of the dove!

"All night I wept, and all day I prayed"
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
"Some sign from heaven for a guiltless maid,"
O spotless breast of the dove!

The sun burns yellow as beaten brass,
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
The fierce heat scorches the trembling grass,
And mocks at the helpless dove

Then strike the flints! Let the fire burn high!
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
'Tis thus that Justice bids sinners die,
O quivering flesh of the dove!

The quick fire curled up its tongues of flame,
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
Then stayed and glowed in a ruddy shame
By the fluttering heart of the dove

For there where the faggot pile had been—
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
Fair rose trees bloomed with the maid between,
As pure as a flawless dove

Red buds for shame, and white buds for Truth,
(And the fair blue sky arched wide above),
Amidst, sweet rose in her lovely youth,
She stood like a frightened dove

ROSE E. SHARLAND

BEFORE SEDGEMOOR,

Two hours afore the dawn
Oor capten zays to we
"Rize oop you men o' Zummerzet Preepare to yollow me!"

No zound of bugle blown,
The whispered words wor vew,
Arl zilently us gathered round
King Moonmouth's banner blue

Ah! manny a gallant lad
As ztood along o' me,
Vor thik blue banner zpilt hes blood,
Or ved the gallas dree.

Zaid Parson: 'Let us pray,'
An' kneeled 'un on the zod,
Whiles he en zimple words an' vew
Commended we to God.

"Oh Lord, us do be wik
The zons o' Beelial ztrong,
Ztrengthun each arm thik day to vight,
Help us to right the wrong"

Oor guns wor urd wi' rust,
An' urd wi' rust each zwoord;
Us trusted not in carnal thengs,
But rather in the Lord.

Captain Wragge meets Miss Garth.

"No Name," by Wilkie Collins (W. Collins, Sons & Co. Illustrated Pocket Classics.)

Thou vorward wor the word
Zays Capten "Yollow me",
Us had no year by day or dark
A yollowin' of he

Now as us traped along,
Zaid Urchett Thorne to me
'Or'm longing vor the dawn," in zaid,
"I will be the last," zays he

Bevore us in the dark
A zudden goonzhot came,
An' in a twink the darkness broke
An' vlated, a hell o' vlamme

There ran a dreadful cry
"Oh God, us be betrayed",
But us wor Zummerzet an' zo
In death wor undizmayed

E. W. HIGGS.

Next in order of merit come the BALLADS of G. R. Harvey (Aberdeen), B. R. M. Heatherington (Carlisle), Ada E. Mann (Rhyl), Jean Wilson (Chippenharn), and there is good work also in those received from Miss P. M. McCleverty (London, S.W.), Margaret Dickin (Wrexham), Willfred Morris (Bodmin), Miss J. M. Pym (Oxford), Ethel Philp (Edinburgh), W. J. Campbell (Edinburgh), Mary B. Gillespie (Denny), Marjorie G. Alexander (London, W.C.), Maud J. Findlay (Brighton), Eveline E. He (Plumstead Common), Leith Gordon (Birmingham), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), W. G. Priest (Norwich), C. L. Alexander (Harrogate), R. B. Ince (London, N.W.), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Margaret McIntyre (Ealing), Edwin Walters (London,

S.E.), H. Elrington (Monkstown), John Nisbet (Edinburgh), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), C. M. Walkerdine (Birmingham), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Alfred Victor Waller (Sunderland), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Robert White, Junior (Edinburgh), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Thomas Brown (Glasgow), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Fred Horsley (Hull), Geraldine Tatlow (Chippenhams), Theodore Maynard (West Hampstead), I. Jackson (Greenock), E. Herbert Jones (Liverpool), Augustus Muir (Edinburgh), Ellen J. Clutterbuck (Bromley), Mark Anderson (Menstrie), Neil Ramsay (Coatbridge), E. Howard (Putney), Ivan Adair (Rathmines), Annie G. Patrick (Birmingham), C. G. Taylor (Heswall), Miss S. Poultny (Ulverston), Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), C. L. P. (Edgbaston),

'She opened an invisible side door in the wall.'

From "The Law and the Lady," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

"A male human being who wrote little poems in her praise."

From "Blind Love," by Wilkie Collins. (Chatto & Windus.)

Ernest A. Kersten (Thornton Heath), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Violet D. Dean (Bromley), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), E. J. Martin, Constance Goodwin (Clapham), J. Tarry (Richmond), Eleanor Gray (Whitby), A. E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), C. H. Whitby (Yeovil), Dorothea Anderson (Dumfries), John I. Leckie (Spennymoor), Mary Hughes (Banbury), M. A. Newman (Badingham), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), A. J. Dick (High Wycombe), M. C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), Kathleen Knox (Bellast), Annie Clarke (High Wycombe), Mrs. E. K. Marshall (Merton Park), Albert Morrison (Glasgow), Florence M. Wilson (Bangor), O. J. Connolly (Brockley), J. Ewing, Rev. Archibald J. Ashley (Cannock), Miss H. Winter (Dublin), J. Charles King (West Hampstead), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon), Evelyn Grace Lalonde (Bath), C. H. Chambers (Glossop), F. E. Briggs (Crown Hill), A. J. Briggs (Crown Hill), Lilian King (Dalhousie), R. H. Evans (Constantinople).

I.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Mr. WILFRID M. APPLEBY, of 19, Pleasant Road, Southend-on-Sea, for the following :

CHANGE IN THE VILLAGE. By GEORGE BOURNE. (Duckworth.)

"Passing rich on forty pounds a year."

GOLDSMITH, Deserted Village.

We also select for printing :

THE SIGN. By MRS. ROMILLY FEDDEN. (Macmillan & Co.)

"He put his thumb unto his nose,
And spread his fingers out."

W. S. GILBERT, Bab Ballads.

(Ellen Webster, 6, Warrington Road, Ipswich.)

LITTLE INCIDENTS. BY FREDERICK WATSON.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"I've planned a little burglary, and forged a little cheque
And slain a little baby for the coral on its neck!"
W. S. GILBERT, Bab Ballads.

(Marjorie W. Bostock, 52, Devonshire Road, Forest Hill, S.E.).

THE SHADOW OF POWER. BY PAUL BERTRAM.
(John Lane.)

"A rod
To check the erring!"
WORDSWORTH, Ode to Duty.

(H. Eleanor Pinnington, 25, Wellington Road, Brighton.)

THINGS THAT MATTER. BY L. CHIOZZA MONFY.
(Methuen & Co.).

"We may live without friends—we may live without books
But civilised man cannot live without cooks."

OWEN MEREDITH, Lucile.

(Miss M. Morton-Smith, Chin-wang-tao, N. China.)

COMMONERS' RIGHTS. BY C. SMEDLEY.
(Chatto & Windus.)

"'Bother it!' I may Occasionally say"

W. S. GILBERT, H.M.S. Pinafore

(Charles Powell, "Dovedale," Victoria Park, Manchester.)

HAVOC. BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"He vaulted from the pulpit, like a tiger from his den
They say it was a lovely sight to see him floor his men Right and left, and left and right; straight and true and hard,

Till the Ebenezer Chapel was more like a knacker's yard!"
SIR A. CONAN DOYLE, Bondy's Sermon

(James A. Richards, 10, Park Road, Tenby,
S. Wales.)

"Is that the road to London?"

"The Woman in White," by Wilkie Collins. (W. Collins, Sons & Co.'s Illustrated Pocket Classics).

"Excuse my asking one question."

From "The Moonstone," by Wilkie Collins. (W. Collins, Sons & Co.'s Illustrated Pocket Classics).

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best account of how a woman has acted chivalrously towards another woman or a man is awarded to the Rev. EDWIN C. LANSDOWN, of The Manse, Derby Road, South Woodford, N.E., for the following:

In a Perthshire monastery, James I. of Scotland had retired to his apartment with his Queen and a few attendants. Armed men approached. The ladies instantly endeavoured to secure the door, but found the bolts had been previously removed. Lady Catherine Douglas chivalrously thrust her arm through the ironwork to make a bolt, while James escaped by lifting a board in the floor. The delicate arm was soon broken by the pressure of the soldiers, but this brave act would doubtless have saved the king's life, had he not prematurely disclosed his hiding place before his foes had left the monastery.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. JOHN F. HARRIS, of St. John's College, Cambridge, for the following:

THE CENTAUR. BY ALGERNON BLACKWOOD.
(Macmillan.)

Like Poe, Mr. Blackwood is a writer of "things on the margin." His is a mind wonderfully adapted to clarity into words the most subtle psychic experiences. His newest tale is founded on the theory of Fechner, that the earth throws off certain cosmic beings, emanations from herself. With its central figure, Terence O'Malley, the primitive being unspoiled by modernity, and its insistence on the necessity of escaping the complexities of civilisation, this book should undoubtedly be read in the Spring. Although it is somewhat pagan in conception, we follow absorbed the adventure of O'Malley until the "inner catastrophe" occurs.

Other good reviews received are :

HERSELF. By ETHEL SIDGWICK. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

For the atmosphere of this delightful story, the writer has caught the charm of Paris, the elusive pathos of Ireland and the sweetness of English gardens in summer. Herein move Harrie Clench, who "collected people," and Pat, her cousin, a beloved vagabond. And in the background waits the solid figure of Geoffry Horn, journalist and friend in need. We have to take Harrie's word for it that Horn is collectable; for he is the one merely worthy man in a group of really human people, whose adventures are set forth in a pleasantly elliptical and altogether charming fashion.

(Hester Marshall, 83, Philbeach Gardens, Earl's Court, S.W.)

IN THE SHADOW OF ISLAM. By DEMETIA VAKA.
(Constable.)

An interesting story about European and Asiatic life in Turkey. There are two plots—one concerned with the "Young Turks" movement to free their country from a despotic rule, the other is the love affair of Orkan Effendi, one of the "Young Turks," and Millicent Grey, an American girl. The girl's brave struggle to overcome her love for this man, which she realises must result in unhappiness to both, is sympathetically told. Her adventure in the Sultan's palace, her escape, and the death of Niko, a young Greek who tried to rescue her, keep the attention riveted on this book.

(Mary Kingdom, Gilston Park, Harlow, Essex.)

IN COTTON WOOL. By W. B. MAXWELL. (Hutchinson.)

This book, though inferior in intellectual restraint to the previous novel, "Mrs. Thompson," shows Mr. Maxwell's well-known merits: his genuine interest in moral issues, his gifts of description and characterisation. It is a powerful study of a man's gradual deterioration, and of two women whom he sacrifices to himself. Some element of conviction is wanting. Perhaps there is a certain lack of poetry in Mr. Maxwell. Perhaps he depends too much on wealth of detail, and describes what ought to be revealed. But the book is interesting throughout, and has throughout a meaning and a moral.

(Elizabeth F. Stevenson, 24, Brandling Park, Newcastle-on-Tyne.)

Grave of Wilkie Collins
at Kensal Green.

THE PATRICIAN. By JOHN GALSWORTHY.
(Heinemann.)

Curiously triumphing over his own defects, Mr. Galsworthy over-describes his characters, not letting them wholly describe themselves by speech and action, yet succeeds in making them live. One remembers that June lived, although absolutely dumb, in his "Man of Property." He splits an infinitive whenever he feels disposed to split one, yet achieves distinction and beauty in his style. He deals in the blanks of life, yet leaves his readers without an uncomfortable sense of depression. He draws characters who provoke antagonism, yet makes them awaken sympathy. "The Patrician" is a great book, and the best he has done.

(Mrs. H. H. Penrose, Deepcut Bungalow, Frimley Green, Surrey.)

THE INVIOLEABLE SANCTUARY. By GEORGE A.
BIRMINGHAM. (Nelson.)

It is long since we came across such a refreshing story. Frank Mannix the hero of the Lower Sixth is in great danger of becoming an unbearable prig when Fortune sends him to Ireland during the holidays, and his cousin Priscilla succeeds in transforming him into a normal schoolboy. Priscilla is a charming creation, and her skill with a boat is a revelation to Frank. Miss Rutherford is alive and adds to the enjoyment of the tale, while the Irish quayside characters and the German spies who turn out to be an eloping couple cause excitement to the very end.

(Marie R. Brown, 233, W. Regent Street, Glasgow.)

SOME REMINISCENCES. By JOSEPH CONRAD.
(F. & L. Nash.)

This book is Conrad's real voice, and the original, "That reminds me" construction is felicitously allied to its spirit. Romance is the sun round which his star revolves. He has those immemorial qualities which are the laurels of the great artist; the tolerance, the detachment, the sincerity, and, for crowning glory, that sympathy which gives life to the bare bones and naked structure of genius. He is our contemporary heir to Stevenson's charm, the royal dispenser of past favours; and, when you hear his voice, pitched in such friendly accents, you can't give criticisms, only gratitude. You are the "gentle reader."

(Beatrice Terry, 374, Brixton Road, London, S.W.)

We specially commend also the reviews sent in by Sybil Waller (Boscombe), Margaret Edwards (Salisbury), Miss Van der Pant (Ashted), Mrs. Fortescue (Worcester), Irene Harrison (Bristol), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Maude Dale (Stretford), Albert Harrison (York), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Elsie Bird (Hinner), Margery Wilkins (Worcester), Geraldine Payne & Galloway (Thirsk), H. Elrington (Monkstown), W. F. Robinson (Cambridge), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor), R. B. Ince (London, N.W.), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone), Nina Coppinger (Wimbledon), Sidney E. Bell (Wandsworth), Alexander E. McGill, Junior (Glasgow), Lottie Hoskins (Birmingham), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), Mrs. Severs (Scarboro'), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), Margery Colman (London, W.), A. Gordon-Fletcher (Birmingham), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Mary C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough), James Brenton (Tottenham), Gwendoline Jones (Swansea), Miss E. K. White (Ravenscourt Park), D. E. Grant (Smethwick), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Brighton), Maurice A. McDermott (Abingdon), M. E. A. Phipps (York), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Isa M. Jackson (Glasgow), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), F. E. Briggs (Crown Hill), X. Y. Z. (Cambridge).

V.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO
"THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. R. G. Ken, of 1, Zion Road, Rathgar, Co. Dublin, Ireland.

THE CENTENARY OF JOHN FORSTER.

BY BERRIC TWIDE.

TO nine out of every ten of the people one meets nowadays, John Forster—save and except that he was the biographer of his friend, Charles Dickens—is absolutely an unknown quantity.

of like reputation, were friends whom he especially delighted to honour, and who honoured him in return. As a dramatic critic his honesty, as also his judgment, were above reproach, his conclusions, so far as I know and have been able to discover, never having been impugned, his theatrical friends always recognizing that with him "duty" meant "truth," even if the telling of the latter involved disapproval or censure. It may be—I am inclined to think it really was—that the one great reason why Dickens and Forster each so appreciated and—yes loved the other, was this same presence of, and devotion to the dramatic in their respective natures. We know how, and in what large measure, the novelist possessed the instinct in question, that Forster had it also is, as I have said, likewise true. What more natural, then, that it should have contributed to strengthen and super-cement the already strong bond existing between the two men? Many there were who, misunderstanding the man, too hastily, and certainly unjustly,

John Forster's Library, Palae Gate House, Kensington.

From the drawing (now in the Forster Library, V. & A. Museum) by John Watkins, made shortly after Forster's death. Photographed by special permission of Sir Cecil Smith (Director).

And this is the more extraordinary when it is seriously considered who and what the man, John Forster, really was, and that his literary life-work was very far from being of the ephemeral sort, the thing of a day only, to be to-morrow forgotten.

His "Lives of the Men of the Commonwealth," for example, would alone serve to mark out their author as being head and shoulders above the crowd as a keen historical student, with a special bent towards the great social and political change-time of the seventeenth century. Born at Newcastle on the 2nd of April, 1812 (barely two months after his famous friend-to-be, Charles Dickens), Forster may be said to have literally come into the world with his "gift" in both hands.

There is not a scrap of evidence procurable anywhere that he derived from either of his parents any advantage or hereditary influence which might have served him in the particular walk of life he was destined eventually to follow.

A born essayist, he, as a lad, proved, on more than one occasion, the power of the instinct that was in him. Like all true literary souls, his dramatic insight was as clear as it was undeniable. He knew, too, the value of it, and as a consequence, invariably regarded his work, and all things connected with it, from a dramatic point of view. In his case, the theatre was not merely a relaxation, it was a sheer necessity for the well-being of his intellectual existence. And, truly, there were theatrical giants in those days, with whom the very greatest and most famous of them—he was on the closest terms of intimacy.

Macready, Kean, Harley, and a whole legion of others

John Forster.

From the engraving by C. H. Jeens.

Facsimile of title page of Robert Browning's first book with his inscription to Forster.

From Forster Library, Victoria and Albert Museum. Photographed by special permission of Sir Cecil Smith (Director).

labelled Forster as being harsh, hard, uncouth, without feeling or capacity for affection. Never was a greater mistake made. Although we boys regarded him somewhat in the light of a "roaring lion" (by the way, we also in, I suppose, contradistinction to his "bigness," dubbed him, amongst ourselves, the "mouse," a distinctly unpardonable contraction, be it explained, of hippopotamus). We, or at least I, came to acknowledge, before his death, that he really had a heart, and that a large one. It was his peculiar misfortune to be judged by his husk, which required duly cracking before the kernel could be adequately appreciated. It was his manner, in fact, and his manner only, which was responsible for much of the adverse criticism which now, in my own old age, I am free to confess was altogether undeserved.

All things considered, I suggest that this year, 1912, the centenary of his birth, is a peculiarly appropriate time in which to tell, in necessarily brief fashion, the story of John Forster, historian, essayist, biographer, journalist, and man, for the benefit of those who have little or no knowledge of him—as the man he, in truth, really was—the clever writer of books, which undoubtedly are destined to live; the true and loyal friend (as Browning called him), which I, for one, knew him only too well to have been. Browning's affectionate regard for Forster was in degree second only to that of Dickens, as is proved by letters and inscriptive notes innumerable in the poet's handwriting, while there was this additional reason for it, in the deep sense of gratitude Browning always expressed for Forster's loyal faith in him, when nearly all the world doubted. Witness that touching inscription on the frontispiece of his original MS. of "Paracelsus," his gift to his friend, and which is now the "pearl of great price" among the priceless treasures of the Forster collection. In estimating the truly astonishing amount of work—literary work—Forster contrived to turn out during his none too lengthy career (he was but sixty-four when he died), it must never be forgotten that, up to the date of his marriage to Mrs. Colburn, the widow of Henry Colburn, the publisher, and an old and tried friend, he was not by any means a rich man. Thirty years of age when called to the Bar in 1842, his literary and journalistic life up to that event was a time of stress and struggle. As editor of the Daily News, and literary editor of the Examiner, things certainly improved with him. But journalism was not his first love, and it was not long before he finally, for all practical purposes, severed his connection with the Fourth Estate in order that he might devote the whole of his time and thoughts to the insistent call of literature. In 1855, thus may be said to have taken place, after nine years' sole and absolute editorial control over the Examiner, he having succeeded Albany Fonblanque in the Chair in 1847. His "Life of Goldsmith," undoubtedly his greatest biographical achievement, appeared in 1848. But with his marriage came enhanced means, and the opportunity for leisure for his literary work. This was his "golden time," and though he did not live to realise all his hopes and ambitions, he succeeded in effecting much, without which the world of letters would be poor indeed. That death should have found him in the midst of his "Swift" labours is, if anything, a greater loss to posterity than it would have been a disappointment to himself. "Finished, and yet unfinished!" is the common cry of literary genius; infinitely sad, no matter how we regard it. The curse of Art, is, in its way, akin to the curse of Adam, and John Forster was to know no exemption. Had he been spared to see the completion of his "Swift," who knows? it might have tempered the bitterness of death; might have meant perfect soul-satisfaction.

It will doubtless be noticed that I have said very little about Forster's connection with Dickens, or made any, except the inevitable, allusion to the "Life." I have refrained for two amongst other reasons.

In the first place, I do not personally look upon the biography of his friend as by any means Forster's best literary achievement. When the book first appeared, the general opinion was that it was disappointing; too self-conscious; too much Forster, and too little Dickens. I must confess that I strongly incline to this opinion.

One junior member of his family (long since gone over to the great majority), even went so far as to say that it was "too full of the great big I." That, of course, was an extreme, and exceedingly foolish expression of opinion, but, though crude—savage almost, it, in a sense, hit the mark. My second reason for keeping Dickens out of the picture is because Forster is so largely associated, exclusively I may almost say, especially in these days, with the novelist; my great desire being to persuade people to believe, if I may, that John Forster's claim to a place on the literary roll of fame, and in the estimation of his countrymen, as a great writer worthy the name, rests on something higher, better, and more enduring than that with which his name is more or less popularly connected.

New Books.

RECENT HISTORY.

When King James, the Sapient and Sext, as he is commonly called on the other side of the Tweed, succeeded to the throne of England, he promulgated a decree annihilating the term Border. The Border, which had so long been the symbol and excuse for every kind of lawlessness, was to be henceforth as though it had never existed. Something resembling order was, as a matter of fact, with the aid of "Jeddart law," more or less rapidly established in Liddesdale, the country of the Armstrongs, and other disturbed districts. That was in 1603. In spite of all James's efforts, however, the Border continues to exist; it is no mere geographical abstraction like the North or South Pole, it marks an historical principle, and it is in fact nowhere more apparent than in the field of written history. England, it has been well said, in spite of its numerous and opulent possessions has never attained to one of Scotland's most priceless inheritances as a distinct country—namely, the rapture of having recovered its lost independence. That has proved an endowment which has coloured the Scottish point of view ever since. English patriotism has never had a patriot saint of flesh and blood quite like Wallace and Bruce. Alfred, though he has inspired poets and epic writers, has always lacked actuality, and is, besides, the hero of Wessex rather than of England as a whole. Walthof and Hereward are pale and bloodless abstractions—embarrassed phantoms—beyond the power of resuscitation by literary genius, however pronounced. Similarly, England lacks a religious hero to compare with John Knox, and even in literature our greatest names are somehow deficient in national actuality. You might, of course, pit the massive figure of Doctor Johnson against Scott and Burns, but our very greatest figures in literature are somehow beyond the sphere of enlistment into any kind of territorial militia. George Meredith in a way is one of the most patriotic, he frequently strikes the heroic lyre, but you could hardly cite him as a champion of distinctively English civilisation, or even of British nationality, still less Empire. Scotland, then, has preserved its own view of, and way of regarding, the history of our diminutive island. It has never frankly or for long acquiesced in the historical generalisations, however conspicuous for moderation or politeness, of the predominant partner; it has accepted historical formulas like other free gifts from the Saxon with an unmistakable reserve. The question of homage has been assumed often enough by the south—never accepted or even tolerated by the north. English historians have not often obtained the freedom of the northern kingdom. It is remarkable, perhaps, how little they have used Scottish history in illustration of their own.

The Scottish antiquaries, on the other hand, from their vantage-ground of superior knowledge of Scots topography, genealogy and local tradition, have generally viewed English incursions into their territory with a profound mistrust and an only slightly humorous suspicion. Their semi-legendary mediæval and legal history are interesting, but obscure and difficult to aliens. The constitutional and economic sides of Scottish historiography are relatively unattractive. Everything has been rather inclined to favour the monopoly which our northern neighbours have set up. And yet, up to the present, with the exception of Scott's "Tales of a Grandfather," it can hardly be said that North Britain has ever risen to the opportunity of providing the southrons with a satisfactory story of Scotland. The dearth of text-books at once interesting, well written, scholarly and abreast with the modern point of view, has tended to justify the southern indifference to the value of a Scottish commentary and reflex upon their own annals. The reproach, however, if reproach it be, to modern Scots historians, is clearly destined to be removed at short notice; for, as a consequence, it may be of the scholastic prizes recently offered in the form of Chairs of Scottish History at various northern universities, there has been a regular landfall of Scottish history during the past few months. Some very able books have been issued, far exceeding in synthetic power any popular Scottish histories of the past, and if Scotland does not yet possess a J. R. Green to compress its history into a single volume of a vivacity admitted to be the equivalent of that of a first-class romance, the defect is not attributable now as it has been in the past to the lack of either enterprise or industry on the part of its historians.

The two standard Scottish histories of recent years have, of course, been those of Mr. Andrew Lang and Professor Hume Brown. Mr. Lang¹ has now condensed his vast knowledge of the subject into a short birds-eye view in one compact volume, the most readable of its size in relation to this subject which we have yet encountered. It is admirably written, and though rather elliptical here and there in dealing with subjects unfamiliar to English readers, it is specially attractive by reason of its concise details of Scottish institutions, such as the estates, the heads of the Articles and the like. It is, in the main, singularly free from the obscurity due to the ultra-allusiveness and difficult quotations and references which so frequently impair the usefulness, if they do not actually mar the artistic effect of his bigger book. Professor Hume Brown's work² has always been recognised as an almost indispensable narrative outline, clear, scholarly, and organised with the most severe economy of space consistent with accurate statement. Its faults have been, I think, widely recognised also as a certain defect of historical glamour and warmth, a timidity in generalisation and a plentiful lack of picturesqueness—a dryness, in short, inconsistent with the enthusiastic vision that allures the student to subjects outside the regular schedule of "forced labour." His book, however, certainly appears to the greatest possible advantage in the present edition where its production is greatly enhanced by the provision of excellent illustrations, while the text has been revised, amended, and richly supplemented by a continuation of the narrative down to the present time. To the southern eye, it will be confessed, the history of Scotland since the Union really became operative (after 1745), is mainly statistical. This erroneous idea will be corrected by reference to Professor Hume Brown's third volume. It will be noticed, however, in justification of the English point of view, that in the case of the two very well written and interesting bids that have been made to emulate J. R. Green quite recently by Dr. Macmillan and Mr. Robert Rait, one ends practically with the '45, the other concludes rather abruptly with Sir Walter Scott.

¹ A Short History of Scotland. By Andrew Lang. 5s. net. (Blackwood.)

² "History of Scotland." By J. Hume Brown. 3 vols. 30s. net. (Camb. Univ. Press.)

Though the printing of the portraits is very inferior to that in the case of Professor Hume Brown's history, Mr. Rait's volume¹ of 312 pages is nevertheless attractively illustrated. The first chapters dealing with the blending of the races in Scotland, and the influence of Queen Margaret, seem to us to supply the clearest and most lucid short account of these remote happenings available. Some of the later portions appear, in comparison, a little more hurried, but the book, as a whole, is a model of lucid exposition and production, and its very moderate price must win it a very large circle of appreciative readers. Recent investigators have claimed that Margaret was daughter of Agatha and grand-daughter of a Hungarian king, and the evidence has recently been marshalled in a very learned paper, the substance of which was given before the Royal Historical Society by Dr. Felbermann. Mr. Rait is an original investigator of Stuart history, especially during the seventeenth century. Dr. Donald Macmillan's work² gives more the impression of a compilation from already well-ascertained and accessible sources. As a compilation it is highly skilled work, it avoids dullness and pedantic detail with marked success, and gives some good social pictures. A composite picture like this of Highland manners previous to the rebellion of 1745 would gain credibility by a reference to authorities. Would Doctor Johnson, one wonders, have confirmed the following account:

"The houses of the cottars were nothing more than huts. A little patch of ground here and there might be cultivated. The woman did most of the labour. The cattle and sheep reared were of the poorest quality. At Falkirk and Creiff trysts droves of black Highland cattle might be seen. They fetched anything from ten to forty shillings each. The sheep were diminutive and poor; they were kept under shelter in winter from fear of dying from the weather, and it was only by accident, about the middle of the century, that the discovery was made that they thrive better in the open. The turf in the neighbourhood, and even round the doors, was used for building and roofing the huts, so that a stranger in Sutherlandshire was forced to remark that the 'Highlanders made their houses of grass and fed their cattle on stone.' When short of food, the clansmen bled the cattle, boiled the blood, and mixed it with oatmeal, and so made a hearty repast. Instead of clipping the sheep, the wool was frequently pulled off their backs, and then spun and weaved for use."

An extremely valuable addition to economic history is supplied by Professor Gonner's carefully compiled work on "Common Land and Inclosure."³ This traces the history of the movement from champain or open land to inclosure during upwards of four centuries. The use of a Common now is regarded mainly from the point of view of recreation, but in early times the Common right was an essential part of agriculture. So long as arable land was absolutely pre-eminent, and the system of culture adopted was simple and uniform, the Common system worked well. The present work is mainly concerned with the change that came over these conditions, it explains how the change was effected and explains how, from an economic point of view purely, the change was often beneficial. The human and national aspects of the problem are treated in Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's interesting book about the peasantry in the eighteenth century. The present work supplies the economic, agricultural, and legal supplement and, to a certain extent, justification.

Among standard works in history reissued during the past few years, a high place belongs by prescription to Erskine May's "Constitutional History of England"⁴ from 1760 to 1860. The original work was, it is believed, to a limited extent put in commission, chapters or parts of chapters having been committed to some of Lord Farnborough's colleagues in the House of Commons. The process has now been continued by Mr. Francis Holland, who has carried the exposition down to 1911 upon similar lines to those originally designed. He has thus written of Parliamentary Reform since the Reform Bill, with some brief remarks on modern developments, such as the Woman's Suffrage Agitation; he has given a capital narrative of party alternations since the first premiership of Disraeli; he has dealt with the evolution of the Home Rule movement in its later manifestations under the consulship of Mr. Parnell, together with local government, education, civil service reform, and the fruition of the Colonial Commonwealths, concluding with a slightly disproportionate but wholly judicious account of the Parliament Bill of last year. It is impossible to make a quite satisfactory book of Erskine May, owing to the polished evasiveness of its style, but Mr. Holland's attempt at least deserves success.

Among biographical additions to historical literature, the most interesting that we have encountered of late deal with the sixteenth century. An unpretentious narrative of the striking career of Jeanne d'Albret,⁵ mother of Henri IV., by Mr. P. F. W. Ryan, is well written and illustrated. It supplies a master key to many of the lives of this period and will be found attractive by the general reader, while, as a genealogical link between Valois and Bourbon, it is invaluable to those who have not access to the larger works by De Ruble and others. Miss Freer's book of thirty or forty years ago on this subject is now at a big premium. Mr. F. M. Hueffer in his diverting work on "The Critical Attitude," forms a relentless and scathing estimate of the works by little ladies on naughty queens. Miss Winifred Stephens' new book on Margaret of France⁶ certainly does not come anywhere near this category. It is a most scholarly investigation and study of the career of the patroness of Ronsard, daughter of François I. and wife of Emmanuel Philibert, the effective founder of the present Royal House of Savoy. The production of this monograph, with its admirable bibliographic and other apparatus, entitles Miss Stephens to rank with Miss Jane Stodart and Miss Edith Schiel, among the most highly equipped scholars of this very thorny period. Margaret of Austria and Margaret of Angoulême, both contemporaries, have found biographers in plenty. Thus, I believe, is the first attempt in English to portray Margaret of France. Another work of real value to which more than passing reference is impossible, is Mr. A. W. Evans' excellent introduction to and excerpts from the Commentaries of Monluc, extracted from Cotton's translation of 1674, and edited with much judgment and taste for the increasingly popular and deserving Regent Library.⁷ This book of nearly 500 pages, offered at half-a-crown, is a real boon to students and readers interested in the complicated times of the French Wars of Religion.

Of recent specialized work on the later career of Napoleon that has reached us, one volume at least deserves mention for marked ability. M. Albert Espitalier's "Napoleon and King Murat"⁸ affords an unsparing picture of Gioacchino, king of the Lazzaroni. Anything more despicable ultimately than the dashing Murat's vanity and faithlessness, whether

⁴ "May's Constitutional History of England, 1760-1911." Edited with Supplementary Volume by Francis Holland. 3 vols. 12s. 6d. each net. (Longmans.)

⁵ "Queen Jean of Navarre." By P. F. W. Ryan. 10s. 6d. net. (Hutchinson.)

⁶ "Margaret of France." By Winifred Stephens. 15s. net. (Lane.)

⁷ The Commentaries of Monluc. With Introduction by A. W. Evans. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

⁸ "Napoleon and King Murat." By Albert Espitalier. 12s. 6d. net. (Lane.)

¹ "The Making of the Nations: Scotland." By Robert S. Rait. 7s. 6d. net. (A. & C. Black.)

² "A Short History of the Scottish People." By D. Macmillan, D.D. 10s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

³ "Common Land and Inclosure." By Prof. E. C. K. Gonner. 12s. net. (Macmillan.)

in regard to his benefactor, the treaty of Bayonne, or his wife Caroline, it would not be easy to imagine. Alternately cringing and sulking, dashing to Paris in eight days and back to Naples in even less, the king is exhibited as possessing far less responsibility and capacity to rule than an average boy-scout. He was a puppet, or should we say victim, of his Bonaparte marriage. The happiness he derived from his elevation was confined to the gratification of his personal vanity. Apart from vanity, selfishness and a blind discontent seem to have predominated—that at least is the impression left by M. Espitalier's pitiless analysis. Admirably translated by Mr. Lewis May, the book only suffers from its high degree of specialisation. Of Murat before Bayonne and between his flight to Cannes and the final catastrophe—not a word.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

JOHN GALSWORTHY'S POEMS.*

It is not easy to criticise the poems of Mr. John Galsworthy. One remembers the tragic intensity of feeling, the emotional force, the easy power and fine spirit of poetry that glow and live in his dramas and stories, and so cuts the leaves of "Moods, Songs and Doggerels" in the expectation of finding that same spirit singing here in golden cages of metre and rhyme. But though the same spirit is here it does not sing in that captivity so magically as it does in the bracing, free atmosphere of Mr. Galsworthy's prose. Which is, after all, nothing strange or unusual. No great novelist has ever been also a great poet—only one has been even an approximately great poet, and that one is Mr. Thomas Hardy. You cannot serve the Muses adequately in your playtime; unless you devote yourself wholly to them they will not give themselves wholly to you. The great poets rarely had much to say in prose; they put all their thoughts and imaginings into poetic form until that became the natural speech of their minds. Mr. Galsworthy chose the other way of utterance, and when he writes in verse does so with a certain constraint, as one speaks a foreign language; he is a little self-conscious, cannot forget he is writing poetry, and therefore is apt to be a little formal, a little artificial, and unable to let himself go in any rush of careless rapture. His songs do not sing themselves; and though, hammering them into shape, he now and then strikes out a strong and splendid phrase, a noble thought, a glittering fancy, he too often spends his energy in giving commonplace utterance to some ordinary idea, or mars some profound reflection or original image with a prosy line that he would never have allowed to pass in his prose writings.

The longest poem is "A Dream," in which God appears to the dreamer and beckons him to where a lonely tree "with ropes of yew-dark bough was bent," and there commands him:

"O man! Confess thy faith!
The word thou speakest saves or bars,
For here are gallows of thy death."

The dreamer knows he must make a true confession, or

"God would not spare but hang me dead Within that twine of yew-dark rope."

The perfume and grace of the earth touch him as he stands; he remembers past happiness, and the woman he loves; and in one picturesque, subtly imaginative verse he recalls the beauty of the world as he has known it:

"I marked the pageantry of noon
Once more with gold and music pass;
I saw the silvery, cold moon
Spill her last glamour on the grass;
I hung once more above that stream,
Whose twining waters draw me down
And down from gazing, till I seem Myself to be that water brown."

Thus passionately in love with life, he nevertheless resolves to confess his unorthodox creed bravely and die:

"And faint I spoke: 'I know my faith
But shadows that required of man';

* "Moods, Songs and Doggerels." By John Galsworthy. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

By K. Scott.

Mr. John Galsworthy.

From frontispiece in "Moods, Songs and Doggerels" by John Galsworthy (Heinemann).

Yet, O thou God! if only wraith
Of creed I hold, 'tis all I can
For well I know that he is base
Who hides in grey hypocrisy,
And ghb pretends, to save his face,
And says, "I see," who does not see."

With how much more grandeur and dignity Mr. Galsworthy would have clothed that passage in prose, omitting the jarring "to save his face" into which the exigencies of rhyme betrayed him. Then in the setting forth of his creed, the thought is high and spacious enough, but moves in words that are not winged but walk with feet that are fettered, as thus:

"All forms upswelling have within Their hearts a static decadence;
In utter stillness does the thin
Reverberation lose its sense;
To ash the spark of spirit dies,
Each revolution of each sphere,
Each swoop of every bird that flies
To its own stilly death draws near."

In the end, having spoken out of his heart boldly, the dreamer finds he has nothing to fear; the sinister shadows that threatened him vanish, the night clears, and all is well.

This courage to speak out honestly at all costs, to face the dark facts of life unafraid, is a characteristic note of these poems, and that mingling of large ideas with inadequate expression, and the sudden, intermittent rise into beauty or ringing harmony of phrase are also characteristic of them. Nothing could be more spontaneous, more alive with passionate sincerity than "Errantry," with its "Come! Let us lay a crazy lance in rest,

And tilt at windmills under a wild sky!"

there is music, too, a delicate fancifulness and a deep underflow of suggestion in "The Seeds of Light," and spontaneity again and a right living lyrical joyance in the "Cuckoo Song," where the cuckoo sings on the moor and the bells ring for church in the valley, but

"I'll go worshipping the sun
While the sun will let me."

If some of the poems in the "Doggerels" section are the least satisfactory in the volume, two of them are among the best. "The Devon Sage," is admirable both for its terse, homely philosophy and its cunning use of dialect; and "Rhyme After Rain," is a charmingly fresh and pagan song round the wistful sense of mortality that inspired Herrick's "Gather ye Rosebuds."

I think if Mr. Galsworthy had been more severe with himself and had left out some dozen or more of very slight bits of verse that have no virtue of thought or treatment to recommend them the total effect of his volume might have been greater, more impressive; as it is, its finer parts are obscured by the intrusion of so many waifs and strays and by the presence of such poems as "Deflowered," with its melodramatic presentment of a world-old tragedy; "The Moon at Dawn," with its strained daring in making the morning moon smile like a harlot; "Hetaira," with its rather cheaply sentimental telling of the woman who gave all her heart to a man, served him, lived for him only:

"Her care was fairy tale that never ends.
And when she died? Ah, would They praise her? Never!
You see, she was not married to him, Friends!"

You might have made a little sketch of that and got a point or so in prose, without having to finish up with the word "Friends"; but to make points like that is not the way to make poetry.

It is a hateful thing to write anything but praise of Mr. Galsworthy, and I only do so because I have a real admiration of his rare creative power and great gifts as dramatist and novelist, and because, rightly or wrongly, I do feel that in publishing this book he does himself less than justice. But though I do not want the whole of it, there are things in it I am glad to possess, and not least among these is one of his shortest poems, "The Prayer":

"If on a Spring night I went by
And God were standing there,
What is the prayer that I would cry
To Him? This is the prayer.
'O Lord of courage grave,
'O Master of this night of Spring!
Make firm in me a heart too brave
To ask Thee anything!"

Compared with nine-tenths of the new poetry that is issued nowadays, "Moods, Songs and Doggerels," stands out loftily by reason of its individual note, its originality of style, its moments of insight, the authentic feeling and fancy and imagination that are here, but struggle cramped and hampered in strait-jackets of verse; it suffers chiefly by comparison with Mr. Galsworthy's own work in other kinds, for he writes his best poetry when he is supposed to be writing prose.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS.*

In that entertaining work, The Schoolmaster, Mr. A. C. Benson states that "an interesting teacher must have a mind resembling a number of Tit-Bits," and though his dictum startles an old-world pedagogue, it is, perhaps, not so wholly paradoxical as it appears. For unless he possesses many odds and ends of miscellaneous knowledge the specialist, however learned in his own department, is apt to become dull, dreary, and uninspiring, and to make the most of life we all need to know much of one thing and a little of many things. The stress and strain of competition drive us remorselessly along a very narrow groove, and we all have delight in occasionally getting outside it. The boy feels the craving, and amid the routine of study relishes magisterial Tit-Bits, and within measure is the better for them. The average man looks for similar snacks and scraps of knowledge set out attractively in the columns of his daily paper. There are many, too, who with a more robust taste are healthily desirous of something more solid and sustaining. They have neither much money nor much leisure, but they want something which they can "read and inwardly digest" without great expenditure of either—a sort of intellectual "quick meal"—and for such "The People's Books" are designed to cater. Here busy workers in many fields have, as it were, gathered up honey, and hungry folk have only "to put forth their hand"—with sixpence in it—and, like Jonathan of old, "their eyes will be enlightened." Or rather, perhaps, such is the praiseworthy purpose of the publishers, but how far they have succeeded in their purpose is a somewhat different question. For in these little books, each of which contains some 80 or 90 pages, compression is carried to its extreme limits, and by a well-known law of letters a writer's difficulties increase, in a sort of geometrical progression, as the space allowed him diminishes. Give him 500 pages and he expatiates at ease; confine him to 100 and he chafes awkwardly against the barriers. And this is especially the case where he is not criticizing facts already known to his readers—for then terseness, though difficult, is at once possible and telling—but has to set out facts of which he must assume that they are almost wholly ignorant, while when those facts are in themselves highly complex, his task requires the highest gifts of intellect, judgment, and expression. To state a great theme shortly in plain words is perhaps the supreme test of mastery as a writer.

* "Botany: The Modern Study of Plants." By M. C. Stopes, D.Sc., Ph.D., F.L.S.—"Heredity." By J. A. S. Watson, B.Sc.—"Organic Chemistry." By Prof. J. B. Cohen, B.Sc., F.R.S.—"The Principles of Electricity." By Norman R. Campbell, M.A.—"The Science of the Stars." By E. W. Maunder, F.R.A.S., of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich.—"Henri Bergson: The Philosophy of Change." By H. Wildon Carr.—"Roman Catholicism." By H. B. Coxon. With Preface, by Mgr. R. H. Benson.—"Mary Queen of Scots." By E. O'Neill, M.A.—"Women's Suffrage—A Short History of a Great Movement." By M. G. Fawcett, LL.D.—"Shakespeare." By Prof. C. H. Herford, Litt.D.—"Pure Gold—A Choice of Lyrics and Sonnets." By H. C. O'Neill.—"Dante." By A. G. Ferrers Howell. "The People's Books." 6d. net each. (T. C. & E. C. Jack).

To pass, however, any single verdict on the manner in which the present writers have dealt with the difficulties they had to face, would be obviously unfair, because those difficulties have been very unequal. Take, for instance, the admirable study of "Shakespeare." It is "admirable" because Professor Herford is a good critic, and because he is able to be largely critical, so that when he says that in Shakespeare's great tragedies, "the interest always centres in the action and suffering of a man of a great but ill-balanced personality, under the stress of a situation which at once betrays his weakness, reveals his greatness, and thrusts him to his doom," we all, knowing for ourselves Othello, Hamlet, and King Lear, at once recognise the justice of his remarks, while he can say what he has to say sufficiently in a few lines. But turn to "Dante," and the case wholly alters. Here the English reader wants not so much criticism as information, but he will get the former rather than the latter, while the author's interest in Dante's sonnets and "Political Ideals"—on both of which he writes excellently—tempts him to leave only a third of his space for The Divine Comedy, which he discusses but does not illustrate, although discussion, when the subject matter is unknown, must obviously be incapable of conveying real knowledge. On the other hand where the subject is well defined, as in the volume on "Roman Catholicism," "Women's Suffrage," and "Mary Queen of Scots," the author has an easy task. In these cases it is possible to be at once clear, concise, and yet sufficiently complete, and all three writers have produced epitomes which fulfil their aim and are of real value. Indeed as ex parte statements of their case nothing could be better than the first two volumes, and that on Roman Catholicism is, perhaps, as accurate and succinct an account of Roman doctrine as has ever been published, while it has the striking advantage of being authoritative, and it gives the modern reader almost an uncanny feeling to take up a sixpenny book and find on the first page: "NIHIL OBSTAT, J. H. Strassonaier, S. J. Censor deputatus, IMPRIMATUR. Edmond Can. Surmont. Vic. gen." It is rare nowadays to come across a book every word of which is officially certified to be correct.

But apart from a little collection of English poetry which almost justifies its rather ambitious title of "Pure Gold," the remaining volumes, which deal with "The Stars," "Botany," "Electricity," "Heredity," "Organic Chemistry," and "Henri Bergson," equally interest and perplex the critic. Here are six vast themes, and here are six tiny books, that claim to tell us just what we all want to know about them. It is a large claim, and do they make it good? If they did then the path of knowledge would cease to be rough, and we should almost have levelled "The Hill, Difficulty"; but to understand hard matters must ever be a long and arduous task, and these books perhaps attempt too much. Instead of pointing as it were to the peaks, telling us what may be seen from them, and taking us a few experimental ascents of moderate attainment, they seem to put too heavy a tax somewhat hastily on our strength with the result that we lose heart and flag in our endeavour. A person, for instance, "of average intelligence but no special knowledge" will hardly be prepared, after reading 20 pages on "Organic Chemistry," for such a sentence as this: "A third repetition of the experiment gives a third compound, the liquid chloroform or trichloromethane, CHCl_3 , and finally a fourth volume of chlorine will produce carbon tetrachloride, or tetrachloromethane, CCl_4 , when the process ceases and no more chlorine is absorbed," although this sentence compared with many which immediately follow is of almost transparent simplicity. Nor, perhaps, will he find it easy to grasp at the very outset of his study of the subject that "the most widely accepted theory of 'Heredity' is the theory of the continuity of the germ plasm, the idea of which is that part of the germ plasm contained in the parent egg-cell, is not used up in the construction of the body of the offspring, but is reserved unchanged for the formation of the germ cells of the following generation"; while, when he comes to "The Stars," he will find (p. 20) that the ancients were acquainted with "the general character of the sun's movement, namely, that he not only moved day by day from east to west, as the stars do, but also had a second motion inclined at an angle to the first, and in the opposite direction," and that the difficult words here italicised are left almost wholly to his own interpretation. But, surely, to understand any of the three statements thus quoted, without considerable previous training, would need a very alert mind. To the expert who has had such training they are clear, but to the "average" person who has not, they can hardly be so, and it would seem—if a word of advice may be pardoned—that the series suffers from lack of a general editor. The abilities of the various writers are beyond question, and they each provide an excellent summary of their subject, but, like most experts, they hardly take a just measure of "the average intelligence." They estimate it too much by an unconscious reference to their own skill, and for "The People's Books" there is surely need of some one who can judge what "the man in the street" is or is not capable of understanding. The idea of the series is of the best; it contains material of extreme interest—and, indeed, the accounts given of Mendelism by Mr. Watson and of Bergson by Mr. Carr open up new realms of thought—but some of the volumes would certainly gain in value by simplification. The publishers have made a very striking effort to bring great subjects within the purview of the popular mind, and if they have erred in forming too high an opinion of its powers, it is a generous error which the public ought very readily to condone.

T. E. PAGE.

VICTOR HUGO.*

It sometimes happens that the originator of a great literary movement long survives its eclipse and lives on honoured and perhaps apotheosized, into a time which has wholly different ideals from his, and regards as a mere extravagance, when thinking of it at all, the cause with which his name was once associated. Victor Hugo is a case in point. In his old age he was universally recognized as the father, the uncrowned king, of French letters. As his last birthdays came round, as some fresh edition of his works was issued, all the schools paid common tribute to the patriarch's fame, and bowed the knee before a giant of genius and a champion of freedom, who in both aspects could be deemed typically French. The mere passage of years had made it possible for the violences of his art, the inconsistencies in his opinions and behaviour to be forgotten, and he had sufficiently retired from active politics for a legend, and not an untrue legend, to connect itself with his career. His interventions in public affairs became so rare, and were so nicely calculated, that more and more could he be considered a representative democrat and the mouthpiece of the young Republic, as well as the best of the world's poets. And so in this final phase, enthusiasm, which stopped little short of idolatry, marked the attitude alike of his fellow-craftsmen and of his compatriots towards the author who had gone into exile on a matter of principle, and had denounced despotism with all the fervour of his unequalled rhetoric. Victor Hugo sat as it were in triumph, removed from the range of criticism and exalted to the dignity of a demi-god. But, in point of fact, his was to some extent a false position, and the homage he received was accorded less to the talents and achievements on which he prided himself than to the age and general reputation of the veteran. In one respect no mistake could be made; Hugo was the premier poet of France—nay, of Europe. But in other ways he was the exemplar of an outworn tradition. Long before his own death that burst of romanticism with which his first blaze of popularity synchronised, was exhausted beyond the hope of revival, a Rostand or so notwithstanding. Drama, poetry, fiction had travelled miles away from his aims and conventions, and it is difficult to believe that his most respectful colleagues knew much or could esteem much of his work apart from his lyrics. "Hernani" and "Ruy Blas" might be reproduced during this or that hour of Hugo-worship, but they were already virtually on the shelf as stage-classics, their rhetorical exuberance, their sentimentality, their melodrama making little appeal to a public among which the problem-play was in vogue. "Les Misérables" and companion stories might claim their tens of thousands of readers, but the naturalistic novel was even then winning its brief spell of favour, and though a reaction was bound to follow its excesses, that reaction was not to take as its motto any such cry as "Back to Hugo." No, romance as he understood it is dead, and we need not regret that Victor Hugo left no real school behind him. For, entertaining as "Hernani" still is as a piece of literature, by reason of its gusto and its note of youthful defiance, magical as is the fantastic atmosphere of "Notre Dame de Paris," there is no denying that this style of art lends itself to insincerity, exaggeration and the striving after effect, vices only too easily developed. The one side of Hugo's invention which is immune from criticism is just the one which could not be imitated, the side which reveals itself in his exquisite lyrics. Fortunately all through his career he poured these out with inexhaustible profusion. Posterity may ignore some of his romances, it may cease to read his dramas, it may turn away from that section of his verse in which he is inclined to pose and be pontifical, but this Hugo at least, Hugo the lyrical poet, will never be allowed to die.

One of the fairest estimates of Hugo, the author, ever published in this country is to be found in a biography which the late Mr. A. F. Davidson just completed, but was not allowed to correct in proof. Fate prevented him from seeing the reward of his labours, but he has left behind him a worthy example of English scholarship. The sound judgment displayed again and again in this appreciation is its most notable feature. If Mr. Davidson had no illusions as to the extravagance of the French romantic movement he is whole-hearted in his esteem of the fecundity of Hugo's imagination, his mastery of the grotesque and the fantastic, his generous humanity and the richness of his more emotional poetry. And while the biographer preserves the balance scrupulously in weighing the merits of the artist he is no less just in his study of the man. He does not make too much of the foibles of the poet's character, but he refuses to ignore them. Especially does he draw attention to the unreliability of the poet in matters of autobiographical detail. Not only did he romance about his birth, creating for himself an aristocratic pedigree, and then subsequently apologising for the ancestors he had invented; his trick of inexactitude was carried to much further lengths. It became habitual with him to credit himself with such behaviour and opinions in a crisis as he might have exhibited had he always had the courage of his views or always been consistent. Thus, he belittles his monarchist phase and antedates the growth of his republican sentiments; he attributes to himself heroic attitudes on occasions such as the time of the Commune, and again of the Coup d'Etat, when he was very far from acting the hero. Comparing Hugo's own statements with extant documents, Mr. Davidson is able to convict him frequently of making assertions that are untrue, of manufacturing fine poses for himself, and of covering up his blunders by forgetting them altogether. The poet's career was not all of a piece, nor was his disposition quite so generous and large-hearted as he wished the world to imagine. There was a large element of egoism in him, and he could be petty and envious. As Mr. Davidson points out, he quarrelled with Dumas père, merely because the latter was more successful in the theatre than he, and he found it hard as the years went on to mix socially with literary rivals. In the days of "Hernani" his friends were his colleagues, but gradually his circle narrowed down into a little coterie of satellites who listened while the Master talked and read his own works. Of Hugo's friendships and of his relations with women Mr. Davidson writes tactfully and with due restraint. He makes no more of Sainte-Beuve's siege of Mme. Hugo and his repulse than he should make, and he mentions, as it were incidentally, the prolonged liaison which existed between the author and the actress, Juliette Drouet. But all these matters--the posturings, the little vanities, the self-absorption and the philanderings of Hugo--his biographer sees in their right perspective, and he never fails to insist that the poet's love of freedom was sincere, his humanitarianism very genuine, his devotion to children absolutely natural, and that even his egoism had the excuse of his preoccupation with noble and disinterested thoughts.

* "Victor Hugo: His Life and Work." By A. F. Davidson. 15s. net. (Nash.)

F. G. BETTANY.

CRISPI.*

The "Memoirs" which Signor Palamenghi-Crispi has compiled for the vindication of his uncle's memory do not constitute a biography, but rather lay before us the materials for one. They are, in fact, a collection of documents strung together by a thread of narrative which, though slight, is sufficient for its purpose. Many of them have never before been published, and many were written by Francesco Crispi himself, who thus, as his nephew points out in an Introductory Note, speaks to us from nearly every page. No student of the Italian Risorgimento, or of Italian diplomacy during the last quarter of the 19th century, can possibly afford to neglect them.

The first volume deals with the Expedition of the Thousand, and opens with Crispi's flight from Palermo, after the failure of the Revolution of 1848. For more than a decade he trod the "hard road" of exile, in Piedmont, in Malta, in London, and in Paris, earning a scanty livelihood with his pen, and conspiring continually against the Bourbon tyranny. In 1859, he travelled through Sicily, visiting Messina, Catania, Syracuse and Palermo, under the very eyes of the ubiquitous Bourbon police; and, a few months later, he, perhaps more than any other, was instrumental in persuading Garibaldi to take up arms for the liberation of Sicily. We have the testimony of so bitter an enemy as La Farina that Garibaldi himself declared that the Expedition of the Thousand was "largely due" to Crispi.

After the landing at Marsala, Crispi became sole Secretary of State, and, from thenceforward, was always either a member of the revolutionary Government or at Garibaldi's side. "He overthrew the Bourbon administration by means of his decrees, and, stripping it of that favour it still enjoyed among those whose interests were at stake, organized the new State." The title of King of Italy for Victor Emmanuel was first suggested by him; and "to him we also owe the formula, 'the people wish Italy to be One and Indivisible,' which confirmed the solemn obligation to achieve union and sanctioned, not the annexation of one province by another, but the creation of a new State." He remained ever faithful to this principle, and, on the death of Victor Emmanuel "stood his ground against the traditionalists of the House of Savoy, and succeeded in inducing the second King of Italy to assume the title of Humbert the First." But, though his abandonment of his republican prejudices was complete and final, he none the less steadfastly resisted Cavour's short-sighted demand for the immediate annexation of Sicily: a demand which, had it been yielded to, would have prevented Garibaldi crossing the Straits of Messina and indefinitely postponed the liberation of Central and Southern Italy. The debt of gratitude which his native Sicily owes him is well nigh as heavy as the debt which she owes to Garibaldi.

Of his subsequent conduct in Naples hard things have been said. Mr. Trevelyan, in his "Garibaldi and the Making of Italy" does not hesitate to characterise his opposition to the plebiscite as "essentially factious"; but there is much to be said in defence of the motives of that opposition. Crispi had practised as an avvocato in Naples, and he knew the Neapolitan character; he can, therefore, hardly have failed to foresee the evils which must follow "the rigid and mechanical application of the Piedmontese laws and administrative system to a state of society very different from that of the sub-Alpine populations", and he, no doubt, felt that the conditions of annexation should be carefully considered. Moreover, he profoundly distrusted Cavour, and, in view of the facts disclosed by the documents before us, we do not see how he could have done otherwise. There was a time when Sir James Hudson and Lord John Russell doubted whether Cavour would "run straight."

If, in the first volume, we see Crispi as conspirator and revolutionist, in the second we see him as diplomatist and statesman, labouring to build up the nation he had helped to create. This task he accomplished mainly through the instrumentality of the Triple Alliance. From the hour of her birth, United Italy was endangered by the hostility of France and, in a lesser degree, by that of Austria. Even after Rome had become the Italian capital, France, though now reduced to a state of impotence, "tolerated the new conditions without accepting them." For years a French man-of-war rode at anchor off Civitavecchia "as a permanent protest and sign of the protectorate France still pretended to exercise over the Holy See." The Republican Government had inherited the traditions of its imperial predecessor, and "instead of seeking to dispel ill-feeling and gain the friendship of the Italians, insulted us, scorned us, and threatened us, thus adding fuel to the fire of hostility."

In 1877, Crispi, now President of the Chamber, was sent on a confidential mission, nominally to open negotiations with the various European governments with regard to the status of Italian citizens abroad and of foreigners in Italy, but really "for the purpose of rendering the friendly relations between Germany and Italy more intimate," and of obtaining "a treaty of alliance which should represent the interests of both countries and provide for all contingencies." For the moment, all that he secured "was a promise of 'eventual alliance in case France should attack'; but he had established confidential relations with Bismarck, and, although the Triple Alliance was not actually concluded till 1882, his mission was fruitful of future gain to Italy.

Unfortunately, however, Crispi's domestic relations served as a handle for the malice of his enemies, and, in 1878, he fell from office with disastrous results. With regard to her foreign policy, Italy became "as changeable as a child at its play," and her consequent isolation subjected her to continual humiliations. At the Berlin Congress her interests

* "The Memoirs of Francesco Crispi." Translated by Mary Prichard-Agnetti from the Documents collected and edited by Thomas Palamenghi-Crispi. Two Vols. 16s. net each. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Letters and Recollections of Mazzini." By Mrs. Hamilton King. 8s. net. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

were ignored; the French occupied Tunis and England's invitation to intervene in Egypt was refused. Only after Crispi's return to Office, in 1887, did things change for the better. In April, he became Minister of the Interior in the Depretis Cabinet and, on Depretis' death, in the following July, succeeded him as President of the Council. Thenceforward, the foreign policy of Italy was in competent hands, and her interests were safeguarded with statesmanlike foresight. Had Crispi remained longer in power, the annexation of Tripoli would probably have become a fait accompli before the close of the last century. It is certain that, at different epochs, all the great Powers had recognized the superiority of Italian claims in that region: France in 1884 and 1888; Austro-Hungary in 1890, and England in the same year. In July, Lord Salisbury declared that "the interests of Europe demand this occupation that the Mediterranean may be prevented from becoming a French Lake. The only point to be further considered is whether the present moment be the best suited for putting this undertaking into execution."

In the course of his various diplomatic missions, Crispi became acquainted with most of the leading statesmen of the day, and there are a hundred passages we should like to quote. It is curious to read of Lord Salisbury that "he belongs to the type of timid Englishmen," and of Leo XIII. that he was "entirely in the power of a handful of intriguers and agents of Cardinal Monaco's, 'that bumpkin with coarse boots and a cunning head-piece,' who intimidates the Pope with threats of the sufferings of hell." Our space is, however, limited, and we can only assure the reader that in these two bulky volumes there is not a single dull page from the first to the last. They are as interesting as they are instructive.

In his foreword to Mrs. Hamilton King's "Letters and Recollections of Mazzini" Mr. G. M. Trevelyan writes:

"The little volume needs no apology. It is a peculiarly genuine, and personal record of the more intimate side of Mazzini's life during those sad latter years, when his cause was triumphing in the eyes of others, but not in his own; it contains some of his most characteristic letters and a description of his last imprisonment at Gaeta, and of his death at Pisa, by the women who witnessed those closing scenes. Comment of mine would be an impertinence, for it is not an argument but a record."

This is no doubt perfectly true; but we are frank to confess that it seems to us rather a record of the authoress's devotion to Mazzini than of any new facts which will be serviceable to the historian. Mrs. Hamilton King's letters are almost as numerous as those of her hero, and no mediæval nun, kneeling in adoration before the shrine of her patron saint, ever poured out her soul in words of stronger yearning:

"I think of you when I pray, and when the sun shines; and I shall think of you when I die, and after that I shall see you. You have made God's ways clear to me through your voice. You have supported my faith, and kept me from despair so often; you do not know all you have done for my soul; and doubtless for many other souls whose blessing follows you through Eternity. May God bless you for ever, great Prophet and Martyr!"

So she wrote, in 1863, before she had even seen the object of her devotion, and, when at last she met him some nine months later, her marriage had, as she tells us, "in a manner placed a barrier between Mazzini and myself, only removed by his death." Almost speechless with admiration she "could only utter a few words of devotion and thankfulness"; but Mr. King was equal to the occasion, and "sustained the conversation," while his wife and Mazzini "gazed at one another." He had, we are informed, "a peculiar gift of being able to talk fluently about anything and to anyone without having the slightest acquaintance with either." We wish that we could have heard more of Mr. King. To live continually in an atmosphere of red-hot enthusiasm is an exhausting experience. Mr. King's occasional appearance is a relief.

The Salute.

After the painting by William van de Velde the younger From "Individuality and Art" by Herbert E. A. Furst (Macmillan).

INDIVIDUALITY AND ART.*

One wants to praise Mr. Furst's fresh and fiery little book—but one must begin with some cold-blooded abuse of it. There are books which are vicious because they slip dangerous doctrines into the mind as smoothly and slyly as a conjuror. The special wickedness of this one is the ostentatious way it trumpets and flaunts a wholesome truism. Its base is the purest of platitudes—the honest axiom, agreeable to us all nowadays, that a picture, no less than a thunderstorm—or a field or a fountain pen or a battleship—is the one product of infinite forces, the logical link in a chain, a bright cross-section of an endless ray; and that Turner's hand (for instance) when it painted "The Fighting Temeraire" was being guided by the hands of dead masters and swayed by countless current forces and doing nothing more, au fond, than intercept the ray, catch it on a canvas, let it dapple it with bright stains: that "The Fighting Temeraire," in fact, like everything else in life, is only a precipitate of the past. Now this, of course, is a good and a sound law, and one it is thoroughly salutary to realise: not, to be sure, because it affects the Turner in the least or alters its value by a ha'porth, but simply because it is itself a kind of kindling picture. Vividly projected, switched suddenly upon a page, it would make something as stirring as the "Temeraire" itself. And that, I feel pretty certain, was Mr. Furst's first fine intention. He would take this single canvas of Turner's and enumerate all the forces which converged there. Starting from the brilliant patch their meeting makes on that wall in Trafalgar Square, he would work out and out, through Space and through Time, along these pouring beams, breasting the stream of evolution, till he climbed to the last inscrutable source. He would stem, first of all, the purely technical tributaries, run up the pictorial pedigree: van de Velde, Claude Lorrain, Tassi, Paul Bril: testing his progress as he went by taking sample cross-sections, showing us those premature pictures—Claude's "Seaport" and van de Velde's cloudy naval "Salute"—which are really "The Temeraire" in embryo, the "Temeraire" some stages further back. Next, he would search out the plot in the chapters of accidents which brought Turner and his subject together on that ripe August evening near Greenwich, "with the summer sun setting astern of the flagship in the north-north-west." That would lead him far afield, through wars and inventions, steam-tugs, Acts of Parliament, and white-bait suppers. The queer chemistry of Turner's blood would follow the allotment of its constituents—so much to mother, grandmother, misty forebears—so much to "Puggy Booth's" taproom life. And the chemistry of his colours would come too, the endless causes which collected them; and the very shape of the two ships in the picture would have to be traced to their origins—back through Armadas, through endless reversed modulations, till it reached that aboriginal skin-coracle which was really their tightly-twisted blind bud. There would be nothing coldly scientific or destructive about this peeling away of cause after cause. It would be a thrilling progress, immensely romantic, immensely reassuring, pressing home, not the individual's impotence, but the royal consequence of his lightest deeds—and converting the "Temeraire," in particular, from an ornament hung on a hook to a focus for eternal forces—slung securely in the centre of a web of widening causes whose ultimate filaments are caught among the stars.

* "Individuality and Art." By Herbert E. A. Furst. 3s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

That is the book Mr. Furst meant to write, making us his companions on a happy pilgrimage. But as the main idea worked in his mind it began to ferment; and the fumes made him see blood. It is a way ideas have. Even the mildest text, if you tease it about, will begin to look like a battle-cry; sooner or later the placidest pilgrim begins to feel he is on a tremendous Crusade. So with Mr. Furst. Essentially, I am sure, the very sweetest and most charming of persons, he has chewed this genial proposal of his back and forth until he has worked himself into the belief that he is a ruthless iconoclast, an æsthetic Ishmael—oh, the very devil of a chap. He tears his argument to tatters to make missiles of; he uses the "Temeraire" as a red flag; he flourishes and jeers and pirouettes like a matador. You might think he would have found some difficulty in discovering an adversary—but your really keen crusader can always find an infidel. Mr. Furst imagines two. One is the gentle creature whom he dubs "the infatuated anti-materialist," mocking his "soulfully transcendental transports," and thrusting something he calls a "dissecting-knife" under his diffident nose. The other band is composed of us poor fools of hero-worshippers, the deluded creatures who offer up what he calls "tribute to the individual." He will expose our idols—show us that Turner was, not a master at all, but a servant—and that "The Fighting Temeraire" is "as much to his credit as the rotation of the earth on its axis." Unhappy human nature! The result, of course, will be realised. Inevitably, his anger spoils his aim, blurs his sight; inevitably, the moment he begins to use it for cut-and-thrust work that dissecting-knife of his loses its beautifully cold, clear, scientific edge. One instance. Carried coolly out to its logical end, this process of stripping away all the influences that formed him would in one sense destroy Turner altogether, but it would not in the least demolish his magnificence. He would become an ambassador, a symbol for vast powers—a kind of arbitrary hieroglyph, if you like, which we use to indicate the point of intersection of endless impersonal forces; but none the less to be worshipped—indeed all the more: for now when we bow the knee to him we are really paying homage, through their representative, to those universal powers. But it is just these obeisances that Mr. Furst has pledged himself to deride, and from this final dissolution of Turner the private party he is therefore compelled to shrink. He has got to keep a melancholy shred of him to fling contemptuously down among us hero-worshippers with a terrible "That's all your Turner truly was." And so we actually find him, dissecting-knife and all, engaged in the comically sentimental and anti-scientific task of dividing the honours between J.M.W.T. and the forces that produced him. He gives Turner credit for something he calls "instinct" and decides that we may properly praise him for "his manner of suppressing facts": failing utterly to see—or rather forced to avoid seeing—that these "instincts," these "suppressions," are just as much a mere inheritance as his borrowed tricks or traceable knowledge.

But there! To hit a man violently, without warning or excuse, is, after all, one way of making him see stars; and regarded as dephlegmatising influence—not as a work of science, that is, but as a piece of art—the value of Mr. Furst's outburst is real. There are touches of real strength in it, too, touches even of beauty, phrases of fire; these ought not to be forgotten. And humanly one of the main results of our irritated denial of the heresy of his notion, our eager assertion that we are every bit as unconventional and ruthless as he is, and more so—is to make us immensely zealous supporters of his idea. Which, no doubt, is exactly what Mr. Furst most desires.

DIXON SCOTT.

STIRRING TIMES.*

Although the first eighteen years of her existence were spent in something of the solitary dignity of the great House on the West Indian island of Nevis, yet that the times of Julia France were really stirring times is abundantly proved before the reader reaches the close of this really fascinating study of modern life. We are too ready to assume that stirring times belong to some period that looms heroic through the distorting mist of history, or to the dateless days of old romance, but here, by one of the keenest and clearest intellects expressing themselves in fiction, we may recognise that we have been living, are still living, in stirring times, for the time of Julia France is the time of many who will delightedly read her story and who are resentful of the fact that they are coming to be regarded as middle aged! It is, indeed, a remarkably clever study of present day life that Mrs. Gertrude Atherton has given us, especially clever in its presentation of women, it may be said, for she is least genial in her selection of masculine types. There may be degenerates of a maniacal tendency, such as Harold France, in the families of our old aristocracy, there may be newly rich men of the city as objectionable as James William Jones, who marries the daughter of an impoverished peer that he may get into Society, but somehow the reader feels that the author has chosen more exaggerated types of men than she has of women in developing the thesis which she has selected. That her characters, engaging or repellent, are presented with a kind of remorseless faithfulness is only what Mrs. Atherton has taught us to expect in her novels. Julia herself is introduced to us as an innocent child who has been brought up on the island of Nevis by a domineering old mother who, guided by astrology, has learned as she thinks exactly what the girl's fate is to be. Thus when Lieutenant France, presumptive heir to a dukedom, appears and is at once impressed with Julia, Mrs. Edis loses no time in bringing about the fulfilment of the first stage of the girl's foretold progress to greatness. There is a hurried marriage; France goes off with his ship and Julia is sent to the care of a worldly aunt in London to await the husband of whom she knows but little, and whom she likes not at all. France is a man of over forty, a roué, a gambler, a drinker, and—to the observant—with hints of the coming event of insanity. In London, and at the Duke of Kingsborough's castle, Julia develops rapidly; circumstances seem to work towards her taking her place as wife of the heir to a dukedom—and had the heir been a shade better that might have been her fate—instead, however, she awakens, or is rudely awakened, to a sense of her position, and at length while agreeing—for a friend's sake—to appear as France's wife, to continue living in his house, she only does so with a pistol ever within reach. The pistol scene is a trifle theatrical, and yet, given the characters concerned, and the situation that has arisen, it is not unreal so.

* "Julia France and Her Times: A Novel." By Gertrude Atherton. 6s. (Murray.)

The times of Julia France bring us up to the Suffragette demonstrations of recent years, and the heroine—victim of a mother's ambition, of a man's selfishness and pride and of effete laws—bears a very prominent part in the movement. Whether as an innocent child, an avidly learning woman, as leader in a great cause, as friend, or as lover she is always possessed of an irresistible charm, and long and bitter as is the road she travels from the hasty marriage in Nevis, the reader would have felt something of a hurt if Mrs. Atherton had not taken her story to a more or less conventionally happy ending. But if Julia France fascinates us—as she fascinated people as widely different as Harold France, Nigel Herbert and Dan Tay—it is not only by the story, but by her thoughtful and illuminating treatment of some of the serious problems of modern life that the author at once attracts and holds us. The novel is indeed a big piece of work, one that may incidentally be commended to the thoughtful consideration of all Anti-Suffragists, as well as Suffragists, though some of the latter may think that Julia should not have accepted happiness with one out of sympathy with her cause, but in making her do so the author has only subtly stressed the fact that woman would be not less a woman for being a better citizen. The story of Julia France is a book that deserves to rank with the best works of fiction of the day, one that can be but inadequately discussed in a short review.

WALTER JERROLD.

CHARLES LAMB.*

"'Elia' did not reach a second edition in Lamb's lifetime," Mr. E. V. Lucas reminds us in this latest, amplest and most satisfying edition of Elia's works—"that is to say, during a period of twelve years—although the editions into which it has passed between his death and the present day are legion." In his lifetime, Lamb was overshadowed and rather patronised by many of his friends; Southey, for example, would have scouted the bare suggestion that a day could ever come when Elia as a personality or as an author would rank above himself; but ever since he passed out of life Lamb's popularity as an author has been surely and steadily increasing and his unique and delightful personality has been growing upon us until at length we know him more intimately, have a vividder idea of him, and are probably more really interested in him than in any of his great contemporaries. He is alive to us as Johnson is, and as Coleridge and Wordsworth are not; and this is because he was not only so quaint and lovable and utterly human a creature in himself that there is a perennial pleasure in reading whatever of fact anyone has to tell us about him, but because he has in the most literal sense put himself into everything he has written. His essays are not merely an utterance of his individual opinions and idiosyncrasies; he puts into them also sketches and stories of his relatives and friends; fashions them out of recollections of his childhood and youth, out of the joys and sorrows and odd events of his past, and the casual, everyday incidents of his present. George Dyer calls to see him, and going away walks short-sightedly into the New River, and one of his most whimsical essays grows out of that; a friend goes abroad, and you have "Distant Correspondents"; he recovers from an illness and writes "The Convalescent"; he is pensioned off from the India House and one of the best of his papers, "The Superannuated Man," is the result. If nobody had told us a word about him we could have gathered all the necessary material for a full biography from his essays and letters.

Johnson has a life apart from his writings, but the best life of Lamb is bound up with what he wrote, and yet to know him perfectly you must read, too, the anecdotes and odds and ends of information about him that many others have added to what he has told us of himself. And he has never had a more painstaking, more conscientious, more understanding editor than Mr. E. V. Lucas. Mr. Lucas's edition of Lamb's works originally appeared in seven more expensive volumes, and is now re-issued in six at five shillings each. This new issue has been "revised and amended and arranged in more companionable shape. Some new matter is included; some doubtful matter has been removed; and the notes, although occasionally enriched, have been reduced in number and often condensed." These copious, concise notes at the end of each book make an ideal concordance; they are a biographical dictionary of all the people Lamb refers to; some of them are essays in little on the underlying truths that Lamb has handled fantastically in several of his dissertations; all of them are interesting and essential for they do add something to our knowledge of Lamb, or his circle, or the world that he lived in. This cheaper edition, too, has the advantage of being the right size for the pocket; it is well printed, very tastefully bound and each volume has a frontispiece portrait. Three volumes are now ready, and when the sixth is out one has a pious hope that Messrs. Methuen may be moved to round off their enterprise with a re-issue of Mr. Lucas's admirable "Life of of Lamb" in the same cheap and attractive form.

S. J.

"HUMAN, WARIOUS."

It is very pleasant to find Mr. Balfour among the optimists, but we doubt if he was quite justified in describing modern fiction as gloomy and deeply tinged with pessimism. Such a description certainly applies to many new novels, as it applied to many old ones, and will apply to many yet to be written, until the world becomes perfect and tomorrow is no longer unsure. It is profitable for us that even in our fiction we should look upon life as it is, and not too complacently close our eyes on all but the sunny side of it. All our most popular novelists—those who sell by the hundred thousand—are unfailingly optimistic and see to it that virtue invariably triumphs and the end is a happy one, and for the rest you could count the pessimists among them on the fingers of your two hands, but the optimists are too numerous to be so readily numbered.

Apart from other considerations, it is not good for a man to go through life ignoring everything that may trouble him and make him sad. You have the evil effects of such a selfish course of living admirably illustrated both in "In Cotton Wool,"¹ and in "Blinds Down."² Mr. W. B. Maxwell presents you in Leonard Calcraft with a man who is, at the outset, despite his little vanities, a charming and likeable personality. He is a strong, healthy, handsome, nearly middle-aged idler, taking infinite care of himself, sensitively shrinking from the ugly facts of existence and whatever might endanger his comfort or disturb his emotions, devotedly attached to his invalid father, walking daily by the side of his bath-chair up and down the parade of a little seaside town, highly respected, looked to for advice by men younger and older than himself, popular with the ladies, but averse from the responsibilities of marriage, anxious to stand well in everybody's opinions, but secretly thankful that the pleadings of his father enable him to pose as a dutiful, self-sacrificing son when he refrains from rejoining the Yeomanry and going out to the Boer War. He is a wonderful blend of the conventional gentleman and the absolute cad. Mr. Maxwell draws him mercilessly, with insight and a subtle skill in psychology that go far to make this the most brilliant of his books. Lenny sacrifices even the woman he loves to his own comfort and selfish pleasure; on the eve of marriage with a rich, infatuated young widow, he runs away, fearing that marriage and a change of habits at his time of life may be unwise and dangerous to his health, and in the end, for all his watchful care of himself and his avoidance of the stony ways of the world he degenerates into a condition that is tragically pitiful. The art of this story and the tonic quality of its philosophy are finer and more moral things than any mere short-sighted cheerfulness.

* "The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb." Edited by E. V. Lucas. Vol. I.: Miscellaneous Prose. Vol. II.: Essays and Last Essays of Elia. Vol. III.: Children's Books. 5s. net each. (Methuen.)

¹ "In Cotton Wool." By W. B. Maxwell. 6s. (Hutchinson.)
² "Blinds Down." By H. A. Vachell. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

Mr. H. A. Vachell reads you a similar lesson in "Blinds Down." His sketches of mid-Victorian life and character are very subtly and delicately finished work. Here it is two elderly spinsters, the Misses Mauleverer, who live wrapped in cotton wool, so resolute to see nothing evil or nasty around them that they always keep the blinds down over their southern windows that overlook Hog Lane, the slummy corner of their country town. They have the upbringing of their half-sister, Rosetta, a lively, pretty girl much younger than themselves, who finds their narrow outlook and prim conventions sometimes amusing and nearly always irksome, but because she loves them, obeys them, with occasional revolts. They will not discuss nor allow her to discuss any but the most decent, agreeable topics of human concern; they try to close her eyes as they close their own against whatever might shock or offend them; and what is the outcome of this scrupulous turning away from all but pleasant truths? Loving Rosetta passionately as they do, they nevertheless make wreck and ruin of her life, and a day comes when she returns to them, and, to keep them from leading her daughter into a loveless but highly respectable marriage, tells them plainly how, having kept her in ignorance of the hard facts, the sorrows and dangers of existence, they had sent her out into a world where those hard facts and sorrows and dangers had to be faced and her ignorance was no protection to her, and that if in her training they had thought more of large realities and less of petty proprieties she might have been happy now instead of miserable. Before you decide that literature should be always cheerful, you would do well to look around you a little, and to read these books.

Which is not to deny that one may be both cheerful and truthful. Mrs. Wemyss achieves that unity in "A Lost Interest"—a cleverly developed witty comedy that runs lightly now and then along the edge of tragedy, but never slips over. Violet Egerton, a charming young married lady, almost as winsomely innocent as Mr. Vachell's Rosetta, attracts the admiration of a personable, middle-aged Cabinet Minister. He contrives to dispatch her husband on a lengthy foreign mission, and in his absence sets himself to enliven the loneliness of little Mrs. Egerton. He is a born philanderer. So long as she shrinks from him, half-afraid, he is keen in the pursuit, but as soon as she is glad to see him and begins to find pleasure in his company he loses interest in her. His interest thus revives, slackens and revives again, and at last it is only the intervention of the kindly, worldly-wise old Lady Blatherwaite that, covering the complacent Minister with ridicule, snatches the flattered, fluttered little wife back into safety in time. It is a capital story, punctuated with good epigrams, and alive with shrewd comments on modern society.

This problem of the wife and the other man is dealt with in widely differing and more sombre ways in "Between Two Stools,"¹ in "Wings of Desire," and in "The Dewpond." In these cases the trouble arises not from the mere absence of the husband, but because the wife has ceased to love him. Miss Rhoda Broughton handles the theme with a freshness and vigor that are amazing when you look back on her long record of achievement and note the date of her first book. One does not hesitate to place this as the best of her many novels; the style is easy, concise, interesting, and the characterisation clear-cut and true, and the story of the patient wife, mated to a man who has for ten years been paralysed and has, by his harshness and brutalities of speech, worn down her compassion and forfeited her affection; watched by a precocious daughter and fearful of being betrayed by her; drifting into love with her husband's close friend, whom she had disliked until after her husband perversely compelled her to tolerate him—all this is unfolded with sympathetic understanding and a ripe narrative skill. Both she and the man are too inherently honourable to do more than own their love of each other, and to feel secretly ashamed of the knowledge that they are waiting wearily for her husband to die. For his own sake she even sends her lover away from her, at length, and nearly drives him into marrying one of the least sophisticated, most oddly charming girls we have met in recent fiction, but fate is kinder to them after all than they had intended to be to themselves.

There is a good rascally romance of a hidden treasure hunt in "Wings of Desire,"² but this only serves to lend a little additional colour and a spice of adventure to a story whose main interest gathers about Sara Bellew, her extraordinary father, her emancipated sister, her husband, Archer, the great novelist, and Captain Billy Knivett, the quiet, large-minded man who understands her and loves her, keeps a doggedly faithful guardianship over her, and is always ready to spend himself in her service. She has all her life been in subservience, first to her father, a genial, eccentric domestic tyrant, and now to both him and her husband, for he shares their household; and she is fretting with all the modern woman's impatience of restraint, reaching out vainly after freedom and a larger life. She had been ambitious of a musical career, but marriage has put a stop to that; she has no children; and her husband has so often given her cause for jealousy that she has grown indifferent to him. A bitter resentment against woman's being "bound by the tyranny of bygone centuries to the vile service of sex" sounds intermittently through this poignantly human story, that lays bare the weaknesses of mankind and of womankind frankly, but with a right artistic reticence of phrase and keen imaginative sympathy.

Once again in "The Dewpond"³ there is the woman unhappily married and meeting when it is too late the man who should have been her husband, but the story is so entirely different in method, in style, in its types of character, that it is as utterly unlike the other three that revolve round this central idea as any story well could be. The wife here might have lived resignedly in decorous respectability to the end of her days, but for one casual, petulant act of hers that chanced to have an unseen witness. Out of this trivial incident Mr. Charles Marriott ingeniously, plausibly, draws a chain of little happenings which links on naturally at last to his final catastrophe—if catastrophe that can be called which makes two people happy and leaves the third too priggishly self-centred to be really miserable. Its very slightness is part of the plot's cleverness; you are interested in the book mainly because its varied characters are in themselves abundantly interesting, and because it is written with delightfully deft touches of fancy, and an airy, slightly cynical humour.

But if, like Mr. Balfour, you prefer novels that will cheer you, you cannot do better than get "The Family Living,"⁴ "A Bachelor's Comedy,"⁵ and "The Inviolable Sanctuary."⁶ The two first are concerned with clerical life, and the third is written by a clergyman. Mr. Lacon Watson's humour has a saturnine streak in it and sharpens now and then into satire, but it is as urbane as it is shrewd. The follies of mankind do not exasperate him—they amuse him, and though he shoots them smartly as they fly his arrows are not poisoned. He knows the life of the country parson and the schoolmaster from the inside, and he traces his irresolute, self-distrustful hero, Algernon Ridley, through those careers with realistic forcefulness and a quiet whimsicality that is, delightfully entertaining. Algernon asserts

¹ "Wings of Desire." By M. P. Willcocks. 6s. (John Lane.)

² "The Dewpond." By Charles Marriott. 6s. (Hurst & Blackett.)

³ "The Family Living." By E. H. Lacon Watson. 6s. (John Murray.)

⁴ "A Bachelor's Comedy." By E. H. Buckrose. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

⁵ "The Inviolable Sanctuary." By George A. Birmingham. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

¹ "A Lost Interest." By Mrs. George Wemyss. 6s. (Constable.)

² "Between Two Stools." By Rhoda Broughton. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

himself sufficiently to have a love affair of his own, and to get splashed by a scandal; and on the death of his father he thankfully throws over the family living and goes seeking adventure abroad, but the pull of early associations lures him back, and after all he not only succeeds to his father's vicarage, but marries the very girl his father had chosen for him.

Mrs. Buckrose's bachelor is a young vicar of a country parish, who suffers under the name of Andrew, because when people get friendly with him they have an instinctive aptness to wound his dignity by calling him Andy. His comedy is the best of good fun, played out amongst a motley collection of quaint parishioners, and gradually taking into its scope a very pretty love affair, that has its moments of anxiety and hints of heartbreak, but is more often in the sun than the shadow, and has never a memory of any shadow left upon it at the close.

The spirit of comedy presides over Mr. George A. Birmingham's pages also, and makes occasional excursions into the realm of farce. A runaway honeymoon couple, hiding among some small islands in remote wilds of Ireland, are suspected of being German spies. It was a little unkind of Mr. Birmingham to make the bridegroom, a clergyman, such a laughable nincompoop; but Priscilla would make amends for more than that. Priscilla is not the bride; she is a fascinating, tomboyish flapper, who looks after her cousin Frank Mannix, a self-important public schoolboy, when he comes north on a holiday, and soon snubs and crushes all the starched pride out of him and reduces him to a state of almost primeval savagery. Boating among the islands, they sight the tent of the honeymoon couple, put them down at once as German spies and proceed to dog them, and keep a troublesome watch upon them; till the bride's father coming in pursuit is the guest of Priscilla's parent, and directly she learns the truth her sympathies go out to the fugitives—she constitutes herself their protector with the result that she considerably increases their discomforts in her anxiety for their safety, but shapes their fortunes to a highly satisfactory finish all the same. Its breezy, rollicking, irresponsible humour is simply irresistible. If it is a cheerful book you are after, here it certainly is; there is nothing serious anywhere about it except its title, and even that is not serious when you know what it means.

GHOSTS OF THE WELLS.*

This book should have been got up in dainty form for the pocket of those who to-day seek the salubrious air of Tunbridge Wells, where they can be far from the madding crowd and recall the memories of the past as well as satisfy the soul with the vision of the blue distances. The author does not stay to enlarge on the picturesque in landscape; but he has provided us with a book that is something to dip into at one's leisure, and is as companionable as it is essentially unpretentious. He repeats himself, as gossips have a way of doing, but his repetitions are not of the nature of the things to be resented.

With its three hundred years of history, Tunbridge Wells provides a splendid topic for the gossip; but apart from the pages of Thackeray and Meredith, old rhymes, old letters and memoirs, Mr. Melville is on virtually new ground. He has been anticipated by only two historians—Thomas Bengé Burr, in 1766, and Paul Amsinck, in 1810. The references in Waller and Congreve are not particularly important, though they are not forgotten.

The Royal patronage of the place, by Henrietta Maria and Catherine of Braganza, was, perhaps, more useful than particularly interesting. One is much more attracted by the stories of Richard Cumberland and Beau Nash, of both of whom Mr. Melville finds much to say and says it well. Gramont (or should we not say Gramont's brother-in-law?) provides the first description of the Wells, which the Duc de Cominges declared should be called "The Wells of Scandal." Defoe, to whom Mr. Melville is specially indebted, entered a warm defence of the ladies in this connection. He found the men much more to blame than the fair sex; and if, as Mr. Melville says, in the century in which the Wells enjoyed its greatest period of prosperity, "gallantry flourished in inverse ratio to athletics," this may possibly placate some of the critics of our contemporary wicket and goal, especially when it is remembered how the gallantry was accompanied by reckless gaming.

Mr. Melville has drawn largely on the correspondence of Lady Jane Coke, Mrs. "Bluestocking" Montagu, Dr. Arbuthnot, John Gay, Gilbert West, Samuel Richardson, and the autobiographies of Madame D'Arblay and Richard Cumberland. One of the best of his liberal supply of anecdotes is about Nash and the equally autocratic Sarah Jennings. There is a very interesting passage about the early residents moving their houses about from one spot to another. This sounds rather like an anticipation of transatlantic enterprise; and even when we gather that the houses in question were built on wheels or sledges, we are not altogether disappointed of a modern parallel, because the object in view was to evade taxation.

In taking us down to the Wells, Mr. Melville devotes some space to the touting for custom by

* "Society at Royal Tunbridge Wells in the Eighteenth Century—and After." By Lewis Melville. Illustrated from rare prints and portraits in the collection of A. M. Broadley. 10s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Richard Nash, Master of the Ceremonies at Bath and Tunbridge Wells.

From "Society at Tunbridge Wells" by Lewis Melville (Eveleigh Nash).

tradesmen who met the travellers en route. This practice was in force on the Epsom as well as on the Tunbridge road. There are some doggerel verses, of which the following lines form a part :

"Now this, please your Honour, is what we call Tooting,
A Trick in your Custom to get the first Footing."

These lines suggest a dreadful thought about a certain Scottish custom. But this by the way. Mr. Melville seems to think that the suburb of Tooting derived its name from the practice alluded to by his rhymester. But Tooting is described in the Domesday Book as "Totinges," and in olden times a family resident there were known as the Totingas. Among other gossip notes one may include the references to the way in which Dissent seems to have settled in Tunbridge in advance of the Establishment, which leads Mr. Melville to remark, when writing about the three hills in the vicinity of the Wells, that the third hill was called Mount Pleasant "perhaps to emphasise the fact that it had no connection with Dissent." Another point in passing may be mentioned: Defoe's statement that at the Wells "few drink physically," meaning medicinally.

In a sense Tunbridge Wells has had its day, together with Epsom and Bath; but it will always have its admirers—(unless in time a coal seam is discovered there), and Mr. Melville's most readable volume will surely add to their number.

W. F. A.

RUTHERFORD AND SON.*

"Rutherford and Son" is an impressive play made out of an evening and morning in the life of a north country manufacturer's family. Old Rutherford, owner of the works, gave his son John a year at Harrow to make him a gentleman, but John, like his elder sister Janet and elder brother Dick, the parson, is a repressed, sullen rebel against his father. John has made a discovery which will save the business from decline, but he refuses to give it up without a price, not seeing the necessity of putting everything into "Rutherford's." He has been a failure himself, marrying "common," and forced to come and live at home with his wife and baby. Dick, the parson, has decided to give up the parish because he can do nothing with a population which is entirely under his tyrannical father and the ideal of "Rutherford's." Janet is getting on for forty, and endures life because she has a love affair with Rutherford's right-hand man, a workman named Martin. Martin is John's confidant in his discovery. Old Rutherford hears the story of Janet and Martin just after a row with John over the giving up of the discovery. He sends for Martin, who is so overcome by the power of Rutherford and "Rutherford's" and perhaps by a fear that he is suspected with Janet, that he gives up the secret of the process, or promises to on the following morning. In the morning Martin gives up the secret and is dismissed for his pains. Martin dismissed, the old man sends for Janet, and, betraying her into a confession, tells her she must go next day and never come back. John is wild at Martin's unfaithfulness, and goes off with all he can find in his father's till, leaving his wife and child to follow when he has made a position for himself. Martin and Janet, and, perhaps, a baby, have to be off to begin life away from "Rutherford's." John's wife has little reason to expect John to do any good, so she makes a bargain with Rutherford:

"You're alone now and getting old, with no one to come after you. When you die Rutherford's will be sold—somebody 'll buy it and give it a new name perhaps, and no one will ever remember that you made it. That'll be the end of all your work. Just—nothing. You've thought of that. I've seen you thinking of it as I've sat by and watched you. . . . From you I can get what I want for my boy. . . . I want to undo the wrong we've done him, John and I. . . . You can give me all this—you've got the power. Right or wrong, you've got the power. . . . That's the bargain. Give me what I ask, and in return I'll give you him."

The child also is to become part of "Rutherford's." Old Rutherford is satisfied. As for the wife:

"And there'll be a woman" she says slowly, "living in the house, year after year, with the fells closed round her. She'll sit and sew at the window, see the furnace flare in the dark; lock up, and give you the keys at night."

Rarely does the author allow herself so much explicit poetry. It is a bleak, northern play, almost saved from sordidness by its bleakness, and so simple and free from waste and exaggeration as to attain on the whole, as well as in many of the parts, a lyrical intensity—a lyrical intensity equal to that of Mr. Edward Garnett's "Breaking Point," but co-operating with a greater depth and richness.

EDWARD THOMAS.

Novel Notes.

QUEEN OF THE GUARDED MOUNTS. By John Oxenham. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The French Revolution has furnished matter for many romances, but rarely for one of more stirring and varied interest or more charm than fill the romance that is unfolded in the pages of "Queen of the Guarded Mounts." Mr. John Oxenham has not taken the usual way of giving you pictures of the lurid doings in and around Paris during the reign of the Terror; he introduces you to a little party of fugitive aristocrats who come over to England and are drawn to finding a haven of refuge on St. Michael's Mount off the Cornish coast because of its resemblance to Mont St. Michel on the shore of Brittany, where their ancestral home had been. This little party consists of the Marquis de St. Aubin, his daughter Renée and his son Michel, and it is not long before the chief interest of the story centres on the delightful Renée. The Marquis and his son return to Brittany to play leading parts in a rising for the restoration of the Bourbons, and mainly through the mean duplicity and weakness of their exiled king all their loyal efforts are frustrated, and when their followers are in hiding and they in prison in that Mont St. Michel that had formerly been their home, Renée and certain of her English friends follow them out to Brittany in the hope of rescuing them. Meanwhile, on the English St. Michael's Mount, where she and her father and brother had won the hearts alike of the rugged fisher folk and the admirable little great persons of the village, Renée herself had found two lovers, who prove the manliest and most generous of men in their rivalry. The sketches of Cornish fishermen and Breton peasantry are very vividly realised, and we meet among these people many sturdily likeable and quaintly humorous personalities. The characterisation throughout is, indeed, excellent; the story bristles with adventure and dramatic incident, and is cunningly threaded with one of the most glamorously interesting of love idylls. The descriptions of the country round about the two Mounts are minutely and graphically picturesque, and the sixteen photographic illustrations add to the attractiveness of the book. "Queen of the Guarded Mounts" is a fresh and cleverly written novel that will enhance Mr. Oxenham's reputation with the general reader and is certain to enjoy as lasting a local popularity in the neighbourhoods of the French and English Mounts as "Lorna Doone" does in the Doone country.

* "Rutherford and Son": A Play in Three Acts. By Githa Sowerby. 2s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Photo by Lawson Taylor

Mr. W. Hope Hodgson.

THE NIGHT LAND. By W. Hope Hodgson. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

You may say that in "The Night Land" Mr. Hope Hodgson's reach exceeds his grasp, that his story in some of its details is obscure and difficult to follow, that he tells it in a quaint, archaic language that does not make for easy reading, but at least you cannot say he has not aimed at doing a big thing. He has set himself to unfold a love tale that is not bounded by the limits of a lifetime, but continues and is renewed again at last in a strange dream-life after many centuries. His hero is a man of two hundred years ago who loses the woman he loves not long after she is married to him; in utter grief and despair all his thoughts go yearning after her—they carry him far on down the ages yet to be, and he seeks her and cries out for her through new and newer phases of existence until, at length, in a miraculous trance state he finds himself at the close of some million of years living in the latter days of the world when the powers of evil have grown so potent, so aggressive, so almost all-conquering that the survivors of the human race are gathered for self-defence into one enormous pyramid, building their city tier above tier within it, and on every hand all around this Last Redoubt stretches the Night Land, inhabited by primeval, material giants and loathsome monsters and sinister, dreadful immaterial things of the spirit world that have power over the souls of mortals. Here, in this place of refuge, that man of two hundred years ago is continually sending his eager thoughts out across the grim wastes of the Night Land in search of the woman he had loved and lost; and a time comes when out of the vast and unknown darkness her thoughts answer him, and after some broken fashion they are able to communicate with each other. Suddenly this communication fails; he tries in vain to renew it; and fearful that she may have set out across that fiend-haunted dayless wilderness to find him, he takes all due precautions, arms and fits himself for his enterprise, quits the shelter of the Pyramid and begins to make his way in the direction whence he believes she may be coming. From this point onwards the story grows rapidly in power and interest. Whatever Mr. Hodgson lacks it is not imagination, and his description of that fearsome journey by trackless ways and through perils undreamt of before, and of the meeting of those two lovers, and the adventures, by turns grim, terrible, charmingly idyllic, through which they passed together give him scope for painting some of the most eerie, wildly horrible and pleasantly dainty pictures that have ever come from his pen. We shall not attempt to give any full outline of Mr. Hodgson's romance—it runs to nearly six hundred pages and is crowded with incident and alive with inner significances and undercurrents of meaning. You may read it as a cloudy and elusive allegory, if you have a liking for that form of literature, but in its allegorical aspect it is not simple enough, it needs too much explaining, and you will do better perhaps to read it simply as a daintily imaginative love story, and as such you will find it a very original and sufficiently remarkable book.

THE GOLIGHTLYS: FATHER AND SON. By Laurence North. 6s. (Secker.)

"The Golightlys" is a brilliant and a disappointing book, which could only have been written by a singularly able man. It is witty, it is in many ways profoundly true, and it is certainly a book that is capable of giving very keen enjoyment to all who care for good things. The character of Potiphar Golightly stands out clear as a cameo, seen unerringly by a mind that is both penetrating and rich in experience; and there is here to be gathered, more surely than has been possible in stories which have more steadfastly laboured to present it, a distinct impression of the journalistic world. Through the intrigues that provide the main interest, one may catch little gleams of personal histories, which fall into their due place, and give the book a great air of real doings and comprehensive knowledge. There are vivid and unusual pictures of undergraduate life at Oxford; the impressions one gets of every person in the story are unhesitating, full of suggestion and knowledge; and the book is, in the highest sense, entertaining. But it lacks momentum. It is Thackerayan in this as in other respects, indescribably scattered, so that although one actually perceives the design, and appreciates the subtlety of the mind that could so deliberately project a story which just catches these various lives at the point of contact, one's final impression is of the author's capacity. It is the supreme test of a novel that the author's ability should not be apparent.

IN THE VORTEX. By Clive Holland. 6s. (Hurst and Blackett.)

Take a young artist of Puritan upbringing and somewhat plastic character, shake him up, and put him in Montmartre—the capital of Bohemia—and what will happen? Pretty much, we imagine, what happens in "In the Vortex." He will be shocked at first, but afterwards his conduct will lack the restraint of even his more level-headed and worldly-wise companions. This is the case with Elbert Glynn, who finds the contrast between Primrose, Pennsylvania, and Paris too much for his stability. He deceives his mother with stories of his brilliant success, consumes a large quantity of absinthe, and gets entangled with his model, Jeanette. As it happens, the last of his faults turns out to be the making of him, for Jeanette's love is perfectly sincere, and it outlasts some very trying experiences. To tell the truth, the attractive model is far too good for Glynn, who is rather a backboneless person and may be accounted singularly lucky in his love affair. Mr. Clive Holland knows his Bohemia very thoroughly, and he contrives to put a good deal of its glitter and fascination into this long and entirely readable book, which is particularly noteworthy for numerous excellent studies of character. "In the Vortex" is a clever and very likeable piece of work, and well deserves the popularity which is certain to come to it.

THE FEN DOGS. By Stephen Foreman. 6s. (John Long.)

It is a surprising thing, when one thinks of it, that the period of the Peninsular War has been so little used by our novelists. For in its singular mixture of chivalry and savagery, there has been no historical drama since to equal it. The sound instinct which has led Mr. Stephen Foreman to this subject in "The Fen Dogs," has resulted in a tale of very unusual interest and undoubted ability. The Fen Dogs are two Lincolnshire soldiers, who deserted from Moore's army during the retreat on Corunna. The one recovered his manhood and rejoined his comrades, and found on his return to England that his baser brother-in-arms had betrayed the girl who had inspired his own resolution. An exciting story centres round the deterioration of the deserter, over whom a cloud of suspicion begins to gather, and who, from moral weakness, is ultimately led to murder. Condemned to death, the murderer makes use of an ancient statute and claims his right to trial by combat, a challenge eagerly accepted by his erstwhile comrade. We have said enough to show that the plot proceeds on novel and enthralling lines. It is only fair to add that it is well-managed to the last, and that the characterisation is no whit inferior to the management of the plot. It is a pleasure to say that the book is one of the best-planned and most skilfully wrought books of the season.

VIEWS AND VAGABONDS. By R. Macaulay. 6s. (Murray.)

Nearly all the qualities that go to make a successful novel are to be found in this book. The writing is uniformly of a very high standard, and there is abundance of shrewd wit, natural dialogue, and faithful characterisation. And yet it may be doubted if the book be entirely successful in its subtle and somewhat ambitious intention, to wit, a mordant satire of idealism. Benjie Bunter, after a brilliant degree at Cambridge, threw in his lot with the "working classes," setting up first as a blacksmith and then as a carpenter. As no half-measures ever sufficed for the un-humorous Benjie, he married Louie Robinson, a mill hand, whose brother 'Arry was a weak-chested spouter of socialism. In the end, Benjie is dragged down to the drab level of the Robinson family, supporting by his industry a tribe of somewhat disreputable relatives, including his new-found father, Captain Prittie, an ancient and thirsty mariner. A second group of characters is drawn from Benjie's aristocratic relatives on his mother's side, who represent the matter-of-fact point of view, with the exception of a couple of amateur idealists who stop short of Benjie's thoroughness. But the real contrast to Benjie, the man of views, is supplied by Betty and Tommy Crevequer, two joyous vagabonds who have no philosophy beyond gathering rose-buds while they may. Neither the idealists nor the vagabonds are very convincing, the latter, particularly, suggesting Dickensian exaggeration. Miss Macaulay's gifts are seen to much better advantage in her brilliant handling of the minor characters, such as the entirely fatuous Lady Lettice, and the pathetic figure of the unsatisfied Louie, and her unspeakably common parents. It is a clever book a little over-laboured.

THE CITY OF LIGHT. By W. L. George. 6s. (Constable.)

There is a fresh spontaneity about this tale of French family life which successfully invests an old theme with new interest. Mr. George's plot is simplicity itself. He takes two typical middle-class Parisian families, and shows us to what lengths parental authority can be exerted in order to discourage or encourage, as the case may be, a match between the respective son and daughter. As the Bernay parents are not more than mildly acquiescent in the love of their daughter Suzanne for Henri Duvernoy, it is, of course, necessary for the purposes of the story that Henri should be a faint-hearted lover, fearful to marry against his parent's wishes a girl who has not an adequate dol. And so we watch with something almost of satisfaction the various forms of tyrannous pressure that are put upon Henri—all, be it said, with the best intentions—till at last even he is driven into rebellion, and goes boldly to claim the patient girl who has so long waited for him. Mr. George has considerable facility in the delineation of character. His people are living individuals, each with a distinct personality of his own, and they are handled by him with no little literary skill. It is obvious in every page that Mr. George has an intimate acquaintance with the life he is describing, and, in fact, one can detect at times a phrase or two which indicate that the author was thinking in French rather than in English when he was writing this story.

THE COMMON TOUCH. By Austin Philips. 6s. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Mr. Austin Philips is now fairly well known as a writer of short stories, and in this, his first novel, he displays an uncommon amount of talent for the larger and different kind of work. Not only is the tale well told and illustrated with quite a remarkable gift for swift and brilliant character study, but it is inspired by an idea, fiercely and passionately expressed, which will kindle the sympathies of a large body of the public. Mr. Philips stands up savagely for the so-called Philistines, against the school of advanced thought once led by Grant Allen, but now directed by a novelist of high genius and a playwright of satirical wit. With a fine skill in staging his dramatic exposure of the vice and folly that masquerade under a certain kind of artistic socialism, Mr. Philips sets his story in the post office of a small provincial English town. So we get a rich background of amusing types of small townfolk, all possessing the common touch so distressing to persons lifted up on the last and most fashionable movements of modern thought. A decent girl, wearing the latest thing in art dresses and the newest fancies in intellectual revolt, arrives from London to work behind the counter of the post office. She is a very advanced young lady, who thinks that a new era for mankind opened when Nora banged the door on "The Doll's House." To the horror of her London friends, this child of light begins to find some of the provincial Philistines companionable and interesting, and the Philistines get to like her, and make an effort to save her from ruin by endowing her with the common touch of sanity. There is a moving struggle for the soul of the girl, in the telling of which the author gets in all he wants to say about the characters of some of the leaders of the present revolutionary movement in our literature. His views are strong, and very strongly stated; but he has cleared the air in a way that no other writer has done.

THE FLY IN THE OINTMENT. By Frances Hammond. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

A girl, charming of manner, with a face "as dainty and exquisite as a Greuze picture," an heiress—and a hunchback, such is the central character of Miss Frances Hammond's story. Her physical deformity, magnified by the natural sensitiveness of her mind was the "fly in the ointment" of Theodora Hope's life. Tragic and pitiful are the disillusionments that result from her craving for that higher love of a man for a woman that pays no regard to bodily infirmity, and the effect of these experiences on the heroine's character are worked out with skilful analysis. Sombre as it is in its main aspect, the book has no lack of animation and the dialogue is often witty and vivacious. The minor characters are well-drawn, and if the authoress is a trifle melodramatic on occasion it will doubtless be imputed to her for righteousness by lovers of the strong meat of fiction. The psychological side of the novel, in fact, is subordinated to its action in the external world. From the treachery and malice of secret enemies, the faithlessness of a weak-kneed lover, the loss by death of loyal friends, Theo Hope emerges at last, purified by suffering, and comes into her spiritual inheritance, saved in spite of herself from the warping of character that threatened her more than once in the course of a life of bitterness.

A SEMI-DETACHED MARRIAGE. By Margaret Legge. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

We take this to be a first novel, at least, we confess to no previous knowledge of the author's work, and therefore, it is not to be judged harshly. Against the altogether unconvincing "plot" of the story, and the glaring improbabilities that occasionally confront the reader, may be placed some considerable powers of observation, a sympathetic attitude towards mankind, an entirely creditable restraint that keeps writer and reader out of the dirt, and a good sense that will not permit any unnecessary tragedy. More than that, it is a readable book—this "Semi-Detached Marriage"—it is not without touches of humour, and it improves as it goes on. That Janet with such a mother, and such a husband, should have developed into a brave and sensible woman, strong and self-reliant, is the real right thing. That Dick Hadow could only be made tolerable by the destruction of his pride is equally good. Nevertheless, we cannot share Janet's admiration for Dick's literary dreamings. It is to be hoped he dropped that kind of writing after the reconciliation, for it won't do at all. We rejoice at the discomfiture of Hilary Curtiss and Mrs. Willersby, at the happiness of Marcia—a fine character—and Sir Reginald, and are impressed far more by the suffering of Evie than by the death of Gerald. For, whereas Gerald's death is not necessary to the story, there are many Evie Pennythwaites of wasted lives in country places. We may reasonably look for better things to come from the pen of Margaret Legge.

THE SIGNAL AND OTHER STORIES. By W. M. Garshin. 6s. (Duckworth & Co.)

Wsewold Michailovich Garshin is known to Russian literature as the author of some twenty short stories the bulk of which are contained in the volume before us. The translator, Captain Rowland Smith of the British Embassy at St. Petersburg, has done his work well, although we imagine the volume has lost something in translation from a language so complex as Russian. The stories are various in type, but each gives an illuminating glimpse of life as seen through the sensitive, melancholy Slavonic temperament. The opening story, "The Signal," tells in graphic fashion a tragic episode in the life of a linesman on a Russian railway, and in "Four Days" Garshin draws on his experiences in the Russo-Turkish war, and describes the sensations of a wounded soldier overlooked by the ambulance corps. "Coward" is another war story full of the elemental stuff of life. "The Frog who Travelled," a fable, reminiscent of Hans Andersen, is not new to us; possibly some version of this story has been given in English before. Garshin sees life more subjectively than Gorky, but the racial affinity between the two writers is clearly visible. And although Garshin's work is at times slight in texture it is so distinctively national that it will prove a welcome addition to the representative literature of Russia as translated into our tongue.

WAR AND THE WOMAN. By Max Pemberton. 6s. (Cassell.)

Mr. Max Pemberton's latest novel, while no less successful as a story than any of its predecessors, has a serious purpose behind it. It advocates nothing less than a scheme for the Federation of Europe, which shall ensure the benefits of universal peace. It may be noted here that "the scheme has obtained favour at the Courts of the Continent and is warmly approved by many in this country, who realise how inseparably the Peace question is allied to that of the national finance." Commerce, we are told, is the key. "When I can throw down the commercial bias, I can cast out war," are the words put into the mouth of the leading (fictional) advocate of the scheme. And again we are told that "the day when any European nation disarmed for reasons of sentimentality would be the last day of its freedom. We must deal with facts as they are; we cannot run ahead of the great company of men, for assuredly we shall fail if we do." It must not be supposed, however, that because "War and the Woman" is a novel with a purpose, it is not also pre-eminently a readable book. Lovers of the bustling tales at which Mr. Max Pemberton is an expert will find plenty of material for excitement in its pages, while an effective love-interest serves as the link between the book's purpose and its plot. John Faber is the "big man" of the book—an American millionaire who has made his money by the manufacture of rifles and the impedimenta of war. Of war in the abstract he approves, he regards it as human nature. But a taste of its horrors, experienced during some Albanian fighting, of which Mr. Pemberton supplies several graphic descriptions, helps him to change his mind. The other compelling factor in the metamorphosis of Faber is Gabrielle Sylvestre, the daughter of a Congregationalist minister, who has distinguished himself in the Peace movement. The reader must discover for himself the ingenious manner in which the author contrives a properly happy ending to a dramatic story, to which labour troubles, rumours of the invasion of England, and the freezing of the North Sea contribute their quota. And he will be well rewarded, for "War and the Woman" is one of the best books that Mr. Pemberton has ever written.

JACQUINE OF THE HUT. By E. Gallienne Robin. 6s. (Hurst & Blackett.)

As a setting for such a picturesque romance as this it would be hard to find a more ideally romantic place than the Island of Sark. On that wildest and loveliest of the Channel Islands, in the later years of the eighteenth century, Jacquine lived with her undesirable father in an isolated hut on a hillside. Secretly she has grown to love Ricart de Carteret, but she is a poor fisherman's daughter and Ricart is of the old aristocracy of the Island; she follows him jealously of a night, thinking he goes "to meet some girl," and lights upon the fact that he is one of the leaders of a thriving gang of smugglers. He discovers her spying on him; and is angry till she confesses her reason for doing so and simply reveals that she loves him. He is rough with her, tells her with brutal frankness it is not likely that one of his standing can have much to do with one of hers, but when he is satisfied that she has no thought of betraying him he bids her lend a hand at rolling and lifting casks in the cavern where he is hiding them, and she is glad so to serve him. How this love affair, so strangely begun, develops, and brings sadness and humiliation and despair to Jacquine, and in the end happiness, are matters to be read of in the book itself, which wonderfully captures the atmosphere of the Island and pictures the lives of its people. It is a delightfully human story, full of colour and adventure, and written with that easy charm of style that is one of the best gifts in the story-teller's armoury.

EVE'S SECOND HUSBAND. By Corra Harris. 6s. (Constable.)

Eve's first husband was a negligible quantity as he died early; her second was Adam West, editor of the Booneville Banner, Congressman, and eventually Governor of Tennessee. The story is slight, but that is more than balanced by its homely humour, its apt American way of putting thoughts and feelings into words, mixed up with philosophical axioms, intended to reveal the inner reasons for emotions. Adam is an attractive man, often liable to drink too much, yet so charmingly boyish that Eve never could resist the temptation to believe him when he would swear never to take another drop as long as he lived. For two years Adam has another wife in Washington, while Eve is bringing up the family at Booneville, and Eve, finding this out, thinks it better "to bankrupt her husband than to economise so much that he can afford extravagances for another woman," so she runs up bills for several thousand dollars. The whole story is an amusing record of the way in which Eve surmounts difficulties in her life with a husband whom she loves. The author generalises somewhat too much upon the assumed moral difference between men and women; thus: "a man's moral nature is very nearly a fiction anyhow"; "there is something in every man to which no good woman appeals"; and again, "being a good woman does not pay, except in goodness." This is not only a clever story, but a very human and cheerful one, which might furnish solace and words of wisdom to many a perplexed young wife.

THE COST OF IT. By Eleanor Mordaunt. 6s. (Heinemann.)

The hero and heroine are so high-spirited that we read this story with unusual interest; and they are both so fearless and so impulsive that quite a series of little shocks pleasantly reward us. Thus the orphaned little Clare Thorold tells her unsympathetic aunt, in borrowed language, that she is "a devilish bad-tempered slut," and Henry Mostyn, learning that for nineteen years his mother of mixed French and Creole extraction—has been deserted by her husband and left in the island of Montserrat, tells his father that he is an unnatural blackguard and cad, after which he leaves the ancestral home for the life of a sugar-planter with his mother. The exigencies of story-telling demand that these two fiery young creatures should meet and claim affinity, and later comes the consideration of the cost of it, with which Miss Mordaunt mingles a further consideration as to the cost of producing human life. The pictures of Montserrat and its inhabitants are vivid, while the emotional and adventurous incidents are highly persuasive of the importance of finishing the story once it is begun. Clare gets terror into her soul lest in her child the far-back taint should reappear, a terror which surrounds the birth with extra horrors for all around her. It is possible that the attempts so prevalent in recent years among the anti-feminists to belittle woman are resulting in the desire on the part of sympathisers with the other point of view to show woman at the height of her endurance and courage, for several recent novels have dealt with child-birth, generally so decorously avoided.

THE DEPARTMENT STORE. By Margaret Bohme. Translated by Ethel Colburn Mayne. 6s. (Appleton)

Readers in search of a story will be well advised to pass over "The Department Store," which is a very long and deadly serious piece of work, of considerable value in some respects, but with no spark of amusement for the frivolous reader. A more serious matter, however, lies in the fact that, while it interests, it does not win the reader's sympathies. Possibly the responsibility for this rests with the translator (who, however, seems to us to have fulfilled her duties with much success); more probably it may be attributed to the enormous number of characters introduced by the author, and their confusing abundance of action. As soon as one realises that the action of the book is entirely inchoate and disconnected and that it is intended to bear only upon the development of character—that, in fact, there is no plot or story whatever—Miss Böhmé's novel will produce the impression that she intends. "The Department Store" is simply a very generous slice of life as it is lived in modern Berlin; any one of its numerous sets of characters has very little to do with any other set; and the whole book has been planned in accordance with as vivid and as life-like a presentment as possible. Depressing at times, as are all realistic novels, "The Department Store" affords ample material for reflection, and no reader can entirely miss its import or fail to be impressed by its author's patience and industry.

The Bookman's Table.

DRAKE IN CALIFORNIA. By Herman Scheffauer. 2s. 6d. net. (Fisher.)

THE MASQUE OF THE ELEMENTS. By Herman Scheffauer. 3s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

There is a certain stately music and breadth of vision, a cloudy, darkling sense of mystery and height and spaciousness in the series of songs that make up "The Masque of the Elements"; there are subtly imaginative descriptive touches, sombre or rapturous dreamings over the endless drama of life and death and rebirth as sun, moon, earth, the four elements personified, and the spirit of chaos pass in glorious pageantry across the limitless stage of Time and Space. And if of these two books we prefer "Drake in California" it is because here Mr. Scheffauer comes right down to earth and is vigorously and poignantly human; he is no longer singing among the stars about cosmic forces and the miracles of matter and spirit, but his song is all of man in the flesh and the good hard, common life he lives on the homely earth. For sheer grimness and force of imagination "The Ballad of the Battlefield" is worthy of Kipling, but it sings the horror and the misery of battle instead of its glory; there is a fitting bluntness and breezy strength, too, in "Drake in California," and vividness and pathos, and an inherent story-telling gift in "The Ballad of the Friar"; and the muscular, sinewy, clinching vigor and swiftness of movement of "The Viking's Death Song" grip and thrill you like the sound of a great voice singing. The work in these two volumes covers a wide range of thought and feeling and proves that Mr. Scheffauer has the root of the matter in him. If he fulfils the promise that is in these poems he will go far.

ON THE BACKWATERS OF THE NILE: STUDIES OF SOME CHILD RACES OF CENTRAL AFRICA. By the Rev. A. L. Kitching, M.A. With 57 Illustrations and a Map. 12s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

There is a jollity about Mr. Kitching's book which is peculiarly attractive, and adds very largely to its readability without in any way detracting from its more solid qualities. It is also very much unlike the usual record of missionary experience. The author has had the good fortune—from the point of view of the writer of books—to have been stationed in out-of-the-way parts of Uganda, and he has come into daily contact with some of its lesser known peoples. His book is divided into two sections, the first and shorter descriptive of his life and experiences in Uganda, and the second to a study of the social life, dress, food, pastimes, and so forth of several of the native tribes. This latter portion of the book is possessed of an obvious value, which is increased by the humour and facility of the author's writing. There are many illustrations from photographs reproduced from Mr. Kitching's negatives.

CHIEFS AND CITIES OF CENTRAL AFRICA. By Olive Macleod. With 151 Illustrations from Photographs, 61 in the Text from Drawings, and 3 Maps. 10s. net. (Blackwood.)

Miss Macleod's beautifully-produced volume is a pleasant and chatty record of a very interesting journey. Starting from Forcados, on one of the mouths of the Niger, she and her companions, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Talbot, travelled through Nigeria and the German Kamerun into the Chad Territory of French Equatorial Africa, whence they returned to Kano and Lagos by a circuitous route down the River Logono and across Lake Chad—which last, of course, is practically unexplored territory. The greater part of this lengthy journey was made by river, but the writer and her friends were on shore sufficiently often to make an elaborate collection of botanical specimens and many other curios, which have been presented to the British Museum, while a couple of lion cubs were brought safely from the Chad region to the London Zoological Gardens. Miss Macleod shows a pleasant sense of humour in her accounts of the dealings of her party with the natives, of which the story of the Jéggara, or Sultan, of Gulfei, near Lake Chad, may be taken as typical. "He came in and sat with us, attended by one courtier only, who acted as interpreter. We craved permission to visit the palace, which the Jéggara granted readily; but still he sat on, conversation flagged, so in default of anything else to say we offered him the hospitality of tea, as an offer of spirit might, we thought, be taken as an insult by one professing the Mahommedan faith. Instantly he rose and took his leave, and Mastaba told us he had been frightened and had said to his companion, 'Why do the English wish to kill me? Why do they offer me grass?' " Admirers of travel books—and, indeed, the reading-public generally—will find plenty to interest and amuse them in the pages of "Chiefs and Cities of Central Africa." The illustrations are also well worthy of attention.

Fulani Musician.

From "Chiefs and Cities of Central Africa" by Olive Macleod.
(Blackwood.)

THE SETTING SUN. By "Anonymous" 1s 6d net (Murray)

Among the scanty list of poets who are published now by Mr. Murray we remember very well Sir Ronald Ross who, a year or two ago, presented us with twins: the one a scientific monument, the other—which alone the present writer may appreciate—a slender and delightful book of poems. It is not a secret that he is the author of "The Setting Sun," a most vivacious satire and, since Byron's day, more interesting in its way than any which has come from Albemarle Street. Yet more than Byron, it resembles "Hudibras," which is to say that there is unavoidable monotony in metre. But the non-scientific writings of a great scientist allure us all, and when the author speaks of his discoveries the interest is really breathless. As to the transmission and the subsequent cure of malaria, which the Italians tried to claim the honour of discovering:

"One mission theirs to find the stuff
And all's not much, nor much enough
With talon'd hands and shaggy hair
Each struggles in his burrow there,
His head is bury'd subterrene,
Only his jerking heels are seen.
It haply fortune one consoles,
The rest run shrieking from their holes,
Snatch at the prize and fighting round it Declare each one 'twas he who found it."

"My loss no longer I repine;
I have my humble fig and vine;
Content—my robbers sit in state,
Content—'twas I who made them great."

Sir Ronald's poem makes upon you the impression that it was composed from dawn to dusk of a wet Sunday in a country house and, to all appearance, it afforded great diversion to its author. Near the end, when he has flung his arrows at a multitude of frauds and solemn frauds and follies, as, for instance, national sloth:

"Because our fathers, victories won,
Think that our day will ne'er be done;
Because the ocean is our wall,
Forget that Watts has made it small;
Engross'd in getting nobly fat,
Detest the drummer's rattattat;
From arms allow our youth to shrink,
But let them slink and drink and sink."

He deprecates his own attempt to wear the singing robes, for in Athene's service he has less to win, says he, and less to try:

"No heights allure, no depths appal;
Tho' less the triumph, less the fall
Here in her deep and dusky dell
The silent cypress groweth well.
Along the lawns of level grass
The tinkling streamlets pause and pass
Piercean, nor thy Hippocrene
More bubbling beauteous to the scene
To their low notes the nightingale
Enlargeth her long-linked wail
Of tongue-deprived Philomel,
What time the lone star looms his light
Upon the purple brows of night,
And fragrant pine odours embark
Within the deep-endonjon'd dark,
Like memory's In her high eyes
No passion shakes the still surmise,
The tho't awakens, the man dies

"Who never dies no tears embalm,
In tho't, like death, eternal calm

"I follow her The Ages lapse,
And passing sigh one word Perhaps

THE FUTURE OF POETRY. An Essay by F. P. B. Osmaston 2s 6d net (Elkin Mathews)

